THE READER'S ENCYCLOPEDIA

SECOND EDITION

THOMAS Y. CROWELL COMPANY

New York / Established 1834
Publisher's Preface

The Thomas Y. Crowell Company has been publishing reference books since 1886. During those seventy-nine years, many of these books have passed through several editions, each of which has represented a significant improvement over the previous edition. In general, these changes were part of that continuing process of gradual revision which makes good reference books better. The second edition of The Reader's Encyclopedia, however, is much more than a revision. It is a new book built on the foundations of the old.

The Reader's Encyclopedia was first published in 1948, under the editorship of the late William Rose Benét. In 1955 a 28-page supplement was added. Almost immediately thereafter work was begun on a complete revision of the book.

The new Reader's Encyclopedia contains 19 per cent more material than the old. This expansion has been achieved by increasing the dimensions of the page, while retaining the old type size. The additional material falls into three classes:

1. New entries. These cover literary developments of the last fifteen years, and also earlier writings in areas and periods of growing interest to modern readers, such as the Orient, the Soviet Union, Latin America, and the Near East.

2. Expansion of old entries. This process has aimed at a well-balanced coverage of world literature, with emphasis on areas of special interest today. For example, the article on Camus has been increased by 65 per cent, that on Li Po by 87 per cent, those on Dostoevski, Gabriela Mistral, and Aeschylus by 600, 700, and 800 per cent, respectively.

3. Addition of illustrations. The inclusion of 148 line cuts of title pages, old woodcuts, and cartoons on literary subjects enhances the usefulness, as well as the appearance, of the book.

Because a reference book is useful only in proportion to the accessibility of its information, special care has been taken with details of cross-referencing and the style of entry headings. Titles of non-English works, for example, are generally given both in English and in their original language, transliterated where necessary; Greek proper names appear in direct transliteration, as well as in their familiar latinized spellings. Basic data on authors and works are now included in the headings in uniform style.

A Note on Using This Book

When a reader can find further information on a subject by consulting an additional entry, he is referred to it in one of two ways: by the use of small capitals (e.g.: He was associated with the Georgian poets.) or by the word "see" (e.g.: Golgotha. See Calvary.). The first word printed in small capitals is the one under which the cross reference is alphabetized. In general, readers are referred from one entry to another only when the second entry provides significant information relevant to the first. Cross-references are plentiful, however, in the entries on mythology, where it is often helpful to be able to trace a complex tale through two or more entries.

Entries are alphabetized without reference to definite or indefinite articles. Titles beginning with frequently met phrases such as The History of... or The Adventures of... are found under the first significant word. (E.g.: Tom Sawyer, The Adventures of...) Authors with pen names appear under the name by which they are best known: Marie Henri Beyle is found under his famous pseudonym, Stendahl, with a cross-reference under Beyle; Dickens appears under his own name, with a cross-reference under Boz. When the original title of a non-English work is commonly used by English speakers, its entry is found under that title, with a cross-reference under a well-known English title. (E.g.: Would-be Gentleman, The. See Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme.) Works better known under English titles are found there, but with cross-references from their original titles, if these are frequently encountered. (E.g.: A la Recherche du Temps Perdu. See Remembrance of Things Past.) The date of a play is that of its first production, when known, unless production was long delayed; otherwise the date is that of the first known printing.
Preface to the First Edition

At the end of the nineteenth century there died an English schoolmaster and clergyman whose life had spanned most of it. He was born in 1810. Two books in my father's library made me familiar, at an early age, with the Englishman's name. They were Brewer's A Dictionary of Phrase and Fable and Brewer's The Reader's Handbook. His full name was Ebenezer Cobham Brewer. Years later, when I was asked to edit a Reader's Encyclopedia, using Crowell's Handbook for Readers and Writers as nucleus, I discovered that, according to the preface of the first editor of that volume, it had originally owed much to the fascinating books of Dr. Brewer. (I always imagined him with a delightful beard—something like Edward Lear's—in which nestled all the oddities of learning. Alas, I can boast no such receptaculum!) However, the Handbook for Readers and Writers had given his material extremely detailed revision, to say nothing of supplying a great deal that was new, relating to the Victorian era and to subsequent years, with especial attention to American literature and allusion. Since that time, of course, almost as many changes in taste, viewpoint, and interest have occurred as the handbook's editor found to have taken place between 1897 (when Dr. Brewer died) and 1925 (when the Crowell Handbook appeared). Twenty or more recent years have shown as many alterations as the previous thirty. And now, in the midst of the new Atomic Age, there are changes that even a modern editor could not have anticipated several years ago!

I wish immediately to acknowledge my indebtedness, not only to the editor of Crowell's Handbook for Readers and Writers, Miss Henrietta Gerwig, but also to an intermediate reviser, Miss Irene Hendry, whose knowledge of modern literature has proved indispensable to the present volume. Miss Gerwig's handbook was designed as "a dictionary of famous characters and plots in legend, fiction, drama, opera, and poetry, together with dates and principal works of important authors, literary and journalistic terms and familiar allusions." Miss Hendry's work, never before appearing in print, is incorporated here. But the original handbook is only one of several ancestors of the present work. Since the handbook's publication, so many people have contributed ideas and suggestions that the present volume has, in a sense, been composed for you by inquiring readers from all parts of the country. It is no mere revision, but veritably a new book.

Original entries on established authors of the past have been enlarged, with modern treatment. Full advantage has been taken of all the most modern reference books. More attention has been given to obscure works and figures in literature both of the distant and recent past. And, in line with the methodological advance in literary criticism of the past fifteen years or so, "whereby an author is interpreted not only in terms of the literal content of his works and the facts of his biography, but also in terms of the general intellectual forces of his time," entries have been chosen of significant figures, movements, and terms in aesthetics, science, philosophy, economics, and politics. Freud, Jung, Karl Marx, Lenin, The New Deal, the stream-of-consciousness tendency in fiction, and even futurism and surrealism have received due consideration. The fields of art and music are now extensively covered, incorporating important twentieth-century additions.

Such is the nature of an encyclopedia of this kind that one could go on almost indefinitely adding new information to that already accumulated. The limitations of such a volume are hard to establish. What is it that intelligent readers and writers do not wish to know? One simply has to set a term, and mark boundaries. Therefore, for this new book, much more grist has actually been gathered than has come through the mill. At that, it deserves to be called a one-volume literary encyclopedia.

I have endeavored carefully to check over what was already amassed, to expand, to fill up gaps, to carry on what was unfinished; to add biographical, historical, and other data that unfolding world events made obligatory; to comb for word, phrase, and allusion such reference works as had been searched either superficially or not at all; to discard the obsolete; to bring to light the overlooked; and to play, in general, the role of Argus-eyed modernizer. I am bound to have made errors both of omission and commission. But, with the able assistance of Dr. Alexander Gode and the invaluable final rechecking of that brilliant literary detective, Earle F. Walbridge, I believe that this encyclopedia will now prove one of the most complete and practicable in existence. It will be found to cover an unusual range of information, to provide a reference to most allusions occurring in your reading, to give all the important myths and legends and a great many of the most important themes and characters in fiction old and new, to include references that constantly crop up in the critical writing of yesterday and today, to furnish information as to literary schools, trends, and movements past and present and biographical data on most “people of importance.” Likewise it will prove a real aid to the vocabulary and allusiveness of writers, as well as providing them with a genuine source book of ideas. As for cross-word puzzlers, they will, of course, discover it to be a necessity!

The curious mind inevitably stores up what it has sometimes characterized as “much useless information.” Yet, in literature, it is often these peculiar bits of learning that serve most to adorn and give flavor to a style. I have, however, endeavored to rid the book of all that is merely archaic. I have tried to maintain balance and proportion between the modern world and the world of antiquity. People used to speak of “dead languages.” Yet, in English derivations, the dead languages still live. In the same way, the mythology of the past constantly reappears in the poecy of the present; and the classics may furnish groundwork for the most modern fiction. (One has only to think of Ulysses.) All of this such a book as the one before you must comprehend. It must also show itself thoroughly familiar with modern literature and thought of all kinds, with modern invention and science, with new art media, with the continuity of history.

Either my memory is at fault or there is one essay that neither Charles Lamb, William Hazlitt, nor Christopher Morley ever wrote: one on Reference Books. The phrase for them, now cliché, has been “mines of information.” But a mine, at best, is a rather dark and dreary excavation—not to say dank, at times. I prefer to think of the book before you as a cave like the famous one stumbled upon by Aladdin. I might go on from there to describe its revelation of treasure of so many varieties and kinds, yet each in its own particular bin. For the office of a reference book is, after all, to bring some sort of order out of chaos. But it is also to present to you a well-organized supplementary memory, in one volume. The delights of such a memory may be inexhaustible; the safaris of research it can initiate, endless; the urge to literary creation which it can supply, present on every page. And remember, that to enter this domain of learning and imagination you have not even to use that mysterious phrase, “Open Sesame!”

Aakjaer, Jeppe (1866–1930). Danish poet and novelist. As a novelist, Aakjaer was intensely concerned with social misery and the need for reform.

Vredens Børn (The Children of Wrath, 1904) describes the oppressed existence led by servants on peasant farms. He is best known, however, for his lyric poetry, in which he celebrates the courage of the peasants and the beauties of his native Jutland. A merry simplicity characterizes the poetry of such collections as Fri Felt (1905), Rugens Sange (Songs of the Rye, 1906), and Den Sommer og den Eng (1910).

Aaron. In the Bible, the brother of Moses, the founder of the priesthood and the 1st high priest. He helped Moses in calling down the Ten Plagues and leading the Children of Israel out of Egypt (c. 1200 B.C.). Aaron directed the construction of the golden calf (made of gold earrings and other jewelry), which was idolatrously worshipped by the Israelites as the god of their deliverance, while Moses was receiving the Ten Commandments from Jehovah (Ex. 32). Aaron did not receive an inheritance in Canaan, as a punishment for doubting God's ability to bring water out of a rock.

Aaron's Rod. The name given to the rod of the tribe of Levi, used by Aaron during the 10 Plagues and the crossing of the Red Sea. When Aaron left his rod in front of the Ark, in the Tabernacle, it miraculously blossomed and bore almonds. This was interpreted as evidence of Jehovah's choice of Aaron as high priest (Num. 17:8).

Aaron. In Shakespeare's Titus Andronicus, the Moorish lover of the vengeful Tamora, with whom he plots the destruction of the Andronicus family. He flees Rome with the black child to whom Tamora gives birth, having substituted a white child and killed all witnesses, and is later condemned to death by Lucius.

Aaru. In Egyptian mythology, the fields of Aaru are the abode of the blessed dead and of the gods and goddesses.

Aasen, Ivar Andreas (1813–1896). Norwegian philologist. Aasen made from various dialects a Norwegian literary language called New Norwegian or landsmaal, in contrast to the Dano-Norwegian rigsmaal. In the poems of Symra (1863) he uses the landsmaal to describe peasant life and to voice his own subdued sadness.

Abaddon. The angel of the bottomless pit in The Revelation of St. John the Divine. Milton uses the name for the bottomless pit itself.

Abano, Pietro d'. Also Petrus de Apono (c. 1250–c. 1316). Italian philosopher, physician, astrologer. In his Conciliator Differentiarum quae inter Philosophos et Medicos Versantur ("reconciler of the differences among philosophers and doctors"), he advocated the systems of Averroes and other Arabic writers. He was so successful a scientist and physician that he was accused of black magic and heresy; brought twice before the Inquisition, he was acquitted once and died in prison before the second trial.

Abaris. A mythical Greek sage of the 6th century B.C. Surnamed "the Hyperborean," he is mentioned by Herodotus, Pindar, etc. Apollo gave him a magic arrow which rendered him invisible, cured diseases, gave oracles, and on which he could ride through the air. Abaris gave it to Pythagoras, who, in return, taught him philosophy.

Abbassids. The 2nd long dynasty (37 Caliphs, 750–1258) of the Muslim Empire. They claimed descent from Abbas (566–562), eldest uncle of Muhammad. Their reign was most firmly established and the court at Baghdad most splendid under Haroun-Al-Raschid, the Caliph described in the Arabian Nights, and his son Mamun (reigned 813–833).

Abbaye Group, the. A group of French writers and artists. They bought a house in Créteil near Paris, called it "L'Abbaye," and lived there communally for 14 months (1906–1907). After their separation they were influential in spreading the ideas of Unanimmism, introduced to them by Jules Romains, a frequent visitor to the Abbaye. Among the group were René Arcos (1881– ), Georges Duhamel, Luc Durtain (1881–1959), Pierre Jean Jouve, Charles Vildrac, and the cubist painter Albert Gleizes (1881– ).

Abbé Constantin, L' (1882). A novel by Ludovic Halévy. This gentle tale, which owes its popularity to the simple, melodious grace of its author's style, tells of the effects of the sale of the largest chateau in the Abbé's parish. The ingredients of young love, charity, and fortune serve to placate the Abbé's fears for his parish and his godson.

Abbey Theatre. The famous Dublin home of the Irish National Theatre Society. It was established in 1901 for Irish actors in plays by Irish dramatists about Ireland; especially about her heroic past and peasantry. William Butler Yeats was influential in founding it. A. E. (q.v.), Lady Gregory, and John Millington Synge wrote for it; and, in later years, so did Sean O'Casey. See Irish Renaissance.

Abbot of Misrule or Unreason. See Lord of Misrule.
Abbotsford. The baronial mansion built by Sir Walter Scott on the Tweed near Melrose.

A B C Book or Absey Book. A primer or speller which used to be used as a child's first lesson book and contained merely the alphabet and a few rudimentary lessons often set in catechism form, as is evident from Shakespeare's lines:

That is question now;
And then comes answer like an Absey book.

King John, i, 1

Abdera, Abderitan. Abdera was a maritime city of Thrace whose inhabitants were proverbial in ancient times for their stupidity. "Abderitan laughter" came to mean scolding or incessant laughter. It was so called because Abdera was the birthplace of Democritus, the laughing philosopher, who is regarded as the greatest among the Greek physical philosophers.

Abderite, the. See Democritus.

Abdiel (Heb., "servant of god"). In Milton's Paradise Lost, the faithful seraph who opposes Satan when he urges the angels to revolt.

Abednego. See Shadrach, Meshach, and Abednego.

Abel. See Cain.

Abéard, Pierre (1079–1142). French scholastic philosopher and theologian. He studied under Roscellinus (b. 1050), exponent of extreme nominalism, then under William of Champeaux (1070–1121), supporter of realism. In this controversy of medieval theology Abéard evolved a middle position called conceptualism, holding that both particular objects and universal concepts are real. However, he angered the clergy, who emphasized faith rather than dialectic argument and proof, with his rationalistic approach to Church dogma, especially the dogma of the Trinity. Thus Saint Bernard of Clairvaux persecuted him as a heretic, and Abéard died on his way to Rome to appeal to the Pope against a condemnation on this charge. Nevertheless, Abéard had been extremely popular as a lecturer; when he had to leave Notre Dame, his students followed him to various monasteries. His influence and his writings, such as Se De Non, increased the popularity of Aristotelian logic over that of Platonic theory.

His popular fame, however, resulted from his tragic love affair with Héloïse. Moved by his Historia Calamitatum (c. 1134), Héloïse wrote to him, and they exchanged their famous letters of love and suffering, including Abéard's advice on how she should conduct the convent he had turned over to her in 1129.

Abe Lincoln in Illinois (1938). A play by Robert E. Sherwood. Awarded a Pulitzer Prize, it deals with the life of Lincoln up to his election to the presidency; the dialogue contains selections from a number of Lincoln's own speeches and writings.

Abell, Kjeld (1901–1961). Danish playwright. The work of Abell is a provocative mixture of light, witty comedy and bitter satire. In 1937, The Melody that Got Lost (Melodien, der blev Voek; 1935), a clever play about the office proletariat, was produced in London; it was followed by Eva afjener sin Barnepig (Eva Serves Her Time as a Child, 1936). Anna Sophie Hedvig (1939), whose schoolteacher heroine murders her principal to save a child from persecution, is a violent protest against injustice.

Abencerrages (Sp. Abencerrajes). A family of Moors in Granada in the 15th century. They are famous in romance for their feud with the family of the Legin (Sp. Cegletes). Chateaubriand wrote a novel called The Last Abencerrage.

Abenteuerliche Simplicissimus, Der. See SIMPLICISSIMUS.

Abercrombie, Lascelles (1881–1938). English poet, critic, and writer of verse drama. He was associated with the Georgian poets. His collections of poems include Interludes and Poems (1908) and Twelve Idylls (1928); The Sale of St. Thomas (1911) is a verse drama.
Abessa. See Faerie Queene, The.

Abhorrets. See Petitioners and Abhorresses.

Abie's Irish Rose (1922). A comedy by Anne Nichols. It had one of the longest records of performance (2,327) in the history of the theater. A Jewish boy and an Irish Catholic girl, fearing to tell their fathers that they are in love, are married by a Methodist minister. The play formed the basis for a novel (1927), a radio program (1942), and a movie (1946).

Abigail. In the Old Testament, the wife of Nabal and later of David (1 Sam. 25:3). She referred to herself as the handmaid of David. In Elizabethan usage, the name came to signify a lady's maid. It is used in works by Marlowe, Beaumont and Fletcher, Swift, and Fielding. The name was further popularized by Abigail Hill (Mrs. Masham), the influential waiting-woman to Queen Anne.

Abnaki or Abenaki. An Algonquian Indian tribe. The English and French used the name to designate a loose confederacy of tribes occupying Maine and parts of New Brunswick and Quebec. The tribes fought as allies of the French until France lost its North American possessions.

Abomination of desolation. An epithet, used in Daniel and in Matthew, referring to a pagan idol or statue set up in the temple at Jerusalem. The phrase is now used for anything very hateful or destructive.

Abou Ben Adhem. A short poem by Leigh Hunt. Because Abou begged to be written as "one who loves his fellowmen," his angel visitor showed the names whom love of God had blest And lo! Ben Adhem's name led all the rest.

Abou Hassan. A young merchant of Baghdad, hero of the tale called "The Sleeper Awakened" in The Arabian Nights. While Abou Hassan is asleep, he is conveyed to the palace of Haroun-al-Raschid where the attendants are ordered to do all they can to make him fancy himself the Caliph. He subsequently becomes the Caliph's favorite. See Sly, Christopher.

Abra. A favorite concubine of Solomon. In his poem Solomon on the Vanity of the World (1718), Matthew Prior describes her devotion in the celebrated lines:

Abra was ready ere I called her name,
And though I called another, Abra came.

Abrabanel or Abrabanel, Judah Leôn. Known as León Hebreo (It., Leone Ebreo) or Leo the Jew (c. 1465–1535). A Jew expelled from Spain who came to Italy and practiced medicine while studying and writing philosophical material. His fame rests on the Dialoghi d'Amore (Dialogues of Love, 1535), a prose work that sets forth in a series of lively conversations Renaissance theories of love. The dialogues reveal the preoccupation in the Italy of the period with Neoplatonism and ancient learning in general.

Abracadabra. A cabalistic charm, supposedly constructed from the initials of the Hebrew words Ab (Father), Ben (Son), and Ruach Adashech (Holy Spirit), and once used as an antidote against various physical ills. From its role as charm it has come to be associated with any meaningless jargon and is a term frequently used by magicians. The word was originally written on parchment and suspended from the neck by a linen thread, in the following form:

A B R A C A D A B R A

Abraham. The founder of the Hebrew people and its first patriarch. With his wife Sarah and his nephew Lot, he migrated from Ur of Chaldees into the land of Canaan, where he settled and prospered. To test his faith, Jehovah commanded him to sacrifice his son Isaac as a burnt offering; however, a ram caught in a thicket was provided instead, just when Abraham was about to draw the knife. The story of Abraham is told in Gen. 11–25 and in various Muslim legends.

Abrahamic covenant. God made a covenant with Abraham (Gen. 17) that He would be God to him and all his children and that they should inherit and dwell in the land of Canaan.

Abraham ben Meir ibn Ezra (1092–1167). Spanish Jewish scholar. He wrote scientific treatises, biblical commentaries, and outstanding poems. He is the Rabbi ben Ezra of Browning's poem.

Abraham Lincoln. A biography by Carl Sandburg. The first part, entitled Abraham Lincoln: The Prairie Years, was published in two volumes in 1926, and the second part, Abraham Lincoln: The War Years, was published in four volumes in 1939. For Sandburg, Lincoln was the archetypal figure of American democracy; the preparation of the biography, the second part of which won a Pulitzer Prize, occupied many years of the poet's life.

Abraham-man or Abram-man. A begging impostor, a pretended lunatic. In Tudor and early Stuart times, inmates of Bedlam who were not dangerously mad were kept in the "Abraham Ward," and allowed out from time to time in distinctive clothes, to supplement their scanty rations by begging. Richard Head, a writer of the latter part of the 17th century, says that many healthy rogues, imitating these Tom o' Bedlams, "used to array themselves with party-coloured ribbons, tape in their hats, a fox-tail hanging down, a long stick with streamers, and beg alms; but for all their seeming madness, they had wit enough to steal as they went along."

Abraham Newland. A bank note, so called from the name of Abraham Newland (1730–1807), the chief cashier of the Bank of England from 1782 to 1807, without whose signature no Bank of England notes were genuine.

Abraxas. A cabalistic word. It was used by the Gnostics to denote the Supreme Being, the source of 365 emanations, the sum of the numbers represented by the Greek letters of the word totaling 365. It was frequently engraved on gems (hence known as absorbs that were used as amulets or talismans. By some authorities the name is given as that of one of the horses of Aurora, the dawn goddess.

Absalom. In the Old Testament, the handsome and rebellious 3rd son of David, king of Israel, who "stole the hearts of the men of Israel" and plotted to become king in his father's stead (2 Sam. 15:6). Riding on a mule in the decisive battle at Ephraim, Absalom was caught by his hair in an oak tree; finding him so suspended, one of David's army killed him despite previous commands of the king. David's lament, "O my son Absalom, my son, my son Absalom! would God I had died for thee, O Absalom, my son, my soul!" has become a classic expression of paternal grief.

Dryden gave the name Absalom to the duke of Monmouth, Charles II's natural son, in his satire Absalom and Achitophel (1681).

Absalom, Absalom! (1936). A novel by William Faulkner. The story centers on Thomas Sutpen, the son of a West Virginia poor white, and his attempts to fulfill his "grand design," to be accepted as a Southern aristocrat and founder of a wealthy family. He establishes himself in Jefferson, Miss., and at the climax of his career he is elected colonel of Jefferson's regiment in the Civil War. Returning to his estate, Sutpen's Hundred, after the war, he finds the plantation in ruins. His daughter's half brother and part-Negro lover has been killed by Sutpen's son, who has disappeared, and she has become a confirmed spinster. Sutpen's attempt to have another son by a poor-white girl ends in his murder by his grand-father. When the Sutpen saga comes to an end in 1910, all that is left of his dream is an idiot Negro, Jim Bond. Sutpen's only living descendant, howling in the ashes of the burned house.

In place of the sustained interior monologue Faulkner used in The Sound and the Fury, the story is projected by means of three narrators; their personalities and concerns are revealed as each tells the story of Sutpen. Miss Rosa Coldfield, Sutpen's sister-in-law, first tells the story to Quentin Compson shortly before his departure for Harvard; her story is supplemented by that of Quentin's father; and Quentin, in turn, relates the whole story with his own interpretation to his Harvard roommate, Shreve McCannon. See SUTPEN.

Absalom and Achitophel (1681). A political satire in verse by John Dryden. Written in heroic couplets, the poem attacks Puritan attempts to exclude the duke of York, the legitimate heir, from the throne of England because of his Catholicism. Using Biblical terminology, Dryden describes the efforts of Achitophel (the earl of Shaftesbury) to incite Absalom (the duke of Monmouth, illegitimate son of Charles II) to rebellion against his father. A second part, written by Nahum Tate and revised by Dryden, who added 200 lines, appeared in 1682.

Absentea, The (1812). A novel by Maria Edgeworth. The "absentea," Lord Conbrony, allows his foolish wife to persuade him to leave his estate in Ireland and try to force a way into fashionable London society.

Absey Book. See A B C Book.

Absolute, Captain Jack. The hero of Sheridan's comedy The Rivals. The clever and gallant son of Sir Anthony Absolute, he is a rival of Bob Acres for the hand of Lydia Languish, to whom he is known only as Ensign Beverley.

Absolute, Sir Anthony. A character in Sheridan's comedy The Rivals. He is a testy, but warm-hearted old gentleman who imagines that he possesses a most angelic temper and that, when he quarrels with others, it is they, not he, who are out of sorts.

Absurd. Modern philosophical term. Used by Albert Camus to describe the meaninglessness of human existence in the modern world, it is presented especially in his essay The Myth of Sisyphus (1942) and his novel The Stranger (1942). Jean-Paul Sartre describes the absurdity of the human condition for which he makes a precondition for the philosophy of existentialism, in his novel Nausea (1938). The "Literature of the Absurd," however, usually refers to those works which deliberately violate or distort the conventions of the novel or the theater, grimly making them ridiculous in an attempt to show the absurdity of the human lives they represent. They often use either a barren setting or an emphasis on things—inanimate material objects—to express the a-human sterility of modern values. The tone may range from the broadly comic aspect of the absurd to the unsettling, the grotesque, or even the terrible. Alfred Jarry's Ubu Roi (1896) is often considered the first direct ancestor of the movement, and Franz Kafka's novels the first examples. The absurd shocked its way to widespread recognition in France with the novels and plays of Samuel Beckett and the plays of Jean Genet and Eugène Ionesco. In America it finds expression in the work of the avant-garde playwrights Edward Albee and Jack Gelber, in England in the plays of Harold Pinter. The Swiss dramatist Friedrich Durrenmatt, also writes in the absurd tradition.

Absyrtus. See the ARGMONAUTS.

Abzu. In Sumerian mythology, the river that is supposed to surround the earth. The Abzu seems almost identical with the Greek Oceanus, the "river of ocean." In Babylonian mythology it is personified as Apsu, the fresh water, who has existed from the beginning of time with his wife Tiamat, the salt water; he plays an important role in the WAR OF THE GODS. The Sumerian ENKI and the Babylonian EA, almost identical gods of water and of wisdom, live in a palace in the Abzu, which was probably the Persian Gulf, the shores of which in early days may have reached northward to the city of Eridu.

Academe. A place of study or instruction. It is so called from Plato's Academy.

Académie française. The French Academy. Originating in secret meetings of men of literary taste in Paris around the year 1630, the Academy was established by order of the king and at the behest of Cardinal Richelieu in the year 1635. Made up of 40 members, supposed the most distinguished living men of French letters, the Academy took as its purpose the protection and perfection of the French language and to that end began compiling its dictionary in the year 1639; the task has not yet been completed. The Academy also undertook the composition of definitive treatises on grammar, poetry and rhetoric. Ordered by Richelieu to censure Conneille's Le Cid, the Academy early adopted a policy of advocating old rules and traditions at the expense of innovation and change. In the late 18th century the philosophers...
Acheron

Italy. His Virginia, a play drawn from Boccaccio's Decameron (Gillette of Narbonne, III, 9), was first performed in 1494. He is a prominent interlocutor in Castiglione's Cortegiano.

Accoramboni, Vittoria (1557?-1585). Her husband was murdered so that she might marry the Duke of Bracciano. After Bracciano's death in 1585, she was herself murdered by assassins hired by one of his relatives. She is a principal figure in Webster's play The White Devil, or Vittoria Coromona.

Account of My Hut, An (Hōjō Ki). Japanese miscellany, a brief account of the personal experiences of Kamo no Chōmei (1153-1216). It details the natural disasters that visited Kyoto during the late Heian period (794-1185) and describes the life led by the author at his hermitage. It is strongly Buddhist in tone.

Aceldama (Gr., "field of blood"). A field in the Hinnon Valley near Jerusalem which, in Matthew (27:6-8), was purchased by the priests with the 30 pieces of silver ("the blood money") thrown down by Judas Iscariot after his betrayal of Jesus. It was used as Jerusalem's "potter's field" (so called because potters used such fields to obtain clay) for the burial of strangers. According to The Acts (1:18), Judas bought the field, fell into it, and "burst asunder." The usual version (Matt. 27:5) of Judas' death is that he hanged himself.

Acestes. In Vergil's Aeneid, the Trojan son of the river god Criminus. During the funeral games held for Anchises in Sicily, where Acestes had established himself before the arrival of Aeneas, he discharges his arrow with such force that it takes fire from the friction of the air (Book V).

Acevedo Díaz, Eduardo (1851-1924). Uruguayan statesman and novelist. Trained as a lawyer, Acevedo Díaz was active in Uruguayan politics, spent part of his life in exile, and held several diplomatic posts. He described Uruguay's war for independence in an impassioned trilogy which he called "a hymn of blood": Ismael (1888), Nativa (1889-1890), and Grito de gloria (1894). His masterpiece is Soledad (1894), often considered the archetype of the gauchito novel. See gauchito literature.

Achard, Marcel (1899-1955). French dramatist. His characters are usually idealistic vagabonds and dreamers. His plays, such as La Vie est belle (1928), Jean de la lune (1929), Dominio (1931), Le Corsoire (1938), and Patate (1957), are full of fantasy and the joy of life.

Achates. In Vergil's Aeneid, the constant companion of Aeneas. Thus, a fidus Achates is synonymous with a faithful companion and bosom friend.

Achelous (Acheloo). In ancient Greece, the large river that separated Aetolia from Acarnania, and the god thereof. This bull-headed god wrestled Hercules as a rival for Delanira, and lost one of his horns as well as the prize. When Alcmæon, pursued by the Erinyes for the murder of his mother Eriphyle, sought a land that had not existed at the time of the murder, he found it in the delta of the Achelous, which was formed by new silt. Achelous gave his daughter Callirrhoe in marriage to Alcmæon but she proved to be his death.

Acheron. (Gr., the River of Sorrows.) The river of the infernal regions into which Phlegethon and Cocytus flow; also, the lower world (Hades) itself.

Académie Concour. See Prix Concour.

Academy, the (Akademe). The name of Plato's school near Athens. It was named after a legendary hero, Hecademus or Academus. The school had a long history, continuing until Justinian suppressed the philosophic schools in 529 a.d.

Acadia. The old name for Nova Scotia, so called by the French from the river Shubenacadie. In 1621 Acadia was given to the Scot, Sir William Alexander, and its name changed; and in 1755 the old French settlers were driven into exile by George II. Many of them migrated to Louisiana, where their descendants are still known as "Cajuns" (Acadians). Longfellow has made this the subject of a poem in hexameter verse, Evangeline.

Accastus (Akastos). In Greek mythology, a son of Pelias. He sailed with the Argonauts and, after his father's death, became king of Iolcus. Believing the lie of his wife Crethis that Pelusus had made advances to her, he tried to kill him. Later Pelusus conquered Iolcus and killed Accastus.

Accademia Della Crusca (It., "Academy of the Chief"). Florentine literary academy founded in 1583 to purify Tuscan, the literary language of the Italian Renaissance. It was opposed to Tasso in the debate over the merits of his Gerusalemme Liberata. The first part of its official dictionary appeared in 1612 and the work is still in progress.

Accent meter. (1) Accental meter, that is, verse based on the alternation of accented and unaccented syllables. English prosody is based on accent meter as opposed to quantitative meter, or verse based on the alternation of long and short syllables, which is the basis of Greek and Latin prosody.

(2) Meter that depends only upon the number of accented syllables in the line and disregards the unaccented syllables. The feet that make up the line may be of any kind, including the monosyllabic foot. Accent verse has always been prevalent in popular ballads and songs, and it is often deliberately used in modern poetry. An example from Sir Patrick Spens, an early Scottish ballad of unknown authorship, is:

O LANG, / LANG, / may the LA/dies STAND
Wit thair GOLD / KEMS / in thair HAIR, WAITing / FOR thair / an deir / LORDS,
Fo th'YLL, / se THAME / n th MAIR.

Accolti, Bernardo (1458-1535). Italian poet and dramatist. Born in Arezzo, he is known as the Unique Aretine for his supposedly impromptu recitations of sonnets before the courts of Renaissance Achilles. In Greek mythology, the son of Peleus and the Nereid Thetis, and king of the Myrmidons, a Thessalian tribe. He is the hero of Homer's Iliad and became the prototype of the Greeks' conception of manly valor and beauty. He took part in the Trojan War on the side of the Greeks as their most illustrious warrior, and slew the Trojan hero Hector. Achilles had been dipped in the Styx by his mother, which rendered him invulnerable except in the heel by which she held him. He was fatally wounded there by an arrow shot by Paris, Hector's younger brother, or, according to another version of the story, by the god Apollo who had assumed Paris' shape. The phrase Achill's heel is used to describe the vulnerable point in the character of a man or nation.

Achitophel. In the Old Testament, David's traitorous counselor. He deserted to Absalom, who was trying to supersede his father, but hanged himself when his advice was disregarded (II Sam. 17). In his satire, Absalom and Achitophel (1681), Dryden used this name for the earl of Shaftesbury.

Acis (Alds). In classical legend, a handsome Sicilian youth, son of Faunus and the naiad Syrnemys. The lover of Galatea, he was killed by his rival, the Cyclops Polyphemus. The blood flowing forth from Acis' body changed into water and formed the river Acis. The story is the subject of an opera by Handel, Acis and Galatea (1721).

Acmeism. A movement in Russian poetry, active from about 1910 to 1917. The Acmeists, who belonged to a group known as the Poets' Guild, got their name from the high poetic standards they professed. They advocated concision in poetry, clear and concrete imagery, and precise use of words. The movement was a reaction against the mysticism and stylistic vagueness of the symbolist school of poetry, which had held sway in Russian literature from about 1895. The leading Acmeists were Nikolai Gumil'ov, Anna Akhmatova, and Osip Mandelstam.

Acquainted with the Night (1928). A sonnet by Robert Frost. Written in the terza rima and one of Frost's few poems set in the city, it is a mystical poem of loneliness and despair; "the time was neither wrong nor right," it declares.

Acrasia. See FAIRE QUEENS, THE.

Acres, Bob. A character in Sheridan's comedy The Rivals. A country gentleman, he is the rival of Captain Jack Absolute for the hand of Lydia Languish. He tries to ape the man of fashion, affects elaborate oaths, and blusters mightily, but when his courage is put to the test he proves himself an abject coward.

Acrisius. In Greek mythology, king of Argos and the father of Danae. An oracle declared that Danae would give birth to a son who would kill him, so Acrisius kept his daughter shut up in a brazen tower. Here she became the mother of Perseus by Zeus who appeared in the form of a shower of gold. The king of Argos now ordered his daughter and her infant to be put into a chest, and cast adrift on the sea, but they were rescued by Dictys, a fisherman. When grown to manhood, Perseus accidentally struck the foot of Acrisius with a quoit, and the blow caused his death, thus fulfilling the oracle.
Act of Union. Specifically, the Act of 1706 declaring that on and after May 1, 1707, England and Scotland should have a united parliament. The two countries had been united under one sovereign since 1603. The term is also applied to the Act of 1536 incorporating Wales with England, and to that of 1800, establishing a legislative union of Great Britain and Ireland on and after January 1, 1801.

Adam. The principal Babylonian storm-god. He took over this role after Enlil, the Sumerian god of air and storms, and MARDUK, the Baal of Babylon, became more generalized in their functions.

Adam. In Shakespeare's As You Like It, a faithful old family retainer who accompanies Orlando into the forest and offers to give him his savings. The well-known phrase “a faithful Adam” is based on this character.

Adam, Juliette. Born Lamber. Pen names: Juliette Lamber; La Messine; and Comte Paul Va- sili (1836-1936). French novelist and editor. She founded and edited the periodical La Nouvelle Revue.

Adam, Paul [Auguste Marie] (1862-1920). French novelist. Originally associated with the symbolists, he was later concerned with the analysis of group action, as in mobs, in his novel series Le Temps et la vie (16 v., 1899-1903).

Adam and Eve. The first man and woman, according to the Old Testament. The initial chapters of Genesis tell the story of their creation, their sin in eating the forbidden fruit from “the tree of knowledge of good and evil” (Gen. 3:9), and their expulsion from Paradise, or the Garden of Eden, to thereafter “till the ground.” Milton retells the story of “man's first disobedience” in Paradise Lost (1667). See Lilith.

the old Adam; the offending Adam. Adam, as the head of unredeemed man, stands for “original sin,” or “man without regenerated grace.”

the second Adam; the new Adam. Jesus Christ is so called.

Adam's ale. Water, because the first man had nothing else to drink; in Scotland, it is sometimes called Adam's wine.

Adam's apple. The protuberance in the forepart of the throat, the anterior extremity of the thyroid cartilage of the larynx; so called from the superstition that a piece of the forbidden fruit stuck in Adam's throat.

Adam's Peak. A mountain in Ceylon where, according to Muslim legend, Adam bewailed his expulsion from Paradise, standing on one foot for 200 years to expiate his crime; Gabriel then took him to Mount Adirath, where he found Eve.

Adamastor. The spirit of the stormy Cape (Good Hope). It is described by Camões in the Lusiad as a hideous phantom that appears to Vasco da Gama and prophesies disaster to all seeking to make the voyage to India.

Adam Bede (1859). A novel by George Eliot. The highly principled Adam Bede loves Hetty Sorrel, a pretty, superficial girl. Although Adam tries to save her, she fancies herself the wife of the young squire, Arthur Donnithorne, who seduces her and then leaves her. In her grief she consents to marry Adam, but before they are wed she discovers that she is pregnant. She tries in vain to find Arthur, but in the end is found guilty of the murder of her child and is transported for life. Adam finally marries Dinah Morris, a young Methodist preacher.

Adam de la Hale (or Halle) (c. 1230–c. 1286). French poet and composer, author of the first-known opera or play with music, Li Gieus de Robin et Maron (The Play of Robin and Marion), performed before the French court at Naples in 1275 or 1285.

Adamic, Louis (1889-1951). Yugoslav-born American writer. Adamic came to this country when he was 15. His own life as an immigrant is described in Laughing in the Jungle (1932). The Native's Return (1934) gives his impressions of revisiting Yugoslavia, and Grandsons (1935) is the saga of a Slovenian family in America. Always concerned with America as a melting pot, Adamic felt increasingly that the process was too slow; My America (1938) reflects this belief.

Adamites. The name for various heretical sects. Their belief was that they might attain to primitive innocence by rejecting marriage and clothing. There was such a sect in North Africa in the 2nd century; the Abelites were similar. The heresy reappeared in Savoy in the 14th century, and spread over Bohemia and Moravia in the 15th and 16th centuries. One Picard, of Bohemia, was leader in 1400, and styled himself “Adam, son of God.” The paintings of Hieronymus Bosch are thought to have been influenced by his adherence to an Adamite sect.

Adamov, Arthur (1908– ). Russian-born French dramatist. His Ping-Pong (1955) and Paolo Paoli (1957) are bitterly disillusioned satires of modern commercial society. Other plays include L'Invasion (1949), Taranne (1951), and Les Âmes mortes (1959).

Adams, Abigail [Smith] (1744-1818). Wife of John Adams, noted as a letter writer. The daughter of a Congregational minister, she married Adams in 1764. Her lively, perceptive letters, first published in 1840 in a selected form by her grandson Charles Francis Adams, mirror the affection and respect that existed between the Adamses and give a valuable picture of social and political life in the infant republic; they are included in their entirety in Family Papers (2 vols., 1963), the second series of The Adams Papers published by Harvard University.

Adams, Charles Francis, Jr. (1835-1915). American lawyer, railroad expert, and historian. This son of John Quincy and brother of Henry Adams was a successful businessman who in time became disgusted with the "low instinct" of money-getting, and turned to writing history. He was chiefly interested in the history of Massachusetts, and wrote Three Episodes of Massachusetts History (1892), and Massachusetts: Its History and Historians (1893). Earlier he had exposed corruption in railroads in Chapters of Erie and Other Essays (1871) and Adams, Hannah (1755-1831). American historian. The first professional woman writer in the United States, she wrote Alphabetical Compendium of the Various Sects... from the Beginning of the Christian Era (1784) and A Summary History of New England (1799).

Adams, Henry [Brooks] (1838-1918). American historian, scholar, and man of letters. A member of the famous Adams family of statesmen, Henry Adams was temperamentally fitted, not for political action, but for the equally arduous task of studying and writing history. Working for a time as a journalist, he became editor of the North American Review; at the same time, he held an assistant professorship of history at Harvard, where he taught medieval, European, and American history. Adams' first important book was the nine-volume study, The History of the United States of America During the Administrations of Thomas Jefferson and James Madison (1889-1891). Men, Adams deterministically argued, cannot change the course of history.

In 1872, Adams married Marian Hooper; after her suicide in 1885, he traveled to the Orient, and renewed an interest in science. His most important books, Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres and The Education of Henry Adams, reflect his lifelong quest for order and unity in a world he considered to be in the process of disintegration.

Adams' two novels, Democracy and Esther, reflect two of his absorbing concerns: corruption in a capitalistic government, and loss of religious faith caused by new scientific discoveries. Adams' letters, edited and published during the last 15 years, often reveal him at his best.

Adams, James Truslow (1878-1949). American historian. He won a Pulitzer Prize for The Founding of New England (1921), but is perhaps best known as the author of The Epic of America (1931), which has been translated into nine languages. Among his other works are Revolutionary New England (1923), The March of Democracy (2 vols., 1932-1933), Building the British Empire (1938), and The American (1943), an analysis of the American character. Adams was also the editor of the Dictionary of American History (6 vols., 1940).

Adams, John (1735-1826). Second president of the U.S. (1797-1801). A graduate of Harvard, Adams was admitted to the bar in 1758 and was carrying on a successful law practice when the Stamp Act crisis of 1765 drew him into politics. In a series of articles, later collected as A Dissertation on the Canon and Feudal Law (1768), he argued that the Stamp Act was contrary to the "inherent rights of mankind." He was a delegate to the first and second Continental Congresses and was an ardent advocate of the Declaration of Independence when it was presented to the congress.

In 1785, after several years' service as minister to France, Britain, and Holland, he began to write his Defense of the Constitutions of Government of the United States of America (1787-1788), in which he discussed the history of republican government. Elected vice president under Washington, he became president in 1797. He quarreled with Hamilton over a treaty with France in 1800, and the resulting split in the Federalist Party contributed to his loss to Jefferson in 1800. After his retirement from the presidency, he returned to his home in Quincy, Mass., and renewed his old friendship with Jefferson. Both men died within a few hours of each other on July 4, 1826.

Adams' essentially conservative political philosophy placed him between the extreme federalism of Hamilton and the agrarianism of Jefferson. His concept of republicanism was based on a "balance" of power that would prevent the power-hungry from gaining control, and his awareness of the weaknesses and vices of mankind led him to put his faith in "the natural aristocracy" of a few men, who, like himself, would use the power vested in them for the good of the people rather than for their private ends. The Diary and Autobiography of John Adams (4 vols., 1961).
Adams, John Quincy (1767–1848). Sixth president of the U.S. (1825–1829). Adams accompanied his father, John Adams, to France in 1778, studied in European schools, and was graduated from Harvard in 1787. In 1791 in a series of 11 articles signed Publicola, he replied to Thomas Paine’s Rights of Man, defending the rights of the minority in opposition to Paine’s contention that the majority must prevail. After holding several diplomatic posts, Adams became secretary of state in 1817; he secured Florida from Spain in 1819 and was largely responsible for the promulgation of the Monroe Doctrine in 1823. In 1824 Adams, Andrew Jackson, and Henry Clay were among the four candidates for the presidency. Since no candidate received a majority of the electoral votes, the election was given to the House of Representatives. Clay threw his support to Adams, who was elected, and when Adams named Clay secretary of state, Jackson’s followers cried “corrupt bargain.” This charge, though undoubtedly baseless, hounded Adams during his term of office and contributed to his defeat in 1828. In 1830 he was elected to the House of Representatives, where he served for nearly 17 years, opposing the annexation of Texas and defending free speech in the face of efforts to stifle debate on the slavery question. Adams’ diary, covering more than 60 years, was edited by his son, Charles Francis Adams, and published in 12 volumes as The Memoirs of John Quincy Adams (1874–1877).

Adams, Léonie [Fuller] (1899– ). American poet. Her poems are marked by a deeply mystical view of nature, by vigorous metrics, and by a sense of song that lends delicacy to the packed meaning of her lines. Her books include Those Not Elect (1925), High Falcon (1929), This Measure (1933), and Poems: A Selection (1954).

Adams, Nick. The central character in most of the stories of In Our Time, a collection by Ernest Hemingway. He appears also in the famous short story The Killers.

Adams, Parson Abraham. The quixotic, vain, staunch friend of the hero of Joseph Andrews (1742), a novel by Henry Fielding. He is a guileless dervyman, totally ignorant of the ways of the world, always seeking the good of others. The element of paradoxical discussion that he introduces into the novel gives the book its truly comic character. He was drawn from Fielding’s friend, the Rev. William Young, who edited Robert Ainsworth’s Latin-English Dictionary (1752).

Adams, Samuel (1722–1803). American patriot and pamphleteer. Active in arousing public opinion against England before the American Revolution, he was responsible for the creation of a committee of correspondence to communicate Boston’s grievances to other towns in Massachusetts and “to the World,” and prepared for the committee a radical declaration, State of the Rights of the Colonies (1772). He was the leading spirit behind the Boston Tea Party and served in the Continental Congress (1774–1781), where he advocated immediate independence.

Adams, Samuel Hopkins (1871–1958). American writer. An effective member of the staffs of McClure’s and Collier’s magazines during the muckraking days, Adams was active in exposing frauds, especially in the field of medicine, and was instrumental in bringing about the Pure Food and Drug Act (1906). He later wrote a long series of books dealing with the American background in fictional terms. He attacked dishonest journalism in his novel The Clarion (1914) and the scandals of the Harding administration in Revelry (1926). The latter book was supplemented by The Incredible Era: The Life and Times of Warren Harding (1939). He also wrote biographies of Daniel Webster and Alexander Woollcott.

Adams, William T. Pen name Oliver Optic (1822–1897). The author of various series of books for boys. He edited the journal Our Boys and Girls, founded in 1867 as a weekly, subsequently a monthly.

Addams, Jane (1860–1935). American leader in social work and the peace and women’s suffrage movements. She is famous for her pioneering work at Hull House, a Chicago settlement house that she founded in 1889. In 1931 she, together with Nicholas Murray Butler, was awarded the Nobel Peace Prize. She wrote a number of books and articles on social problems, among them two autobiographical works: Twenty Years at Hull House (1910) and The Second Twenty Years at Hull House (1931).

Adding Machine, The (1923). A play by Elmer Rice. The dramatist uses expressionistic techniques to satirize the morality of the machine age. Mr. Zero loses his position when his employer installs adding machines. In a fit of temporary insanity, he murders the employer and is executed. Along with a coworker, Daisy Dina Dorothea Devore, who has committed suicide to be with him, he finds himself in the Elysian Fields. Happily operating the celestial adding machine, Mr. Zero scorns the company of such men as Swift and Rabelais. He is finally reincarnated and returns to earth to continue evolving into the perfect soulless slave.

Addison, Joseph (1672–1719). English poet, essayist, and critic. In association with Richard Steele, he perfected the essay as a literary form in his contributions to The Tatler and The Spectator. His prose style was the model for pure and elegant English until the end of the 18th century; his comments on manners and morals were widely influential in forming the middle-class ideal of a dispassionate, tolerant, Christian world-citizen. The Campaign (1704), celebrating the victory at Blenheim, and his hymn The Spacious Firmament on High (1712) are his most famous poems. His musical play Rosamond (1705) was an attack on popular Italian operas, and his blank-verse tragedy Cato (1713) was enormously popular, combining an appeal to the party-spirit of the Whigs, and an avowed intention to purge the stage of immorality. Addison is bitterly attacked by Alexander Pope in Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot (1735) in the character of Atticus. See Thomas Tickell.

Address to the Dell (1786). A poem by Robert Burns attacking the corrupt clergy of Scotland.

Ade, George (1866–1944). American humorist and playwright. Ade first achieved popularity in the columns of the Chicago Record with the creation of the brash but good-hearted Artie. Stories of a colored bootblack and a gentlemanly liar were added, the three becoming the titular heroes of Artie (1896), Pink Marsh (1897), and Doc’ Horne (1899). In 1898 he began to write the stories that were collected as Fables in Slang. He commenced his career as a playwright with a successful musical comedy, The Sultan of Sultia (1902), later writing The County Chairman (1903), a play directed against political corruption; The College Widow; and Father and the Boys (1908).

Adenauer, Konrad (1876–1967). First chancellor of the German Federal Republic (1949–1963), who led his country in its economic and political recovery after World War II. He was mayor of Cologne (1917–1933) but lost this position because of conflict with the Nazis. In 1945 he helped to found the Christian Democratic Union, his political party. He retired from public life in 1963.

Adler, Alfred (1870–1937). Austrian psychoanalyst. A disciple of Sigmund Freud, he later rebelled against his master’s teachings and held to a system of “individual psychology.” In this he maintained that psychological differences among individuals—in behavior, attitude, and the like—were due to the differences in their means of attaining a feeling of superiority in their relations with society.

Adler, Felix (1851–1933). German-born American philosopher, teacher, and founder of the Ethical Culture movement. Adler came to America at the age of 16; he founded the New York Society of Ethical Culture while teaching at Cornell University in 1876. The society emphasized the need for a stronger morality, and advocated the moral education of children as well as various kinds of labor and social reforms. Adler established the first free kindergarten for the children of the poor in New York City; this later grew into a vocational school, the first to include manual training and ethical instruction in its curriculum. In 1884 Adler helped to establish the Tenement House Commission; he arranged for trained nurses to visit the poor, argued for parks and playgrounds in poor areas of the city, and opposed child labor. Ethical Culture societies have since sprung up in several cities of the United States and Europe. Among Adler’s books are The Moral Instruction of Children (1892), Marriage and Divorce (1905), What the Ethical Culture School Stands For (1910), and The Reconstruction of the Spiritual Ideal (1923).

Admetus (Admetos). See Alcestis; Argonauts.

Admirable Crichton, The (1902). A dramatic fantasy by J. M. Barrie. The Earl of Loam, his family, and one or two friends are wrecked on a desert island, where the butler, the admirable Crichton, proves himself to be a man of infinite resource and power, far superior to the rest of the party. Barrie took the title from an epithet bestowed upon James Crichton (1560–1585?), Scottish traveler, scholar, and swordsman, by Sir Thomas Urquhart.

Admiral Hosier’s Ghost (1739). A ballad by Richard Glover, based on the capture of Porto Bello by Admiral Edward Vernon in 1739. Admiral Francis Hosier (1673–1727) is sent with 20 ships to the Spanish West Indies to block up the galleons of that country. He arrives at the Battimentos, near Porto Bello, but has strict orders not to attack and his men perish, not in battle, but from disease. Hosier dies of a broken heart. Upon Admiral Vernon’s victory, Hosier and his 3,000 men rise from the dead and lament the cruel orders that forbade them to attack the foe, for “with 20 ships he surely could have achieved what Vernon did with only 6.”

Adolphe (1815). A novel by Benjamin Constant de Rebecque. Adolphe, the novel’s young protagonist, has been influenced by his early relationship with a woman of strong intellectual convictions, and is unable to adopt the conventional masks of society. Having finished his studies, he sets out upon a period of travel in Germany and Poland. While visiting at a small German court, he establishes a liaison with Elena, mistress of Count P—. Adolphe, who began the affair out of pride rather than love, is deeply probed by the author who points out his inability to terminate the relationship as a result of his guilt, which leaves him desolate when Elena dies. The work, considered to be based in part on Constant’s relationship with Mme. de Staël, is a precursor of the modern psychological novel.

Adonais (1821). A poem by Percy Bysshe Shelley. When Keats died in 1821, Shelley was moved to compose this elegy for his friend. He gave Keats the name of Adonais, probably in allusion to the mourning for Adonis. Adonais is considered one of the greatest elegies in the English language.

Adonis. In Greek mythology, a beautiful youth. Adonis was born of Myrrha (Smyrna) after she had been turned into a tree to escape her father, for whom she had had an incestuous love. Aphrodite fell in love with Adonis when he was still a youth, but he was killed by a boar, which, according to some accounts, was Aphrodite’s jealous lover Ares in disguise. From his blood sprang the anemone. According to another story, Aphrodite gave the infant Adonis in a chest to Persephone to take care of, but Persephone fell in love with him and would not return him. Zeus judged the case and ordered that Adonis should spend one third of the year with each godless, the third where he chose. He chose to spend the extra third as well with Aphrodite.

This myth, the scene of which is laid in Asia, is one of the many in which a young god of vegetation dies and is resurrected. A part of the cult included the planting of “gardens of Adonis”—seeds in shallow soil which withered as quickly as they sprouted. The name of the god is derived from adon (lord), which appears in the Hebrew adonai, used as a substitute for the name of Yahweh (Jehovah). See Tamuz; Venus and Adonis; Adonais.

Adramelech. One of the fallen angels. Milton has him overthrown by Uriel and Raphael in Paradise Lost.

Adrasto (Adrastus). In the Jerusalemme Liberata of Tasso, the commander of the Indian forces allied with other enemies of the crusaders. During the assault upon Jerusalem he is killed by Rinaldo at the final battle, which results in the fall of the city.

Adrastos (Adrastos). In Greek mythology, a king of Argos and leader of the expedition of the Seven against Thebes. He was the only member of the expedition to return alive.

Adrian or Hadrian IV (originally Nicholas Breakspear) (d. 1159). The only Englishman to be elected Pope (1154–1159). He crowned Emperor Frederick Barbarossa (1155), but soon entered a great conflict with him over the assertion of papal prerogatives. There is much historical controversy over his reputed gift of the feudal sovereignty of Ireland to Henry II of England.

Adriana. A character in Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors. She is the high-spirited and impatient wife of Antipholus of Epheus and sister of Luciana. The cave in which David took refuge when he fled from King Saul. This stronghold attracted "every one that was in debt, and every one that was discontented" (1 Sam. 22:1-2).

Advancement of Learning, The (1605). A treatise on philosophy by Francis Bacon. Considered an excellent example of Renaissance thought, it extols the pursuit of learning and critically surveys the existing state of knowledge. Bacon later wrote a greatly expanded version, De Dignitate et Augmentis Scientiarum (1623), to form the first part of his projected Instauratio Magna.

Advent (Lat. adventus, the coming to). The four weeks immediately preceding Christmas. It commemorates the first coming of Christ, and anticipates the second: the one to redeem, the other to judge the world. The season begins the Sunday on or nearest St. Andrew's Day (Nov. 30th). There is an old tradition of preaching on the "Four Last Things" on the Advent Sundays: Death, Judgment, Heaven, and Hell.

Adventists. Christian religious sects believing that the second coming of Christ and the end of the world are near at hand.

Adventures. For many titles beginning with the words The Adventures of, . . ., see the following proper names. For example, The Adventures of Tom Sawyer will be found under Tom Sawyer, The Adventures of.

Adventures of Philip, The (1862). A novel by William Makepeace Thackeray. The hero, Philip Firmian, revolts against the hypocrisies of his father, Dr. George Brandon Firmian, whose sham marriage to Caroline Gann forms the subject of an earlier novel. As a boy he is befriended by Caroline, now known as Mrs. Brandon, or "the little Sister," and throughout the book he champions her cause. He is brought up in luxury, but, owing to his father's scheming, loses his money and is forced to earn a living as an editor. He marries Charlotte Baynes, the daughter of his guardian, whom his father had tricked to secure his fortune. After numerous difficulties, Philip comes into a fortune from Lord Ringwood, a wealthy relative. The novel is a sequel to A Shabby Gentleman Story (1840), which is usually printed as its prologue.

Advice to the Privileged Orders (1792). A prose tract by Joel Barlow. Barlow argues that the state exists not to protect property but to assure the political rights of the individual. The piece aroused a great deal of discussion and unfavorable criticism in England and was the subject of debate in the House of Commons. The Pitt ministry ordered it burned and Barlow fled.

Æ or A.E. Pen name of George William Russell (1867-1935). Irish poet, painter, mystic, patriot of Irish Nationalism, and one of the organizers of the Irish Agricultural Co-operative movement. In 1886 he was associated, as was William Butler Yeats, with the founding of the Dublin Lodge of the Theosophical Society, for occult and Hermetic study.

His mystical poetry is based on visions, magic, and Eastern religious ideas; he writes about these interests in The Candle of Vision (1918). Among his collections of poetry are Homeward: Songs by the Way (1894), The Earth Breath (1897), and House of the Titans (1934). He also wrote Deirdre (1902), one of the first verse plays performed at the Abbey Theatre, and The Living Torch (1937), a collection of essays.

Aeacus (Aiakos). Greek mythological character. A son of Zeus and Aegina, King of Pythia, noted for his piety. He was the father of Telamon and Peleus by Endemis and Phoicus by Pammate. The elder sons killed Phoicus from jealousy and were banished. When all Greece was ravaged by drought because of Pelops' murder of Symphalus, Aeacus' prayers brought rain. At his death he became either a waterer or a judge in Hades.

Aedile. In ancient Rome, one of 4 magistrates whose duty it was to maintain order in the city and to take charge of public games and buildings. An aedile corresponds roughly to a modern commissioner of public works. His supervision of public games gave him great opportunities for gaining favor with the populace. Although a small sum was appropriated from the public treasury for these games, an aedile generally expended much more from his own purse to make the show magnificent and thus win votes for the next office in the cursus honorum, that of praetor.

Æetes (Aietes). See Medea.

Aegaeon. In Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors, a merchant of Syracuse, the father of the two Antipholi and the husband of Aemilia. He is detained in Ephesus, pending ransom, because of the law barring Syracusans from the city.

Aegaeon. See Briaresus.

Aegusus (Aiheus). A legendary king of Athens, father of THESEUS. Aegus threw himself into the sea, thinking mistakenly that Theseus' expedition to Crete had failed. The Aegean Sea, according to tradition, was so named as a result of this event.

Aegipan (Aigipan). The god Pan. His horns, ears, and legs were goatlike. The name literally means goat Pan.

Aegis (Aigis). The shield or cuirass of Zeus. Made by Hephaestos, it was the symbol of divine protection. An aegis was also worn by Athene. The word indicates that it was originally merely a goat-skin.

Aegyptus (Aigypсос). In classic myth the father of 50 sons. They were married to the 50 daughters of his twin brother Danaus and all except one of them were murdered by their brides on the wedding night. See Danaides.

Aelfric, called Grammaticus, or "the Grammariam" (c. 955-c. 1020). English clergyman and scholar, a prolific writer in both Latin and Old English. He wrote a series of 120 homilies and saints' lives (990-998), then a treatise on the Old and New Testament and a Heptateuch, a vernacular translation of portions of the first seven books of the Bible. His prose is alliterative and rhythmical, the finest in Old English. Concerned with the revival of learning, he wrote a Latin grammar and Latin-English glossary.
Aemilia. The virtuous mother of the twins, Antipholus of Ephesus and Antipholus of Syracuse, and the wife of Aegeon in Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors. When her family is lost to her in a storm, she becomes an abbess.

Aeneas. The hero of Vergil's Aeneid. He was the son of the mortal Anchises and the goddess Aphrodite. According to Homer, he fought against the Greeks in the Trojan War and after the sack of Troy reigned in the Troad. Vergil, however, used another legend, according to which Aeneas carried his father Anchises on his shoulders out of the burning city and with a band of followers set out to establish a new nation; after wandering for many years, he is said to have arrived in Italy, where he founded the colony from which the Romans traced their origin. The epithet often applied to him is pious, i.e., devoted to the service of the gods and deeply aware of his obligations to his family and his country. See Ascanius.

Aeneas Silvius. See Pius II.

Aeneid. An epic poem by Vergil, composed of 12 books, in which the legendary Trojan origin of the Roman people is glorified. Vergil traces the lineage of the Julii from Iulus or Ascanius, the son of the Trojan hero Aeneas, down to Octavius Caesar (later Augustus), whose newly established principate the poem endorses. The poem was written at the request of the emperor and, though it was left unfinished at the sudden death of the poet (19 B.C.), it was greeted with enthusiasm by all educated Romans because of its nationalistic purpose.

In Book I, Aeneas and his Trojan followers are driven by a storm to the shores of Carthage and are hospitably entertained by Queen Dido. In Book II, Aeneas tells the tale of the wooden horse and of the destruction of Troy. He describes his escape from the burning city with his father Anchises, his son Ascanius, and several followers. His wife was lost and died during their flight. The narrative is continued in Book III, in which Aeneas recounts the perils he encountered on the westward voyage from Troy and the death of his father. Book IV tells of Dido's love for Aeneas, his departure from Carthage, and her suicide and cremation on a great funeral pyre. In Book V, Aeneas and his followers reach Sicily and hold funeral games in honor of Anchises. (See Acestes.) Aeneas visits Anchises in the underworld in Book VI, sees the future generations of Romans, and is told of their exploits. Here appear the much quoted lines of Anchises to Aeneas concerning the task of the Romans: "Roman, remember that you shall rule the nations by your authority, for this is to be your skill, to make peace the custom, to spare the conquered, and to wage war until the haughty are brought low."

In Book VII, Latinus, king of the Latini, entertains Aeneas and promises his daughter Lavinia to him in marriage; but Prince Turnus, who has already been betrothed to her by her mother, raises an army to resist Aeneas. Book VIII tells of the preparations for war on both sides and of Aeneas' visit to Latium, the future home of the Romans. In Book IX, Turnus, in the absence of Aeneas, fires the Trojan ships and assaults their camp. The episode of Nisus and Euryalus occurs here. The war between Turnus and Aeneas is depicted in Book X. Here Mezentius and his son Lausus are slain by Aeneas. In Book XI, the battle continues. Book XII tells of the single combat between Aeneas and Turnus, and of the death of Turnus. See Achates; Gyas and Cloanthus; Helenus; Palinurus.

Aeolus (Aiolos). In Greek mythology, the god of the winds, which he kept imprisoned in the Aeolian islands. He freed them at his own choice or the wish of other gods. In the Odyssey, Book X, he aided Odysseus in his homeward voyage by fastening the unfavorable winds in a leather bag and giving it into Odysseus' keeping, with a warning not to open it. While Odysseus slept, however, his seamen, thinking that he was secreting treasure from them, opened the bag and the ship was blown back to its starting point. Angrily Aeolus refused to cooperate further.

Aeolus (Aiolos). The grandson of Deucalion, the Greek Noah, and Eponymous, ancestor of the Aeolian Greeks.

Aerodrome, The (1941). A Kafkaesque social and political allegory by Rex Warner. Its main character tries to impose his totalitarian system on a disorganized, easy-going village. The villagers successfully resist him.

Aeschylus (Aischylos) (525-456 B.C.). A Greek tragic dramatist. Aeschylus was born of an aristocratic family in Eleusis. In his youth, he fought against the Persians in the great battles of Marathon, Salamis, and Platea. He seems to have been prouder of these feats than of his immense success as a playwright, which he did not even mention in the epigraph that, according to tradition, he wrote for himself. After 16 years of writing, he won his first prize for tragedy in 484 B.C.; he won his last with his masterpiece, the Oresteia, 25 years later. In 476 B.C. he had paid a successful visit to the court of Hiero I, Tyrant of Syracuse; three years before his death, he again went to Sicily, this time to Gela. According to a popular story, he was killed when an eagle dropped a tortoise on his bald head, mistaking it for a stone. The story is improved with the mention of an oracular prophecy that he would die of a blow from heaven.

Aeschylus wrote 90 plays, but only seven of them have survived: The Suppliant Women, The Persians, the Seven Against Thebes, Prometheus Bound, and the Oresteia, a trilogy. This last is the only exact example of the trilogies on related themes that were common in Aeschylus' day; it includes Agamemmon, The Libation Bears, and the Eumenides. Aeschylus is noted for the grandeur of his language and of his subjects, which encompass not only the struggles between historical heroes (The Persians) and mythical (Agamemnon), but the grim conflict between the old laws and the new (Eumenides), and, in a sense, between man and gods (Prometheus Bound). Aeschylus' poetry is tense, closely packed, exciting, often somewhat rough, compared with the polished lines of Sophocles. His imagery is strong, startling, and sometimes forced, but always effective. The antithesis of Euripides' relatively colloquial speech, Aeschylus' dialogue is far from natural, but is well suited to the tragic immorality of his themes.

Aeschylus was a practical and imaginative member of the theater, as well as an inspired poet. He was the first to use a second actor in addition to the chorus;
this permitted for the first time dialogue between individuals. He also introduced elaborate costumes and the high-soled cokhurnoi that gave his actors added stature. He seems to have enjoyed colorful effects; The Persians is filled with pageantry, and old Oceanus appears in Prometheus Bound riding on a sort of four-legged bird, perhaps the original of modern vaudeville's two-man horse. Tradition says that some of his costumes were so splendid that the hierophants at Eleusis copied them for their own vestments. The story is also told that his presentation in Eumenides of the chorus of Erinys, hideous creatures with black skins and red tongues, so terrified the audience that women had miscarriages and children convulsions.

Aesculapius. See ASCLEPIUS; FAERIE QUEENE, THE.

Aesir. The collective name of the Norse gods who lived in heavenly Asgard. There were said to be 12 gods and some 24 to 30 goddesses, but the number seems variable. The following may be mentioned: (1) Odin, the chief of the gods; (2) Thor, Odin's eldest son and god of thunder; (3) Tiw, another son, the god of wisdom; (4) Balder, the Scandinavian Apollo; (5) Bragi, god of poetry; (6) Vidar, god of silence; (7) Hoder the blind, slayer of Balder; (8) Hermoder, Odin's son and messenger; (9) Hod, a minor god; (10) Odinr, husband of Freya, the Scandinavian Venus; (11) Loki, the god of mischief; (12) Vafi, Odin's youngest son.

Wives of the Aesir. Odin's wife was Frigg; Thor's wife was Sif; Balder's wife was Nanna; Bragi's wife was Iduna; Loki's wife was Sigurna.

The important deities mentioned above are more fully treated under their names. See ASYNJA; VANIR.

Aesop. Greek fabulist. According to tradition, the author of Aesop's Fables was a Phrygian slave who probably lived from 620 to 560 B.C. It is inferable from Aristotle's mention of Aesop's acting as a public defender that he was freed from slavery, and Plutarch's statement that the Athenians erected a noble statue of him would tend to contradict the tradition that Aesop was deformed. There is little information on Aesop's life, and several scholars have consequently been led to doubt that he ever existed at all. The earliest extant collections of Aesop's stories were made by various Greek versifiers and Latin translators, to whose compilations were added tales from Oriental and ancient sources to form what we now know as Aesop's Fables. The majority of European fables, including those of La Fontaine, are largely derived from these succinct tales, in which talking animals illustrate human vices, follies, and virtues. Since some of Aesop's fables have been discovered on Egyptian papyri dating from 800 or 1,000 years before his time, it cannot be claimed that he was, by any means, the author of all the fables.

Aesthetics. The branch of philosophy dealing with art and beauty. The term was first used by the German philosopher Alexander Baumgarten (1714-1762), though occidental preoccupation with problems of aesthetics goes back to the Greeks of the 4th century B.C.

Aetna. See ETNA.

Affair, The (1959). A novel by C. P. Snow. It is a melodrama about an unpopular college teacher with Communist sympathies. He is unjustly accused of forgery, but eventually justice prevails. The novel is part of the STRANGERS AND BROTHERS series.

Affliction (1633). A poem by George Herbert. The author rebels against the way God has "deceived" him into abandoning his worldly hopes for His service, afflicted him with illness, loss of friends, a sense of uselessness. The poem concludes with the famous lines:

Ah, my dear God! though I am clean forgot,
Let me not love thee if I love thee not.

Afacioando. See DILETANTES.

Afriengenov, Alexander Nikolaevich (1904-1941). Russian dramatist. His plays describe the early struggles and problems of the Soviet regime. They include At the Breaking Point (1926), The Cran (1929), Fear (1931), Distant Point (1934), Spain, Salute! (1936), The Mother of Us All (1940), Masenka (1941) and On the Eve (1941).

Afreet or Afrit. In Muslim mythology the second most powerful of the five classes of JINN or devils. They are of gigantic stature, very malicious, and inspire dread. Legend holds that King Solomon once tamed an Afreet, and made it submissive to his will.

African Farm, The Story of an (1883). A semi-autobiographical novel by Olive Schreiner. She gives a vivid account of life on a Boer farm like her childhood home and describes the religious doubts and intellectual and emotional development of an ardent young feminist like herself.

African Queen, The (1935). A novel by C. S. Forester. It is the comic-heroic story of a missionary's sister and a timid Cockney engineer who try to blow up a German gunboat from their asthmatic steam launch, The African Queen.

After Many a Summer Dies the Swan (1939). A novel by Aldous Huxley. Centered around Jo Stoyte, a Californian oil magnate afraid of old age and death, it is a satire of some aspects of American life. Jeremy Pordage, working on some old English manuscripts, discovers that an 18th-century earl used the same rejuvenating system Stoyte is experimenting with. They go to England and find the earl, over 200 years old, a filthy ape. Old Mr. Propter is spokesman for Huxley's spiritual philosophy.

Afternoon of a Faun, The. See L'APRÈS-MIDI D'UN FAUNE.

Agadir Crisis (1911). An international incident precipitated by the arrival of a German gunboat at Agadir in French-controlled Morocco. German demands for African territory were repulsed.

Against the Grain, or Against Nature (A Rebours; 1884). A novel by Joris Karl Huysmans. Its subject is the quest of its décadent hero, Des Esseintes, for the rare and perverse in sensation. Restless and discontent, Des Esseintes seeks release from the ennui of existence in perfumes, music, painting, the love of circus acrobats, or the study of medieval Latin literature.

Agamedes. See TROPHONIUS.

Agamemnon. In Greek legend the king of Mycenae, son of ATREUS and leader of the Greeks at the siege of Troy. Homer makes him ruler over all Argos. He was the brother of Menelaus, the theft of whose wife Helen by Paris brought on the Trojan War. Before the expedition against Troy could sail, Agamemnon's daughter Iphigenia was sacrificed to Diana to appease that goddess for a sacred stag Agamemnon had killed. At Troy, Agamemnon's quarrel with Achilles cost the Greeks many lives and delayed the end of the war. (See Iliad.) After the sack of Troy, Agamemnon returned home only to be murdered by his wife Clytemnestra, who was living as the paramour of Aegisthus.

Aganippe. Fountain of the Muses, at the foot of Mount Helicon in Boeotia. Its waters were thought to inspire those who drank them.

Agape. See Love Feast; Faerie Queene, The.

Agapemone. A 19th-century English society. This communitarian establishment of men and women was suspected of free-love practices.

Agassiz, Jean Louis Rodolphe (1807-1873). Swiss naturalist, teacher, and author. Agassiz came to the U.S. in 1846 as a lecturer with an established reputation; deciding to remain permanently, he became widely known as a professor at Harvard and curator of the Agassiz Museum at Cambridge. He was the founder of the Marine Biological Laboratory at Woods Hole, Mass. A fluent writer on geology and zoology, Agassiz showed an astonishing command of English. His major work is called Contributions to the Natural History of the United States of America (4 v., 1857-1862). An effective teacher of laymen and scientists, he epitomized his method in the directive: "Go to Nature; take the facts in your own hands; look, and see for yourself!" Opposed to the Darwinian theory of evolution, Agassiz did succeed in arousing interest in the natural sciences and establishing methods of study and classification. A member of the famous Saturday Club, he exchanged ideas with leading men of letters.

Agastya. In Hindu mythology, the legendary sage and pioneer in the epic age of the Aryanaization of south India. Supposed to have been born in a jar, he is also known as Kumbhayon, or "jar-born." Legend says that his pupil Rama he presented the invincible bow and inexhaustible quiver of Vishnu. Another legend describes him as drinking the sea dry. As he was walking one day with Vishnu, he invited the god who the pigrm (the "jar-born" dwarf) was that strutted by his side. When Vishnu replied that it was the patriarch Agastya, who would restore earth to its true balance, the ocean contemptuously spat its spray in Agastya's face. Agastya, in revenge, drank it dry.

Agathoncles (361-289 B.C.). Tyrant of Sicily (316-304 B.C.). He was the son of a potter, and raised himself from the ranks to become general of the army. There is a story that he always kept an earthen pot at hand in memory of his origin. When he attacked the Carthaginians, he "carried the war into Africa" and "burned his ships behind him" that his soldiers might feel assured they must either conquer or die. Agathocles died of poison administered by his grandson. He is the hero of an English tragedy by Richard Perrington, a French tragedy by Voltaire and a German novel by Caroline Pichler, all called by his name.

Agave (Agae). In classic mythology, a daughter of Cadmus and mother of Pentheus, whom she tore to pieces in a mad fury under the illusion that he was a wild beast. This episode forms a part of Euripides' drama called the Bacchae. See Bacchantes.

Agree, James (1909-1955). American novelist and film critic. Agree was raised in the Cumberland mountain area of Tennessee, the setting for his two novels. In 1936 he lived for a few weeks with several "typical" Alabama sharecropper families in order to write a magazine article on the plight of such people. Instead of a magazine article the result was the book Let Us Now Praise Famous Men (1941), with photographs by Walker Evans. During the 1940's Agree was a film reviewer. His work has been compiled as the first volume of Agree on Film (1958). After 1948 he worked almost exclusively for the motion pictures. The second volume of Agree on Film (1960) contains five of his screen plays. His first novel was The Morning Watch (1954). A Death in the Family was posthumously published in 1957 and was awarded a Pulitzer Prize. Dramatized by Tad Mosel as All the Way Home in 1960, the play too was a Pulitzer Prize winner. A collection of Agree's letters to Father Flye, an Episcopalian minister he had met as a youth, appeared in 1962.

Age of Anxiety, The (1948). A long poem by W. H. Auden. It concerns three men and a woman who meet by chance in a New York bar in wartime; all are suffering from the modern malaise, and feel guilty, isolated, and rootless. In a common dream they set out on a quest through a barren waste land. Hope in Christianity is presented as the solution to their problems. The title has frequently been used as a name to describe our age.

The Age of Anxiety is also the name of a ballet, danced to Leonard Bernstein's Second Symphony.

Age of Innocence, The (1920). A novel by Edith Wharton. A satirical picture of social life in New York during the 1870's, it describes the marriage of Newland Archer to May Welland, who is bound by the tribal code of the elite. Although he is attracted to her unconventional cousin, Ellen Olenska, they are both too obedient to the code to seek happiness together.

Age of Reason, The (1794-1796). A controversial treatise by Thomas Paine, expounding the deistic view of revealed religion. The work was widely denounced in America as immoral and atheistic.

Agésilas (1666). A tragedy by Pierre Corneille. Set in Ephesus in the time of Agesilaus, king of Sparta, it centers on the conflict between public opinion and the king's desire to marry a Persian. A compromise is effected, and he is finally able to marry the woman of his choice.

Aggravaine, Sir. In Arthurian legend, a son of Mervaww and a knight of the Round Table. In Malory's Morte d'Arthur, he is the brother of the knights Gawain, Gareth, Gaheris, and half brother of Mordred.

Agib. The third calendar in the Arabian Nights. He was wrecked on a loadstone mountain, lived for a year in the palace of the forty princesses, and lost an eye for his curiosity.

_Agincourt, Battle of_ (1415). Battle in northern France. The English army defeated the more nuumerous, better armed French. It is the setting for Shakespeare's _Henry V_ and Michael Drayton's _The Ballad of Agincourt_ (c. 1605).

_Aglaia_. (1) One of the three Charites (GRACES) of classic mythology.

(2) In Dostoevski's novel _The Idiot_, the fiancée of Prince Myshkin.

_Aglaonice_. A poor Arcadian peasant. He was called by the Delphic oracle "happier than King Gyges of Lydia," because he was contented.

_Agnés_. In Molière's comedy _L'École des Femmes_, the girl on whom Arnaulph tries out his educational experiments, with the aim of turning her into a perfect wife for himself. She has been brought up in a country convent and kept totally in ignorance of the difference between the sexes, conventional proprieties, the mysteries of marriage, and so on. When removed from the convent, she treats men like schoolgirls, playing with them and kissing them. An _Agnés_ is therefore any naïve and innocent young girl. The French have the expression, _Elle fait l'Agnés_, that is, she is pretending to be wholly unsophisticated and ingenious.

_Agnes Grey_ (1847). A novel by Anne Brontë, published with her sister Emily's _Wuthering Heights_.
It is a quiet account of the life of an ill-treated, lonely governess who eventually marries Mr. Weston, a curate.

_Agni_. The Hindu god of fire, sunlight, and lightning and lord of the gods of the earth. He is one of the more important deities described in the Vedas.

_agnostic_ (Gr., _a_, not, _gnosko_, to know).
Thomas Huxley coined this term in 1869, alluding to the altar to "the Unknown God" mentioned in St. Paul's writings. Huxley meant to indicate the mental attitude of those who withhold their assent from whatever is incapable of proof, such as an unseen world, a First Cause, etc. Agnostics neither dogmatically accept nor reject such matters, but simply say _agnosco_ (I do not know): they are not capable of proof.

_Agramante_ (Agramant). The emperor of Africa who fights Charlemagne and the paladins in the Orlando poems of Boiardo and Ariosto. In the latter's poem he is killed by Oliviero (see _Orlando Furioso_).

_Agrarians_. A group of 20th-century American writers in the South. Among its members were Allen
Tate, John Crowe Ransom, and Robert Penn Warren. Drawing their inspiration from the past, they favored agriculture as the economic base for the South; this would supposedly enable the South to return to its regional aristocratic heritage. These critics expressed their views in the symposium _I'll Take My Stand: The South and the Agrarian Tradition by Twelve Southerners_ (1932). Many members of the original group have since abandoned their early position.

_Agricane_ (Agrican). In Carolingian legend the King of Tartary who fights against the Christian forces of Charlemagne and his paladins. In the _Orlando Innamorato_ of Boiardo, he besieges the lovely princess Angelica at Albracca, but is killed in combat by Orlando. Before he dies, he asks for and is given baptism.

_Agrippa I_ (d. a.d. 44). A son of Herod. He was one of the Roman rulers before whom St. Paul was tried. His tribute, "Almost thou persuadest me to become a Christian" (Acts 26:28), is often quoted.

_Agrippina_. (d. a.d. 59). Daughter of Agrippina and Germanicus Caesar, sister of the emperor Caligula, and mother of the emperor Nero. She persuaded her husband the emperor Claudius, to name Nero, her son by a previous marriage, as his successor over his own son Britannicus; subsequently she had Claudius poisoned. After he became emperor, Nero, after many elaborate and thwarted attempts,
finally succeeded in having Agrippina murdered.

Agrippina's mother was the granddaughter of Augustus, wife of Germanicus Caesar and mother of Caligula. She was banished by Tiberius to the Isle of Pandatarra where she died (a.d. 33).

_Aguecheek, Sir Andrew_. In Shakespeare's _Twelfth Night_, a silly old fop with "3,000 ducats a year." Very fond of the table but with a shrewd understanding that "beef had done harm to his wit," Sir Andrew thinks himself "old in nothing but understanding," and boasts that he can "cut a caper, dance the coranto, walk a jig, and take delight in masques," like a young man.

_Ahab_. (1) In the Old Testament, a king of Israel whose name has become a byword for wickedness. He is remembered especially for his hostility to the prophet Elijah and countenance of profane sects. At the instigation of his wife Jezebel, he excuted Naboth on false charges in order to obtain possession of a vineyard which Naboth owned and refused to sell. His story is told in I Kings 16-22.
(2) The monomaniacal captain of the Pequod in Melville's _Moby-Dick_ (1851).

_Ahasuerus_. (1) In the Old Testament, king of the Medes and Persians, as related in the book of _Esther._

(2) In medieval legend, one of the names given the _Wandering Jew._

_Ahi_. In Vedic myth, the sky dragon that releases the rain when Indra's thunderbolt is hurled.

_Ahmed, Prince_. A character in the _Arabian Nights_, noted for the tent given him by the fairy Paribanou, which would cover a whole army but might be carried in one's pocket; he is also associated with the apple of Samarkand, which would cure all diseases.

_Aho, Juhani_. Pen name of Johannes Brofelt Influenced by the realist movement, Aho depicted in his earlier work the daily lives of common people.
He was not, however, motivated by a passion for social reform, but sought instead to paint a true portrait and to record his often humorous insights.
In both _Papin Tytan_ (The Parson's Daughter, 1883) and _Papin Rowan_ (The Parson's Wife, 1893), he portrays the inner struggles of a young woman who is married to a man she does not love. A new strain appeared in Aho's work with the publication of the drama _Panu_ (1897): national romanticism now colored his realism. In the short stories of _Lautuja_ (Chips, 1891–1921), he shows himself a fine poet.
Ahoh and Ahobilah. In the Old Testament, the names of 2 harlots who symbolize the religious idolatry and pursuit of false faiths in Samaria and Jerusalem (Ezek. 23:4).

Ahobilamah. In the Old Testament, the name of one of Esau's wives (Gen. 36:2) and of a duke, or leader, of Edom (Gen. 36:41). In Byron's poem, Heaven and Earth (1824), she is a proud, ambitious, queenlike beauty, the daughter of Cain's son and loved by the seraph Samiasa.

Ahriman or Ahrimanes. In the dual system of Zoroaster, the spiritual enemy of mankind, also called Angra Mainyu and Druj (deceiver). He has existed since the beginning of the world and is said to be in eternal conflict with Ahura Mazda or Ormuzd.

Ah Sin. The Chinese card player in Bret Harte's Plain Language from Truthful James.

Ahura Mazda. See ORMUZD.

Aida. A spectacular opera by Giuseppe Verdi. The libretto by Camille du Locle was translated into Italian by Ghislanzoni and considerably reworked by Verdi himself. The story was based on a sketch by the French Egyptologist Mariotte, who had originally thought of it as appropriate for ceremonies opening the Suez Canal. Verdi, however, did not consent to begin writing the opera until 1870, the year after the opening of the canal, and the only connection it retained of Mariette's original purpose was that the khdive of Egypt, who commissioned the opera, required that it should open in Cairo. Aides, also Aidoneus. See Hades.

Aiglon, L'. A drama by Edmond Rostand. It is based on the tragic career of Napoleon's son and heir, whom Victor Hugo called l'Aiglon (the eagle).

Aiken, Conrad [Potter] (1889-). American poet. A graduate of Harvard, Aiken was influenced by Freud, Havelock Ellis, and William James, as well as by Edgar Allan Poe. Of his novels, perhaps the best known are The Blue Voyage and the autobiographical Ushant. He won a Pulitzer Prize in 1930 for his Selected Poems (1929). Among his volumes of poetry are The Jig of Forslin (1916), The House of Dust (1920), Priapus and the Pool (1922), Serlin (1925), Time in the Rock (1936), and And in the Human Heart (1940). Costumes by Eros (1928) is a collection of short stories. See Kim, The. His collected novels appeared in 1964.

Ainsworth, William Harrison (1805-1882). English historical novelist. From 1840 on he was editor of Bentley's Miscellany, Ainsworth's Magazine, and the New Monthly. He wrote 39 novels, including Rookwood (1834), Jack Sheppard (1839), Old St. Paul's (1841), Windsor Castle (1843), and The Fitch of Bacon (1854).

Airavata. In Hindu myth the holy elephant, Indra being its rider. He is supposed to have been created by seven chants from the mouth of Brahma. Ajax (Aias). The most famous hero of the Trojan War after Achilles. He was king of Salamis, a man of giant stature, daring and self-confident, son of Telamon. When the armor of Hector was awarded to Odysseus instead of to himself, he turned mad from vexation and stabbed himself. His deeds are narrated by Homer and later poets. Sophocles wrote a tragedy called Ajax, in which "the madman" scourges a ram he mistakes for Achilles. His encounter with a flock of sheep, which he fancied in his madness to be the sons of Atreus, Agamemnon, and Menelaus, has been mentioned at greater or less length by several Greek and Roman poets. This Ajax is introduced by Shakespeare in his drama Troilus and Cressida.

Ajax (Aias) the Less. In Greek legend, son of Oileus, King of Locris. The night Troy was taken, he offered violence to Cassandra, the prophetic daughter of Priam; in consequence, his ship was driven on a rock, and he perished at sea.

Akenside, Mark (1721-1770). English poet and physician to the queen (1761). He is the author of The Pleasures of the Imagination (1774), in blank verse, and of various minor poems.

Akhmatova, Anna. Pen name of Anna Andrejevna Gorekho (1888- ). Russian poet. An outstanding member of the Acmeist school (see Acmeism), she married the poet Nikolai Gumiliov in 1910 and divorced him in 1918. Between 1912 and 1923 she published half a dozen volumes of poems, the best of which included Evening (Vecher; 1912) and Anno Domini (1922). Her poetry, principally intimate and personal love lyrics, is in the Acmeist tradition of clarity and sharpness of imagery. Akhmatova's abstinence from political themes led to an attack on her in 1946 by the Soviet cultural overseer, Andrei Zhdanov. She had published little since 1923 —being completely unpublished at all for one 17-year stretch—and after the attack issued only a few second-rate verses. In 1956, at the height of the Soviet thaw in the arts, two of her poems were reprinted in a Moscow literary journal.

Akins, Zoë (1886-1958). American dramatist. She won a Pulitzer Prize for her adaptation (1935) of Edith Wharton's The Old Maid. She also wrote such light romantic comedies as A Royal Pendangle (1923) and The Greeky Had a Word for It (1930). In later years Miss Akins wrote screenplays, among them one for Edna Ferber's Show Boat (1926).

Aksakov, Sergei Timofeyevich (1791-1859). Russian writer. Born in Ufa, in the eastern steppes of Russia, Aksakov attended the University of Kazan and entered government service in Moscow. His early writing consisted mainly of essays and articles on the theatre. The novelist Gogol, whom he became a close friend of Aksakov's in the early 1830's, urged him to write the reminiscences of his early life in the steppe country. Aksakov produced three autobiographical works: Semenaya khronika (The Family Chronicle, 1856); Vospominaniya (Reminiscences, 1856), and Detskiy gody bagrova vnuka (Years of Childhood of Bagrov's Grandson, 1858). In the Chronicle and Years of Childhood, Aksakov used fictitious names for his family. All three of these works, which are masterpieces of description and narration, have become classics in Russian literature. Aksakov's prose style is placed on a level with the best Russian prose writers, including Pushkin, Lermontov, and Turgenev. The love of the old patriarchal Russian way of life that is revealed in Aksakov's memoirs was passed on to his children. Two of his sons, Konstantin (1817-1860) and Ivan (1823-1886), became leading members of the Slavophiles.

Akatagawa Ryunosuke (1892-1927). Japanese short-story writer, noted for his novel subject matter, presented in a vivid and realistic style. Many of his stories have been translated into English. He committed suicide with an overdose of veronal.

Al Aaraaf (1829). A poem by Edgar Allan Poe. It is the title poem of his second collection, called Al Aaraaf, Tamerlane, and Other Poems. In Arabian folklore, Al Aaraaf is the region between Heaven and Hell, presided over by Nesace, a beautiful maiden. Poe's Al Aaraaf is a wondrous star, surrounded by four suns. The youth, Angelo, is brought there with the hope of entering Heaven; an earthly love prevents him from hearing Nesace's call.

Aladdin. One of the most celebrated characters in the Arabian Nights, hero of the story Aladdin or the Wonderful Lamp. The son of Mustafa, a poor tailor of China, Aladdin is a lazy, obstinate and mischievous boy when the tale opens. One day an African magician accosts him, pretending to be his uncle, and sends him into a cave to bring up a "wonderful lamp," giving him a "ring of safety." Aladdin secures the lamp but will not hand it to the magician till he is out of the cave; whereupon the magician shuns him up and departs for Africa. Wringing his hands in despair, Aladdin accidentally rubs the lamp and learns of its magic power as two genii appear to do his bidding. He asks to be delivered from the cave and is returned to his home. By means of this lamp, he obtains untold wealth, builds a superb palace, and marries Bardoulbourdou, the sultan's daughter. After a time, the African magician, offering new lamps for old, obtains the lamp from Aladin's wife and causes the palace to be transported into Africa. Ultimately, however, Aladdin poisons the magician, regains the lamp and has his palace restored to its original place in China.

Aladino (Alandine). In the Gerusalemme Liberata of Tasso, the aged king of Jerusalem who opposes the armies of the First Crusade led by Godfrey (Godfrey). He is killed in the final battle that precedes the Christian conquest of the holy city.

Alain. Pen name of Emile Chartier (1868–1951). French philosopher, essayist, and teacher. He took his pseudonym from the 15th-century poet Alain Chartier. Believing that to be alive is to be awake, Alain imbed a generation of disciples with the will to resist conformity. His writings were most often in the form of propos, short aphoristic essays much like fables or parables, which taught a practical lesson through imagistic narrative. Some of the many thousands of these propos have been collected in books about politics, his militant pacifism, psychology, philosophy, and literary criticism, including Les Cent et un Propos d'Alain (5 v., 1908–1929) and Mars, ou la Guerre jugée (1921).

Alain-Fournier. Pen name of Henri Fournier (1886–1914). French novelist. Alain-Fournier grew up in the beautiful countryside of La Chapelle-d'Angillon, in the department of Cher. The son of two schoolteachers, he wandered from the merchant marine, to military service, to a career in journalism. In 1914, Alain-Fournier died in action, leaving on work which alone secured his reputation as a significant French novelist: Le Grand Meaulnes.

Alamí (Alan-a-Dale). In the Chansons de Geste, a knight of Roman lineage and the hero of the adventures of the Ile de Noircourt. He is especially well known as the defender of the citadel of Ambushe at the battle of Poitiers, where he is killed.

Alaric. The great king of the Visigoths, who invaded France (496) and Spain, and tyrannized over the Visigothic kingdom for nearly a century (496–526). He was a great soldier, but a poor tactician, and his campaigns were characterized by inconstancy and cruelty.

Alaric II (410). The last king of the Visigoths, who was killed in battle with the Roman army at Tolbiac (496). He was a brave and chivalrous warrior, but his reign was marked by internal strife and external aggression.

Alas y Ureña, Leopoldo. Also known as Clarín (1852–1901). Spanish novelist and critic. Though he exerted some critical influence during his period, his chief claim to fame lies in his two-volume novel La Regenta (1884–1885), considered one of the major works of European fiction in the 19th century. It applies a mixture of naturalism, akin to that of French writers, and psychological interpretation to Spanish provincial life, concentrating upon the plight of a heroine crushed by the boredom and malice present in her native town.

Albanact. Son of Brutus, in Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the Kings of Britain. According to Geoffrey, Albanact gave his name to Albany (Scotland).

Albany, duke of. In Shakespeare's King Lear, the gentle, wise, and courageous husband of the ruthless Goneril, eldest daughter of Lear. He is horrified Alamo. A fortified mission in San Antonio, Texas. In 1836, during the Texas rebellion against Mexico, a force of Texans under William B. Travis was besieged there by a much larger Mexican army led by General Santa Anna. When the Mexicans succeeded in gaining entrance after a 13-day bombardment, every remaining defender was killed in hand-to-hand combat. Among those killed were Davy Crockett and James Bowie. "Remember the Alamo!" became a battle slogan of the Mexican War.

Alan-a-Dale or Alín-a-Dale. See Alaric.

Alarcón, Pedro Antonio de (1833–1891). Spanish novelist. Alarcon's fame rests on his shorter works, particularly his humorous tale based on popular ballad tradition, El sombrero de tres picos (The Three Cornered Hat, 1874). His humor again raised him to prominence with the publication of the novella El capitán Veneno (Captain Venom or Poison, 1881). Also well known is his full-length work, El escándalo (1875), which points out the redeeming effects of an innocent girl's love upon a quarrelsome aristocrat, and the novel El niño de la bola (1880).

Alarcón y Mendoza, Juan Ruiz de (c. 1581–1639). Mexican-born Spanish dramatist. Alarcón, who spent most of his life in Spain, studied at Salamanca and was appointed to the Council of the Indies in 1626. His humped back and touchy temperament made him a target for the gibes of rival dramatists, such as Lope de Vega.

A restrained and painstaking artist who paid close attention to style and characterization, he wrote 24 plays, most of which were published in 1628 and 1634. The best known of these are the "comedies of ethics," in which the comic element enforces a moral lesson: Las parades oyun, a study of slander; Mudarse por mejorarse, which assail inconstancy in love; La prueba de las promesas, an attack on ingratitude; and La verdad sospechosa.

A la Recherche du Temps Perdu. See Remembrance of Things Past.

Alaric. (370?–410). Gothic king and conqueror. As king of the Visigoths, he invaded Greece (395–396) and plundered Rome (410).

Alas y Ureña, Leopoldo. Also known as Clarín (1852–1901). Spanish novelist and critic. Though he exerted some critical influence during his period, his chief claim to fame lies in his two-volume novel La Regenta (1884–1885), considered one of the major works of European fiction in the 19th century. It applies a mixture of naturalism, akin to that of French writers, and psychological interpretation to Spanish provincial life, concentrating upon the plight of a heroine crushed by the boredom and malice present in her native town.

Albanact. Son of Brutus, in Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the Kings of Britain. According to Geoffrey, Albanact gave his name to Albany (Scotland).

Albany, duke of. In Shakespeare's King Lear, the gentle, wise, and courageous husband of the ruthless Goneril, eldest daughter of Lear. He is horrified at Goneril’s behavior toward her father. At the play’s end, he and Edgar are left to rule England.

albatross. The largest web-footed bird. It is the subject of many superstitions, especially among sailors. Coleridge’s RIME OF THE ANCIENT MARINER is based on the belief that it is fatal to shoot an albatross.

Albee, Edward [Franklin] (1928– ). American playwright. His first play, written in three weeks in 1958, was the one-act Zoo Story, which was produced off-Broadway in 1960. This was followed by The Death of Bessie Smith, a one-act play on the effects of racial discrimination in the lives of whites; it was produced on Broadway in 1961, paired with Albee’s The American Dream. He also wrote two 15-minute plays: The Sandbox, a prelude to The American Dream, and Fam and Yam, a dialogue between playwrights. Albee’s first three-act play was Who’s Afraid of Virginia Woolf? (1962), a virulent unveling of the relationship between a history professor and his wife, the daughter of the president of the college. In 1963 he dramatized Carson McCullers’ novel The Ballad of the Sad Café.

Alberich. In Scandinavian and German legend, the dwarf who guards the treasure of the Nibelungs, owners of a magic ring. He plays a prominent part in both the Völsunga Saga and the Nibelungenlied. In Wagner’s musical drama, Der Ring des Nibelungen (1876), Loki and Wotan steal the ring and treasure, and Alberich’s curse follows the ring wherever it goes.

Albers, Joseph (1888– ). German artist. He taught at the Bauhaus and, emigrating to the U.S., headed the art department of Yale University until 1958. His teaching has considerably influenced industrial design.

Albert, Prince. Full name Albert Francis Charles Augustus Emmanuel of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha (1819–1901). German husband of Queen Victoria and prince-consort of England, son of the Duke of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha. Through his tact and abiding interest in the arts and science, he overcame the initial distrust of the English people. It was largely through his work that the great Exhibition of 1851 was successful. His death left the queen and the nation in deep mourning.

Albertanus of Brescia. See MELIBEE.

Alberti, Leone Battista (1404–1472). Florentine humanist. He wrote poetry, plays, moral and philosophical essays, dabbled in painting and sculpture, and practiced architecture, designing the Rucellai Palace and Loggia and the facade of Santa Maria Novella in Florence. In Rimini, he redesigned the church of San Francesco for the tyrant Sigismondo Malatesta in 1445; one of the earliest examples of Renaissance classical style, it was called the Tempio Malatestiano because of its resemblance to pagan temples. In Rome, he was one of the early contributors to the architectural plans for Saint Peter’s. He is particularly known for his treatises, on painting, De pictura (1435), on sculpture, De statua (1464), and on architecture, De re aedificatoria (1452, pub. 1485) in which he popularized Filippo Brunelleschi’s innovations concerning the scientific study of vision and the use of ancient monuments as sources; he also described a system based on human proportions which allows the correct placement of figures within pictorial space.

Among his literary works are a play written in such perfect imitation of the Latin poets that Aldo Manu- tius thought it an original; an autobiography (1460); and his masterpiece, the treatise On the Family (Della famiglia), which uses the dialogue form to discuss his social philosophy, and presents a valuable portrait of life in his day.

Alberi, Rafael (1902– ). Spanish poet and playwright. His early volumes, Marinero en tierra (1925), La amanta (1926), El alba del alhelí (1927), and Cal y Canto (1927), reveal his initial interest in folklore as an art motif. Later, as in his best-known work, Sobre los ángeles (1928), he shifted his focus, concentrating upon surrealist poetry. Alberi is also known for his popular plays El hombre deshabitado (1931), El adiés (1944), and the tragedy La Galarda.

Albertine disparue. See REMEMBRANCE OF THINGS PAST.

Albertine [Simonet]. The mistress of the narrator in Marcel Proust’s Remembrance of Things Past. She refuses him when they meet at Balbec, but later comes to live with him in Paris, although secretly continuing to have affairs with other women. Tormented by his jealousy, she leaves him—only to be killed accidentally by being thrown from a horse.
Albert the Great. See Albertus Magnus.

Albertus Magnus. (1206-1280). German scholastic philosopher and churchman. His works include paraphrases of Aristotle's works, and he was very advanced for his day in his knowledge of experimental science. His teachings had great influence; Thomas Aquinas was one of his students. He was canonized in 1932.

Albion. An ancient and poetical name for Great Britain. It is thought to have been so called from the white (Lat. albus) cliffs that face Gaul, but possibly from the Celtic alp, alp, a rock, cliff, mountain. It was Napoleon who called England Albion Perfid (Perfidious Albion).

Albracca. In Boiardo's famous epic Orlando Innamorato, a fortress in Cathay to which Albracca retires in grief when Rinaldo fails to return her love. Here she is besieged by Agricane, king of Tartary, until Orlando kills him.

Allbright, Ivan Le Lorraine (1897- ). American painter. He spotlights, with microscopic realism, the pores, wrinkles, textures, and blemishes of humanity.

Alcaic verse or Alcaics. A Greek lyrical metre, so called from Alcaeus, a lyric poet. He is said to have invented it. Alcaic measure is little more than a curiosity in English poetry; probably the best example is Tennyson's:

O migh/ty-mouthed / in/ ventor of / harmonies,
O skilled / to sing / of / Time or Eternity,
God-gifted ed / or / gan-voice / of Eng/land,
Mitton, a / name to re/sound for / ages.

Alcalde de Zalamea, El (The Mayor of Zalamea, c. 1640). A tragic drama by Pedro Calderón de la Barca. This play was originally written by Lope de Vega, but Calderón re-adapted it, giving to the realism of the former master a more profound and intellectual outlook. Among the characters created by Calderón is the hero, Pedro Crespo, a farmer who is elected alcalde, or mayor, of Zalamea.

Don Alvaro, an army captain quartered in Pedro's home, violates his host's daughter and refuses to marry her; he does not believe that he has to answer to commoners for his conduct. After Pedro has done Alvaro's business, Pedro, the captain's superior officer, demands his freedom, and King Philip II, who has arrived in Zalamea, agrees that Pedro has exceeded his authority. However, when Pedro reveals that the captain has been strangled in prison, the king, forced to admit that justice has been done, makes Pedro perpetual mayor of the town. This play, like many of Lope's works, is a protest against the capricious and despotic feudal nobility and upholds the dignity of the middle class.

Alcestis (Alkestitas). The first extant play (438 B.C.) by Euripides. It tells the story of Alcestis, a daughter of Pelias and wife of Admetus, king of Phaea. In gratitude for past kindnesses, Apollo had promised that Admetus might escape death if someone would consent to die in his place. When the time came, Admetus' aged parents refused to do so, but Alcestis voluntarily descended to Hades, from which Hecules soon rescued her. The drunken, comic Heracles makes this a tragi-comedy; it was originally presented in lieu of a satyr play. By implication, it called into question the Athenian attitude toward women. In Gluck's opera Alcestis (1767), the heroine is saved by the intervention of Apollo.

Alchemist, The (1610). A comedy by Ben Jonson. Subtle, a clever quack, and his whorish colleague, Doll Common, set up shop in the house of Lovewit while the latter is away. With the help of Lovewit's servant, Jeremy or Face, the "alchemists" succeed in tricking a whole series of gullible scoundrels, such as Abel Druggar, who seeks charms and advice on how to set up his tobacco shop for maximum good fortune; Dapper, a gambler in need of a familiar spirit (whom he is forced to await while bound in a privy with a gingerbread gag in his mouth); two sanctimonious Puritan Brethren, Anna and Tribulation Wholesome, who hope to extend their philanthropies and their power by means of alchemy; and, most important, Sir Epicure Mammon, a miser and lecher who dreams of inordinate sensual pleasure. These and others, including Kastril, a young country fellow who wishes to learn to quarrel like a gallant, are adroitly fleeced by Subtle and his colleagues, until the return of Lovewit, who cleverly rattles the quacks and takes advantage of their various accumulated gains.

Alcibiades (Alkibiades; c. 450-404 B.C.). An Athenian general and politician. Arrogant and ambitious, Alcibiades called democracy "acknowledged folly." He was brilliant but dissolve and ostentatious, earning both the admiration and the disgust of his fellow citizens. Alcibiades' courage and ambition won him an appointment as general. When Segesta appealed to Athens for aid against Selinus, Alcibiades spoke in favor of the ill-omened expedition. Spurred on by his speech, the Athenians sent him at the head of a huge fleet (415 B.C.). Just before the sailing he was implicated in a sacrilegious mockery of the Eleusinian mysteries. After the fleet had sailed he was recalled for trial, but escaped to Sparta. There, in revenge for the Athenians' confiscation of his property and sentencing him to death, he traitorously informed the Spartans of Athens' weak defenses. Sparta successfully cut off Athens' control over the farmlands through Decelia. Finally, he was forced to flee Sparta because of the jealousy of his leaders. When the Athenian democracy was overthrown, he was welcomed back to his native city. There, on the eve of a battle with Sparta, he was distracted again. He fled to Persia, where on Sparta's orders he was killed. Alcibiades' return to Athens is incidentally treated in Shakespeare's Timon of Athens; he also appears in Plato's dialogues the Phaedo and the Symposium, and is caricatured in Aristophanes' The Clouds.

Alcina. The sister of Morgana and a personification of sensual pleasure in the Orlando poems of Boiardo and Ariosto. In the latter's poem, Orlando Furioso, she reigns, like Circe, over an island of oblivion filled with luring enchantments. She turns her lovers into trees, stones and wild beasts after tiring of them. Ruggiero, one of her victims, stays with her until rescued by Melissa, who also restores Aristolfo to himself after Alcina had turned him into a myrtle tree.

Alcinous (Alkinos). See Phaecians.

Alcione or Alcyone. See Halcyone and Ceyx.

Alciphron (Alkiphron). A Greek rhetorician of the 2d or 3d century. He was the author of fictitious letters giving details of domestic life and manners of his time.

Alciphron, or the Minute Philosopher (1732).

The title of a series of dialogues by Bishop Berkeley, so called from the name of the chief speaker, a free-thinker.

Alcmaeon (Alkmeon or Alkmaion). In Greek mythology, a son of Amphiaraut and Eriphyle. As children, he and his brother Amphibias were enjoined by their father to avenge him on his wife for the treachery that drove him into the fatal war as one of the Seven against Thebes. When Alcmaeon was grown, Eriphyle, bribed by Thersander, repeated her treachery by sending Alcmaeon too into war with Thebes. He led the Epigoni to victory and, on his return, killed his mother. Dying, she laid a curse on any land that would shelter him, and the Erinyes drove him mad.

Alcmaeon wandered through many lands. Phegeus, king of Psophis, married him to his daughter Arsinoe and Alcmaeon gave her Harmonia's necklace, with which his mother had been bribed. Eriphyle's curse brought famine on the land and Alcmaeon left Psophis. He wandered to the river Achelous. On its delta, which had not existed when the curse was laid, he was at last free from madness. The river god Achelous gave Alcmaeon his daughter Callirrhoe.

She bore him two sons, Acarnan and Amphoterus, but soon demanded the necklace for herself. Alcmaeon returned to Psophis and tricked Phegeus into giving him the necklace. As he was leaving, the trick was discovered and Alcmaeon was killed by Phegeus' sons. Callirrhoe, meanwhile, had been lending her favors to the amorous Zeus. At her request, he caused herself by Alcmaeon to grow to manhood overnight.
They killed Phegeus' sons and finally dedicated the necklace to Apollo at Delphi, where it was still shown in classical times.

Alcan (Alkman). A celebrated Dorian lyric poet of Sparta. He flourished in the first half of the 7th century B.C.

Alcmena or Alcmene (Alkmena, Alkmene).
In Greek mythology, the mother of Hercules by Zeus. Her cuckolded husband was Amphitryon.

Alcofridas. The pseudonym assumed by Francois Rabelais in Books I and II of his Gargantua and Pantagruel. Alcofridas Nasier is an anagram of Francois Rabelais. Books III, IV, and V were all signed "M. Fran. (or Francoys) Rabelais, Docteur en Medecine."

Alderson, see KORAN.

Aldcott, [Amos] Bronson (1799-1888). American philosopher, teacher, and poet. After a period as itinerant peddler, Alcott organized an unorthodox school whose advanced methods and racially mixed enrollment cauied public indignation. For a time he ran a cooperative experimental farm called Fruitlands. He then served as superintendent of schools in Concord, Mass., but it was not until his daughter Louisa May Alcott succeeded as a writer that any measure of financial security was assured his family. In Concord he set up a school of philosophy with William T.
Harris; together, they disseminated Alcott's benevolent philosophy. He published little but kept extensive journals; his most important published work includes Tablets (1868), Observations on the Principles and Methods of Infant Instruction (1830), and his contributions of Orphic Sayings to The Dial.

Aldrovandus (Louisa May) (1832-1888). American novelist and poet. Determined to write, she had to work to help support the family. Her father, Bronson Alcott, to whom the family was very devoted, kept them poor with a succession of philanthropic and educational schemes. Miss Alcott wrote her first book, Flower Fables, when she was 16; her first success was Hospital Sketches (1863), a volume based on the letters she wrote for soldiers as an untrained nurse in Georgetown Hospital, during the Civil War. Louisa May Alcott became famous in 1869, with the publication of Little Women. She continued with a series of books read by children and adults: An Old-Fashioned Girl (1870), Little Men (1871), Eight Cousins
(1875), Rose in Bloom (1876), and Under the Lilac (1878).

Her fiction is semiautobiographical and is still widely read; eight of the books are still in print.

Alduin of York (735-804). English scholar.
Trained at the cathedral school of York, set up by one of the Venerable Bede's students, he was invited to France by Charlemagne to aid in the revival of learning and ecclesiastical reform (see Carolin-gians). He established a school at the royal court and another at Tours, thus helping to return to the Continent the Christian learning and culture that had been preserved mainly in the English monasteries.

Aldanov, Mark. Pen name of Mark Aleksan-drovich Landau (1886-1957). Russian émigré novelist. He is best known for his novel The Fifth Seal (Nachalo kontsa; 1939), set during the Spanish Civil War.

Alden, John. See Courthship of Miles Standish,
The.

Aldigeri of Chiaramonte. In the Morgante Magioire of Pulci and the Orlando poems of Ariosto and Boiardo a knight of Charlemagne's company who holds the castle of Agrismon. In Pulci's poem he is killed by the traitorous Gano of Maganza.

Aldine editions. Editions of the Greek and Roman classics printed and published at Venice and elsewhere by Aldo Manuzio or Aldus Manutius (1450-1515) and his family from 1490 to 1597. Their handy octavo size and scholarly accuracy made them popular throughout Europe and helped promote Renaissance Humanism's ideal of reviving the classics.
Aldo invented the type called italics, once called Aldine, and first used in a 1501 edition of Virgil.

Alidington, Richard (1892-1962). English poet, novelist, biographer, and translator. At one time mar-rried to the American poet Hilda Doolittle, he was a member of the group that introduced imagism.
He was among those who, after World War I, found England barren and sterile. His collection of poems Images of War (1919) expresses his disgust with the war itself; Soft Answers (1932) is a collection of savage satires. His chief novels are Death of a Hero and All Men Are Enemies (1933). His best-known biographies are D. H. Lawrence: Portrait of a Genius, But . . . (1950), and Lawrence of Arabia (1955). Life for Life's Sake (1941) is an autobiography.

Aldrich, Bess Streeter (1881–1954). American novelist. She is noted for her studies of pioneer life, especially A Lantern in Her Hand (1928), the story of a pioneer woman in Nebraska, and Song of Years (1939), a novel of pioneer Iowa. Miss Bishop (1933) is the story of a Middle Western teacher who marries a man and brings up other women's children.

Aldrich, Thomas Bailey (1836–1907). American poet, editor, novelist, and dramatist. After an early career as journalist and war correspondent, Aldrich became the editor of The Atlantic Monthly in 1881. He later retired to devote himself to writing.

Aldrich was a member of a brilliant literary circle in New York; although he was a man of great wit, his work is marred by excessive gentility and sentimentality. His most famous book is the novel, The Story of a Bad Boy, based on his own childhood. His well-known short story, May Jorke Daw, is included in the collection, Marjorie Daw and Other People (1873). Other popular works are The Still-water Tragedy (1880), a collection of verse called The Bells (1855), and a series of plays.

Aleichem, Sholem or Shalom. Pen name of Solomon J. Rabinowitz (1859–1916). Russian-born Yiddish humorist. A noted author of tales in Yiddish, he was the son of Russian-Jewish storekeepers. For some years a rabbi, he escaped from the 1905 pogrom in Russia and, later, emigrated to the U.S. Sholem Aleichem's stories of Jewish life are noted for their combination of humor and pathos. Much of his large output has been translated into English, but the special quality of the Yiddish language, particularly in the uses of humor, loses a great deal in the translation, so that his reputation has failed to spread as far as it deserves.

Alexandré [y Merlo], Vincente (1900– ). Spanish poet. An emphasis upon the linking of strange metaphors, a favoring of free verse, and the presence of great technical skill are the main characteristics of his collected poems: Ambito (1928), Espadas como labios (1932), Pasión de la tierra (1935), Sombra del paraíso (1944), and Mis poemas mejores (1961). Alexandre has had a profound influence upon younger, contemporary Spanish poets.

Aleman, Mateo (1547–after 1613). Spanish novelist. The son of a prince doctor, Aleman studied in Seville, Salamanca, and Alcalá and spent some 20 years as a government accountant. He was twice imprisoned for debt. In 1608 he went to Mexico in the company of Archbishop García Guerra, whose life he published in 1613.

Aleman is remembered chiefly as the author of GUZMÁN DE ALFARACHE, the second great picaresque novel after Las Casas de Torquemada (1554). The first part appeared in 1599 and, after Juan José Martí, a Valencian lawyer, produced a spurious sequel (1602), Aleman himself wrote a continuation (1604), in which he good-naturedly lampooned Martí. Aleman also wrote a biography of Saint Anthony of Padua (1604) and Ortografía castellana (1609), a treatise on spelling.

Alembert, Jean Le Rond d' (1717–1783). French mathematician and skeptical philosopher. He was the natural son of Mme. Claudine Guérin de Tencin. As coeditor (1751–1759) with Diderot of the Encyclopédie, he wrote the Discours preliminaire (Introduction), a veritable synthesis of human knowledge; numerous scientific, philosophical, and literary articles; and supervised all entries on mathematics. He was a member of the Academy of Science (1741), and the Académie Française (1754), being secretary to the latter from 1772. He is best known for his Traité de dynamique (1743) and a history (1787) of the members of the French Academy who had died between 1700 and 1772.

Alencar, José Martiniano de (1829–1877). Brazilian novelist. Probably Brazil's finest romantic novelist, Alencar is known for his idealized portraits of Indians and for his deep feeling for the Brazilian landscape. His most popular novels are O Guarani (1857) and Iracema (1865), both of which deal with love between Indian and white.

Aleria. In the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, an Amazon, one of ten married forcibly to GUIDONE SELVAGIO (Guido the Savage) after he had killed the ten male champions of the Amazons who hold him captive. Aleria, Guidone's favorite wife, helps him escape to join the armies of Charlemagne against the pagans.

Alete. In the Gerusalemme Liberata of Tasso, an Egyptian ambassador who comes to the camp of Goffredo (Godfrey), the Christian commander, with Argante the infidel champion. He subtly tries to dissuade Goffredo from attacking Jerusalem, but when the attempt fails, he and Argante promptly declare war on the Crusaders.

Alexander (Aleksandros). The name given to Paris, son of Priam, by the shepherds who brought him up. Ironically, in view of its owner's character, the name means "protector of men."

Alexander VI, Pope. See Borgia.

Alexander I (Aleksandr Pavlovich; 1777–1825). Czar of Russia (1801–1825). Alexander was given a liberal education by his grandmother Catherine the Great, and hopes were high in Russia that his reign would prove less despotic than that of his father, Paul I. However, Alexander showed little concern for reform. The invasion by Napoleon in 1812 and the subsequent years of war and political activity in Europe took up all of his attention. The renewed contact with Western political ideas, which the war brought about, once again stirred young Russians to thought and action. It was during this period that secret political groups were formed that finally made an unsuccessful attempt at a coup d'état in the December Revolt of 1825.

Alexander II (Aleksandr Nikolayevich; 1818–1881). Czar of Russia (1855–1881). Alexander II's reign was a period of major reform in Russia. In 1856 the long-awaited emancipation of the serfs took place. Three years later, elective assemblies (zemstva) were set up for local self-government. Judicial reforms, including public trial by jury, were also instituted. Despite these reforms, revolutionary activity increased. Several attempts were made on Alexander's life by the terrorist organization known as the People's Will (Narodnaya volya) before a successful attack on his life was made in March, 1881. Shortly before he was killed, Alexander had approved plans for an elective legislative assembly.

Alexander III (Aleksandr Aleksandrovich; 1845-1894). Czar of Russia (1881-1894). Alexander III was a conservative ruler, partially because of the influence of his former tutor and adviser, Konstantin Pobedonostsev. Plans for constitutional government, which were begun by Alexander II, were dropped. Revolutionary agitation and terrorism continued, and the reign became a series of efforts by the regime to eradicate the revolutionaries and attempts by the latter on the life of the czar. A bomb plot in 1887 was squelched, and five of the conspirators were executed. Among these was Alexander Ulyanov, the older brother of Lenin, who reportedly swore vengeance for his brother's death.

Alexander, Sir William. Earl of Stirling (c. 1567-1640). Scottish poet. Alexander at one time held all of eastern Canada under royal grant, but died insolvent. A serious, plodding poet, he wrote sonnets, Senecan tragedies, and didactic poems. He is best known for Doomsday (1614), an epic poem in 12 books.

Alexander of Hales (c. 1175-1245). English theologian and scholastic philosopher, called "Doctor Inrefragabilis," a Franciscan after 1222. In his lectures at the University of Paris and in his Latin Summa Universae Theologiae he amalgamated the current Augustinianism of Christian doctrine with Aristotelian philosophy and the works of the Arabian commentators. His teaching greatly influenced St. Thomas Aquinas, St. Bonaventure, and others.

Alexander the Corrector. Self-assumed nickname of Alexander Cruden (1701-1770). A Scottish bookseller in London and compiler of the Concordance to the Bible (1737), he petitioned Parliament to constitute him "Corrector of the People." Confined on several occasions to an insane asylum, he developed a compulsion for carrying a sponge to wipe out licentious scrawls.

Alexander the Great (Alexander III of Macedon, 356-323 B.C.). The son of Philip of Macedon, and conqueror of the civilized world. He was appointed to his father's position as leader of the Greek confederation. He did away with his rivals to the throne, razing Thebes to the ground. He then began the invasion and conquest of Asia, and defeated Darius III, king of Persia. He marched through Syria, Egypt, Babylon, Susa, and Persepolis, founding the city of Alexandria in 331 B.C. Adopting the oriental customs of his captives, Alexander married a series of eastern princesses. On their way through India his exhausted troops rebelled, and Alexander was forced to begin the return to Macedon. He fell ill of a fever, and died after three days' illness at the age of 33. Alexander achieved the extension of Greek civilization into the East. His reign ushered in the Hellenistic Age. See Bucephalus.

Admired for his courage and frequent generous and humane acts, Alexander figures in many English and French medieval romances. French heroic verse of six feet became known as the Alexandrine. Alexander's life is the subject of a tragedy by Racine (Alexandre le Grand) and of Lyly's Alexander and Campaspe (1581).

Alexandre le Grand (Alexander the Great, 1665). A tragedy by Jean Racine. Combining love and intrigue with historical details of Alexander's Indian campaign, the drama reaches its climax with Alexander's admiration for his betrayed enemy, the brave king Porus, and his consequent renunciation of the kingdom that he had conquered.

Alexandrian Library, the. The most famous library of antiquity. Located in Alexandria, it was, under the Ptolemies, the principal center of Hellenistic culture and contained hundreds of thousands of rolls. Among its earliest librarians were Callimachus and Apollonius of Rhodes. In his Casus Cleopatra G. B. Shaw treats humorously the burning of the library by Julius Caesar. It was burned and partly consumed in 391; but when the city fell into the hands of the caliph Omar, in 642, the Arabs found books sufficient to "heat the baths of the city for six months." It is said that it contained 700,000 volumes, and the reason given by the Muslim destroyer for the destruction of the library was that the books were unnecessary in any case, for all knowledge that was necessary to man was contained in the Koran, and any knowledge contained in the library that was not in the Koran must be pernicious.

Alexandrian school. An academy of learning. It was founded about 310 B.C. by Ptolemy Soter, son of Lagus, and Demetrius of Phaleron; especially famous for its grammarians and mathematicians.

Alexandria Quartet, The. Four novels by Lawrence Durrell: Justine (1957), Balthazar (1958), Mountolive (1958), and Clea (1960). The complex plot is made more complex by Durrell's attempt "to complete a four-decker novel whose form is based on the relativity proposition." Each novel presents a different point of view, and different truths about the same characters. Diaries and letters and novels-within-novels give still other views. Justine is about the love affair between the narrator, Darley, and the fascinating, enigmatic Justine. In Balthazar Darley learns, through Balthazar, a mutual friend, that Justine really loved his successful rival author, Pursewarden. Her apparently serene marriage to Nessim was really a cover for their illegal political activities—gun-running into British-held Palestine. Mountolive is a third-person novel (the "time" element in the relativity scheme) about a British diplomat in love with Nessim's mother but obliged to discover who is organizing the gun-running. Clea, narrated again by Darley, brings the threads of the story together and ends in an idyllic love between him and the serene painter, Clea.

Brilliant exotic and melodramatic episodes and a flamboyant poetic style enrich the works. Among the vivid characters are Melissa, a sad, lost night-club dancer; Narouz, a primitive, silent man who suddenly becomes a religious prophet; and Scobie, a comical old English homosexual. Durrell calls The Quartet "a big city poem." It is a wonderful evocation of Alexandria, an exotic and sordid city haunted by figures from its past, from the ancient alchemists to Antony and Cleopatra. The Quartet is also an investigation of modern love and a study of the growth of an artist.

Alexandrine. In prosody, a line of 6 iambic feet (iambic hexameter). The Alexandrine is the standard French heroic line, just as iambic pentameter is the standard line for English heroic verse. The name is thought to derive from Li romans d'Alexandre, a 12th-century French romance written in that measure relating the deeds of Alexander of Macedon. The Alexandrine was introduced in England by Michael Drayton and others in the 16th century, but never took root as a dominant measure in English poetry, perhaps because English, being an uninflected language, requires fewer syllables than French to express its meaning. However, the Alexandrine is used singly as the final line of the Spenserian stanza, where it affords a contrast to the predominant iambic pentameter.

Alexeyev, Konstantin Sergeyevich. See Konstantin Stanislavsky.

Alexis, Willibald. Pen name of Willibald Höring (1798–1871). German historical novelist. His early works Walladomar (1823) and Schloss Avalon (Avalon, 1827) were strongly influenced by the influence of Walter Scott and were even thought to be Scott's work in translation. Alexis' most famous later novel is Ruhe ist die erste Bürgerpflicht (Quiet Is the First Civic Duty, 1852), about the Napoleonic invasion of Germany.

Alexius Comnenus (1048–1118). Byzantine emperor (r. 1081–1118). He appealed to the West for military help against the Turks, giving impetus to the first of the Crusades. His daughter, Anna Comnena (1083–1148), wrote the Alexiad in Greek; although more a panegyric than a history of her father's career, it is an important source of information on this period.

Africa, Vittorio (1749–1803). Italian dramatist and poet. He wrote 19 tragedies (1775–1875) scrupulously observant of the classical unities and typified by a portrayal of the protagonist's struggle against moral and political tyranny. Among his dramas are Cleopatra; Filippo, whose protagonist is Philip II of Spain; Antigone; Agamenon; Oreste; Virgìnia; Saul; Mirra; and Bruto Primo, dedicated to George Washington, "the liberator of America," 1787. He also wrote sonnets and odes, five of which are grouped under the title L'America Libera (1781–1783) to celebrate the newly acquired independence of the U.S. In his lengthy and exciting Vita (Autobiography), he analyzed and exalted himself as a poet dedicated to the extirpation of all forms of political and intellectual bondage. His hatred of tyranny and love of freedom helped to revive the national spirit of Italy.

Alfonso X. Known as El Sabio ("The Sage" or "The Learned") (1221–1284). King of Castile and Leon (1252–1284), scholar, and poet. Alfonso is generally regarded as a political failure, his reign being marred by his futile attempts to capture the imperial crown and by a disastrous conflict with his second son, later Sancho IV. His true fame rests on his activities as a patron of art and learning. Scholars flocked to his court where, under his direction, they translated Arabic and Latin writings, copied manuscripts, and compiled historical, scientific, and legal works. Under his guidance, Castilian laws and customs were codified in Las siete partidas, begun about 1256, which presents a minute and accurate picture of 13th-century society. He was also responsible for the compilation of the Primera crónica general or Estoria de España, a history of Spain from the deluge through the reign of Ferdinand III, Alfonso's father. Begun in 1270 and completed during the reign of Sancho IV, it is drawn from biblical, classical, and Arabic sources as well as from Spanish chronicles and epics, such as the Poema de mio Cid. Many scholarly and literary works are also ascribed to Alfonso's authorship, notably the charming Can'tigas de Santa María, over 400 poems in Galician in honor of the Virgin.

Alfred, called the Great (c. 849–c. 900). King of Wessex in England (871–900). He began fighting against the Danes in 866 under his brother Athelred, completing his first series of battles the year of his accession to the throne. He repulsed further attacks in 878 and between 893 and 897, when the Danes were defeated and retreated toward the north or into France.

Aside from his military successes, which made possible his successors' conquest and unification of the rest of England, Alfred is known for the excellence of his domestic rule. He codified the laws and established a court school with scholars from abroad to promote the education of his people. He began a great translation project, determined to make available in Old English vernacular prose all the books he considered important, which then existed only in Latin. He himself translated Pope Gregory I's Pastoral Care, the world history by Orosius, and the Consolation of Philosophy by Boethius. His Bloßman ("blossoms," i.e. "anthology") is largely culled from the Soliloquies of St. Augustine of Hippo. He had other scholars translate Gregory's Dialogues and Bede's Ecclesiastical History of the English People, and undertake the writing of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. See also Asser.

Algeciras Conference (1906). An international meeting at Algeciras, Spain. It was held largely at the urging of Kaiser Wilhelm II, who sought to curb French influence in Morocco. The conference members supported France.

Alger, Horatio, Jr. (1832–1899). American writer of books for boys. The oldest child of a Unitarian minister, Alger attended Harvard College and Harvard Divinity School, but fled to Paris as a rebellious bohemian. He was finally persuaded to return to the U.S. and became a minister. In 1866 he was made chaplain of a Newsboys' Lodging House, to which he devoted his time, money, and affection for the rest of his life.

Although Alger wished to write novels for adults, he actually turned out about 120 books for boys. Among the most popular were the Ragged Dick Series (1867), the Luck and Pluck Series (1869), and the Tattered Tom Series (1871). The heroes were bootblacks or newsboys whose virtue was invariably rewarded with riches and success. Alger also wrote juvenile biographies of famous men.

Algerine Captive, The (1879). An early American novel by Royall Tyler. It recounts the adventures of the hero, Updike Underhill, in his native New England backwoods, in Philadelphia where he meets Franklin, in London where he sees Tom Paine, and finally as a captive among the Algerines. The book is famed chiefly for its preface, which contained the first significant plea for native American fiction.

Algonquian or Algonkian. A linguistic family of widely distributed American Indian tribes whose territory stretched from Newfoundland to the Rocky Mountains. The tribes were mainly agricultural and sedentary.

Algren, Nelson (1909— ). American novelist and short-story writer. Best known for his novel The Man with the Golden Arm, Algren is identified with the realistic school centered in Chicago; that city was a big influence on the principal inspiration of his work. His other works include Somebody in Boots (1935); Never Come Morning (1942); The Neon Wilderness (1947), a collection of short stories; A Walk on the Wild Side (1956); and Who Lost an American? (1963), a book of essays and travel pieces.

Alhambra. A citadel and palace at Granada, Spain, built by Moorish kings in the 13th century. Its name is derived from the Arabic kal'at al hamra ("the red castle"). The buildings stand on a plateau some 35 acres in area and are surrounded by a reddish brick wall. Considered one of the finest examples of Moorish architecture in Spain, the palace consists largely of two rectangular courts—the Court of the Pool or of the Myrtles and the Court of the Lions,—and their adjoining chambers. The latter court contains a famous central fountain, consisting of an alabaster basin supported by 12 lions of white marble. While he was an attaché at the American legation in Madrid, Washington Irving spent much time in the Alhambra and wrote a well-known volume of sketches and tales called Legends of the Alhambra (1832, 1852).

Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves. One of the most popular stories in the Arabian Nights. Hidden in a tree, the poor woodcutter Ali Baba sees a band of robbers enter a secret cave by saying the magic words, "Open Sesame." When he leaves, he repeats the spell, gains access to the treasure, and becomes rich by carrying off gold from the stolen hoards. His brother, Cassim, also discovers the secret but forgets the word "Sesame" and cries "Open, Wheat! Open, Barber" to the door; he is killed by the thieves who find him trapped within the cave. Their captain tries several schemes to catch Ali Baba, but is always outwitted by the woodcutter's female slave, Morgiana, who kills the whole band by pouring boiling oil into the jars where they have hidden themselves.

Alibert, François Paul (1873— ). French poet. His works, primarily classical despite symbolist influence, include L'Arbre qui saigne (1907), Odes (1922), Eleguèes (1923), and Élégies romaines (1923).

Alice Adams (1921). A novel by Booth Tarkington. It describes the disintegration of the middle-class Adams family in a small Midwestern town. The father, a minor employee in a drug company, has a nagging, ambitious wife and a shiftless son. Alice, his daughter, yearning for wealth and admiration and seeing herself always in a romantic role, almost deceives herself into believing that her fanciful explanations for the cruelties of her family are valid. At the end of the book, her hopes doomed, she is seen bravely entering the stairway that leads to Frincke's Business College.

Alice's Adventures in Wonderland (1865). A whimsical story by Lewis Carroll. The little girl Alice falls down a well into a strange country where everything happens with a fantastic illogicality. She finds that she can become a giantess or pygmy by nibbling alternate sides of a magic mushroom, and she has a series of remarkable adventures with the White Rabbit, the Cheshire Cat, the Mock Turtle, the Queen of Hearts, the Hatter, the March Hare, the Duchess, the Dormouse, and other strange characters. See Through the Looking-Glass, and FATHER WILLIAM.

Alice W.—n. The old love conjured up by Charles Lamb in his Dream Children: A Reversie as the mother of his imaginary children. She has been identified as the actress Frances Maria Kelly.

Alien and Sedition Acts (1798). 3 congressional acts that gave the president power to deport or imprison any alien considered dangerous to the nation, and to punish any person engaging in treasonable acts or issuing writings considered to be seditious. These measures were directed by the Federalists against propagandists for the French Revolution and the Democratic-Republican Party in the U.S.

Aljubarrota. A village in Portugal, some 40 miles north of Lisbon. It was the site of a battle (1385) between the forces of John I of Portugal and those of John I of Castile. The Portuguese routed the enemy, firmly establishing the independence that they had first won three centuries earlier.

Allah. The Arabic name of the Supreme Being, from Allah, god. Allah il Allah, the Muslim war cry, and also the first clause of the confession of faith, is a corruption of la ilaha illa allah, meaning "there is no God but the God."

The Garden of Allah. A novel by Robert Hichens (1904), the title of which refers to a region of the Sahara Desert.

Allan-a-Dale, Allin-a-Dale, or Allen-a-Dale. A minstrel in the Robin Hood ballads, who appears also in Scott's novel Ivanhoe (1820). He is assisted by Robin Hood in carrying off his bride when she is on the point of being married against her will to a rich old knight.

allegory. In literature, an extended metaphor in which characters, objects, incidents, and descriptions carry one or more sets of fully developed meanings in addition to the apparent and literal ones. John Bunyan's Pilgrim's Progress, for example, is apparently about a man named Christian who leaves his home and journeys to the Heavenly City. However, it is clear that Christian stands for any Christian man, and the incidents of his journey represent the temptations and trials that beset any Christian man throughout his life on earth.

Allegory has been a favorite form all over the world, and was particularly strong in Europe during the Middle Ages. Spenser's Faerie Queene (1590–1596), though late, is perhaps the best-known example.

In art, especially of the Middle Ages, allegory was also a favorite device; in particular it was used to depict good and evil engaged in symbolic action. See personification.

Allegro, L' (1632). A poem by John Milton, the title of which means literally the cheerful or merry one. It is a pastoral idyl, celebrating a mood of gaiety and contrasting with the author's Il Penseroso. The poem, like its companion piece, is written in Milton's early style, characterized by an Elizabethan freshness and vividness and a remarkable command of verbal music.

Allen, Ethan (1738–1789). American Revolutionary soldier and hero of early Vermont. He commanded the Green Mountain Boys, a regiment originally raised by some Vermont settlers to fight a claim on their land by Governor Tryon of New York. With 83 of the Green Mountain Boys and aided by Benedict Arnold, Allen seized Fort Ticonderoga in 1775. His own Narrative of Captain Ethan Allen's Captivity tells of his capture by the British after a rash attempt to take Montreal. He is the hero of Daniel Pierce Thompson's novel Green Mountain Boys (1839).

Allen, Frederick Lewis (1890–1954). American editor and writer. On the editorial staffs successively of the Atlantic Monthly and Century Magazine, he joined Harper's Magazine in 1921 and later became its editor in chief. He is also known for his lively social histories: Only Yesterday (1931), an account of the 1920's in the U.S.; Since Yesterday (1940), a similar treatment of the 1930's; and The Big Change (1952), an account of the transformation of the U.S. from 1900 to 1950.

Allen, William Hervey (1889–1949). American historical novelist. He is best known for his first novel, the long and phenomenally successful Anthony Adverse. Allen began his career with several volumes of verse and also wrote Israfel (1926), a biography of Edgar Allan Poe.

Allen, James Lane (1849–1925). American novelist and short-story writer. He is noted for the Kentucky setting of his books, among them A Kentucky Cardinal, Aftermath (1896), and The Choir Invisible (1897), an historical romance of pioneer Kentucky. Flute and Violin (1891) is a collection of Kentucky short stories. Allen also wrote the sketches of The Blue-Grass Region of Kentucky (1892).

Allen, Ralph (1694–1764). A noted English philanthropist, friend and benefactor of both Pope and Fielding. Fielding may have depicted him as Squire Allworthy in Tom Jones, and Pope wrote of him:

Let humble Allen, with an awkward shame,
Do good by stealth, and blush to find it fame.

All for Love, or The World Well Lost (1678). A tragedy in blank verse by John Dryden. In strict observance of the classical unities, Dryden describes the last day on earth of Antony and Cleopatra. Simpler in plot, though less stirring than Shakespeare's version of the famous story, Dryden's play focuses on the conflict between Cleopatra, on the one hand, and Antony's wife, Octavia, his general Ventidius, and his friend Dolabella on the other, as they vie for possession of Antony's soul.

All God's Chillun Got Wings (1924). A play by Eugene O'Neill. White Ella Downey marries Negro Jim Harris, who is struggling to become a lawyer. The tragic consequences of her mental inferiority are intensified by the latent racial prejudice she shows in a desperate effort to gain superiority before lapsing into insanity and a regression to childhood.

All Hallows' Day. See All Saints' Day.

All Hallows' Eve. See Hallowe'en.

Allingham, William (1824–1889). Irish poet, best known for light lyrics employing Irish folklore and dialect. He was briefly editor of Fraser's Magazine (1874–1879) and much esteemed as a critic by Dante Gabriel Rossetti and Coventry Patmore. He published over a dozen volumes of poetry, perhaps the most famous of which is The Fairies (1883).

Alliteration. In poetry and prose, the repetition of consonants, especially initial consonants, as in the sentence "Peter Piper picked a peck of pickled peppers." Like assonance and consonance, alliteration tends to unify the passage or poem in which it occurs, and in that function may be considered a form of rhyme.

Alliterative Morte Arthur, The. See Arthurian Legends.

Alliterative verse. Form of versification of Old English poetry such as Beowulf, similar to that of some early medieval Continental poetry. In Old English (or Anglo-Saxon) poetry, each line has four accented syllables and a varying number of unaccented syllables, divided into two halves of two strong stresses each. There must be alliteration between at least one stressed syllable in the first half and one in the second; preferably three, and sometimes all four, of the accented syllables in a line are alliterative. The use of this form declined under the influence of the strictly syllabic meters and rhyme schemes in French and Italian poetry; it was revived, however, during the 14th century in such works as Piers Plowman and Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. Poets of the late 19th and 20th centuries have adapted alliterative verse in the trend away from conventional toward accentual meters.

All Men Are Brothers. See SiuI Hu CHUAN.

All Quiet on the Western Front (Im Westen nichts Neues; 1919). A novel by Erich Maria Remarque. It is the best known of the anti-war literature written during the period 1920–1939, expressing the horror and futility of war.

All Saints' Day or All Hallows. A feast in honor of all Christian saints. Between 603 and 610 PopeBoniface IV changed the heathen temple called the Pantheon into a Christian church, and dedicated it to the honor of all the martyrs. The feast was first observed on May 1, but in 834 it was changed to November 1, and its use extended to the whole Christian Church. It is a major feast of the Church.

The medieval English name All Hallows is derived from halig, Old English for holy (man), hence, a saint. In France the day is called Toussaint. Much folk lore and superstition are associated with the eve of the day, called Hallowe'en.

All Souls' Day. The popular name for the Commemoration of All the Faithful Departed. It is observed by the Roman Catholic Church on November 2. It was instituted by Abbot Odilo of Cluny in 993 and soon spread to the rest of the Western Church. In many parts of Europe it is the custom to place lighted candles on graves of friends and family the previous evening.

All's Well that Ends Well (c. 1602). A comedy by William Shakespeare. After curing the king of France of a malady, Helena, the daughter of a famous physician, is rewarded by the king's giving her in marriage to Bertram, the young count of Rousillon, whom she has long loved. He, however, scorns her and departs for the Florentine war, stating that until Helena obtains the ring on his finger and produces his child, he will not return nor can she call him husband. Disguised as a pilgrim, Helena follows Bertram to Florence, where she discovers that he is enamored of a young Florentine girl. She arranges an assignation and takes the girl's place, obtaining the ring and conceiving the child. Hearing false reports of Helena's death, Bertram returns to France. When she suddenly appears, having fulfilled her terms, she at last wins his love.

The plot is taken from Boccaccio's Decameron and was a familiar folk legend reworked by Shakespeare. See countess of Rousillon; Parolles.

All the King's Men (1946). A novel by Robert Penn Warren. Jack Burden, a young intellectual, narrates the story of the rise and fall of Willie Stark, a Southern demagogue obviously modeled on the Louisiana politician Huey Long. Burden is forced to confront the problem of good and evil in Stark's career and at the end of the book is led to a new self-understanding. The novel won a Pulitzer Prize.

Allworthy, Squire [Thomas]. In Henry Fielding's Tom Jones, a wealthy justice of the peace, foster father to the foundling Tom Jones. One of the best-known characters in English fiction, he is a man of sturdy rectitude, modesty, and benevolence, completely disinterested as regards money and fame. He is strongly contrasted with his neighbor Squire Western. Fielding's friend Ralph Allen is believed to have been the model for Squire Allworthy.

Bridge Allworthy. The sister of Squire Allworthy, who, as it turns out, is the mother of Tom Jones.

Alma. See Faerie Queene, The.

Almagest (Arab. article al, Gr. megiste, greatest). An astronomical treatise by the 2d century Alexandrian scholar Prolemy. The work was extensively used during the Middle Ages in an Arabic translation.

Almanach de Gotha. A European social register. A German periodical publication begun in 1763, it gives data on all royal or titled European families.

Almanack, Poor Richard's. See Poor Richard's Almanack.

Almaviva, Count and Countess. Leading characters in Beaumarchais' comedies The Barber of Seville and The Marriage of Figaro and in the operas based upon them.

Almayer's Folly (1895). A novel by Joseph Conrad. Almayer, an English trader in the (then) Dutch East Indies, is moved by two passions: the desire to find gold and love for his half-caste daughter. "Almayer's Folly" is an absurdly fine house he moves into after his daughter has gone away with a Malay prince. See Outcast of the Islands, An.

Almaschar. In the story the "Barber's Fifth Night" in the Arabian Nights, the visionary character who invests all his money in a basket of glassware, which he fancies will bring him wealth and the vizier's daughter. As he dreams of the grand life he will lead, he grows angry with his supposed wife, upsets his basket, and smashes all the wares that have started his visions of wealth. Hence, an Almaschar dream is counting one's chickens before they are hatched.

Alonso. The king of Naples and father of the innocent Ferdinand in Shakespeare's Two Tragedies. Alonso's greed and enmity toward Prospero caused him to accept the tributes of Antonio, Prospero's brother, and to endorse the usurpation of Prospero's dukedom.

Alonso, Dámaso (1898– ). Spanish poet and scholar. A translator of Joyce and Eliot, Alonso is known for his poetry, particularly the volumes Poemas puros; poemillas de la ciudad (1921) and Hijos de la ira (1944), the latter being a treatment of religion in the modern poetic idiom. As a scholar and literary critic he is known for his studies of the Spanish baroque poet Góngora, particularly La lengua poética de Góngora (1935).

Alonzo the Brave. A ballad by Matthew Gregory Lewis which first appeared in his novel, The Monk. It is a variant of the widespread traditional theme of the specter lover, popularized in the ballad Lenore by Gottfried August Bürger. Imogen was betrothed to Alonzo, but, during his absence in the wars, became the bride of another. At the wedding feast Alonzo's ghost sat beside the bride, and, after rebuking her for her infidelity, carried her off to the grave.

alpha and omega. The first and last letters of the Greek alphabet; hence the beginning and the end. In the Bible, Jesus says, "I am Alpha and Omega, the beginning and the end, the first and the last" (Rev. 22:13).

Alroy, David. A half-mythical Jewish medieval prince, local governor of his people under Muslim rule, with the title, Prince of the Captivity. He is the hero of Benjamin Disraeli's prose romance, The Wondrous Tale of Alroy (1833).

Alsop, Richard (1761-1815). American satirical poet, a member of the group known as the Hartford Wits. Alsop frequently collaborated with Theodore Dwight, Lemuel Hopkins, and others in the two series of Federalist verse satire known as The Icho (1791-1805) and The Political Greenhouse (1798).

Also sprach Zarathustra. See Thus Spake Zarathustra.

Altamira. Site near Santander, Spain, of a cave decorated with paleolithic mural paintings. It was discovered in 1879.

Altamirano, Ignacio Manuel (1834-1893). Mexican novelist and poet. A full-blooded Indian, Altamirano was an adherent of Benito Juárez and fought against the French intervention in Mexico. In 1869, he founded Renacimiento, a review to encourage literary activity, almost moribund after 15 years of turbulence. He became the mentor of the younger generation, to whom he advocated the importance of creating a literature rooted in national life. His poetry consists of a single volume of Rimas (1880), written before 1867 and notable for its description of the Mexican landscape. Altamirano's preoccupation with purely Mexican scenes and customs is also evident in the prose works for which he is best known: Clemencia (1869), a love story set against the background of the French intervention; La navidad en las montañas (1870), a novelette; and El Zarcó (1901), a novel dealing with bandits in the state of Morelos.

Altamoro (Altamore). A fierce Saracen warrior in the GERUSALEMME LIBERATA of Tasso. He leads the Persian and African forces against the Christian armies at Jerusalem and is also a champion of Armida, who has sworn to give herself to any infidel knight who kills Rinaldo of Este. It is he who surrenders the remnants of the pagan armies to the Christian general Goffredo, signifying the final victory of the Crusaders at the holy city.

Alton Locke, Tailor and Poet (1850). A novel by the Rev. Charles Kingsley. This novel won for the author the title of The Chartist Clergyman (see CHARTISM) because of its picture of Alton Locke and his radical Chartist friends who move through the depressed regions of the London sweatshops. It was one of the first English novels to present a study of industrial conditions.

Altruria. See A TRAVELLER FROM ALTRURIA.

Alvarez Quintero, Serafín (1871-1938) and Joaquín (1873-1944). Spanish dramatists, brothers who collaborated in their work. The brothers Álvarez Quintero are known for their light and amusing comedies; the best known of the more than 100 written are Los galeotos (1900), El patio (1900), El amor que pasa (1904), and Doña Clarín (1909).

Alvaro, Corrado (1895-1956). Italian novelist, poet, essayist, and moralist. Alvaro was a world traveler who wrote several books of verse and travel, the latter noted for the author's keen perception and description of people, places, and customs. His numerous short stories have been collected in Revolt in Aspromonte (Gente in Aspromonte); (1930). For the most part these tales describe the hard, primitive life of Calabrian shepherds. His finest novels are Man is Strong (L'Uomo E' Forte); (1938) and L'Èt È Breve (1946), the first book of a three-novel cycle entitled Memorie del Mundo Sommesso describing Italian political and cultural life during the fascist period.

(2) A character in Verdi's opera La Forza del Destino.
(3) A character in the romantic drama Don Alvaro o La fuerza del sino by Angel de Saavedra y Ramírez, duke of Rivas.

Alving, Oswald. The principal character in Ibsen's Ghosts. A neurotic and dissipated young man, he becomes insane from congenital syphilis. His mother, embittered by her experiences, is in revolt against a society in which such conditions exist.

Amadís de Gaula (Amadis of Gaul). A 16th-century Spanish romance of chivalry. The first extant version (1508), consisting of four books, was compiled by Garci Ordóñez or Rodríguez Montalvo, a regidor of Medina del Campo, who stated that he was merely revising the original text; however, the fourth book is his own addition. The origin of the story is still obscure, though it was known in both Spain and Portugal at least as early as the 14th century.

The romance incorporates many details from the Breton cycle of the Round Table. Amadís, who exemplifies the chivalric ideals of valor, purity, and fidelity, is the illegitimate son of Perión, king of Gaul (Wales) and Elisena, princess of Brittany. Soon after birth he is abandoned by his mother, who puts his cradle in the sea; for this reason he is also known as el Doncel del Mar, or “Child of the Sea.” He is rescued by the knight Gandalés and is educated in the court of the king of Scotland, where at the age of 12 he falls in love with Oriana, daughter of Lisuarte, king of England. Amadís then performs a series of incredible exploits, triumphing over sundry giants and monsters, but he always remains faithful to his lady-love. Other notable characters include Galoar, Amadís' brother; his cousin Agrajes; the Fairy Urganda, la Desconocida, or “the Unknown”; and Archeláus, a mischievous enchanter.

The work won enormous popularity throughout Europe and inspired numerous sequels and imitations, including Montalvo's Las sergas de Esplandión (1510) about the son of Amadís. The barber and priest in Cervantes' Don Quijote called it “the best of all the books of its kind,” a verdict in which later generations have concurred.

Amado, Jorge (1912- ). Brazilian novelist. In a series of novels beginning with O País do Carnaval (1931), Amado explores various aspects of life in his native state of Bahia. His works reflect his Marxist political views in their sympathy for the downtrodden and their keen awareness of social injustice. His best-known novels are probably Terras do Sem Fim (The Violent Land, 1942), about the cacao boom in the frontier districts of Bahia, and Gabriela, Cravo e Canela (Gabriela, Clove and Cinnamon, 1958), about social and political change in the Amalthea. In Roman legend, the sybil who sold the sibylline books to Tarquin.

Amaltheia. The goat that suckled the infant Zeus in the cave in the Cretan mountain Dicte. Her horn became the cornucopia, the horn of plenty that has been a symbol of the earth's bounty since very ancient times.

Amanda. See Peregrine Pickle.

Amants magnifiques, Les (The Magnificent Lovers, 1670). A comédie-ballet in prose by Molière. Written for the king and based on a subject chosen by him, the play recounts amid songs and dances the courtship of a princess by two princes and her preference for a lowly soldier.

Amaryllis. A rustic sweetheart. The name is borrowed from a shepherdess in the pastoral of Theocritus and Vergil. In Spenser's Colin Clout's Come Home Again, Amaryllis is intended for Alice Spenser, countess of Derby.

Anasis, ring of. Herodotus relates that Polycrates, tyrant of Samos, was so fortunate in everything that Anasis, king of Egypt, fearing such unprecedented luck boded ill, advised him to part with something which he highly prized. Polycrates accordingly threw into the sea a ring of great value. A few days afterwards, a fish was presented to the tyrant, in which the ring was found. Anasis now renounced friendship with Polycrates, as a man doomed by the gods; and not long afterwards, a Persian satrap put the too fortunate despot to death by crucifixion.

Amazons (Amazones). A mythical race of women warriors. Ancient accounts differ as to where they lived; Herodotus places them in Scythia, north of the Black Sea; Apollonius Rhodius' Argonautica has them inhabiting a portion of the south shore. According to the legend, they were a hardy lot, burning off their right breasts in order that they might draw the bow better. They either destroyed or sent away any male children they had as a result of encounters with neighboring tribes. There are among the Greek myths many legends of encounters with them. Heracles fought them in order to acquire the girdle worn by their queen, Hippolyta. He acquired it either by killing Hippolyta or by capturing her general, Melanipe, and holding her for ransom. Theseus also fought the Amazons and made one of them, either named Hippolyta or Antiope, his wife. His son Hippolytus was their offspring. Hippolyta appears as the wife of Theseus, duke of Athens, in Shakespeare's A Midsummer Night's Dream.

Ambassadors, The (1903). A novel by Henry James. The central character and first "ambassador," Lambert Strether, is sent to Paris by Mrs. Newsome, a wealthy widow whom he plans to marry, in order to persuade her son Chad to come home. Chad is deeply involved with a charming French woman, Madame de Vionnet, and the novel deals chiefly with Strether's gradual conversion to the idea that life may hold more real meaning for Chad in Paris than in Woollett, Mass. Strether comes to this conclusion in spite of his discovery that Chad and Mme de Vionnet are, in fact, more than just good friends. After the arrival of a second ambassador, Chad's sister Sarah, Strether decides to return to Woollett, urging Chad to remain in Paris. The essence of the novel is in Strether's remark, "Live all you can; it's a mistake not to."

ambiguous oath. A folklore motif, especially popular in medieval literature. An outstanding example may be found in the legend of Tristan and Isolde. Setting forth for the trial that is to determine whether she is guilty of a love affair with Tristan, Isolde sends word to Tristan to disguise himself as a poor pilgrim and meet her on the way. At her request, he then carries her across a stream so that she will not get wet. She is then able to swear at the trial that no one but King Mark (her husband) and "that poor pilgrim" who carried her across the stream has ever held her in his arms. She is subsequently absolved.

Ambler, Eric (1909– ). English novelist and screenwriter. Ambler is best known for his realistic novels of espionage, usually dealing with ordinary Englishmen who find themselves ensnared in a web of international intrigue. These include Epitaph for a Spy (1938), The Mask of Dimitrios (1939; U.S. title, The Coffin of Dimitrios), Journey into Fear (1940), Judgment on Deltchev (1951), and Passage of Arms (1959).

Ambrose. A tavern keeper. His name suggested the title for the celebrated Noctes Ambrosianae, a series of imaginary conversations chiefly by Christopher North (John Wilson), published in Blackwood's Magazine. The blue parlor of Ambrose's Hotel in Edinburgh was in reality a rendezvous for Wilson and his friends, although the Ambrosian Nights were largely imaginary.

Ambrose, St. (c. 340–397). Bishop of Milan (374–397) and one of the Fathers of the Latin Church. A constant champion of the Church in its conflicts with paganism and the various early heresies, Ambrose was instrumental in driving the Arians out of Italy. He baptized Augustine of Hippo, who later became St. Augustine.

city of Ilheus in 1925–1926. Among his other novels are Suor (1934), Jubiabá (1935), and Mar Morto (1936).

Amahl and the Night Visitors. A one-act opera by Gian Carlo Menotti. It was written (1951) for production on television. Amahl, a crippled boy, adds his crutch to the gifts of the Magi and is cured.

Amalmon. One of the chief devils in medieval demonology. He is king of the eastern portion of hell; Asmodeus is his chief officer. He can be restrained from doing harm from the third hour until noon and from the ninth hour until evening.

Amalia (1851–1855). A novel by José Mármol (1817–1871), Argentine poet and novelist. Written while Mármol was in exile in Uruguay, the book is an impassioned denunciation of the barbarism and terror of the dictatorship of Juan Manuel de Rosas. Although the plot is melodramatic and the principal characters are one-dimensional, Mármol's descriptions of life in Buenos Aires and of actual personages, such as the dictator himself, are vivid and convincing.

Amalthea. A Roman name, the sybil who sold the sibylline books to Tarquin.

Amaltheia. The goat that suckled the infant Zeus in the cave of the Cretan mountain Dicte. Her horn became the cornucopia, the horn of plenty that has been a symbol of the earth's bounty since very ancient times.

In actuality, ambrosia was probably the common and rather primitive cereal food of early Greece.

Ambrosio, or the Monk. See Monk, The.

Amelia (1751). A novel by Henry Fielding. Amelia, the idealized heroine, is the long-suffering, virtuous wife of Captain Booth, an impoverished army officer who has been unjustly thrown into prison. During his absence, his false friend Captain James makes overtures to Amelia, but her virtue prevails against him. In prison with Captain Booth is Miss Matthews, an adventuress who lures him into an affair, leaving him conscience-stricken. He is released from prison and Amelia forgives him, but soon after, he is thrown into debtor’s prison for gambling. The situation is saved when Amelia receives an inheritance, and the two retire to the country to live a peaceful life.

Amélie. A character invented by Pierre Corneille in his tragedy Cinna. She encourages Cinna to lead a conspiracy against the emperor Augustus and is the cause of jealous friction between Cinna and his co-conspirator Maxime.

Amen, Amnon, Amun, or Amen-Ra. Among the ancient Egyptians, a deity usually represented as a man with a crown of two long plumes, and sometimes with a ram’s head on a man’s body. Originally a minor local deity of Thebes, he was brought into prominence about 2000 B.C. when his name was joined with that of Ra, the sun god. As the composite figure Amen-Ra, he reigned as supreme King of the Gods; Amen appealed to the Theban patriot; Ra to the educated man. His oracle was in the Libyan oasis where Alexander the Great was told he was the son of Ammon. The Greeks identified Amen with Zeus.

America. Designation for both North and South America. Loose usage applies it chiefly to the U.S. Its origin is the name of Amerigo Vespucci, a Florentine merchant and traveler who claimed to have made a voyage in 1497 during which he discovered what is now the mainland of South America. His claim, although never proved, was perpetuated in the name given to the new continent in the West.

American, The (1877). A novel by Henry James. Christopher Newman, a wealthy, self-made American in France, hopes to marry Claire de Cintré, a widowed daughter of the De Bellegardes, but that aristocratic old French family finally succeeds in circumventing him. Although Newman plans to retaliate by publishing proof that Claire’s mother and brother were the virtual murderers of her father, he decides to give up his design because revenge is “really not his game.” Both the contrast between the simple, innocent American and the sophisticated, corrupt European, and the necessity for renunciation later became common Jamesian themes.

American Academy of Arts and Letters. The inner circle of the National Institute of Arts and Letters. The latter, founded in 1898, created the smaller society to honor its more distinguished members. The first seven men elected to its membership were William Dean Howells, Augustus Saint-Gaudens, E. C. Stedman, John La Farge, Mark Twain, John Hay, and Edward MacDowell. The aim of the academy is to give “the stamp of its approval” to the best in literature and art that both the past and the present have to offer.

American Caravan, The (1927–1936). An annual publication of American poetry and fiction. Its aim was to exhibit the best of contemporary literature, and its first editor was Van Wyck Brooks. He was followed by Lewis Mumford, Alfred Kreymborg, and Paul Rosenfeld. A number of well-known writers, including Ernest Hemingway, were represented in its pages.

American Civil War (1861–1865). A war between the U.S. and 11 Southern states which seceded from the Union and formed the Confederate States of America. The war was the result of long-standing social and economic differences between North and South that gradually became apparent after the War of 1812. Sectional conflict over such issues as the tariff and the extension of slavery was temporarily abated by the activities of men such as Henry Clay and Daniel Webster, but in the 1850’s the position of each side became progressively more rigid; whether the war could have been averted is still a subject for discussion among historians.

Upon receiving the news of Abraham Lincoln’s election in 1860, South Carolina seceded, followed by 10 other Southern states, which then organized the Confederate government and elected Jefferson Davis president early in 1861; with the Confederate attack on Fort Sumter, the actual fighting began. To the North, the principal objective was the preservation of the Union, though emancipation of the slaves became a secondary aim after 1862.

Although Union hopes for a quick victory were dashed by the rout at Bull Run, it gradually became evident that, despite the brilliant leadership of such Confederate generals as Robert E. Lee and Thomas (“Stonewall”) Jackson, the superior human and industrial resources of the North would ultimately prevail. This was especially true after the Union victory at Gettysburg and Gen. Grant’s successful siege of Vicksburg (1863) ended Confederate hopes of securing foreign recognition and aid. In 1864, Grant, now supreme commander of the Union forces, turned to the conquest of Richmond, the Confederate capital, while W. T. Sherman undertook his famous march to the sea. After a gallant defense, Lee was forced to evacuate Richmond (April 2, 1865) and surrendered to Grant at Appomattox Courthouse, Va., on April 9.

With the possible exception of the Napoleonic Wars, no other conflict has produced more books. Among the most famous of the novels inspired by the war are Stephen Crane’s Red Badge of Courage, Winston Churchill’s The Crisis, and Margaret Mitchell’s Gone with the Wind. Other novelists who wrote about the war include Thomas Nelson Page, Mary Johnston, Ellen Glasgow, and MacKinlay Kantor. Verse dealing with the war was written by such poets as Henry Timrod, Paul Hamilton Hayne, John Greenleaf Whittier, Walt Whitman, and Stephen Vincent Benét. Edmund Wilson’s Patriotic Gore (1962) consists of essays about 19th-century Civil War literature.

American Democrat, The

1783, widely distributed in the American colonies and touching on all of the important issues of the Revolution. The famous first Crisis paper, beginning, "These are the times that try men's souls," was ordered by Washington to be read to his troops on the eve of the battle of Trenton. In later Crisis papers, Paine called for a strong federal union.

American Democrat, The, or Hints on the Social and Civic Relations of the United States of America (1838). A political essay by James Fenimore Cooper, written on his return to New York, after a seven-year stay in Europe. Although a firm democrat, Cooper opposed a tyranny of the majority. Socially conservative, he favored an aristocracy of landowners; this cultured class would maintain stable values in American society. The book is Cooper's fullest statement of his beliefs, and is one of a series of volumes in which he criticizes the politics and manners of his countrymen. The other books are A Letter to His Countrymen (1834), Homeward Bound (1838), and The Moniksins.

Cooper's outspoken criticism caused him to be denounced in the American press; acting as his own lawyer, he fought and won many libel suits. Although he lost most of his fortune, he helped to codify the libel laws of the U.S.

American Language, The (1919, 1921, 1923, 1936; Supplement One, 1945; Supplement Two, 1948). A treatise by H. L. Mencken. Believing at first that the American language and English were diverging, Mencken found that by 1923 American had become the more powerful tongue and was leading English along with it. He set out to examine the two streams of language and their differences in vocabulary, spelling, and pronunciation. He treated American slang, proper names, and non-English dialects in America. Ironically, his work won him a place among the scholars he had attacked and scorned.

American Mercury, The. An iconoclastic magazine founded in 1924 and edited by H. L. Mencken and George Jean Nathan. For a decade, previously, both men had worked together as editors and part-owners of the Smart Set. Nathan retired as coeditor of the Mercury after a year, but remained as a departmental editor until 1930. Some departments were continued from the Smart Set, for example, the "Americana," a collection of absurdities in popular culture and cults, arranged geographically by states. But the magazine also contained articles on literary figures and other positive aspects of American culture. Among its contributors were Lewis Mumford, Sinclair Lewis, Carl Sandburg, and Vachel Lindsay. After Mencken's retirement in 1933, it was published as a pocket-size miscellany of conservative tendencies by Laurence E. Spivak. It eventually became a rightist organ of limited circulation, owned by millionaire J. Russell Maguire.

American Notes (1842). A volume of travel sketches by Charles Dickens. The book was well received in England, but gave great offense in the U.S. Dickens, besides advocating the abolition of slavery, made many harsh and somewhat patronizing observations about the rawness and narrowness of life and manners in America.

American Revolution (1775-1873). The war for independence waged by the former British colonies in the present U.S. against the mother country. The conflict stemmed from the political and economic grievances of the colonists, especially after the French and Indian War, when the British decided to end their former policy of "salutary neglect" toward the colonies by enacting such revenue-raising measures as the Stamp Act and the Townshend Acts of 1767. Fanned by the writings of Samuel Adams and others, American resentment increased and erupted in such incidents as the Boston Massacre and the Boston Tea Party. The gathering of the first Continental Congress in 1774 was followed by the clash of British regulars and Minute Men at Lexington and Concord; Congress named George Washington commander-in-chief of its forces in 1775 and promulgated the Declaration of Independence, largely the work of Thomas Jefferson, the following year. Important American leaders in the battles that followed were Ethan Allen, Benedict Arnold, Horatio Gates, George Rogers Clark, Anthony Wayne, Francis Marion, and John Paul Jones. The entry of France into the war against England in 1778 was a major factor in the final American victory; at the siege of Yorktown, a French fleet blockaded the harbor, while Washington was assisted by the forces of the Comte de Rochambeau and the Marquis de Lafayette. The Treaty of Paris, signed after lengthy negotiations by John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, and John Jay, ended the war.

The American struggle for freedom was accompanied by much literary activity, most of it political in nature, as seen in the works of Thomas Paine, John Trumbull, and Francis Hopkinson. Philip Freneau is sometimes called "the poet of the American Revolution."

American Scene, The (1907). A travel book by Henry James. The volume is mainly an examination of life in Saratoga, Newport, and other important American social and cultural centers, remembered as they were in the 1870's and 1880's and described as James saw them again in 1904, on a visit to the U.S.

American Scholar, The (1837). A Phi Beta Kappa address delivered by Ralph Waldo Emerson at Harvard. Emerson called for a reliance on direct perception and native abilities, rather than a pale imitation of European culture. For the scholar, or Man Thinking, books must be secondary tools. O. W. Holmes called the address our "intellectual declaration of independence."

American Songbag, The (1927). A collection of folk songs and ballads made by Carl Sandburg. In tours of the country, Sandburg himself sang many of these songs, accompanying them on his banjo or guitar. A number of them have been recorded by him, perhaps the best known being The Bully Weevil.

faithfully follows the original facts; at other moments he transgresses them with his own interpretations. Clyde Griffiths' boyhood, for example, reproduces some of the details of Dreiser's own earlier years.

In revolt against the poverty and piety of his Midwestern family, Clyde becomes a bellboy in a luxurious hotel and, after being involved in an automobile accident for which he is legally responsible, is employed by a distant relative, owner of a collar factory in upper New York State. There Clyde seduces Roberta Alden, an employee at the factory, but falls in love with Sondra Finchley, a girl of the local aristocracy, who symbolizes the wealth and glamour that he has been seeking. Clyde's relationship with Sondra is menaced when Roberta, now pregnant, demands that he marry her, and he carefully devises a plan to murder her. He lacks the courage to carry out his scheme, when he takes Roberta rowing on an isolated lake, but the boat accidentally overturns, and he allows Roberta to drown while he swims away. Clyde is accused of murder, and the remainder of the book is a powerful depiction of his subsequent trial, conviction, and execution. Although Clyde is portrayed as a weakling, Dreiser squarely indicts America's industrial society for dazzling persons like Clyde with the dream of an unattainable and meretricious luxury.

_America the Beautiful_ (1895; rev. 1904, 1911). A poem by Katharine Lee Bates (1859–1929), best known as a patriotic song to the tune of Samuel A. Ward's hymn, _Materna._

_Amerika_ (1927). An unfinished novel by Franz Kafka that was published posthumously. Less radically abstruse than his other two novels, _The Trial and The Castle_, it deals with the adventures of a European boy in an unreal, expressionistically depicted America. Its first chapter was completed and published separately in 1913 as _The Stoker_ (Der _Heizer_).

Amethyst Ring, _The_ (L'Anneau d'améthyste; 1899). A novel by Anatole France. The tale centers about the actions of its protagonist M. Bergereet.

_Amfortas._ Guardian of the Grail in medieval legend, grandson of Titurel. Because he has sinned, he has been wounded by the sacred lance which wounded Christ and can only be cured by a blameless fool. See Parsifal and Parzival.

_Amidism, or Pure Land Buddhism._ A Chinese and Japanese Buddhist salvationism. Its aim is rebirth in the Western Paradise of Amida (Sans. _Ami-taba-ha_; Ch. _A-mi-śa’o_ ) Buddha. Stemming from northern India and Central Asia, it spread rapidly in China, incorporating many elements from popular folk religions. In the Ming period (1368–1644) it merged with Ch’an (Zen) Buddhism. In Japan Amida pietism sprang up at the Tendai Buddhist center of Mt. Hiei. Its leading exponents were Genshin (942–1017), Hōnen (1133–1212), founder of the Jōdo Sect, and Shinran (1173–1262), the first patriarch of the Shin Sect. Amidism developed during the Heian (794–1185) period and marks a shift from a Buddhist society for the elite toward one with an appeal for the common people. Emphasis is placed on the recitation, with faith, of the _nembutsu_, or invocation of the Buddha's name, as the single requirement for rebirth in Amida's Paradise. Its thought has had a lasting influence on both literature and the arts. The Shin was the first sect to allow its priests to marry. Shin and Jodo have the greatest number of adherents among Japanese Buddhist sects.

_Amiel, Denys_ (1884– ). French dramatist of the "school of silence" (see Jean-Jacques Bernard). _After Le Voyageur_ (1912, produced 1922), he collaborated with André Obey on _The Wife With the Smile_ (La Souriant Mme. Beude) (1921) and _La Carcaise_ (1926). Other plays by Amiel include _Décalage_ (1931), _Three and One_ (1932), and _Café-Tabac_ (1932).

_Aminta._ A famous Renaissance pastoral play by Tasso, written and first performed in 1573. The plot begins with the appearance of Venus' son Amor in the guise of a shepherd, determined to aim his arrows at the most odorate nymph of Diana, Silvia, whose haughtiness has repulsed all lovers. Her friend Dafne (Daphne) tries to persuade her to fall in love with the shepherd Aminta, but she prefers the hunt; at the same time, Aminta spurns Amarilli, who loves him desperately. Aminta tells his friend Tirsi that there is no hope of gaining Silvia, as the wise Mopsos has seen the future and confirmed the hopelessness of the pursuit. Now Satiro (the Satyr), also enamored of Silvia, decides to take her by force while she bathes. Aminta rescues her, but she flees from him. Later, believing Silvia dead, Aminta attempts suicide; but he survives to find Silvia convinced of his love and loving him in return. They wed and the play closes with the appearance of Venus, arrived to discover her unruly son and put an end to his mischief by taking him back to the Olympian court from which he had strayed.

_Amis, Kingsley_ (1922– ). English novelist and poet. His comic novels include the best-selling _Lucky Jim and That Uncertain Feeling_ (1955), _I Like It Here_ (1958), and _Take a Girl Like You_ (1960). _A Case of Samples_ (1956) is a collection of intellectual, light-hearted poems. See Angry Young Men.

_Amis and Amile._ Also _Amis and Amiloun._ French _chanson de geste_ based on an Oriental tale, made popular in 13th century French and English romance. The story celebrates an extraordinarily devoted friendship. Amis perjures himself to take Amile's place in a trial by combat, and is punished by leprosy. A vision reveals to Amile that only the blood of his children can cure his friend, so he kills them and effects the cure. But this generous sacrifice is miraculously rewarded: a visit to the children's dead bodies discovers them to be merely sleeping.

_Amish._ The Amish Mennonites, a strict sect of the 17th century, named from Jacob Ammann or Amen, a Swiss Mennonite bishop.

_Ammers-Küller, Johanna van_ (1884– ). Dutch novelist. Her best-known novel is _The Rebel Generation_ (1925), which was a best seller in Holland and widely translated.

_Ammon._ See _Amen._

_Ammontius Saceas_ (c. 175–c. 242). An Alexandrian philosopher. The teacher of Plotinus, Ammonius made his students vow that they would not reveal his doctrines in writing. He was born a Christian but abandoned the faith.

_Amore._ See _Ovid._

_Amoret._ See _FABLES QUEENIE, THE._
Amoretti (1595). Sonnet sequence by Edmund Spenser.

Amorous History of the Gauls. See Bussey-Ramsay.

Amos. In the Old Testament, one of the Minor Prophets and the name of the oldest of the prophetic books in point of time. Amos had disquieting visions of the corruption of his city contemporaries. His pleas for personal and social righteousness are simply and movingly framed.

Amour courttois. See courtly love.

Amour médecin, L' (Love, the Doctor, 1665). A comédie-ballet in prose by Molière. By pretending to be a doctor, the hero Cithandre dupes the selfish Sganarelle into giving him the hand of his daughter and her dowry as well. See Josse; Lucinde.

Amépère, André Marie (1775–1836). French physicist. Ampère made important discoveries in the fields of magnetism and electricity; these paved the way for the present-day study of electrodynamics. The ampère, the unit measure of intensity of an electric current, is named in his honor. Specific scientific orientation is less frequently found in his later work Essai sur la philosophie des sciences (1834–1844).

Amphiaraus. In mythology, the son of Oicles. It is not certain whether he was originally a man or god, although his name means "very sacred." Foreknowing the outcome of the expedition of the Seven against Thebes, Amphiaraus refused to part in it until he was compelled to do so by his wife, Eriphyle. He attacked Thebes at the Homoloian Gate, but was driven off. While attempting to escape, he was swallowed up in a cleft in the ground made by Zeus's thunderbolt.

Amphion. A son of Zeus and Antiope. He became a famous musician and reigned, with his twin brother, in Thebes. Antiope, a daughter of Nycteus, the ruler of Thebes, lay with Zeus, but was driven from the city by her angry father. While fleeing to Sicyon, she gave birth to twins, Amphion and Zethus, on Mount Cithaeron. They were raised by shepherds and, on reaching manhood, learned of their mother's fate. Nycteus having died, his brother Lycus, now king, had brought Antiope back to Thebes, where he and his wife Dirce had long mistreated her. The twins went to Thebes, killed Lycus, and tied Dirce to the horns of a bull; she died at the Theban spring named for her.

Amphion and Zethus now shared the Theban throne and together built the city walls, though Amphion accomplished his part of the task by playing such ravishing music that the stones moved into place of their own accord. Amphion married Niobe, but her arrogance led to the slaying by Apollo and Artemis of their many children and, according to some accounts, of Amphion himself. Zethus married Thebe, who gave her name to the city.

Amphitrite. In classic mythology, a goddess of the sea. She was the wife of Poseidon, daughter of Nereus and Doris, and mother of Triton.

Amphitrion. In Greek mythology, a king of Myceae cuckolded by Zeus. The god assumed the likeness of Amphitrion for the purpose of visiting his wife, Alcmena, and gave a banquet at his house; but Amphitrion came home, and claimed the honor of being the master of the house. As far as the servants and guests were concerned, the dispute was soon decided: "he who gave the feast was to them the host." Alcmena became the mother of Heracles. This legend is the subject of three famous comedies by Plautus, Molière, and Dryden, all called Amphitryon. In 1929 there appeared a play entitled Amphitryon 38, meaning that it was the 38th treatment of the famous theme, by the French dramatist Jean Giraudoux (1882–1944).

Amphitryon (1668). A comedy by Molière. It is derived from Plautus' treatment of the Amphitryon legend. Jupiter, smitten with Alcmena, assumes the appearance of her husband Amphitryon, the better to effect her seduction, while his attendant Mercury takes on the appearance of Amphitryon's servant Sosie. The play recounts the mounting confusion caused by the arrival of the real Amphitryon and Sosie. Eventually, Jupiter clears up the matter by explaining the deception.

Heinrich von Kleist's Amphitryon (pub. 1808) is an adaptation of Molière's version, but concentrates much more on the tragic implications of the situation, especially for Alcmena.

amrita or amreeta (Sans., without death). In Hindu mythology, the elixir of immortality, corresponding to the ambrosia of classical mythology. To the early Aryans, it was probably the juice of the soma plant, from which a sweet ritual wine was prepared.

Amon. See Amen.

Amundsen, Roald (1872–1928). Norwegian polar explorer. Amundsen located the exact geographical position of the north magnetic pole on a voyage through the Northwest Passage (1903–1906). On December 14, 1911, he reached the South Pole and is known as its official discoverer. He flew across the North Pole with Lincoln Ellsworth in the dirigible Norge (1926). Amundsen disappeared (June, 1928) while on a flight to rescue the Italian explorer Nobile, who was lost returning from the North Pole. With Ellsworth and others he published North West Passage (1908), South Pole (1912), Our Polar Flight (1925), and First Crossing of the Polar Sea (1927).

Amusements sérieux et comiques d'un Siamois. See Charles Rivière Dupresny.

Amyclaean silence. Named for Amyclea, a Laconian town south of Sparta. Amyclea was ruled by the mythical Tyndareus. The inhabitants had so often been alarmed by false rumors of the approach of invading Spartans that they made a decree forbidding mention of the subject. When the Spartans actually came no one dared give the warning, and the town was taken. Hence the phrase "more silent than Amycleea."

Amys and Amylion. See AMIS AND AMILI.

An. The Sumerian god of heaven. Born of Namu, the primeval sea, An and his sister-wife Ki (Earth) were originally joined as one, but their offspring Enlil, the god of the air, separated them. An's place as head of the Sumerian pantheon was taken by Enlil. An is the same as the Babylonian god Anu.

Anabaptists. A general name for many Protestant sects which appeared in Germany during the 16th and 17th centuries. Although the various groups were usually in conflict with one another, most of them believed that they were restoring the purity of the primitive Christian church. Most practiced adult baptism, as described in the Bible, and several were involved with social and economic agitation. See MÜNTER ANABAPTISTS.

Anabase (1924). A poem by St.-John Perse. It was translated into English by T. S. Eliot in 1930. In this long work, the "upward journey" of the human spirit is portrayed through the expeditions of a Conqueror making his way across inhabited lands and deserts in Asia. He is loath to leave the pleasures and people of each successive city; yet restless he dreams of new travels and conquests and sets forth again.

Anabasis. See Xenophon.

Anacharsis. The protagonist in a once celebrated historical romance entitled Le Voyage du jeune Anacharsis en Grèce dans le milieu du IVe siècle avant l'ère vulgaire (1788) by Jean Jacques Barthélemy. The author, inspired by his archeological research in Pompeii during a trip to Italy in 1755, seeks in this novel to bring alive classical antiquity in the time of Philip of Macedon and Demosthenes, and emphasizes particularly those aspects of science, art, and customs that history frequently neglects.

The real Anacharsis was a Scythian sage who, according to Herodotus, visited many countries in search of knowledge during the 5th century B.C.; Barthélemy's work, however, is completely original.

Anacreon (Anakreon). A Greek lyric poet. He wrote chiefly in praise of love and wine. He lived from about 563 to 478 B.C.

Anadyomene. An epithet of Aphrodite, alluding to her rising from the sea at birth.

Anagog. An elevation of the mind to things celestial. Specifically, the term is used to refer to exegesis that gives a mystical or spiritual meaning or application to the words of the Bible, as opposed to their literal, moral, or allegorical interpretation. See PSEXT.

Anak. In the Old Testament, a giant of Palestine, whose descendants were terrible for their gigantic stature. The Hebrew spies said that they themselves were mere grasshoppers compared with the Anakim.

Analects (Lun-yi). One of the Chinese Four Books. A brief, unsystematic collection of fragmentary writings attributed to Confucius and his school. Memorized until recently by every schoolboy, it is one of the most influential works in the history of Chinese thought. See Arthur Waley, The Analects of Confucius (1938).

Ananias. In the New Testament, an early Christian of Jerusalem. With his wife Sapphira, Ananias was struck dead for lying about the price of a piece of land they had sold in order to give the proceeds to their church (Acts 5). His name has since become a general term for one who lies.

Anapest. In English prosody, a metrical foot consisting of three syllables, the first two unaccented and the third accented. The word "sig-a-ra-te" is an anapest. The meter made up of such units is called anapestic meter, and the following lines are a good example.

iam lord / of the fowl / and the brute.

Cowper, Alexander Seilkirk

Anat or Anath. Canaanite goddess, sister of Baal. A somewhat vengeful and violent deity, but loyal to her brother Baal, she has some characteristics in common with the Greek Artemis. She figures prominently in The Poem of Baal and The Poem of Aqhat.

Anatol (1891). A play by Arthur Schnitzler. It presents several sentimental and erotic episodes from the life of a Casanovalike adventurer who constantly flits from one girl to another. Anatol's carefree and often shallow attitude toward life is contrasted with that of his more solid and sensible friend Max, but there is no real conflict, and the whole is pervaded with a light-hearted and sensuous humor. Hugo von Hofmannsthal wrote a preface in verse for the play.

Anatomy of Melancholy, The (1621). A prose work by Robert Burton. Elaborately organized as a medical treatise, the Anatomy not only deals with various morbid mental states, their causes, symptoms, and cures, but is a compendium of notable utterances on the human condition in general, compiled from classical, scholastic, and contemporary sources. Melancholy, for Burton, embraced everything from ravaging lunacy to philosophical and occasional pessimism; as his quotations illustrate, it is "the character of mortality." The book is witty, pedantic, quaint, imaginaive, inexhaustively rich, and, from Milton on, it has been pillaged by numerous authors.

Anaxagoras (500-428 B.C.). A Greek philosopher, teacher of Pericles, Thucydides, Euripides, and possibly of Socrates. He believed in a dualistic universe, consisting of a chaotia mass of tiny particles or seeds that compose matter, and an ordering force that imparts motion. He called this force nous, or mind. Anaxagoras was also an astronomer, and correctly explained eclipses. He studied the size of the sun, the phases of the moon, and the behavior of meteors. Because his views conflicted with the state religion, Anaxagoras was charged with impiety and banished from the Athens he had made the center of philosophic argumentation. He is sometimes referred to as Anaxagoras of Clazomenae, after his birthplace in Asia Minor.

Anaximander (611-547 B.C.). Greek philosopher of the Milesian School, pupil of Thales. According to Anaximander, primary matter, which he called the apeiron, is eternal and indestructible. Motion and the separation of contradictory elements within this indefinite mass are the causes of plurality and variety in the universe. A practical scientist, Anaximander invented the sundial and was the first to prepare a map. He is known as the first Greek
Anaximenes

Anaximenes (fl. 525 BC). Greek philosopher of the Milesian School, associate of Anaximander. He believed that the condensation and rarefaction of air or aether, the primary substance, give rise to matter in all its forms.

Anaximenes of Lampsacus (c. 380–c. 320 BC). Greek rhetorician and historian, companion of Alexander the Great on his Persian expeditions. He wrote histories of Greece and biographies of Philip of Macedon and of Alexander. He is also thought to be the author of the only surviving work on rhetoric before Aristotle.

Anchises. In classic legend, a member of the royal house of Troy and the father of Aeneas by Aphrodite, who had fallen in love with him because of his beauty. According to Vergil, when Troy fell, Aeneas carried his aged father out of the burning city on his shoulders. Anchises died during Aeneas’ wanderings and was buried in Sicily (Aeneid, Book III).

Anderson, Hans Christian (1805–1875). Danish writer of fairy tales, poet, novelist, and dramatist. A skilled writer in all these genres, Hans Christian Andersen owes his worldwide fame to his fairy stories. Always popular with children, the 168 tales contain a mature wisdom together with gay witiness. Andersen invested stories of folk and legendary origin with moral and symbolic significance. He could convey a fine perception of life’s ironies while describing the fate of a tin soldier or a drab duckling. Among his best-known stories are The Red Shoes, The Ugly Duckling, The Emperor’s Clothes, The Tinder Box, and The Fir Tree. The tales appeared from 1835 to 1872. Andersen’s complete tales have been issued in several English editions.

Anderson, Marian (1902– ). American contralto. She is the first Negro to have sung as a permanent member of the Metropolitan Opera Company in New York. She is greatly admired as a concert artist, especially in Europe, where she first established her reputation.

Anderson, Maxwell (1888–1959). American playwright. He is known for his experiments in verse drama, his insistence on the necessity of an inner moral struggle, and his success in the field of historical drama. After an early play, White Desert (1923), Anderson began collaborating with Laurence Stallings, the two producing What Price Glory?; First Flight (1925), about Andrew Jackson; and The Buccaneer (1925), a play about Sir Henry Morgan. In the late 1920’s he wrote Outside Looking In (1925), based on Jim Tully’s Beggars of Life, and Saturday’s Children (1927), a domestic comedy. He then wrote with Harold Hickerson the first play to deal with the Sacco-Vanzetti case, Gods of the Lightning (1928). Anderson was to return later to this theme in his successful Winterset.

In the 1930’s Anderson returned to historical drama, writing two plays dealing with 16th-century themes, Elizabeth the Queen (1930) and Mary of Scotland (1933). Valley Forge (1934), a reinterpretation of Washington, followed. During the 30’s, Anderson wrote better than a play a year; some of these are Night Over Taos; Both Your Houses; High Tor (1937), which mingle real people and ghosts, past and present; Knickerbocker Holiday (1948), a musical with Kurt Weill; and Key Largo (1939), about a man who struggles to redeem himself for an act of cowardice committed during the Spanish Civil War. World War II was reflected in several Anderson plays of the early 40’s: Candle in the Wind (1941), an anti-Nazi play set in Paris; The Lute of St. Mark (1942); and Storm Operation (1944). After the war Anderson returned again to historical drama with Joan of Lorraine (1946); Anne of the Thousand Days (1948), a favorable interpretation of Henry VIII; and Barefoot in Athens (1951), a play about Socrates. Also noteworthy among Anderson’s late dramas were Lost in the Stars (1949), a dramatization of Alan Paton’s Cry the Beloved Country, and The Bad Seed (1955), the story of a grotesquely evil little girl, based on a novel by William March.

Anderson, Sherwood (1876–1941). American short-story writer and novelist. Born in Ohio, largely self-educated, Anderson worked at various trades and for several years was a copywriter in Chicago. There he met Midwestern writers associated with the Chicago literary renaissance, notably Theodore Dreiser and Carl Sandburg, and began his own literary career. His third book, Winesburg, Ohio, a collection of related short stories dealing with individuals in a typical Midwestern town, brought him recognition as a leader in the revolt against established literary traditions.

Though his style has been decried by a later generation of writers and critics as artless and sentimental, it was for Anderson’s time a significant breakthrough to an individual and original expression; not realistic in the sense of being an accurate reproduction of Middle Western speech, it has yet a kind of stylized realism that evokes the flavor of the Midwestern town, the paths of lives trapped by conventionality and commercialism, the adolescent yearning to know and despair at discovery. Anderson was repelled by the industrial and commercial society he saw growing up all around him, and he frequently contrasted the contemporary scene with an earlier one devoted to craftsmanship and personal concern. For Anderson, modern society and the worship of materialistic success resulted in the erection of walls between people, a sterile sexuality, and a loss of skill in handicraft and the arts. Such walls, he believed, could only be broken down by love, creative human relationships, and a return to a personal involvement in one’s craft.

Anderson never again equaled his achievement in Winesburg, Ohio, though his novel Dark Laughter became a best seller. He was most at home in the short story, some of his best stories being I’m a Fool, Death in the Woods, and I Want to Know Why.
His stories are collected in The Triumph of the Egg and Horses and Men (1923). His novels include Windsy McPherson’s Son (1916), Marching Men (1917), Poor White (1920), and Many Marriages (1923). A Story Teller’s Story and Tar: A Midwest Childhood (1926) are autobiographical. His Memoirs (1942) and Letters (1953) were published posthumously.

Andō Hiroshige (1787–1858). Japanese painter and wood-block artist. He is famous for his Tōkaidō Gojūsan-tsugi (fifty-three stations along the Tōkaidō Highway), and as the last great master of the wood-block (ukiyo-e) print. His works are said to have influenced Western painters, notably Whistler.

And Quiet Flows the Don. See Quiet Don, Tar.

André, John (1751–1780). English army major to whom Benedict Arnold delivered the plans for the betrayal of West Point during the American Revolution. He was caught and hanged as a spy. He is the hero of André (1798), a play by William Dunlap.

Andrea del Sarto (1855). A poem by Robert Browning. Written in the form of a dramatic monologue, del Sarto, known as “the Faultless Painter,” reveals his own character as he tells of the consuming passion for his beautiful, unscrupulous wife, Lucrezia, which prevented him from reaching the artistic stature of Raphael and Michelangelo.

Andreas Capellanus or André le Chapelain (late 12th–early 13th century). French chaplain at the court of Philip II. He wrote a Latin Liber de Arte Honeste Amandi (Book on the Art of Loving Honestly), a treatise on the art of love in the tradition of Ovid’s Ars Amoris. It became a handbook of the theory and practice of courtly love.

Andrew, St. One of the twelve disciples of Jesus; the brother of St. Peter. He is depicted in Christian art as an old man with long white hair and beard, holding the Gospel in his right hand, and leaning on a cross like the letter X, termed St. Andrew’s cross. His day is November 30. It is said that he suffered martyrdom in Patrae (A.D. 70).

André Walter, Les Cahiers d’ ’(1891). A short novelistic work by André Gide. It purports to be the notebooks of a sensitive youth who is suffering romantic anguish because his beloved has obeyed her mother and married another. Its melodrama reveals the conflict between spiritual love and fleshly desire as irreconcilable. Gide also called his first book of poems Les Poésies d’André Walter (1892).

Andrews, Pamela. See Pamela, OR VIRTUE REWARDED.

Andreyev, Leonid Nikolayevich (1871–1919). Russian writer. Born in the province of Oriol, Andreyev studied law at the universities of St. Petersburg and Moscow, during which time extreme mental depression led to several suicide attempts. He graduated in 1897 but turned to writing instead of law for a living, receiving aid and encouragement from Maksim Gorki. Among the best of Andreyev’s earlier works were In the Fog (V tumanney, 1902) and Thought (Myśl, 1902), the first dealing with awakened sexuality in a young boy, the second with insanity and murder. Such sensational themes were at this time still treated in a realistic manner by Andreyev, but, from this period on, his work became increasingly complex, often strained in its search for sensational effect and symbolic import. This is especially apparent in a work such as The Red Laugh (Krasný směch; 1904), a horrific tale of the madness and terror of war. The same tendencies are evident in Andreyev’s plays, which include He Who Gets Slapped, The Black Maskers (Chorniye maski; 1908), Anathema (Anatema; 1909), and The Life of Man (Zhizn cheloveka; 1906).

Andrâ, Ivo (1892— ). Yugoslav novelist. Born in Bosnia of a family of artisans of very modest means. Andrić managed to secure an education in universities in several cities in what is now Yugoslavia, Poland, and Austria. He was active in the National Revolutionary Youth Organization before World War I, and after it served in the diplomatic service in Rome, Bucharest, Trieste, Graz, and Berlin. During the German occupation, he lived in retirement in Belgrade and wrote his major novels, all about Bosnia: Miss; The Traunik Chronicle; and The Bridge on the Drina. He was little known outside his own country until the last novel was translated into English. In 1961 he was awarded the Nobel prize for literature.

Androcles or Androclus. According to Aulus Gellius, Androcles was a Roman slave of the 1st century who removed a thorn from the paw of a lion. When Androcles was later thrown into the arena, the grateful beast began to caress him and they were both set free. George Bernard Shaw used this story as the basis of his play ANDROCLES AND THE LION.

Androcles and the Lion (1912). A play by George Bernard Shaw. Using the story of ANDROCLES as the basis of the plot, Shaw’s play is about the early Christians’ faith. The first act opens as a band of first-century Christians is being led to the arena in Rome to be martyred. Androcles, a meek tailor, whose fabled encounter with the lion has taken place in the prologue, is in the group. As they proceed toward Rome, they sing hymns and aver their faith. The two main characters are a Roman captain and Lavinia, a beautiful, young Christian. She enunciates the theme of the play: to make life worth living, one must have something to die for. In the arena one of the Christians fights so well that the emperor pardons them all, but one person must still be thrown to the lion to keep the crowd happy. Androcles volunteers and discovers that the lion is the same one that he had helped in the forest.

Andromache. In Homer’s Iliad, the wife of Hector. She appears in Euripides’ The Trojan Women and is the heroine of his Andromache (430–424 B.C.). In the latter play, she has been carried off to Thesaly by Neoptolemus, Achilles’ son; has borne him a child, and has been abandoned in favor of Hermione, the daughter of Menelaus and Helen. Her sufferings at their hands are the substance of the play, which, in portraying the Spartans as cruel and cowardly, served as an effective political indictment of the Athenians’ enemies. Racine wrote a tragedy about Andromache entitled Andromaque.

Andromaque (1667). A tragedy by Jean Racine. It is based on the Greek legend of ANDROMACHE but differs from it in several details of interrelation between the characters. The play is set in Epirus after the fall of Troy. Andromaque is loved by her captor
Andromeda

Pyrhus whom she hates, but his action arouses the jealousy of his fiancée Hermione. Pyrrhus threatens to surrender Andromaque's son Astyanax to the Greeks if she will not yield to him. In exchange for his promise to protect her son, she agrees to marry Pyrrhus, but secretly intends to remain faithful to her dead husband Hector by killing herself after the wedding. The rejected Hermione persuades Orestes, the Greek ambassador, who has come to demand Andromaque's son, to murder Pyrrhus, and in exchange agrees to flee with him. But after the murder she reviles him and in her remorse commits suicide upon the funeral pyre of her adored Pyrrhus. Orestes goes mad. Andromaque is held by French critics to constitute the first representation in tragedy of the psychology of passion.

Andromeda. In Greek mythology, the daughter of Cepheus and Cassiopeia. Because her mother boasted that she was more beautiful than the Nereids, they induced Poseidon to send a sea-monster against Ethiopia, and an oracle declared that Andromeda must be sacrificed to it. Chained to a rock near Joppa, she was rescued by Perseus, who married her. He also killed Phineus, her former betrothed, and all his companions. She was placed among the stars upon her death.

Andromède (1650). A play by Pierre CORNELLE. Based on the Andromeda legend, it exploited the most spectacular scenic effects of its day.

Andvari. King of the dwarfs in Scandinavian mythology, especially in the Edda and the Völsunga Saga, who gave up his treasure and magic ring to Loki in exchange for his liberty.

Anelida and Arcite (probably c. 1380 or 1381). An unfinished poem by Geoffrey CHAUCER, in 357 lines. Although Chaucer gives Statius as his authority, he apparently draws more on Boccaccio's Teseida. The story of how Arcite faithfully leaves Queen Anelida for a new love is told in Rhyme Royal. It introduces the better poetry of Anelida's song of complaint, written in stanzas of nine lines, except for two of sixteen.

angel (Gr., angelos, "messenger"). (1) In theology, a celestial being. In postcanonical and apocalyptic literature, angels are grouped in varying orders, and the hierarchy thus constructed was adapted to church uses by the early Christian Fathers. In his De Hierarchia Celesti the pseudo-Dionysius (early fifth century) gives the names of the nine orders; they are taken from the New Testament (Eph. 1:21 and Col. 1:16) and are as follows:

(i) Seraphim, Cherubim, and Thrones, in the first circle of the heavenly hierarchy.
(ii) Dominions, Virtues, and Powers, in the second circle.
(iii) Principalities, Archangels, and Angels, in the third circle.

The seven holy angels are Michael, Gabriel, Raphael, Uriel, Chamuel, Jophiel, and Zadkiel. Michael and Gabriel are mentioned in the Bible; the others appear in Apocryphal books.

Milton (Paradise Lost, Bk. 1, 392) gives a list of the fallen angels.

Muslims say that angels were created from pure, bright gems, the genii from fire, and man from clay.

(2) An obsolete English coin, current from the time of Edward IV to that of Charles I, bearing the figure of the archangel Michael slaying the dragon. Its value varied from 6s. 8d. in 1465 (when first coined) to 10s. under Edward VI. It was the coin presented to persons touched for the King's Evil.

Angelica. The bewitching heroine of the Orlando poems of Boiardo and Ariosto (see ORLANDO FURioso). A princess of Cathay, her arrival at the court of Charlemagne sows discord among the paladins, especially Rinaldo and Orlando. The latter goes mad for a time when he discovers that she has fallen in love with the simple Moorish youth Medoro and escaped to Cathay with him. By introducing her as the main plot impulse, Boiardo made the first important blending of the Carolingian legends with the amatory motifs of the Arthurian cycle.

Angelico, Fra [Giovanni]. Real name: Guido di Pietro (1387–1455). Italian painter. A Domini- can friar of Fiesole, near Florence, he worked in Rome, Orvieto, and Florence. It was there that he completed the well-known series of frescoes for the monastery of San Marco, as a result of the patronage of Cosimo de Medici. In 1447, Fra Angelico was summoned to Rome by Pope Nicholas V for the purpose of painting several scenes from the life of Saint Law- rence, which were to be hung in the Vatican. A religious painter of grace and simplicity coupled with an admirable purity and delicacy of color, he did not share his contemporaries' enthusiasm for the new sci- entific naturalism of the day.

Angelo. (1) In Shakespeare's Measure for Meas- ure, the puritanical lord deputy who governs Vienna in the absence of Duke Vincentio. Although he is widely known as "a man of stricture and firm abstinence," his austerity masks a violent inner nature. (2) In Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors, a gold- smith who, having fashioned a gold chain for Antipholus of Ephesus, mistakenly gives it to Antipholus of Syracuse.

Angel Pavement (1930). A novel by J. B. PRIESTLEY. Set in London, it is the story of small businessmen and a grasping capitalist.

Angelus. A Roman Catholic devotion in honor of the Incarnation. It is so called from the first words, Angelus Domini (The angel of the Lord). The prayer is recited three times a day at 6 a.m., noon, and 6 p.m., at the sound of a bell called the Angelus. Millet made a well-known painting with this title.

Angelus Silesius. Pen name of Johann Scheffler (1624–1677). German baroque poet. His most fa- mous work, Cherubicischer Wandersmann (The Cherubic Wanderer, 1657) is a collection of religious epigrams of mystical character. Although he was a Catholic, Scheffler's thought is not unrelated to the earlier Protestant mysticism of Jakob Böhme and to the later movement of Pietism.

Anglo-Saxon Attitudes (1956). A satirical novel by Angus WILSON. The hero is an elderly medieval historian who decides to investigate a possible academic fraud with which he was once indirectly connected. In the process he discovers some truths about his family and himself.

Anglo-Saxon Chronicle, The [also called Old English Annals] (c. 891–924). An Old English history of England begun under the direction of

no. cynirg; otiferg munuc tuiae'/jp ... after he had viewed the body of a young woman who committed a similar suicide. A subplot concerns the contrasting happy love under various circumstances. The early material is adapted from Bede's work and from records kept by the monasteries. After the account of Alfred's wars against the Danes in the Chronicle was officially kept up year by year until 924, after which the various extant manuscript copies of it show fragmentary continuations by different authors, one with entries as late as 1154.

An angry group of English writers who came into prominence in the 1950's. The Angry Young Men, generally of working or middle-class origins, expressed the discontent and disillusionment of a generation enfranchised and university-educated by British socialism but unable to effect an entrance into the restricted power circles of British politics, education, criticism, or literature. They expressed their suspection and resentment of upper-class culture, manners, and snobism and their disgust with Britain and with what they took to be British hypocrisy chiefly through the novel and the drama. They produced several works of undeniable power, won enormous press publicity and critical favor, and achieved an impressive commercial success which, in the opinion of several critics, has modified their fervor. The movement may be said to be in decline in the 60's.
The leading Angry Young Men were John Osborne, notable for the fury and bitterness of his plays, and Kingsley Amis, remarkable among the group for the coherence and humor of his novels.

Animal Farm (1945). A satirical fable by George Orwell. Some farm animals get tired of their servitude to man and start a revolution to run the farm as they want. They are betrayed, however, by their leaders, the pigs, into a worse servitude. The pigs' slogan is, "All animals are equal, but some animals are more equal than others." The book is a satire on the development of the Russian revolution under Stalin.

Animal Kingdom, The (1932). A play by Philip Barry. It is the story of Tom Collier, who finds years of happiness with his mistress, Daisy. After returning to his wife, he abandons her again for Daisy.

Animal magnetism. See MESMERISM.

Animals in heaven. The 10 animals which, according to Muslim legend, have been allowed to enter paradise. They are (1) Jonah's whale; (2) Solomon's ant; (3) the ram caught by Abraham and sacrificed instead of Isaac; (4) the lapwing of Balkis; (5) the camel of the prophet Saleh; (6) Balaam's ass; (7) the ox of Moses; (8) the dog Kratim or Katmir of the Seven Sleepers; (9) Al Borak, Muhammad's ass; and (10) Noah's dove.

Anker Larson, Johannes (1874-1957). Danish
d Novelist and playwright. His novel The Philosopher's Stone (De Vises Stem, 1923) won the coveted Gyldendal prize and brought fame to the little-known writer. Anker Larson's absorbing interest in mysticism finds expression in all his novels, among them Martha and Mary (Martha og Marie; 1925), With the Door Open (For aaben Dør; 1926), and Stranger in Paradise (Sognet, som vanker ind i Himmelen; 1928).

Anna, Mother. See Ann Lee.

Anabel Lee (1849). A poem by Edgar Allan
Poe. Its subject, Poe's favorite, is the death of a beautiful woman.

Anna Christie (1922). A drama by Eugene O'Neill. Anna is the daughter of Chris Christopherson, a Swedish captain who has come to regard all evil and misfortune as the work of "dat old davil sea." He had sent her away to be brought up in Minnesota, but in the play she turns up in port and falls in love with both the sea and with a brawny Irish seaman named Mat Burke. When she confesses to a shameful past in St. Paul, both her father and lover repudiate her. In the end, however, she is forgiven by them both. The play won a Pulitzer Prize in 1922. It was made into the musical comedy
New Girl in Town (1957) by George Abbott.

Anna Comnena (1083-1148). A daughter of the Byzantine emperor Alexius Comnenus. She wrote a history of her father's career entitled the Alexiad.

Anna Karenina (1873-1876). A novel by Count Leo Tolstoi. The author's second great major novel, it is the story of a tragic, adulterous love. Anna meets and falls in love with Aleksy Vronski, a handsome young officer. She abandons her child and husband in order to be with Vronski. When he tires of her and leaves her to go to war, she kills herself by leaping under a train. The idea for the story reputedly came to Tolstoi after he had viewed the body of a young woman who committed a similar
marriage of Konstantin Levin and his young wife Kitty. Levin's search for meaning in his life and his love for a natural, simple existence on his estate are reflections of Tolstoi's own moods and thoughts of the time. While working on the novel, Tolstoi began to experience the doubts and torments which he describes in A Confession.

Annales Cambriae (c. 955). A Latin history of Wales, importantly connected with the origins of Arthurian legend. It notes that at the battle of Mount Badon, a historical Arthur (prototype of King Arthur) wore a cross on his shield, and that Arthur and Medract (a historical Morcvas) fell at the battle of Camlan in the year 537.

Anna Livia Plurabelle. In James Joyce's novel Finnegans Wake, the personification of the Irish river, the Liffey, representing H. C. Earwicker's wife Anna. The initials A. L. P. are interwoven throughout the novel to represent the universal feminine principle.

Anna of the Five Towns (1902). A novel by Arnold Bennett. The first of Bennett's novels dealing with the Potteries region, it is a naturalistic account of an ordinary woman's dull life. It is also a study of the repressive effects of Wesleyan religion. Anna is the daughter of Ephraim Tellwright, a miser and former preacher, who looks after the fortune Anna has inherited from her mother and forces her to extort high rent from her tenants. Anna becomes engaged to marry Henry Mynors, a pillar of the Church and a successful businessman, who is interested in her money. When she finds that she really loves Willie Price, son of a tenant her father has forced her to ruin, she cannot break the habit of years of obedience and marries Henry. Old Mr. Price and Willie commit suicide.

Anne Boleyn (c. 1507–1536). Queen consort of Henry VIII, mother of Elizabeth I. A lady of honor to Henry's first queen, Catherine of Aragon, Anne soon attracted the attention of the king, to whom she was secretly married in January, 1533. Some months later Henry's first marriage was declared invalid, and Anne was crowned queen. After the disappointing birth of a daughter (the future Queen Elizabeth), a miscarriage, and a stillborn son, Anne lost favor with Henry. In 1536 she was made to stand trial for adultery, was condemned, along with five men accused of being her lovers, and executed.

Annenksi, Innokenti Fiodorovich (1856–1909). Russian poet. A classical scholar and translator of Euripides and the French Parnassians, Annensksi wrote lyric poems that were models of concision and exquisite finish. His small output of poetic work was published mainly in Quiet Songs (Tikhiiye pemi; 1904) and The Cypress Chest (Kiparisovskii laryetz; 1910). Annensksi was a potent influence on the poetry of the Acmeists and the early work of Boris Pasternak.

Anne of Austria (Anne d'Autriche; 1602–1666). Daughter of Philip III of Spain, consort of Louis XIII of France, and regent during the minority of her son Louis XIV.

Anne of Cleves (1515–1557). The fourth wife of Henry VIII of England. Henry's marriage with Anne, a German, was arranged by Thomas Cromwell to create an alliance with the German Protestants. Henry, however, disliked her, and after six months had the marriage declared null and void.

Anne of Geierstein, or The Maiden of the Mist (1829). A novel by Sir Walter Scott. Exiled Lancastrian supporters become involved with the defeat of Charles the Bold, duke of Burgundy, by the Swiss in the 15th century.

Anne of Green Gables. See L. M. Montgomery.

Anniversaries, The. The general title of two long elegiac poems by John Donne: An Anatomy of the World (1611) and Of the Progress of the Soul (1612). Ostensibly written in memory of Elizabeth, young daughter of his patron, Sir Robert Drury, they are more concerned with the typical Donne themes of intellectual disorder and temporal decay.

anno Domini (Lat.). In the Year of our Lord; i.e., in the year since the Nativity; generally abbreviated to A.D. It was Dionysius Exiguus who fixed the date of the Nativity; he lived in the early 6th century, and his computation is probably late by some three to six years. The custom of determining dates on this basis is said to be the result of the work of the Venerable Bede.

Annonce faite à Marie, L'. See Tidings Brought to Mary, The.

Annual Register, The. A summary of the chief historic events of the year, first published by John and Robert Dodsley in 1758. It is still issued annually in England.

Annunciation. The announcement of the angel Gabriel to the Virgin Mary that she was to be the mother of the Messiah. The Annunciation is also the name used for a representation in art of this event and the name of the church festival, often called Lady Day (March 25), that commemorates it.

Annunciation, the Day of the. March 25, the day of the angel's (traditionally Gabriel's) announcement to the Virgin Mary of the forthcoming birth to her of the Messiah. It is also sometimes called Lady Day.

Annus Mirabilis (Lat., “year of wonders”; 1667). A poem by John Dryden. The poem describes the London fire and the Dutch war, the chief events of the year 1666. In a preface to the poem, Dryden discusses his conception of the poetic imagination.

Anouilh, Jean (1910– ). French dramatist and screen writer. The Ermine (1932) first presented his major recurrent theme, the "great thirst for purity." His plays, Antigone (1942) and The Lark (1953) for example, frequently oppose the freshness of youth to the staledness or even sordidness of age. Youth is embodied in the person of a young girl, poor but innocent and lovely; age is personified by a man who is usually wealthy and in a position of control. Allied to this contrast is the theme of the opposition between the poetry of fantasy or art and the sullying demands of practicality in the real world. The devices of play-within-a-play and disguised or pretended identity give symbolic expression to this conflict between artifice and actuality. Anouilh is never able to resolve these antitheses in an optimistic manner. The young and pure, however beau-Antigone, is fragile and unreal, compelled to face the inevitable bitterness and ugliness of actual human existence. The increasing bitterness and pessimism of his later work is half hidden beneath a veil of facile but charming satiric wit.

Anouilh's serious plays are often adaptations of well-known legends; the settings of his popular comedies range from castles to bourgeois domesticity. His plays published as Pièces roses (rosy plays) include Thieves' Carnival (Le Bal des voleurs, 1932) and Time Remembered (L'Éọcdie, 1939), Restless Heart (La Sauvage, 1934), Eurydice (1941; also translated as Legend of the Lovers and Point of Departure), Romeo and Jeannette (1945), and Medea (1946) were published as Pièces brillantes (sparkling plays) were Ring Round the Moon (L'Invitation au Chateau, 1947; translated by Christopher Fry), Cecile (1949), The Rehearsal (La Répétition, 1950) and Colombe (1951). Pièces grinçantes (grating plays) include Ardele (1948) and The Walts of the Toréadors (1952). Anouilh's later plays are L'Hurluberlu (1959) and Beckett (1959).

Anshar. Babylonian sky-god. Born of Lahmu and Lahamu, he fathered by his sister, Kishar, Anu, the god of heaven.

Anstey, Christopher (1724-1805). English poet. He became famous as the author of The New Bath Guide (1766), a series of verse letters supposedly written by Simpkin Blunderhead and other members of his family, describing the resort town of Bath. Tobias Smollett later used the same device in The Expedition of Humphry Clinker.

Anstey, F. Pen name of Thomas Anstey Guthrie (1856-1934). English humorist, novelist, and playwright. Among his works are Vice Versa, or A Lesson to Fathers (1882), a satiric novel, and The Man from Blankley's (1901), a play very popular in its day.

Antaeus (Antaïos). In Greek mythology, a gigantic wrestler, a son of Earth and Sea, Ge and Poseidon. His strength was invincible as long as he touched the earth; and when he was lifted from it, his strength was renewed on touching it again. It was Hercules who succeeded in killing this charmed giant by lifting him from the earth and squeezing him to death.

Antenor. A Trojan in Homer's Iliad. It was he who advised that Helen return to Menelaus. He appears also in Chaucer's Troilus and Criseyde and in Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida.

Anteros. In late Greek mythology, a son of Aphrodite and brother of Eros, the avenger of unreturned love. Or, according to some authorities, the opponent of Eros.

Anthony, St. First Christian monastic. He lived in the third or fourth century and founded a fraternity of ascetics who lived in the deserts of Egypt. The story of his temptations by the devil is a well-known subject of literature and art. It is the basis of Flaubert's novel, La Tentation de Saint Antoine.

Anthony, Susan Browell (1820-1906). American reformer and teacher. She organized the Woman's State Temperance Society of New York, and was president of the National American Woman Suffrage Association (1892-1900). A firm abolitionist, she was among the first, after the Civil War, to support Negro suffrage. She conducted many lecture tours, and tested the suffrage law in the case of United States vs. Susan B. Anthony.

Anthony Adverse (1933). A historical novel by Hervey Allen. An enormous popular success, the book is set in the Napoleonic era and takes its hero all over the world in a series of rousing adventures. The enthusiastic response of readers to the book's great length surprised the publishing world and caused a trend, influencing numerous other works.

Anthony of Padua, St. (1195-1231). Franciscan friar, preacher, and theologian. He was born in Portugal, but spent his life teaching theology in France and Italy; he died in Padua, Italy. There is a legend that St. Anthony preached to a school of fishes that listened attentively until he was finished.

Antic Hay (1923). A satirical novel by Aldous Huxley. Comical and bitter, it is about a group of London intellectuals and their long, learned, futile conversations; in which everything seems valueless. God, art, love, learning, social reform, science. The central character is timid Theodore Gumbriel, Junior, who gives up his job as a teacher to try to sell a new kind of trousers with built-in air cushion seats. He purchases a thick beard to help him act the part of a confident, aggressive man in business and in love. As in Crome Yellow, the general atmosphere of despair is deepened when the hero loses his girl.

Antichrist. Biblical term, occurring in the Epistles of John (I John 2:18), which refers to a "man of sin" (II Thess. 2:3) who denies the Father and Son and disowns the incarnation and messianic role of Jesus. Many legends are connected with the Antichrist, or deceiver, whose presence was supposed to precede the Second Coming of Christ and betoken the end of the world. Such stories are founded chiefly in II Thess. 2:1-12 and Rev. 8. The blasphemous beast with 7 heads and 10 horns, associated with the mystic numer 666, is identified with the Antichrist (Rev. 13-14). The early Christians associated the Antichrist with Caligula and Nero; Muhammad was also called Antichrist; and the name has since been applied figuratively to Hitler, Stalin, and other disturbers of world peace.

Antietam. A creek near Sharpsburg, Md., and the site of one of the bloodiest battles (Sept. 17, 1862) of the U.S. Civil War. Although the battle was a draw, the Union claimed victory because General Lee withdrew the Confederate troops to Virginia. General McClellan, the Union commander, was severely criticized for failing to pursue Lee and was soon replaced. See Emancipation Proclamation.

Antigone. In Greek mythology, the elder daughter of Oedipus. She is the heroine of Sophocles' tragedy Antigone, and a principal character in his Oedipus at Colonus and Euripides' Phoenician Women. She appears briefly in the interpolated ending of Aeschylus' Seven Against Thebes.

Antigone. One of the earliest extant tragedies of Sophocles. After the defeat of the expedition of the Seven Against Thebes, Creon, now king, decrees that the body of Polyneices shall lie unburied, in defiance of the rites due the dead. Antigone, Oedipus' daughter, gives her brother a token burial and, though she is excommunicated by her son Haemon, Creon condemns her to burial alive. Warned by Tiresias, he regrets his act too late; Antigone and Haemon Antigone (1942). A play by Jean Anouilh first produced despite censorship as an allegory of France under the Vichy government.

Antigonus. A Sicilian lord and the beleaguered husband of the bold and strong-minded Paulina, in Shakespeare's Winter's Tale. When, at the command of King Leontes, he attempts to abandon the king's infant daughter in a deserted place, he is eaten by a bear.

Antilochus (Antilochos). In Greek legend, the son of Nestor and friend of Achilles. He was chosen to break to Achilles the news of Patroclus' death. Antilochus was killed by Memnon, the son of Aurora and Tithonus. The three friends, Antilochus, Achilles, and Patroclus were buried in the same mound. Odysseus saw them walking together in the underworld.

Antin, Mary. See Promised Land, The.

Antiochus. In Pierre Corneille's tragedy Rodrigue, the stepson of the wicked queen Cleopatra and the betrayer of Rodrigue.

Antiope. (1) See Amphion.

Antiope. (2) A queen of the Amazons. See Theseus.

Antipholus of Ephesus and Antipholus of Syracuse. In Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors, the lost twin sons of Acastus and Aemilia. Antipholus of Ephesus is the husband of Adriana. Antipholus of Syracuse comes to Ephesus in search of his lost brother and becomes enamored of Adriana's sister, Luciana.

Antiphon (c. 479–410 B.C.). A Greek Sophist and rhetorician. Against Protagoras and the early Sophists, who believed in the supremacy of conventional law, he argued that men were by nature seekers after life, comfort, and unlimited pleasure, and that all law and restraint were consequently opposed to nature, which was for him the standard of right. He advised men to evade the law whenever possible; to obey it when expedient. Other Sophists developed the doctrine that might makes right from his work.

Antipope. See Pope.

Antiquary, The (1816). A novel by Sir Walter Scott, and his own favorite among his works. It deals with the love of William Lovel for the daughter of Sir Arthur Wardour in the time of George III. See Jonathan Oldbuck and Edie Ochiltree.

Antoine, André (1858–1943). French actor and theater director. Antoine is known for his directorship of the Théâtre Libre (1887–1894). A passionate love for the theater accompanied his desire to see more freedom and more possibility for experimentation on the French stage. Avant-garde in its bold unconventionality, the Théâtre Libre produced principally the plays of the naturalists, although it also played the works of contemporary Scandinavian, Russian, and German dramatists. Financial difficulties did not discourage Antoine, who opened another theater, the Théâtre Antoine, in 1897. He had already done much to revolutionize French theater, to encourage naturalness and to dispense with artificial stage conventions.

Antoinette, Marie. See Marie Antoinette.

Antonello da Messina (c. 1430–1479). Italian painter. After his early years at Messina, Sicily, he went to Naples; there he encountered the Flemish style of painting, particularly the use of oils, in such works as those of Jan van Eyck. In the years following 1475, both in Venice and other Italian cities, he became the chief sponsor of the new technique. His works, which favor the miniature still life, are noted for their handling of light and mastery of perspective. Among those considered his masterpieces are Saint Jerome in his Study and the Virgin Annunciate.

(2) The treacherous brother of Prospero in Shakespeare's The Tempest. With the help of Alonso, the king of Naples, he has usurped Prospero's dukedom and cast him and his infant daughter adrift on a rotting bark. He is never troubled by conscience, but is, at last, forced to restore his brother's rightful position to him.

Antony, Mark or Marc. In Latin, Marcus Antonius (c. 82–30 B.C.). Roman triumvir and general. He was one of the tribunes who, in 49 B.C., supported Caesar and joined him before crossing the Rubicon. He was appointed consul in 44 and, after Caesar's death, swung the populace against the assassins to his favor with his eloquent oratory. It was at this time that Cicero delivered his famous Philippics (orations) against Antony. In 43, the Second Triumvirate of Antony, Octavian (later Augustus), and Lepidus was formed. Caesar's assassins, Brutus and Cassius, were defeated at Philippi in 42. From the year 40 on, Antony lived chiefly at Alexandria with Cleopatra, queen of Egypt, abandoning his wife Octavia, sister of Octavian. Open hostilities between Octavian and Antony broke out, and, in 31, the combined forces of Antony and Cleopatra were defeated by Octavian at Actium. Antony committed suicide in Egypt after hearing a false report of Cleopatra's death (circulated, some say, by Cleopatra herself in an attempt to win Octavian's favor by causing Antony's death).

In Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, he is portrayed as a devoted friend of Caesar. Though he is fond of revelry and amusements, he is also a shrewd strategist and capable general. After Caesar's death, he skillfully turns public opinion against the assassins by means of his funeral oration, which begins with the famous lines:

If friends, Romans, countrymen, lend me your ears; I come to bury Caesar, not to praise him. The evil that men do lives after them, The good is oft interred with their bones; So let it be with Caesar.

Antony is depicted in Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra as a declining hero, torn between his love for Cleopatra and his political ambitions. After his death, Agrippa utters a fitting epitaph:

A rarer spirit never Did steer humanity; but you, gods, will give us
Some faults to make us men.

Antony and Cleopatra (c. 1607). A tragedy by William Shakespeare. Having given himself over to a life of sensual pleasure with Cleopatra in Egypt, Marc Antony returns to Rome upon hearing of his wife's death and of an attack on Italy by the forces... of Sextus Pompeius. In Rome the differences between Antony and the two other triumvirs, Octavius Caesar and Lepidus, are patched up by Antony's marriage to Octavia, the sister of Octavius. When Antony, succumbing to Cleopatra's enticements, returns to Egypt, Octavius seizes upon the insult to his sister as a pretext for attacking his erstwhile ally. Octavius wins the naval battle of Actium when Cleopatra's fleet deserts. Antony, after unsuccessfully seeking to make terms with the victor, hurls defiance at him. Defeated in a later land battle and believing Cleopatra dead, the despairing Antony falls on his sword. Hearing that she is still alive, he is taken to her and lives long enough to lay his last kiss upon her lips. When Cleopatra learns that Octavius, now sole master of the empire, plans to lead her in triumph through Rome, the proud and imperious queen applies an asp to her bosom and joins her lover in death.

Shakespeare's source for the play was Sir Thomas North's translation (1579) of Plutarch's Lives. Dreyden's drama All for Love (1678) also describes the last days of Antony and Cleopatra, and for many years was more frequently performed than the Shakespearean version. See Domitius ENobarBUS.

Anu. The Babylonian god of heaven. A development of the Sumerian god An, he was descended from Tiamat, the sea; his own parents were Anshar and Kishar. He was deposed and emasculated by KUMARR, but replaced on his throne by his son Ea, the god of water and wisdom, who became far more important in the Babylonian pantheon than Anu himself.

Anubis. In Egyptian mythology, a deity who presided over funeral rites and insured the accuracy of the scales weighing the souls of the dead. He was the son of Osiris, the judge of the infernal regions, and was represented as a man with a jackal's head.

Anunnaki. The Sumerian deities of the underworld. Originally followers of the god of heaven, Anu, they somehow became gods of the underworld where they were inferior to its queen, ERESHKIGAL. Their demotion may have been punishment for some crime, or merely the result of Anu's displacement as principal god of the pantheon by Enil.

Anville, Evelina. See Evelina, or the History of a Young Lady's Entrance into the World.

Anzengruber, Ludwig (1839-1889). Austrian dramatist. He is best known for his dialect plays depicting rustic life, such as Der Meineidbauer (The Farmer Forsworn, 1872) and Der Doppelselbstmord (The Double Suicide, 1876). Because of his use of dialect and his treatment, especially in Das vierte Gebot (The Fourth Commandment, 1877), of family problems, he was important in the genesis of dramatic naturalism.

Aonian. Pertaining to Aonia, the region of Mt. Helicon and Cithaeron, in Boeotia. The Muses were supposed to live there. The Aonian fount was the fountain of Aganippe at the foot of Mt. Helicon.

Apache. The name of a nomadic and predatory tribe of North American Indians of Athapascan linguistic stock. They occupied what is now the southwestern U.S. The name is often applied to the hooligans of Paris; an apache dance is a violently acrobatic exhibition supposedly danced by a Parisian apache and his partner.

Ape man. The churlish, cynical philosopher in Shakespeare's Timon of Athens. He foresees Timon's ruin and chides him for his pride, as great in ruin as it was in wealth. His hatred of mankind is paralleled and later surpassed by Timon's misanthropy.

Apes of God, The (1930). A novel by Wyndham Lewis. It is an epic satire on the rich artistic coteries which in Lewis's eyes reflected the social decay of the period. Among writers satirized are the Sitwell family, Gertrude Stein, James Joyce, and Virginia Woolf and the Bloomsbury group.

Aphrodite. The Greek goddess of erotic love and marriage. Although Homer calls her a daughter of Zeus and Dione, it was the more common story that she was born from the foam that gathered about the severed parts of the emasculated Uranus. She is said to have first stepped ashore on the island of Cytherea, just off the coast of Laconia, hence her epithet Cytherea. Her name was identified by the Greeks with the word aphros, seafoam. As an Olympian deity, she was the wife of Hephaestus, but the lover of Ares. A familiar story about her tells how Hephaestus trapped her in bed with Ares by throwing a delicate golden net over them, and displayed their embarrassment to the other gods. In late Greek myth, Aphrodite was called the mother of Eros.

It is generally agreed that Aphrodite was originally an Asiatic goddess similar to Ishtar. An ancient center of her worship was the island of Cyprus for which she was often called Cypris. In Rome, she was identified with Venus. See ADONIS.

Apicius, Marcus Flavius (fl., a.d. 14—37). A Roman epicure in the time of Tiberius. He wrote a book on the ways of tempting an appetite. Having spent a fortune in supplying rare delicacies for his table, and having only 10 million sesterces (about $400,000) left, he hanged himself, not thinking it possible to exist on such a wretched pittance. Apicius has become a stock name for certain cakes and sauces, and his own name is still proverbial in all matters of gastronomy.

Aphis. In Egyptian mythology, the bull of Memphis, sacred to Osiris, of whose soul it was supposed to be the image; others said it was the union of divine and animal souls. The sacred bull had to have natural spots forming a triangle on the forehead and a half-moon on the breast. It was allowed to live only 25 years, when it was sacrificed and buried with great pomp.

Apocalyptic literature (Gr., apokalyps, “uncovering”). A type of prophetic literature common in ancient Hebrew and early Christian writing. It is filled with veiled symbolism (see Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse) and inspired by visions of the future triumph of the Messianic kingdom. The Revelation of St. John the Divine is often called the Apocalypse.

Apocrypha (Gr., apokrypto, “hidden”). Certain Old Testament books of doubtful authority. These books are included in the Greek (Septuagint) and Latin (Vulgate) versions of the Old Testament, but are usually regarded as noncanonical or of secondary value by other Christians and Jews. They are seldom printed in Protestant Bibles, but in the Authorized Version of 1611 they are given immediately after the Old Testament. The New Testament also has a large number of apocryphal books associated with it, consisting of later gospels, epistles, apocalypses and such fragments as the Logia. Othon was the first to apply the term to books used by the church, to designate writings of a questionable character; it has come to signify false and heretical literature.

Apollinaire, Guillaume [born Wilhelm Apollinaris de Kostrowitski] (1880–1918). French poet and critic. In 1898, he met Alfred Jarry in Paris and was attracted to l'esprit nouveau, the new spirit in esthetic theory. A friend of Picasso, Braque, and other avant-garde artists, he wrote Antitradition futuriste and The Cubist Painters in 1913. The latter work first established cubism as a school of painting. The poems in Alcools (1913) combined free and classical verse forms; those in Calligrammes (1918) used words to draw lines, the controversial typography carrying poetry to its extreme limits. He called Les Mamelles de Tirésias (1903, pub. 1917) a "drame surréaliste," apparently the source of the name of the surrealist movement. It was made into an opera (1947) by Francis Poulenc, Apollinaire's other works include fiction: L'Hérésiarque et Cie (1910) and The Poet Assassinated (1916); the verse play Couleur du Temps (1918); and the posthumously published Ombre de mon amour (1948), poems, and Tendre comme le souvenir (1952), letters.

Apollo (Apollo). A Greek god, son of Zeus and Leto. Originally, perhaps, a god of flocks, he also became a god of healing, music, and archery. As Phoebus Apollo, he came to be the god of light, but not properly of the sun. He was born, with his sister Artemis, on the island of Delos, where his mother had taken refuge from the jealous Hera. At an early age, he killed the Python, the sacred snake of the Delphic Oracle, and took charge of that oracle, which had previously belonged to a succession of earth goddesses. Though implausible in anger, as the fates of Maresyas and Niobe show, he was surprisingly unsuccessful in love, to judge from the number of nymphs and mortals, such as Daphne and Marsyessa, rejected who his advances. Nevertheless, he has been called "the most Greek of Greek gods," speaking more than once for modern concepts of justice and human relations as opposed to the more primitive traditions. The most notable example of this tendency is his defense of Orestes on the Areopagus, dramatized in Aeschylus' Eumenides.

Apollodorus (Apollodoros). A Greek mythographer. Nothing is known of him, but his one extant work (if it is his), The Library (Bibliothèque), is one of the most important sources of Greek mythology. Though it draws on the works of Apollonius of Rhodes and the Athenian dramatists, it was largely based on a lost book by Pherecydes of Leros, dating from the early fifth century B.C.

Apollonian and Dionysiac. Terms used by Friedrich Nietzsche in The Birth of Tragedy to designate the two central principles in Greek culture. The Apollonian, which corresponds to Schopenhauer's principium individuationis ("principle of individuation"), is the basis of all analytic distinctions. Everything that is part of the unique individuality of a man or thing is Apollonian in character; all types of form or structure are Apollonian, since form serves to define or individualize that which is formed; thus, sculpture is the most Apollonian of the arts, since it relies entirely on form for its effect. Rational thought is also Apollonian since it is structured and makes distinctions.

The Dionysiac, which corresponds roughly to Schopenhauer's conception of "will," is directly opposed to the Apollonian. Drunkenness and madness are Dionysian because they break down a man's individual character; all forms of enthusiasm and ecstasy are Dionysian, for in such states a man gives up his individuality and submerges himself in a greater whole; music is the most Dionysian of the arts, since it appeals directly to man's instinctive, chaotic emotions and not to his formally reasoning mind.

Nietzsche believed that both forces were present in Greek tragedy, and that true tragedy could only be produced by the tension between them. He used the names Apollonian and Dionysian for the two forces because Apollo, as the sun-god, represents light, clarity, and form, whereas Dionysus, as the wine-god, represents drunkenness and ecstasy.

Apollonius of Rhodes (Apollonios Rhodios), an Alexandrian poet of the 3d-2d centuries B.C. According to tradition, he was a pupil of Callimachus, but quarreled with him and, when his youthful work the Argonautica proved unpopular, went to Rhodes. He later abridged this epic of the voyage of the Argonauts; it won favor and he was appointed head of the Alexandrian Library.

Apollonius of Tyana or Apollonius Tyanaios (fl. a.d. 50). Greek Neo-Pythagorean philosopher. He studied in the temple of Asclepius at Aegae. An ascetic, he traveled through India, Babylonia, and Persia, absorbing mysticism. He had a school at Ephesus, and was credited with magical powers. Philostratus wrote a biography of Apollonius, recording his miraculous feats; the work is regarded as religious fiction.

Apologia pro vita sua, or a History of My Religious Opinions (1864). An autobiographical treatise by John Henry Newman. In it the author outlines and defends the intellectual development that led to his conversion from the Anglican to the Roman Catholic Church. One of the most famous of English autobiographies, it is noted for its candor and intellectual passion, its subtle and musical prose style.

Apologie for Poetrie, An. An essay by Sir Philip Sidney, written during 1580–1583 in answer to an attack on poetry by the Puritan Stephen Gosson in The School of Abuse (1579). Sidney's essay defines as poetry all imaginative writing. In addition to defending its worth and replying to Puritan accusations against it, Sidney gives his own critical appraisal of the poetry and drama of the time. Two different editions of the essay, one titled An Apologie for Poetrie, the other The Defense of Poesie, were posthumously published in 1595.

Apology for Raymond Sebond (Apologie de Raimond Sebond). The longest of the Essays of Michel de Montaigne. It gives fullest expression to his skeptical philosophy. Montaigne's "defense" of the treatise of Sebond, a 15th-century Spaniard who attempted to demonstrate the existence of God by analogy with the hierarchy of nature in which man occupies the highest rung, was a pretense for demolishing the validity of reasoning altogether. Se-bond's proof, asserted Montaigne, was no less credible than any other proof. Man vainly believes himself superior to the rest of creation by virtue of his reason, whereas in fact all his theorizing has not uncovered a single universal truth. Montaigne's skepticism was an affirmation of the relativity of knowledge and essentially a healthy reaction to the excessive faith in reason of the early Renaissance. It cleared his mind of preconceptions and prepared him for a search for wisdom based, not on intellectual speculation, but on his own experience.

Apology for the Life of Mrs. Shamela Andrew's, An (1741). A novel by Henry Fielding satirizing Samuel Richardson's Pamela. Shamela is presented as a designing woman who deliberately tricks her master into marrying her.

Apolonio, Libro de. A Spanish heroic poem of the first half of the 13th century by an anonymous author, probably an Aragonese. Consisting of 2624 verses, it is one of the oldest examples of cuaderna via. The story, based on a Greek legend, deals with Appollonius, prince of Tyre, who is separated from his wife, Luciana, and their daughter, Tarsia; after many adventures they are finally reunited. Other authors have utilized this theme, notably Shakespeare in Pericles.

Apophis. In Egyptian mythology, the power of darkness in the form of a serpent against whom the sun god Ra waged daily war.

aposiopesis. Deliberate failure to complete a sentence for rhetorical effect. As a figure of speech the form is often used to convey an impression of extreme exasperation or to imply a threat, as, for example, in "If you do that, why, I'll—" The rest of the sentence is understood.

apostles (Gr., apostolos, messenger, envoy). Jesus' 12 original disciples: Peter, Andrew, James the Less, John, Philip, Bartholomew, Thomas, Matthew, Simon the Canaanite (also Simon Zelotes), Jude (also Thaddaeus and Lebbæus), James the Greater, and Judas Iscariot. Jesus gave His message to these men personally and gave them the task of being His witness after His death. He shared with them the Last Supper, which has become the fundamental sacrament of Christian worship.

To the apostles, Jesus entrusted the work of establishing the Church, with Peter to be the "rock" upon which it was built. Matthias was later chosen to take Judas Iscariot's place. All of the apostles met martyr's deaths except John and, of course, Judas Iscariot who committed suicide.

Beside Judas Iscariot, two other apostles have not been canonized: Philip and Simon the Canaanite. Paul, though not one of the original 12, is always classed as an apostle as is often Barnabas, Paul's companion in his first mission.

Apostolic Fathers. Christian authors born in the 1st century, when the apostles lived. John is supposed to have died about A.D. 99; Polycarp, the last of the Apostolic Fathers, born about 69, was his disciple. The Five Apostolic Fathers most referred to are Clement of Rome, Barnabas, Hermas, Ignatius, and Polycarp.

apostolic succession. A theological doctrine first enunciated by Irenæus (fl. 190). It maintains that the bishops of the church are direct spiritual descendants of the apostles and of the bishops consecrated by them, and that authority over the church's faith and discipline resides in them.

Apostolus, Michael (1422-1480). Greek scholar in Italy during the Renaissance. He defended Plato against the Greek Aristotelians.

apostrophe. A figure of speech using the direct address of a person or thing, usually absent, for rhetorical effect. The thing addressed is often personified, as in "Hence, loathed Melancholy!" which begins Milton's L'Allegro. The object of the apostrophe is frequently a real person, living or dead, as in "Milton, thou shouldst be living at this hour," the beginning of Wordsworth's sonnet on Milton.

Appian Way (Lat., Via Appia). The oldest and best preserved of all the Roman roads, it leads from Rome to Brundisium (Brindisi) by way of Capua. This "queen of roads" was commenced by Appius Claudius, the censor, in 312 B.C.

Appius Claudius. Roman decemvir (451–450 B.C.). He was one of 10 decemvirs appointed to draw up a code of Roman law. According to tradition, his passion for the beautiful plebian Virginia caused an uprising, led by her father, which overthrew the decemvirs and established a tribunate.

apple of discord. In Greek mythology, the initial cause of the Trojan War. All the gods and goddesses except Eris (Discord) were invited to the wedding of Thetis and Peleus. In revenge, Eris threw among the guests a golden apple inscribed "For the fairest." Hera, Athene, and Aphrodite claimed it and were referred to Paris, the handsomest man in the world, for judgment. See the Judgment of Paris.

Appleseed, Johnny. Nickname of John Chapman (1774–1845). American orchardist and folk hero. Born in Massachusetts, Chapman wandered westward to Pennsylvania, Ohio, Illinois, and Indiana. For 50 years he led a nomadic existence, preaching and distributing apple seeds to all he met. It is said that the orchards of the four states above owe their origin to Chapman's seeds.

Johnny Appleseed has become a favorite American folk hero, celebrated in many stories and poems. The poet Vachel Lindsay, who frequently referred to him, wrote a long poem called In Praise of Johnny Appleseed (1923).

apples of perpetual youth. In Scandinavian mythology, magical golden apples. They were in the keeping of Idhunn, daughter of the dwarf Svald and wife of Bragi. It is by tasting them that the gods preserve their youth.

apples of Sodom. Fruit which, in classical tradition, grew beside the Dead Sea. They are lovely in appearance, but full of ashes within. Josephus, Strabo, Tacitus, and others speak of them, probably referring to the gall-nuts produced by the insect Cynips insana.

Après-midi d'un faune, L' (The Afternoon of a Faun, 1876). A poem by Stephane Mallarmé. It presents the wandering thoughts of a faun on a drowsy summer afternoon. The poem inspired Debussy's Prélude à l'Après-midi d'un faune (1894), which was choreographed and danced by Nijinsky for Diaghilev's Russian Ballet in 1912.

Apsyrtus (Apsyrtos). See the Argonauts.
Apuleius, Lucius (fl. c. A.D. 155). Latin writer. He is best known today for his prose romance Metamorphoses, or The Golden Ass, the only Latin novel that survives in its entirety. Apuleius was born in North Africa. After studying in Carthage and Athens, he spent a number of years traveling and delving into the magic lore of the Mediterranean countries. He incorporated his vast knowledge and experience into the 11-volume The Golden Ass. Here, in a prose style as odd and fanciful as the tale itself, he narrates the story of a man who, transformed into a donkey, wanders from land to land observing the proverbs and brutal foibles of mankind. In one of the episodes, Apuleius recounts the famous story of Cupid and Psyche.

Aqhat. Hero of the Canaanite The Poem of Aqhat. The young son of the chieftain Danel, he is given a divine bow belonging to Anat. She kills him and he is eaten by eagles, but avenged by his sister Paghat. It is probable that in the lost final section of the poem, Aqhat revived.

Aquilante. In the Orlando poems of Boiardo and Ariosto he is the son of Oliviero and brother of Grifone (see Orlando Furioso). He is called il nero (the black) and his brother il bianco (the white) because each is protected by an enchantress of that color. The black enchantress had saved him from an eagle (hence his name) which had stolen him from his mother Ghismonda.

Aquinas, St. Thomas (c. 1225-1274). Italian scholastic theologian and philosopher, often called the Angelic Doctor (Lat., Doctor Angelicus). He came from a noble family, who strongly objected when he joined the Dominican Order in 1243 and forcibly detained him for over a year. He finally reached Paris and began his studies under Albertus Magnus, whom he followed to Cologne in 1248. He began teaching at Paris in 1252, and thereafter taught alternatively in Paris and in Italy. In 1254 he began his commentaries on the Sentences of Peter Lombard, on Boethius, and on the Bible, revealing Albertus Magnus and St. Augustine of Hippo as the greatest influences on his thought.

The treatises that followed were later incorporated into his two great Summae, or summaries of human knowledge. The Summa [de Veritate Catholicae Fidei] contra Gentiles (1259-1264) defends "the truth of the Catholic faith against the pagans" by making clear the distinction between the realms of reason and of faith: reason seeks knowledge from experimental and logical evidence, while faith seeks understanding through revelation, but uses the knowledge provided by reason. Thus they can never be in conflict, and both come from and reveal God as the source of all truth. The Summa Theologica, his greatest work, continues on this basis to summarize all that is known about God and man from the sources of both reason and faith.

Aquinas' followers were called Thomists in later scholastic disputes, especially with the Scotists (see John Duns Scotus). His synthesis of theology and philosophy, known as Thomism, has since been officially recognized as a cornerstone in the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church.

Arabian Nights' Entertainments, The, or A Thousand and One Nights. A collection of ancient Persian-Iranian-Arabian tales, originally in Arabic, arranged in its present form about 1450, probably in Cairo. Although the stories are discrete in plot, they are unified by Scheherazade, the supposed teller; she postpones her execution by telling her husband, Schahriar, a story every night after which without revealing the climax until the following session.

The first European translation, into French, was Antoine Gallard's 12-volume (1704-1717) free rendering of the oldest known manuscript of 1548. In 1840, E. W. Lane published a new scholarly English translation (three vols.); John Payne's translation appeared in nine volumes, 1882-1884; and Sir Richard Burton's monumental (10-vol.) English version was issued only to subscribers by the Kamashastra Society of Benares in 1885-1886. Among the more recent editions is a four-volume edition by Pourys Mathers, completed in 1937. See Abou Hassan; Aladdin; Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves; Calendrier; Carpet, Magic; Haroun-al-Raschid; Sindiad; The Sailor; Sidi Nouman.

Arachne. In Greek mythology, Arachne was a Lydian maiden. She challenged Athena to compete with her in needle tapestry. Athena metamorphosed her into a spider out of jealousy. Arachnida is the scientific name for spiders, scorpions, and mites.

Araf or Al Araf. In the Koran, the Islamic equivalent of purgatory, between heaven and hell. It is a place both for those neither morally good nor bad, and for those who, because their good and evil deeds were about equally balanced, must await their ultimate admission to heaven.

Edgar Allan Poe has a poem called Al Araf.

Arafat, Mount. A hill southeast of Mecca where, according to Muslim tradition, Adam met Eve after a punitive separation of 200 years during which time he was a wanderer on the face of the earth. He was conducted to its summit by the angel Gabriel.

Aragon, house of. A noble family of Spanish origin. Its members ruled in Sicily and later in southern Italy from the 13th through the 15th century. At Naples, the outstanding King Alfonso of Aragon (1385-1458), surnamed the Great, who ruled from 1443, was a celebrated patron of Humanists and poets. Under his inspiration, the men of letters gathered at his court founded the Neapolitan Academy, which included such men as Petrarch and Sanzaro.

Aragon, Louis (1897- ). French novelist, poet, and essayist. After brief associations with Cubism and Dadaism, Aragon wrote the novel Le Paysan de Paris (1926) as a participant in Surrealism. He criticized the ideal of "pure poetry" in Traité du style (1928), however, and became a Communist in 1930, thereafter to devote his art to the ideal of social revolution. He was prosecuted for his poem The Red Front (1931), but responded with more poetry: Persecuteur persécuté (1931) and Horsa l'Oural (1934), and with leftist magazines. Social novels depicting "the real world," as the series is collectively titled include: The Bells of Basil (Cloches de Bâle, 1936) and Passengers of Destiny (Les Voyageurs de l'impériale, 1941; also trans. The Century Was Young). Aurelios (1944) and Les Chefs ablés (1945) are autobiographical. Aragon abandoned current politics, however, in Holy Week (La Semaine Sainte, 1958), a panoramic epic of the flight of Louis XVIII at the beginning of Napoleon's 100 days in 1815.
His books of poetry include Le Crève-Coeur (1941), Les Yeux d’Elsa (1942), Brocéliande (1943), and Le Nouveau Crève-Coeur (1948). Many of these describe his participation in the Resistance and his love for his Russian-born wife Elsa Triolet (1896–1955), author of the novels The White Charger (1943) and Fine of 200 Francs (1945), as well as novels dealing with postwar social problems.

Aramis. One of the famous trio in Dumas’ The Three Musketeers, and a prominent character in its sequels Twenty Years After and The Viscount of Bragelonne. Aramis, always soberly garbed in black, regularly swore that he would soon forego his adventures for a pious life in a monastery.

Aranha, José Pereira de Graça. See José Pereira de Grãça Aranha.

Ararat, Mount. See Noah.

Araucana, La (1569–1590). An epic poem by Alfonso de Ercilla y Zúñiga (1535–1594), Spanish soldier and poet who went to Chile after the conquest and fought against the indomitable Araucanians. The stubborn resistance of the Araucanians against Spanish rule is the theme of the poem. Ercilla stresses the nobility and valor of the Indians and of their leaders Lautaro and Caupolicán, who are drawn in Homeric proportions.

Arbante. In a tale from Ariosto’s Orlando Furioso he is the son of King Cimosco of Frisia, the spouse of Olimpia, and the victim of the latter’s unwillingness to marry him. Olimpia has him killed before they wed.

Arbad, Joseph d’ (1874–1953). Provençal poet and novelist. Recorder of the old language and traditions of the Provence region, Arbad presented in The Laurel of Arles (Lou Laussé d’Arle; 1913) his philosophy that a tree—or a culture—must have deep roots to grow high. His works include poems: Songs of the Marshes (Li Cant palustre; 1919), The Brazen Boughs (Li Rampau d’aram; 1920), and Vision of the North (La Visioun de l’Uba; 1921). Among his novels are The Beast of the Vaccares (La Bésto dòu Vaccareis; 1924), The Gypsy (La Caraco; 1926), and Wild Animals (La Souvago; 1929).

Arber, Edward (1836–1912). English scholar. He was the editor of Arber’s English Reprints (1868–1880) and other series of cheap, accurate editions of 15th-18th century works. He also edited Transcript of the Registers of the Company of Stationers of London, 1554–1640 (1875–1894) and Term Catalogues, 1668–1709 (1903–1906), basic sources for research in English literature and publishing.

Arbor of Amorous Devices, The. An anthology of Elizabethan lyric poetry, Published in 1597, it was one of many such published in England after the success of Tottel’s Miscellany. It was attributed by the printers to Nicholas Breton, but it contains the work of other poets as well.

Aebuthnot, John (1667–1735). Scottish writer and court physician to Queen Anne. He was a close friend of Alexander Pope and Jonathan Swift and formed with them the Scriblerus Club. His works include The History of John Bull, which typified and fixed John Bull as the personification of England; The Art of Political Lying (1712), an essay; Know Thyself (1734), a philosophic poem; and The Memoirs of Martinus Scriblerus (1741), an attack on pedantry. He is the addressee of Pope’s Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot.

Arcades ambo (Lat., “both Arcadians”). Two people with similar skills and tastes, such as Corydon and Thyrsis in Vergil’s Seventh Bucolic, who were “both in the flower of youth, both Arcadians and peers of pastoral song.” When used ironically, the term implies that both are simpletons or scoundrels.

Arcadia (Arkadia). A district of the Greek Peloponnesus. According to Vergil, it was the home of pastoral simplicity and happiness. This notion was an early example of an illusion that has beset sophisticated intellectuals ever since: namely, that a simple, rustic life is not only idyllic, but somehow nobler than a more complex urban existence. The Arcadians were, as a matter of fact, the most backward of the Greeks, retaining to a relatively late date primitive, even savage customs that had long since died out elsewhere in Greece. Hence, to less poetically minded authors, the term Arcadian came to have a derogatory meaning.

The name Arcadia was taken by Sir Philip Sidney as the title of his famous pastoral romance (1590) and was soon generally adopted into English with much the old Virgilian significance. A 17th-century painting by Guercino, and a more famous one by Poussin of a slightly later date, show a shepherd’s tomb on which is the inscription Et in Arcadia ego (Even in Arcadia am I), signifying presumably that...
Arcadian Academy

Academic death is present even in the most ideal earthly life.

Arcadian Academy (Accademia dell’ Arca dia). An Italian literary academy founded at Rome (c. 1690) at the suggestion of Queen Christina of Sweden and headed by Giovanni Maria Crescimbini, an historian of Italian poetry.

The academy’s members proposed to counteract the fashionable mannerism of MARINISM by a return to the simple, unsophisticated pastoral motifs of the classical poets (hence the name Arcadia). Their program included the use of an unpretentious language, a close imitation of the classical poets, and a preference for short verse forms: the ode, sonnet, and canzonetta. Among its members were Carlo Frugoni (1692–1768), generally considered the most typical exponent of Arcadian ideals (“Frugoneria” describes his sonorous style); Paolo Rolli (1687–1765), lyric poet, librettist for Handel, and tutor at the English court; and Metastasio.

The academy came under the special protection of the royal house of Sweden and was never formally disestablished. It still maintains a formal existence although its role as arbiter of Italian literary taste came to an end with romanticism. See LEO XIII.

Archangel. A chief angel. In Judeo-Christian Scriptures and legend there are four: Michael, the warrior; Raphael, the healer; Gabriel, the herald; and Uriel, bringer of light. In the Koran, the four are Michael, the champion of the faith; Gabriel, the angel of revelations; Azrael, the angel of death; and Israfel, who sounds the trumpet of the resurrection. In the medieval hierarchy (see ANGEL) the archangels comprise the second order of the third division.

Archbishop of Granada. In Lesage’s novel Gil Blas de Santillane, a very rich, proud, and inflexible church dignitary. Gil Blas becomes his secretary and favorite. When he dares to criticize the archbishop’s oratorical excellence, he is dismissed.

Archer, Isabel. The heroine of Henry James’ The Portrait of a Lady. A girl of great vitality, Isabel has an insatiable thirst for experience which causes her to reject the proposal of Lord Warburton, a wealthy and cultivated Englishman, and to marry the shadowy and sinister Osmond. At all times treated sympathetically by James, she comes to realize the danger of her American expansiveness. Nevertheless, she asserts her inner freedom by refusing to leave the man she married.

Archiliochian bitterness. Ill-natured satire. It is so named from Archilochus, the Greek satirist (714– 676 B.C.).

Archiloro. A Negro giant in an episode from the Orlando Innamorato of Boiardo. He is killed at the battle of Albraca by Agriance, the king of Tartary, who hopes to win the hand of Angelica, princess of Cathay.

Archimago. The enchanter in Books I and II of Spenser’s Faerie Queene, typifying hypocrisy and false religion.

Archimedes (c. 287–212 B.C.). Syracusan mathematician, astronomer, and inventor. Several of his treatises, including that on the sphere and the cylinder, are still extant. Archimedes discovered the principle of the displacement of water, which, by means of specific gravity, he used to test the amount of base metal in the crown of Hieron, ruler of Syracuse. He is said to have exclaimed “Eureka,” or “I have found it,” when the principle occurred to him as he stepped into his bath.

Archipenko, Alexander Porfirievich (1887– 1964). Russian sculptor. Settling in the U.S. in 1923, he experimented with plastic materials and with the effects of transparency and reflection, tending toward abstraction in his sculpture.

Archpoet. See GOLLIARDIC VERSE.

Archer and mehitabel. The famous cockroach and cat created by Don MARQUIS in his newspaper column. Their stories were written at night in Marquis’ deserted office by literary archy, who was obliged to write without capitalization because he could not operate the shift key on the typewriter. Archy often related the ribald adventures of the indomitable mehitabel, whose motto was “toujours gai.” The lives and times of archy and mehitabel (1940) contains the original collection of the columns, archy and mehitabel (1927), and its sequels, archy’s life of mehitabel (1933) and archy does his part (1935).

Arcita. See TESEIDA.

Arendt, Hannah (1906–). German writer on political philosophy. Now resident in the U.S., she was educated at the universities of Marburg and Freiburg, and received her doctorate at the University of Heidelberg. In this country, she has taught at a number of universities, including those of California, Chicago, Princeton, and Wesleyan. Her best-known book, Eichmann in Jerusalem: A Report on the Banality of Evil (1963), is a study of the implications of the famous, emotionally charged trial of a high-placed Nazi official; it created a storm of controversy upon publication and was debated for months in literary journals. Her other books include The Origins of Totalitarianism (1951), The Human Condition (1958), Between Past and Future: Six Exercises in Political Thought (1961), and On Revolution (1963). She has also contributed to numerous publications, such as the Partisan Review, Commentary, Review of Politics, and Journal of Politics.

From 1944 to 1946, Miss Arendt was research di rector for the Conference on Jewish Relations, and 1949–1952 director of Jewish Cultural Reconstruction.

Areopagitica (1644). A famous pamphlet by John Milton, written as an argument against restriction of freedom of the press. Probably Milton’s best-known prose work because of the greatness of its cause and the eloquence of its rhetoric, it commands more interest than most of his other theological or political writings.

Areopagus (Areiopagos). The hill of Ares, located in Athens, west of the Acropolis. According to Greek myth, it was so named because it was there that Ares was tried for the murder of Halirrhothios, son of Poseidon. According to another story, the hill was named after an epithet of Athene, who had cast the deciding vote in the second trial of Orestes, supposedly held on this hill.

The name was also applied to a council of former archons, who assembled there. Under Draco, the council had the duty of judging murderers, and exercised general administrative powers. Ephialtes and Pericles reduced the scope of its function.
Ares. The Greek god of war, a son of Zeus and Hera. He was a lover of Aphrodite, by whom he had several children, but he also had various other mistresses. Probably Thracian in origin, Ares had no characteristics except belligerence, and, therefore, was rather disapproved of by the Greeks.

Aretino, Pietro (1492-1556). Italian Renaissance author. Aretino is famous throughout Europe for the volume and audacity of his writings. A self-styled Scourge of Princes, he aimed his satire at the powerful men of his day, but primarily at its social customs and literary pretensions. He was honored by princes and popes, and a friend of artists such as Titian, who painted Aretino’s portrait. Among his many works—letters, dialogues, poems, comedies and tragedies—are both lascivious sonnets and a book on Christ. His best-known work is the comedy La cortigiana (Life at Court), written in 1525.

Arévalo Martinez, Rafael (1884— ). Guatemalan novelist and poet. Though little is known of it, Arévalo’s life has been apparently as bizarre as some of his writing; he was reported dead in 1920, only to turn up as director of Guatemala’s National Library. He is best known as the creator of the “psychozoological” story. The most famous of these is El Hombre que Parecía un Caballo (1915), a Kafka-esque tale whose protagonist, modeled on a Colombian poet, resembles a splendid race horse, not only physically but, also, in his lack of moral sense. His other words include Las Rosas de Engadi (1927), a collection of verse, and El Mundo de los Maharachias (1938), which deals with a shipwrecked traveller who finds himself in the land of the Maharachias, monkey-like beings superior to men.

Argalia. The brother of Angelica, the princess of Cathay who comes to sow discord in Charlemagne’s court in the Orlando poems of Boiardo and Ariosto. In Boiardo’s poem he is killed, but his horse Rabicane remains in the plot of Ariosto’s version.

Argan. The hypochondriacal central character in Molière’s comedy Le Malade Imaginaire. He attempts to marry his daughter Angélique to a doctor, in order to avoid the expense of apothecary’s bills. At the conclusion of the play he is made a mock doctor in a burlesque ceremony of investiture, conducted in macaronic Latin.

Argante (Argantes). One of the two leading warriors among the infidels opposing the Crusaders in Tasso’s GERUSALEMME LIBERATA. His death at the hands of Tancred precipitates the conquest of the holy city by Goffredo (Godfrey), the commander of the Christian armies.

Argillano. In the Tasso epic GERUSALEMME LIBERATA an Italian Crusader among the Christian forces assaulting Jerusalem. When rumor reaches Argillano that the champion Rinaldo of Este is dead, he leads a revolt against the authority of Goffredo, the Christian commander who had caused Rinaldo to leave them in anger. Later, to amend for his rebellion, he plunges vigorously into battle and finds a noble death at the hands of Solimano, the Turkish king. Rinaldo eventually avenges Argillano’s memory with the slaying of Solimano.

Argo. The galley, built by Argus, that carried Jason and the Argonauts in search of the Golden Fleece. It was reputed to have been the first seagoing vessel.

Argonautica. See APOLLONIUS OF RHODES; ARGONAUTS.

Argonauts. A group of mythological heroes. They sailed to Colchis to recover the Golden Fleece. Jason had demanded the throne of Iolcos from Pelias, who had usurped it from his brother Aeson, Jason’s father. Pelias agreed, if Jason would first return the Fleece to Greece. Those who joined Jason in this adventure included Heracles, Orpheus, Castor and Polydeuces, Peleus, Melampus, Mopsus, Melesger, Atlantis, Admetus, the winged sons of Aeolus, Calais and Zetes, the lynx-eyed Lynceus and his quarrelsome brother Idas, Telamon, Pelias’ own son Acastus, and many others. Argus built their ship, the Argo, under Athene’s direction, and Hera aided them throughout the voyage so as to punish Pelias for refusing to worship her.

Their first stop was Lemnos, where the women, lonely after having killed their husbands a year before, vainly entreated them to stay. They were hospitably received by the Doliones, but killed their king Cyclicus by mistake. In Mycia, when Heracles’ beautiful young favorite Hylas was drowned in a spring by a love-struck naiad, Heracles would not give up the search for Hylas and had to be left behind. The Argonauts were challenged to box by Amycus, king of the Bebryces, who had killed many strangers in this manner. Polydeuces accepted the challenge and quickly killed Amycus. At Salmydessus they saw blind old King Phineus whose days were made miserable by the Harpies; they stole or befouled his food before he could eat—a punishment for his having revealed too much, as a seer, of the ways of Zeus. Zetes and Calais saved him by pursuing the Harpies until Iris promised that they would not return. In gratitude, Phineus gave the Argonauts much useful advice.

With the help of this advice and of Athene, they passed through the Clashing Rocks, which usually sprang together to crush ships between them. Later, shouts and the clashing of shields drove off the birds of Ares, which attacked them with a hail of sharp plumes. By a happy chance they saved the four sons of Phrixus from shipwreck and were led by them to their home, Colchis, where King Aeetes kept the Fleece. The cruel Aeetes promised to relinquish the Fleece if Jason could pass a test: he must plow a field with two fire-breathing bulls, sow dragon’s teeth, and fight the armed men who would spring up (see also SPARTI). Jason succeeded with the secret aid of Aeetes’ daughter Medea, who had fallen in love with him. Aeetes refused to honor his promise, but Medea lulled to sleep the dragon that guarded the Fleece and escaped with the Argonauts.

They were pursued, but escaped again when Jason and Medea treacherously slew her half-brother Apsyrtus and (according to some versions) flung pieces of his body from the ship. Zeus ordained that the Argonauts suffer many hardships for this outrage before reaching home. Making their way via the Danube, Rhine, and Rhone to the Mediterranean, they reached the island of Aea, where Circe, Aeetes’ sister, purified Jason and Medea of murder. Thetis helped them past the Wandering Rocks; the singing of Orpheus got them safely past the Sirens. While they were entertained by the Phaenicians, Queen Arete secretly arranged the marriage of Jason and

Blown to the coast of Africa, they were marooned with their ship in the desert, but they were helped or encouraged by Libyan nymphs, by the Hesperides, and by the god Triton. As they neared Crete, the bronze giant Talus nearly crushed their ship with rocks, but was destroyed by Medea's sorcery. The Argonauts returned to Iolcos, where a trick of Medea's disposed of Pelias and, Aeson having died, Acastus became king. Jason returned the Fleece to the temple of Laphystinian Zeus in Orchomenus.

Next to the Trojan War, the voyage of the Argo was the event most often celebrated in Greek epic. It is the subject in particular of the Argonautica, the masterpiece of Apollonius of Rhodes, which is notable for the psychological realism with which its characters are treated, its memorable picture of Medea, and its remarkably unheroic portrayal of its hero, Jason.

Arguedas, Alcides (1879–1946). Bolivian novelist, historian, and diplomat. Although Arguedas spent many years in Europe, especially in France where he was Bolivian consul, his best-known writings reflect his abiding concern with the problems of his homeland. He is remembered primarily for three works, each in a different field. Pueblo enfermo (1909) is a pessimistic and controversial analysis of Bolivian society. One of the most famous of the Indianist novels, Rasa de bronze (1919) describes the exploitation of Bolivian Indians by inhuman landlords. Arguedas' most enduring work may be his five-volume Historia de Bolivia (1920–1929), which covers that country's history from 1809 to 1872.

Argus (Argos). A fabulous creature. According to Greek mythology, Argus had 100 eyes, for which he was called Panoptes. Hera set him to watch Io, of whom she was jealous. Hermes, however, acting under orders of Zeus, who had his eye on Io, charmed Argus to sleep and slew him. Hera changed Argus into a peacock, whose tail was full of eyes. "Argus-eyed," therefore, means jealously watchful.

Argus (Argos). The builder of the ship Argo for the Argonauts. He was assisted by Athene.

Argyropoulos, Johannes (1410–1490). Greek scholar in Italy during the revival of classical studies. He taught at Florence and Rome, was a member of the Medici circle, and engaged in the translation and the editing of texts.

Ariadne. In Greek mythology, daughter of Minos, king of Crete. She gave Theseus a clew of thread to guide him out of the Cretan Labyrinth. Theseus married his deliverer, but when he arrived at Naxos forsook her. Later she became the wife of Dionysus. It is generally agreed that Ariadne was the name of a Cretan mother-goddess. Richard Strauss wrote an opera called ARIADNE AUF NAXOS (1912;rev. 1916). An opera by Richard Strauss, with a libretto by Hugo von Hofmannsthal. It was originally intended as an interlude to be introduced into a performance of Molière's Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme. In it a serious drama about Bacchus and Ariadne is played simultaneously with the improvisations of a commedia dell'arte troupe. For the Vienna performance of 1916 Strauss wrote a long Prologue so that the opera could be performed independently of the play.

Arians. The followers of Arius, a presbyter of the church of Alexandria, in the 4th century. He maintained (1) that the Father and Son are distinct beings; (2) that the Son, though divine, is not equal to the Father; (3) that the Son had a state of existence previous to His appearance on earth, but not from eternity; and (4) that the Messiah was not real man, but a divine being in a case of flesh. The Arian tenets varied from time to time and also among their different sections. The heresy was formally anathematized at the Council of Nicaea (325), but the sect was not, and never has been, wholly extinguished. See also ATHANASIUS.

Aridano. In the ORLANDO INNAMORATO of Bolando a giant who guards the treasure of the witch Morgana at the bottom of a lake. Orlando kills him and seizes the treasure.

Ariel. A sprite in Shakespeare's THE TEMPEST. Ariel has been freed by Prospero from a pine rift in which he was imprisoned by the evil witch Sycorax. Invisible at will, all light and spirit, he seems to symbolize man's imagination. After serving Prospero faithfully, Ariel is at last freed when his master renounces his magic.

Ariel (1900). An essay by José Enrique Rodó, which had a tremendous impact on Hispanic American intellectuals. Rodó appealed to the youth of Spanish America to aspire to the spirituality, idealism, and rationality symbolized by Shakespeare's Ariel and to reject the brutality and sensuality represented by Caliban. Because Rodó censured U.S. materialism and utilitarianism in the essay, many readers erroneously assumed that he was pitting Anglo-Saxon crassness against Latin idealism. The essay is, however, a generalized guide for the future.

Arioch. In Milton's PARADISE LOST, one of the fallen angels. The word means "a fierce lion"; Milton took it from Dan. 2:14, where it is the name of a man.

Ariodante (Ariodantes). The beloved of Ginevra in Ariosto's ORLANDO FURioso. The blame for his supposed suicide because of her infidelity is placed on her hands and she is doomed unless rescued by a champion. Rinaldo saves her and she is reunited with Ariodante, who is alive and arrives to defend her, when his identity is revealed.

Arion. A Greek poet and musician. He flourished about 700 B.C. According to legend, he was cast into the sea by mariners, but carried to Taenaros on the back of a dolphin.

Arion. A horse born of the union of Poseidon and Demeter. His magical swiftness saved his master ADRASTUS, the only one of the Seven Against Thebes to escape alive from the siege of Thebes.

Ariosto, Lodovico (1474–1533). Italian poet. He was born at Reggio, in Modena, and served the Este family of Ferrara for most of his life. His poems, satires, and learned plays were popular and respected in his day, but his masterpiece remains the ORLANDO FURIOSO (Roland Mado). A continuation of BOIARDO'S ORLANDO INNAMORATO (Roland in Love, 1495), it is a long narrative poem in octave stanzas dealing with the adventures of Roland and other knights of Charlemagne in wars against the Saracens.

Aristaeus (Aristaios). In classical mythology the son of Apollo and Cyrene. He was the god-hero protector of cattle and fruit trees. Aristaeus had offended the nymphs by pursuing Eurydice, the wife of Orpheus, who in her flight had been bitten by a serpent and died. In revenge the nymphs destroyed his bee hives, but, when he had propitiated them, new bees swarmed from a rotting carcass. He was the father of Actaeon by Autonoe.

Aristarchus (fl. 156 B.C.). Aristarchus of Samothrace, the greatest critic of antiquity and head of the Alexandrian library. His labors were chiefly directed to the Iliad and Odyssey of Homer. He divided them into 24 books each, marked every doubtful line with an obelus, and every one he considered especially beautiful with an asterisk.

Aristides (Aristeides; 530–468 B.C.). An Athenian statesman and general. He is called "The Just" for his impartiality and honesty, which have become proverbial. According to tradition, an illiterate Athenian once came to Aristides, whom he did not recognize, and asked him to write the name of Aristides on a ballot demanding his ostracism from the state. The man explained that he had grown tired of hearing Aristides forever called "The Just." Without revealing his identity, Aristides wrote his own name.

Aristides of Miletus. See Mileian Fables.

Aristippus (Aristippos; c. 435–c. 356 B.C.). Greek philosopher, pupil of Socrates. Aristippus founded the Cyrenaic School, named after his birthplace, Cyrene. This school, similar to the Epicurean, holds that pleasure is the goal of life, and that prudence should be exercised to avoid pain.

Aristophanes (445 B.C.–c. 380 B.C.). A Greek comic playwright. Little is known of Aristophanes' life except that his first produced play won a second prize when he was only 18, and he continued to write fine comedies at a rate of about one a year for more than 20 years. His last two extant plays, Ecclesiazusae (392) and Plutus (388), were produced after the fall of Athens in 404 B.C. Perhaps because it was no longer possible for him to criticize the state freely, these comedies are considerably inferior to his earlier works.

Aristophanes was a brilliant if somewhat wide-swinging social satirist, who used the traditional freedom of Old Comedy to ridicule public figures, institutions, and even the gods. His favorite butts were the demagogue Cleon, whom he attacked in The Knights and several other plays, and Euripides, who was lampooned in The Frogs and Thesmophoriazœ. Socrates is the victim in The Clouds, in which Aristophanes inaccurately and unfairly makes him a wily sophist, who teaches men to chest others through cunning argumentation. It is apparent that the playwright was conservative in his views, disproving of Euripides' humanizing of the gods and heroes, of modern trends in music and philosophy, and of the war with Sparta, whose rigid traditionalism he may even have admired. As a practical writer of comedy, however, he also knew that it is easier to draw laughter by ridiculing newfangled fads than by pointing out absurdities in modes of behavior that are generally accepted.

Another indication of the license permitted Old Comedy is the open but never prurient obscenity of the plays, a custom that began with their origin in one aspect of the fertility rites of Dionysus. (Aristophanes' eleven plays are the only surviving examples of the genre.) It is all the more striking that Aristophanes does not hesitate to make Dionysus, the patron of the dramatic festivals, an absurd figure in The Frogs, or to give men the upper hand over the gods in The Birds.

Aristophanes was the most imaginatively original of the Greek playwrights, in that, while they wrote of (supposedly) historical figures, he invented not only completely new characters and situations but even entire worlds out of whole cloth. He was also a fine poet who wrote delicate and charming lyrics in his choral songs. His masterpiece, The Birds, is a remarkable example of both these outstanding qualities. In it he creates a delightfully improbable kingdom of birds and men, Cloudcuckooland, and his characters, both feathered and otherwise, sing one lovely lyric after another all through the play. Unfortunately for modern audiences, some of the qualities that make Aristophanes' comedies successful are difficult or impossible to reproduce in modern English: his poetry, his topical satire, and his knack for puns and garbled literary allusions. In spite of this, his comic genius was so universal that a great deal of the humor of his plays still comes through.

Aristophanes of Byzantium (fl. 195 B.C.). A leading critic, head of the Alexandrian library. He is known for his editing of the works of Homer, and for devising, or at least standardizing, the accents since used in the Greek language. These accents were intended for the benefit of foreigners learning Greek, a language that all educated people were expected to know in the days of the Roman empire.

Aristotelian units. See UNITIES.

Aristotle (Aristoteles; 384–322 B.C.). Greek philosopher, born at Stagira. Brought up in a family of moderate wealth and position, Aristotle went at the age of 18 to Athens to study in Plato's Academy, where he remained for 20 years, until the death of his teacher. He moved to Assos, then to Mytilene, then to Macedon, whence he was invited by King Philip to tutor the young Alexander. Aristotle remained in Macedonia for eight years, until Philip was assassinated (336 B.C.) and Alexander succeeded to the throne. During the time he spent in Assos, Mytilene, and Macedon, much of Aristotle's work in natural history was done. On his return to Athens, he taught at the Lyceum. Finally, in 323 B.C., at Alexander's death, Aristotle left Athens, where there was an upsurge of anti-Macedonian feeling, and retired to Chalced, where he died a year later.

The works for which he was most widely known among the ancients have been lost, but fragments indicate that they were dialogues written in a highly polished rhetorical style. These are referred to as his exoteric writings, or those designed for the general public outside his school. A second class of writings, the esoteric, or those designed for use by the students of the Lyceum, has survived. These are called the acroamatic writings, and are known to us as the treatises of Aristotle. A third class of writings, the hypomnematic, or memoranda, have also been lost.

The treatises include first the logical works (Categories, Topics, De Interpretatione, Prior Analytics, Posterior Analytics, Sophistical Refutations) known as the Organon, or instrument. For Aristotle, logic was preparation for scientific knowledge, not knowledge itself. He was the first to insist on rigorous scientific procedure, and his method of demonstration by the syllogism and by dialectic, or reasoning from the opinions of others, became standard philosophic method. Aristotle maintained that all human knowledge originates in sensible experiences, out of which the soul perceives the universal.

Aristotle's natural philosophy, contained in the eight books of the Physics, examines the physical universe. They include the important distinction between the substance (or essence) of a thing and its accidental properties. Other works in this group include On the Heavens (De Caelo), On Coming into Being and Passing Away (De Generatione et Corruptione), and Meteorology (Meteorologic). Parva Naturalia and De Anima are the titles of his works on psychology. He wrote an introduction to biology called Historia Animalium, in which he classified the animals, their methods of reproduction, and their evolution. In his treatises on metaphysics, known as Metaphysica, Aristotle discusses theology, or primary philosophy, which he considered the highest type of theoretical science. Unlike his teacher Plato he did not posit a separate world of perfect Forms or Ideas, but always finds form immanent in matter.

There are two Aristotelian ethical treatises, known as the Nicomachean Ethics and the Eudemian Ethics. According to the former, happiness is the goal of life. Pleasure, fame, and wealth, however, will not bring one of the highest happiness, which is achieved only through the contemplation of philosophic truth because it exercises man's peculiar virtue, the rational principle.

In Aristotle's Politics (eight books), the good of the individual is identified with the good of the city-state. The study of human good is thus a political inquiry, as it is in Plato. Aristotle discusses different types of government, finally preferring monarchy, an aristocracy of men of virtue, or constitutional government of the majority. Slavery is considered natural in Aristotle's politics, because some men are adapted by nature to be the physical instruments of others. Aristotle's Rhetoric treats methods of persuasion; the Poetics is his great contribution to literary criticism.

Called by Dante "the master of those who know," Aristotle mastered every field of learning known to the Greeks. His influence on St. Thomas Aquinas and the medieval world, through the translation of the Arabic scholar Averroes, was profound and enduring.

Arius (c. 256-336). Greek ecclesiastic. He lived and taught in Alexandria. His teachings on the nature of God constitute what is called the Arian heresy or Arianism. Arius felt that God is separate from the world, alone and unknowable. He taught that Jesus was a mortal, created being, not fully divine, and as such should be worshiped as secondary to God. At the church councils of Nicaea (325) and Constantinople (381), Arius and his followers were condemned as teachers of false doctrine. See Arianism.

Ark of the Covenant. A wooden chest (possibly a model of a temple) overlaid with gold in which the presence of Jehovah was believed to dwell when communicating with Israel. The Ark was portable and was carried into battle. Its contents are thought to have been the stone tablets recording the law as given to Moses. It was installed in the Holy of Holies of Solomon’s temple at Jerusalem. The fate of the original Ark is not known: it disappeared after the fall of Jerusalem in 586 B.C.

Arlequin. See Harlequin.

Armada, Spanish. Also know as the Invincible Armada. The fleet assembled in 1588 by Philip II of Spain for the conquest of England. The armada, which consisted of some 130 ships and carried over 30,000 troops, set sail from Lisbon on May 29 under the command of the duke of Medina Sidonia. Its destination was the Netherlands, where the fleet was to pick up an army under Alexander Farnese, the duke of Parma, and transport it across the channel for an invasion of England.

After being forced by a storm to put in at Corunna for repairs, the armada was sighted by the English near Plymouth on July 29. Medina Sidonia, who was under orders to sail directly to the Netherlands, retired before the lighter and more maneuverable ships of the English fleet, suffering several losses, until he anchored at Calais on Aug. 6. Farnese’s army, hemmed in by the Dutch fleet, was unable to stir. On Aug. 7, the English sent fire ships among the Spanish vessels, forcing them to flee. The following day the bitterest engagement of the campaign was fought off Gravelines, the Spaniards being bested by the gunnery of the combined English and Dutch fleets. A favorable change of wind enabled the armada to make for the North Sea and return to Spain by sailing around Scotland and Ireland, where severe storms caused further losses. The Spaniards lost over 63 ships and 9000 men in the campaign, and Spanish prestige suffered a severe blow.

Amaro, Don Adriano de. A fantastic Spanish knight in Shakespeare’s Love’s Labour’s Lost. A posturing, self-important fellow, given to absurd rhetoric, he is a satire on the popular Spanish knight of the Elizabethan era.

Armageddon. The name given in The Revelation of St. John the Divine (Rev. 16:16) to the site of the last great battle between good and evil before the Day of Judgment; hence, any great final struggle or conflict. Theodore Roosevelt popularized the term in connection with his break from the Republicans to form the Progressive Party in the presidential election of 1912. It has been frequently used in connection with the First World War.

arne Heinrich, Der. See Heinrich, Der Arme Armida. In Tasso’s Gerusalemme Liberata, a beautiful sorceress, niece of the enchanter Idracote, sent by him to the Christian camp in hopes of sowing discord and confusion there. In the camp,
She tells Goffredo, general of the Crusaders, a tearful story and requests ten of his knights to assist her in reclaiming her own lost kingdom. In the arguments that follow, Goffredo's leadership is severely tested, and more than ten of his most pious knights fly after her. For a time she holds in her power the Christian champion Tancred, who is rescued by Rinaldo of Este, himself soon a captive victim of her charms. When Rinaldo, whom she loves, is also rescued, Armida sets fire to her palace and flies in her chariot to the camp of the Egyptians, where she offers herself to any champion who will kill Rinaldo. In the final battle for Jerusalem she is put to flight by Rinaldo; she then tries to kill herself, but he persuades her to live and trust her future to him:

"Behold," she says, "thy handmaid; I obey: Thy lips my future life, thy will my fortune sway!"

Armida's Garden. The enchantress Armida, of Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata, lives in a castle that contains a garden of gorgeous sensual delights, from lush flowers and fruits to alluring nymphs bathing in fountains. It symbolizes the attractions of the senses and their power over human reason. As such, it links Armida with Circe and Alcina and is the inspiration of Spenser's Bower of Bliss.

Armida's Girdle. The enchantress Armida, of Tasso's Gerusalemme Liberata, wears a magical girdle of incomparable beauty and worth. The source of many of her powers, it enables her to know and do whatever she wills.

Arminianism. A religious heresy, opposed to Calvinism. It began in Holland in the early 17th century and then spread to England and the colonies in America. It denied the leading Calvinistic tenets that only the elect were to benefit by the sacrifice of Christ's death, and that the human will was powerless to reject or to forfeit divine grace once it had been received; it also opposed the doctrine of absolute predestination. Jonathan Edwards violently attacked Arminianism in America.

Arminius, probably the Latin form of Hermann (18 B.C.-A.D. 21). Hero-chiefain of the Germanic Cherusci tribe. Although he served in the Roman army for a while, he came home to find his people suffering under Roman dominion, and in A.D. 9 won a crushing victory over the Roman governor Varus. He was finally defeated by Germanicus in A.D. 16. His exploits survive in popular legend and in plays such as G. F. Klopstock's Hermanns Schlacht (1769) and Hermann und die Fürsten (1784).

Armory Show. An exhibition of American and European modern art held in the 69th Regiment Armory, New York City in 1913. Among the organizers and contributors were Arthur Davies and John Sloan. At this show American's got their first look at the revolutionary work of such artists as Matisse, Kandinsky, Brancusi, Maillol, Picasso, and Braque. The painting that most attracted public attention was Marcel Duchamp's Nu Descending a Staircase, which one critic renamed "explosion in a shingle factory." In general, the conservative art critics were hostile to the show, especially to the foreign works that were much more extreme than those from the U.S. The public, however, flocked to the show: over 250,000 people paid to see the wild-looking European painting and sculpture. A few were conscious at once of what the Armory Show implied for art in America: modern art had arrived full-fledged from Europe, and it was in the U.S. to stay.

In the winter of 1963, the 50th anniversary of the Armory Show was celebrated in the same building. All of the works hung in the original show that could be traced were re-exhibited, most of those jeered at in 1913 being now considered masterpieces despite their modish appearance.

Arms and the Man (1894). A play by George Bernard Shaw. Set in Bulgaria, it satirizes romantic attitudes about war. The title is taken from the first line of Vergil's Aeneid: Arma virumque cano (I sing of arms and the man). The libretto of the comic opera The Chocolate Soldier (1909) by Oskar Strauss was unofficially based on the play.

Armstrong, John (1709-1779). Scottish poet and physician. He is noted for his didactic, blank-verse poem, Art of Preserving Health (1744).

Arnauld, Antoine (1612-1694). French writer and theologian. A Jansenist and a bitter opponent of all that he took to be false doctrine, Arnauld was a lifelong opponent of the Jesuits. A storm of controversy arose over his exposition of Jansenism in La Fréquente Communion (The Frequent Communion, 1643). La Perpétuité de la foi de l'église catholique touchant l'Eucharistie (The Perpetuity of the Faith of the Catholic Church Regarding the Eucharist, 1669-1676), written in collaboration with Pierre Nicole, criticized the Calvinist conception of the Eucharist, and the Traité des vraies et des fausses idées (Treatise on True and False Ideas, 1683) demolished the pantheistical philosophy of Malebranche.

Lettre à un due et pair (Letter to a Duke and Peer, 1655), Arnauld's outspoken criticism of Jesuit practices in the confessional, brought about his condemnation by the Sorbonne, which in turn caused Pascal to write the Lettres Provinciales. Forced into hiding for almost 20 years of his life, Arnauld died in exile.

Arnauld-d'Andilly, Angélique. Known as Mère Angélique de Saint Jean (1624-1684). French nun and writer. Mistress of the novices at Port-Royal-de-Paris when the community was disbanded by order of the archbishop of Paris in 1664, she was moved to another convent and confined to a solitary cell without sacraments. She described her sufferings in the Relation de Captivité (Account of Captivity, 1760). From 1678 until her death she was abbess of Port-Royal-des-Champs.

Arndt, Ernst Moritz (1769-1850). German patriotic poet of great importance during Germany's wars of liberation from Napoleon (1813-1815). His most famous collection is Lieder für Deutsche (Songs for Germans, 1813), which includes the well-known song Der Gott, der Eisen wachsen liess (The God Who Made Iron Grow).

Arne, Thomas Augustine (1710-1778). English composer of operas, masques, and scores for plays. He wrote an English grand opera Artaxerxes, a score for Milton's Comus, and songs for revivals of As you like it (1740) and The Tempest (1746). His patriotic song Rule Britannia is from the music for the masque Alfred (1740).

Arnim, Elisabeth ("Bettina") von, born Brentano (1875-1859). Wife of Achim von Arnim, sister of Clemens Brentano. In her youth she was a fervent admirer of Goethe, and her correspondence with the poet, Goethes Briefwechsel mit einem Kinde (Goethe’s Correspondence with a Child, 1835) reveals the perfect emotional purity of her nature. Her Dies Buch gehört dem König (This Book Belongs to the King, 1843) is a naive plea for royal assistance to alleviate poor economic and social conditions among the Silesian weavers.

Arnim, Ludwig Joachim ("Achim") von (1781-1831). German romantic poet. He was a close friend of Clemens Brentano, whose sister he married in 1811. With Brentano, he edited the folk-songs collection Der Knaben Wunderhorn. His unfinished novel Die Kronenwächter (The Guardians of the Crown, 1817), about 16th-century Germany, is important in the development of the German historical novel. See German Romanticism.

Arnim, Gräfin von. See Elizabeth, Countess Russell.

Arnold, Benedict (1741-1801). American army officer and traitor. Beginning his career as a patriot, Arnold led the attack with Ethan Allen on Fort Ticonderoga, N.Y. (1775), and he is now generally given credit for winning the important battle of Saratoga (1777). He was given command of the fort at West Point by Washington, but, embittered by repeated slights from Congress and other Americans, he arranged for its surrender to the British, and was made a brigadier general in the British army. After the war he sailed to England, where he died. He appears in William Dunlap’s play André (1798) and in Kenneth Roberts’ novel Arundel (1930). See John André; Horatio Gates.

Arnold, Sir Edwin (1832-1904). English poet, journalist, translator, and traveler. A student of Indian languages, Persian, and Turkish, Arnold traveled widely in the Orient. His best-known work, The Light of Asia (1879), is an epic poem on the life of Buddha; many of his other poems also deal with Eastern themes. He was the author of a number of translations of Oriental literature, including The Indian Song of Songs (1875) and Indian Idyls (1893).

Arnold, Matthew (1822-1888). English critic and poet. The son of Thomas Arnold, the clergyman who became headmaster of Rugby and made it one of England’s most renowned public schools, young Arnold began his literary career as a poet, publishing The Strayed Reveller and Other Poems (1849); Empedocles on Etna and Other Poems (1852); Poems (1853); Poems, Second Series (1855); Merope, a dramatic poem (1858); and New Poems (1867). His poetry tends to be elegiac and brooding, and at its best is among the finest expressions of the plight of the sensitive Victorian caught between "two worlds, one dead,/ The other powerless to be born." His most famous poems are The Scholar-Gypsy, based on a legend of an Oxford student who, in poverty, joined a band of gypsies; Stanza from the Grande Chartreuse (1855), in which the narrator, visiting a Carthusian monastery, mourns the loss of faith in the modern world; Thyris (1866), an elegy written on the death of Arnold’s friend Arthur Hugh Clough, which Swinburne adjudged, after Milton’s Lycidas and Shelley’s Adonais, the finest elegy in the English language; and Dover Beach (1867), perhaps his best-known poem, which uses the image of the sea as a metaphor for the Sea of Faith, ebbing away from the naked shores of the world.

In 1857, Arnold was elected to the professorship of poetry at Oxford, and during the 10 years that he held this position he delivered many of the lectures that were to become part of his essays on criticism. The best-known collections of these are On Translating Homer (1861); Essays in Criticism (1st series, 1865; 2nd series, 1888); Culture and Anarchy (1869); and Literature and Dogma (1873). Seeing literature as both shaper and sustainer of the highest elements of culture, he urged that the great mass of the public—the "Philistine" middle class—be educated to improve its response to literature (and culture). He argued for high standards of literary judgment, using the "lines and expressions of the great masters . . . as a touchstone to other poetry." He believed that the English were too immersed in the spirit of "Hebraism," or strictness of conscience and rightness of conduct, and not sufficiently touched by the symmetry and spontaneity of "Hellenism"; he saw religious fundamentalism as one expression of this Hebraism, and attempted to interpret the Bible as literature and show that, as in all great poetry, the poetry of the Bible contained the moral and spiritual truths that were the essence of religion. He saw the task of the critic as "a disinterested endeavor to learn and propagate the best that is known and thought in the world." He is of importance as a shaper of both English and American criticism, up to the time of T. S. Eliot. See Arminius von Thun-Derentronckh.

Arnold, Thomas (1795-1842). English educator, historian, and headmaster of Rugby (1828-1842). The father of Matthew Arnold, he is often referred to as "Arnold of Rugby," being chiefly remembered for his tenure there as headmaster, where he exerted great personal influence and set the modern pattern for the entire English public-school system. His literary works include a collection of sermons (1829-1834), an edition of Thucydides (1830-1835), a history of Rome (3 vols., 1838-1843), and Lectures on Modern History (1842).

Arnold of Brescia (c. 1100-1155). Italian theologian and reformer. He was persecuted by St. Bernard of Clairvaux as being a follower of Pierre Abelard’s Aristotelian philosophy. A preacher of asceticism, he rallied against the wealth and temporal power of the clergy, and in 1145 encouraged a revolution in Rome against the Pope’s civil authority. In 1155 the rebellion was suppressed and Arnold was hanged, then burned.

Arnolphe. In Molière’s comedy, L’Ecole des Femmes, a man of wealth with stern ideas on the proper training of girls to make good wives. He applies his educational methods to Agrès whom, in time, he intends to make his wife.

Arnothy, Christine (1928— ). Hungarian-born French novelist. She won notice with the autobiographical I am Fifteen and I Don’t Want to Die (1956), about a Hungarian family escaping the Russian siege of Budapest. The sequel, It is Not Easy to Live (1957), moves through refugee camp experiences to marriage in Paris. Her novels include God Is Late (1955), The Charlatan (1959), and The Serpent’s Bite (1961).

Arroux, Mme Marie. One of the main characters in the novel L’Éducation Sentimentale by Gustave Flaubert. Frédéric Moreau suffers the passion of art for Mme Arroux during the years of her marriage. In an ironic conclusion, when a middle-aged widow she comes to him, Frédéric rejects her offer of love.

Arouet, François Marie. See Voltaire.

Around the World in Eighty Days (Le Tour du monde en quatre-vingts jours; 1873). A romance by Jules Verne. The hero, Phileas Fogg, undertakes his hasty world tour as the result of a bet made at his London club. He and his French valet Passepartout meet with some fantastic adventures, but these are overcome by the loyal servant, and the endlessly inventive Fogg. The feat they perform is incredible for its day; Fogg wins his bet, having circled the world in only 80 days.

Arp, Hans. Also known as Jean Arp (1887– ). German poet and sculptor. As a sculptor he is best known for his use of suble, curved forms. With Hugo Ball and others he founded the Dada Cabaret Voltaire in Zürich (1916). A recent selection of his poetry is entitled Worteigüne und schwarze Sterne (Word-Dreams and Black Stars, 1953).

Arrow of Gold, The (1919). A novel by Joseph Conrad. It is a story of romance and adventure during the Second Carlist War. Conrad himself, when he was about 20, had been involved at the fringe of these events.

Arrowsmith (1925). A novel by Sinclair Lewis. It follows the career of Dr. Martin Arrowsmith from his training under Max Gottlieb, a small-town practice, the health department of a small city, an “institute” sponsored by a rich man and his wife, to an isolated West Indian island and an equally isolated Vermont farm. In his quest for pure science, Arrowsmith encounters meanness, corruption, and misunderstanding; he is often frustrated, and finally fails when he himself refuses to carry his principles to their logical extreme. Filled with medical lore, the details of which Lewis got from Paul de Kruif, the novel is frequently satiric and caused much controversy when it was first published.

‘Arry and ‘Arriet. Two characters from the pages of the English Punch. ‘Arty, a good-natured but vulgar costermonger, and his wife ‘Arriet were the creation of the Punch artist Edwin J. Milliken. ‘Arry made his debut in ‘Punch’s Almanac of 1874 in ‘Arry on the black.

Ars Amatoria, or Ars Amoris. See Ovid.

Arsenal at Springfield, The (1845). A poem by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. A poem about peace, its theme was suggested by his wife.

Arsetics ( Ars Arse). In the GERUSALEMME LIBERATA of Tasso, a eunuch, custodian of the warrior maid Clorinda. He had been given the child by her mother, the Ethiopian queen, who feared that its white complexion would arouse the suspicions of King Senàpo (Senapus). Arsète neglects to baptize her, despite her Christian parentage, but he tells her the story of her birth before the battle that results in her death at the hands of her beloved Tancred. The latter baptizes her and receives her forgiveness as she dies in his arms.

Arsinoê. (1) The false prude of Molière’s comedy Le Misanthrope.

(2) The scheming stepmother in Pierre Corneille’s tragedy Nicomède.

Ars Poetica (Lat., “the art of poetry”). A treatise by the Roman poet Horace, laying down rules for the writing of poetry. English critics of the Renaissance and post-Renaissance periods were greatly influenced by this work.

Artabano (Artabane). In the GERUSALEMME LIBERATA of Tasso, a Saracen king who leads the African forces against the Crusaders during the battle for the holy city. His death at hands of the English baron Odoardo (Edward), takes place in the last canto of the poem.

Artagnan, Charles de Baatz d’. One of the famous guardsmen whose amazing adventures Alexandre Dumas narrates in T H E T H R E E MUSKETEERS, TWENTY YEARS AFTER, and T H E V I S C O U N T O F B R A G E L L O N E. The works follow d’Artagnan through his various exploits to his death as Comte d’Artagnan, marshal of France. He is always the soldier—quick-witted, quick-tempered, and extraordinarily brave.

Artaud, Antonin (1895-1948). French dramatic theorist and producer. Artaud influenced many playwrights by urging that the theater should translate experience into universal and primitive images, as explained in The Theater of Cruelty (1935) and The Theater and Its Double (1938).

Artegal or Arthgall. See Elidure; FAERIE QUEENE, THE.

Artemidorus. In Shakespeare’s JULIUS CAESAR, a teacher of rhetoric who tries to warn Caesar of the plot against him. He passes Caesar a note naming the conspirators, but Caesar fails to read it.

Artemis. Greek goddess of hunting and childbirth, daughter of Leto and sister of Apollo. Perhaps originally a Cretan goddess of fertility, she came to be regarded as a virgin, who demanded chastity from her female attendants, and even her male devotees, such as HIPPOLYTUS. Her attendants (who were either local goddesses or local versions of Artemis herself) included HECATIE, CALLISTO, OPIS, BRITOMARTIS, and the mortal Iphigenia. She figures importantly in Euripides’ plays HIPPOLYTUS and Iphigenia in Aulis (see IPHIGENIA).

Artemis of Ephesus, temple of. One of the SEVEN WONDERS OF THE ANCIENT WORLD. It contained a famous statue of the goddess—a cone surmounted by a bust covered with breasts—which was said to have fallen from Heaven. However, Minucius, in the second century A.D., described it as a wooden statue, and Pliny, a contemporary, claimed that it was made of ebony. As Diana of the Ephesians, this goddess, who bears a somewhat doubtful relationship to the Greek Artemis, appears in an episode in Acts 19:24-28.

art for art’s sake. English equivalent of the French L’art pour l’art, which itself derives from Edgar Allan Poe in The Poetic Principle:

There neither exists nor can exist any work more thoroughly dignified ... than the poem which is a poem and nothing more—the poem written solely for the poem’s sake.

The doctrine which this represents, that the aim of art should be creation and the perfection of technical expression rather than the service of a moral, political, or didactic end, had been evolving ever since the romantic period. It was adumbrated by Coleridge and given early expression by Poe in the above treatise, flowered among the French symbolists poets and their English associate Walter Pater, and reached its culmination in surrealism and the aesthetic theory of T. A. Richards. It was the dominant theory of art and especially of poetry until the 1930's, when the proletarian and Marxist movements in literature threatened for a time to revive the 18th-century didactic theories. After the beginning of World War II in 1939, the latter movements began to lose much of their influence.

Artful Dodger, the. A young thief in Charles Dickens' Oliver Twist, pupil of Fagin. He became perfectly adept in villainy, and pickpocketing especially.

Arthur. The hero of a great cycle of medieval romance (see Arthurian legend). There was a historical Arthur, a Celtic chieftain who lived in Wales during the 6th century. Little is known of him except that he was mortally wounded (according to the Annales Cambriae) in the battle of Camlan and was taken to Glastonbury where he died. However, while elements of the historical Arthur have been infused into the medieval romances, evidence indicates that there was an earlier, mythical Arthur, possibly a Celtic deity, whose origins are unknown. As they told and retold the story of Arthur, and in attempting to produce a coherent narrative out of diverse sources, the medieval romancers introduced Christian and other elements, not originally Arthurian, thus further confusing its origin. Despite the strong influence of Christianity in the later versions of Arthur, scholars detect the Celtic myth in which the Graal is a thinly disguised caldron of plenty and the opponents of Arthur and his knights the last echoes of earlier long-displaced deities.

By the time the Arthurian legends were given permanent shape in Malory's Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469), the figure of Arthur as a legendary hero had become fairly distinct. He was the natural son of Uther Pendragon and Igraine (see Merlin), and was raised by Sir Ector. By pulling the sword Excalibur from a block of stone, he proved his right to the throne of England. He subdued 12 rebellious princes of whom Lot, king of Norway, was chief, and won 12 great battles against the Saxon invaders. About his Round Table he gathered a group of knights whose deeds of daring and chivalry won his court high renown. Arthur himself became known far and wide as a mighty warrior and a just and generous ruler. His wife was Guinevere, his most valiant knight Launcelot. In the earlier romances the ruin that finally overtakes Arthur was due entirely to Guinevere and the treacherous Mordred; the story of her illicit love for Launcelot and its demoralizing effect on the court was added later. In distinct contrast to Malory and the older romancers, who say that Arthur's sons were born out of wedlock, Tennyson in his Idylls of the King makes Arthur a man of the highest morals, not only absolutely loyal to Guinevere but requiring that his knights "cleave to one maiden only." The reason that brought an end to Arthur's court was hatched while he was away on conquest. After his return and defeat in a final, terrible battle, the mortally wounded king was borne away to the island of Avalon, where some accounts say that he was buried while others say that he dwells with his sister Morgan le Fay "till he shall come again full twice as fair to rule over his people."

Arthur, Prince. See Farrer Quene, The.

Arthur, Timothy Shay. See Ten Nights in a Bar-Room.

Arthurian legend. A great body of literature that revolves around the partly mythical, partly historical figure of King Arthur. It seems to have neither traceable beginning nor foreseeable end, but the earliest extant written references to Arthur are found in Welsh literature of the 6th century. Sources of information include the writings of the historian Gildas (c. 540); a poem entitled Godonn (c. 600); the work of the historian Nennius (c. 800); the Annales Cambriae (c. 955); The Spoils of Annwn (10th century); and the very important Mabinogion, a collection of tales which includes Kulhwch and Olwen, perhaps the earliest, full-fledged Arthurian romance.

In the 12th century the fame of Arthur spread to England where it was noted by William of Malmsbury in his Gesta Regum Anglorum. In Geoffrey of Monmouth's Latin History of the Kings of Britain, Arthur attained full stature, becoming a great national figure, the hero-king of marvelous deeds accompanied by such figures as Merlin, Guinevere, Gawain, and Mordred. Uther Pendragon also made his appearance in context with the now traditional story of Arthur's conception, and there is what may be the first mention of Arthur's departure, mortally wounded, for Avalon.

The Norman poet, Wace, transformed the work of Geoffrey of Monmouth into an elegant verse chronicle, Roman de Brut. In this adaptation, the chivalric setting was expanded; the Round Table was introduced for the first time; the death of Arthur was further dramatized by the suggestion that he had gone to Avalon to be healed of his wounds, with the expectation of returning one day to Britain.

Thyes involved, essentially, the unification of existing Arthurian materials into new narrative form. He wrote individual tales that highlighted the deeds of individual knights. The best known of these is Lancelot, a story that recounts the intensely enacted drama of Lancelot’s adventures in the name of his great and undying love for Queen Guinevere, thus introducing into the stream of Arthurian legend that wondrous knight, Lancelot, and the important medieval theme of courtly love.

The English priest Layamon (fl. 1198–1207) took the chronicle of Wace as his model and wrote The Brut—perhaps the first of the legends of Arthur to be composed in the English language. Layamon elaborated on the Round Table motif, effectively mixed native folk tradition with Norman elegance, and drew upon Celtic lore for a description of Arthur’s journey to Avalon where Morgan le Fay waited to heal his wounds.

During the 13th century, the tales of Arthur enjoyed a period of popularity in Germany, which resulted in such works as those of Gottfried von Strassburg and Wolfram von Eschenbach. In the 14th century, Arthurian legend saw an artistic revival that produced two especially important pieces of English literature: The Alliterative Morte Arthur (c. 1360) and Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. In the first, an anonymous work, Gawain is the central figure, and it is his death, not Arthur’s, that is the dramatic high point of the poem. Even his murderer, Mordred, weeps bitterly that it was his destiny to kill such a knight. The emphasis is on an early English kind of epic treatment, so that this version has an affinity more with Beowulf than with the customary form of Arthurian romance. Norman lightness and Celtic magic have no place in this work. When Arthur dies, he is carried to Glastonbury, not Avalon, for a Christian burial.

The second important poem of the 14th-century English revival, Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, is one of the most important examples of Arthurian literature; its unknown author ranks with Chaucer as one of the greatest of the Middle English poets. Part of the brilliance of this particular poem is found in its unusual imagery and dramatic effects. An excellent example of the latter is the sudden appearance of the Green Knight at the court of King Arthur, during New Year festivities, and his shocking challenge; Gawain accepts the challenge, and the story is essentially a testing and development of his character.

In the 15th century, the legends of Arthur were gathered together and given ultimate shape in Sir Thomas Malory’s great English prose classic, Le Morte d’Arthur. This rendition, as above all else, the work of a master story-teller. Malory utilized traditions other than those of Arthurian romance, elaborating most effectively on the Grail theme, and making good use of material from the Tristan and Iseult stories. The life of Arthur is recounted, including the story of his miraculous conception and birth, events leading to his coronation, various military exploits, and his ultimate death at the hands of Mordred. In this work, the mysterious Lady of the Lake stretches her arm from the depths of the lake and provides Arthur with the marvelous sword, Excalibur. There is an enchanted forest through which disguised knights go galloping in search of odd beasts, the Holy Grail, perilous ladies in distress, and behind almost any tree Morgan le Fay may be waiting to capture passing knights of the Round Table. A villainous King Mark forever pursues the gallant Sir Tristram who is forever devoted to Queen Iseult. The exemplification of chivalry, Sir Launcelot, has many dramatic adventures in the name of love for Queen Guinevere or loyalty to King Arthur, while his son, the pure Galahad, is granted sight of the Holy Grail. Le Morte d’Arthur ends on the traditional, tragic note of Arthur’s death and the dissolution of the Order of the Round Table.

Even in its own time, Malory’s version of the Arthurian legend enjoyed considerable popularity. It was one of the works chosen for publication in 1485 by William Caxton, the first English printer, who gave it the title Le Morte d’Arthur and complained in a famous preface that Arthur was far better known and appreciated in other countries than his own. Caxton’s complaint was subsequently more than answered as, one after the other, English poets dipped into Arthurian legend; the legend and the characters, however, changed, and the many versions reflect the changes in ideals, tastes, and preferences wrought by time. The Arthur in Spenser’s Faerie Queene (1590, 1596, 1611), for example, is the ideal of manhood and bears little resemblance to earlier portraits of Arthur.

Perhaps the best-known modern retelling of the story of Arthur is Tennyson’s Idylls of the King (1859–1872). Like all the later romancers, Tennyson leaned heavily on Malory, but his approach is very different. The sin of Launcelot and Guinevere as the evil cause of the failure of the Round Table is strongly emphasized. Tennyson is often criticized for his shadowy, unreal, almost symbolic depiction of Arthur.

The story of Arthur has been much told in the 20th century by such writers as William Morris, Edwin Arlington Robinson, John Masefield, and Mark Twain, who burlesqued the romance of Arthur in Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur’s Court (1889).

The popularity of the story of Arthur continues, being more recently retold, for example, by T. H. White in The Once and Future King (1958). This work has served to demonstrate once more the astonishing appeal of the legendary king, once a remote Celtic chieftain, whose name has already figured in literature for at least 1400 years.

Articles of Confederation and Perpetual Union. The constitution by which the United States was governed from 1781 until the ratification of the new Constitution in 1789. The central government created by the Articles lacked strength because each state remained sovereign and independent; there was no effective executive officer, and Congress lacked the power to levy taxes. To remedy these defects, a Constitutional Convention was called in 1787 and resulted in the writing of a new constitution.
Arzybashev, Mikhail Petrovich (1870–1927). Russian novelist and dramatist. His novel Sanin (1907) created a sensation because of its frank treatment and discussion of sex. His other works include The Death of Lande (1904) and At the Brink (1912).

Arundel (1930). A historical novel by Kenneth Roberts. The first of the author’s stirring and authentic narratives, it deals with Benedict Arnold’s expedition against Quebec. Arundel was the original name of Kennebunk, Me., Roberts’ birthplace, and it had been his intention to give the history of Maine in a family chronicle, but he gave up the idea as he became more interested in the history of the country as a whole. Benedict Arnold’s story is continued in Ransom in Arms.

Arundhati. In Hindu legend, the wife of the great sage Vishvashitha. Traditionally, she, along with Sita, represents the ideal Hindu wife.

Aruru. The Babylonian goddess who molded man, and later the hero Enkidu, out of clay. She appears in the Epic of Gilgamesh.

Arveragus. See Franklin’s Tale.

Arviragus. (1) In Shakespeare’s Cymbeline, the valiant and noble younger son of Cymbeline, king of Britain. He is abducted by Belarius as an infant and raised as his son under the name of Cadwal.

(2) In Chaucer’s Franklin’s Tale there is a character named Arviragus (or Arveragus). See Guide- rius.

Aryan language (from Sans.arya, noble). The Indo-European family of languages, from the name by which the Hindus and Iranians used to distinguish themselves from the nations they conquered. The place of origin of these languages is not definitely known, authorities differing so widely as between a locality enclosed by the river Oxus and the Hindu-Kush Mountains, and the shores of the Baltic Sea. The Aryan family of languages includes the Persians, Indic (Hindi, Sanskrit, etc.), Latin, Greek, and Celtic, with all the European except Basque, Turkish, Hungarian, and Finnish. It is sometimes called the Indo-European, sometimes the Indo-Germanic, and sometimes the Japhetic.

Aryan race. A term used by the German Nazis to designate, without any scientific basis, the original Indo-European race from which the German people were descended. They claimed that German superiority depended on the purity of the race, or in practical terms, on the extermination of the Jews. See Houston Stewart Chamberlain; Alfred Rosenberg.

Ascalaphus (Askalaphos). In Greek mythology, an inhabitant of the underworld. When Hades gave Persephone permission to return to the upper world as she had eaten nothing, Ascalaphus said that she had partaken of a pomegranate. In revenge Persephone turned him into an owl by sprinkling him with the water of Phlegethon.

Ascalon, the Hermit of. In the Gerusalemme Liberata of Tasso, a good wizard who helps Usbalo and Guelfo break the power of Armida over the Christian champion Rinaldo of Este. With his help they are able to reach her castle on the Fortunate Islands and bring him to his cage. His return to the fray results in the final victory of the Crusaders.

Ascanius. Also known as Iulus. In classic legend, the son of Aeneas. He escaped with his father from Troy and later ruled over the kingdom in Italy which his father had secured. After Aeneas’ death, Ascanius himself built its capital, Alba Longa. The gens Julia (or Julia), to which Julius Caesar and Octavius Caesar belonged, supposedly derived its name from Ascanius’ other name, Iulus, and accordingly sought to trace its lineage from the earliest ancestors of the Roman people. See Aeneid; Julian Emperors.

Ascapart. A legendary giant conquered by Sir Bevis of Hamton. He was 30 feet high, and the space between his eyes was 12 inches. This mighty giant, whose effigy may be seen on the city gates of Southampton, could carry Sir Bevis and the latter’s wife and horse under his arm with no difficulty.

Ascasubi, Hilario. See Gauchito literature.

Ascent of F6, The (1936). A drama in verse and prose by W. H. Auden and Christopher Isherwood. In a political crisis involving a border dispute in “British Sudan,” Sir James Ransom asks his brother Michael, a famous mountaineer, to lead a British expedition up F6, a mountain on the colony’s frontier, which the Sudoland people believe to be haunted. Michael Ransom is reluctant to go, for he does not want to turn mountain climbing into a political weapon, or to help his brother and his powerful, upper-class friends in their unscrupulous careers. But his mother urges him to go, to do a good deed; he agrees. The mountain is inhabited only by a strange order of monks, whose Abbot tells Ransom that the mountain is haunted in that each man meets his own demon there. The other climbers are killed one by one because of their particular obsessions or defects of character. At the top Ransom, delirious, goes through a nightmare trial scene with the other characters and finally sees his demon, his mother, and dies. As in Auden’s other early work, the poet is concerned with both social and psychological diseases, and expresses himself through symbolism. Mr. and Mrs. A., ordinary English people, make up the chorus as they listen to the radio announcer’s account of the expedition and comment on it. Benjamin Britten composed the music for the play.

Asch, Sholem (1880–1957). Polish-born American novelist. Asch, who wrote his books chiefly in Yiddish, is best known for his biblical novels: The Nazarene (1930), The Apostle (1943), and Mary (1949). These books reflect his conviction that Christianity should be considered the logical continuation of Judaism. East River (1946), a novel set in New York, illustrates the formation of the American character through the merging of diverse races and creeds. Asch’s later works include Moses (1951), A Passage in the Night (1953), and The Prophet (1955).

Ascham, Roger (1515–1568). English prose writer and teacher, tutor to Elizabeth before her accession to the throne, later connected with her cousin, the Greek preceptor. In his writings he urged the adoption of sports in an educational curriculum and defended English prose as a literary medium. His best known works are Toxophilus (1543), a treatise on archery, and The Schoolmaster (1570), which expounds his pedagogical theories.

Aschenbach, Gustav von. See Death in Venice.
Asclepius (Asklepios). Greek god of healing, son of Apollo and Coronis. Apollo killed the mother for infidelity, but saved the unborn child, giving it into the care of Chiron. Asclepius became extraordinarily proficient in medicine, but when he brought Hippolytus back to life, Zeus, thinking he had gone too far in interfering with divine prerogative, destroyed him with a thunderbolt. In revenge Apollo killed the Cyclopes. Asclepius was the father of Podalirius and Machaon, heroes at Troy, and of various daughters who were mere personifications of one form or another of healing.

Asem, An Eastern Tale, or A Vindication of the Wisdom of Providence in the Moral Government of the World (1759). A tale by Oliver Goldsmith concerning Asem, a hermit and misanthrope, who sees a vision of a world free from vice.

Asgard (from as, a god; gart[hr], an enclosure, yard). The celestial dwelling place of the Scandianavian gods, equivalent to the Olympus of Greek mythology. It was said to be situated in the center of the universe and be accessible only by the rainbow bridge (Bifrost). Valhalla was the most famous great hall of its many regions and mansions, which also included Gladsheim, Vingolf, Valaskjalf, and Ydalir.

Ashcan School or The Eight. A term applied to a group of realistic American artists. They painted bars, prizefights, and street scenes rather than the pretty pictures fashionable at the turn of the 20th century. Their first exhibition in 1908 met with an uproar of disapproval that gave rise to the name of the group. Their members were Robert Henri (1865–1929), John Sloan, Maurice Prendergast (1861–1924), Arthur B. Davies (1862–1928), George Luks (1867–1933), Everett Shinn (1873–1953), William Glackens (1870–1938), and Ernest Lawson (1873–1939).

Ashenden. The name W. Somerset Maugham used for his own appearances in Cakes and Ale and The British Agent.

Asherah or Asherat. The mother of the Canaanite gods, and consort of El. She lives in a palace in the north and exerts great influence over her husband. Even more than El himself, she seems hostile to the younger gods, such as Baal. Although her epithets refer to her as a sea-goddess, she fills a role in the Canaanite pantheon similar to that of Ge (Earth) in the Greek. See The Poem of Baal.

Ashford, Daisy (1882– ). English child author of the story The Young Visitors. The book was published in 1919, with a preface by J. M. Barrie claiming that the author, then a mature woman, was nine when she wrote it.

Ashkenazim. The middle and northern European Jews, as distinguished from the Sephardim. It was originally the name of a people from Ashkenaz, near Ararat, mentioned in the Old Testament (Jer. 51:27). Ashkenaz is also the name of the eldest son of Gomer (Gen. 10:32).

Ashley, Lady Brett. The principal female character in Ernest Hemingway's novel The Sun Also Rises. An Englishwoman, in Spain while she divorces her husband, she seeks to hide the emptiness of her life in friendship with the impotent Jake Barnes and an affair with the bullfighter Pedro Romero. She typifies the aimless pursuit of leisure of "the lost generation."

Ashnan. The Sumerian goddess of grain.

Ashtar. Canaanite god of artificial irrigation. During the period that the rain-god Baal spends in the underworld, he reigns on earth, but is not quite equal to the job. This role, clearly shown in The Poem of Baal, is obviously an allegorical statement of the practical fact that irrigation cannot fertilize the earth as effectively as rain.

Ashton, Helen Rosaline (1891–1958). English novelist. She is the author of popular stories about doctors such as Doctor Senecold (1930), and fictional biographies such as William and Dorothy Wordsworth (1938) and Parson Austen's Daughter (1949).

Ashton, Lucy. See The Bride of Lammermoor.

Ashton, Winifred. See Clementine Dane.

Ashmoreth. See Ishitar.

Ashur. See Assur.

Ash Wednesday. The first day of Lent, so called from the ancient custom of sprinkling ashes on the heads of clergy and people. The ashes are prepared from the palms blessed on Palm Sunday the previous year.

Ash Wednesday (1930). A poem by T. S. Eliot. The first of his poems to celebrate the peace found in orthodox Christianity, it is a poetic liturgy, meditation, and approach to mystical communion with God.

Asia. In classic mythology, one of the Oceanides, usually spoken of as wife of Iapetus and mother of Prometheus. In his Prometheus Unbound, Shelley makes her play an important part as Prometheus' wife.

Asia. According to the Koran the wife of that Pharaoh who brought up Moses. Her husband tortured her for believing in Moses; but she was taken alive into paradise. Muhammad numbers her among the four perfect women.

As I Lay Dying (1930). A novel by William Faulkner. It tells the story of the death of Addie Bundren and the ordeal her family undergo in carrying the body to Jefferson, Miss., for burial. Her husband, Anse; her four sons, Cash, Darl, Jewel, and Vardaman; her daughter, Dewey Dell; and several neighbors all reveal their relationships with Addie in the course of the story. A series of mishaps besets the family: in crossing a flooding river, the mules are drowned, Cash's leg is broken, and the coffin is upset and rescued by Jewel. Later, the family rests at a farmhouse, where Darl sets fire to the barn in an attempt to destroy the now-putrescent corpse; again the coffin is rescued by Jewel. The family finally reaches Jefferson, where Addie is buried; Darl is taken to the insane asylum, and Anse acquires a new wife.

In the course of the narrative it is revealed that Jewel was born of Addie's affair with Whitfield, a local preacher. Her relationship to Anse had been spiritually and emotionally barren, based on words alone. Significantly, Jewel is a silent man, active and passionate, while Darl is sensitive and perceptive, living in the world of his own mind.

The story unfolds in some 60 short sections, each labeled with the name of the character who narrates his thoughts and perceptions; as in The Sound and the Fury, Faulkner uses the stream-of-consciousness...
Asimov, Isaac

1920— ). Russian-born American author known primarily as a science-fiction writer, Asimov has published more than 40 books interpreting science to the general public. Building Blocks of the Universe (1957) and The Living River (1959) both received awards for their excellence. The Intelligent Man's Guide to Science (2 vols., 1960) is an encyclopedic work for the layman. His books of science fiction written for those in high school are published under the pseudonym Paul French.

Asim Palacios, Miguel (1871-1944). Spanish philologist and professor of Arabic studies. Author of the famous La escatología musulmana en la Divina Comedia (Islam in the Divine Comedy, 1919), which deals with the influence of Arabian authors, notably Aben Arabí, upon Dante, Asín Palacios was responsible for many of the discoveries pointing to the interrelationship between the Islamic and early Christian cultures. Also among his best-known works is the volume El Islam cristianizado (1931).

Asir. See Asyr.

Ask or Askr. In Norse mythology, the first man, created out of an ash tree by Odin, Vili, and Ve. The first woman was Embla.

Asmodée. The devil-companion of Don Cléopas, in Alain René Lesage's picaresque novel Le Diable Boiteux (1707), sometimes entitled Asmodeus or The Devil on Two Sticks in English translations. He is an engaging little devil, with a great deal more gaiety than malice. He takes pleasure in showing his companion human ugliness and depravity by lifting the roofs off houses in Madrid.

Asmodeus. The "evil demon" who appears in the Apocryphal book of Tobit. His business was "to plot against the newly wedded and . . . sever them utterly by many calamities." According to Hebrew mythology, Asmodeus fell in love with Sara, daughter of Raguel, and slew her seven husbands in succession, each on his bridal night. He was exorcised and driven into Egypt by a charm made by Tobias (on the advice of the angel Raphael) from the heart and liver of a fish burnt on perfumed ashes (Tobit 6:14; 7:2). In the Talmud, Asmodeus is called "king of the devils."

Aspasia. A Milesian woman (fl. 440 B.C.) celebrated for her beauty and talents. She lived at Athens as mistress of Pericles, and her house became the center of literary and philosophical society; hence a fascinating and cultured courtesan. Walter Savage Landor wrote a series of imaginary letters, Pericles and Aspasia (1836).

Aspasia. Titular heroine of Beaumont and Fletcher's drama, The Maid's Tragedy (1610). She is betrothed to Amintor but the King, wishing to provide a husband for his mistress Evadne, commands Amintor to marry her instead. Aspasia is a pathetic figure, the very type of ill-fortune and wretchedness, but she bears her fate with patience even when she becomes a jest and byword. Her tragic death gives the drama its name.

Aspects of the Novel (1927). A literary study by E. M. Forster. Defining the novel as any work of prose fiction, Forster discusses not only plot and character, but also "fantasy," "prophecy" (or symbolism), and "pattern and rhythm" (writing of the structure of a novel as though it is, or should be, like a symphony).

Aspern Papers, The (1888). A novelette by Henry James. According to passages in his notebook, James based The Aspern Papers on a story he had heard concerning the mistress of Byron, then living, who was in possession of several unpublished papers and letters of both Byron and Shelley. The narrator of The Aspern Papers learns that the former mistress of the romantic poet Jeffrey Aspern is still living in Venice and has in her possession a collection of the poet's papers which she will not permit to be published. In hope of gaining access to the papers, the narrator rents a room from the old lady and her middle-aged niece, but his plans are frustrated when, at the old lady's death, the niece demands marriage as the price of the papers.

Assassins. A small Islamic sect. For two hundred years it terrified Europe with its secret murders. It was founded by Hassan-i-Sabbah near the end of the 11th century. From the nearly impregnable mountain stronghold of Alamut in Persia, and later from the Syrian stronghold of Masyad, the Assassins harried the Crusaders and their rival Islamic sects, remaining unbroken in power even by the great Saladin. They were finally destroyed in the 13th century by the Tatar prince Hulagu and, somewhat later, in Syria, by the Egyptian Sultan Baybars.

The name Assassins is derived from hashish, a drug made from hemp, with which, according to tradition, the victorious Assassins were rewarded upon their return from successful depredations. The secret of their long reign of terror was the absolute obedience that the young men of the sect were required to give to their leaders. The name of the sect soon came into the languages of Europe as a synonym for murderer.

Assembly. During the French Revolution, a representative body which had three names: the National, Constituent, and Legislative. In 1789 the tiers état (third estate) declared itself to be the National Assembly and controlling body, and took the so-called Oath of the Tennis Court. Shortly thereafter, reinforced by a majority of clergy and a minority of nobles, it called itself the Constituent Assembly; in 1791 it framed and voted the first written constitution in French history. The Constituent Assembly was succeeded by the Legislative Assembly (1791), which voted the war against Austria and the imprisonment of Louis XVI, thus opposing the constitutional monarchy. In September, 1792 the Legislative Assembly was succeeded by the National Convention which immediately decreed the abolition of the monarchy. With this formality, the struggle among the various republican factions—Gironistes, Jacobins, Cordeliers, adherents of Robespierre—began.

Asser (d. 909?). Welsh monk, later bishop of Sherborne (after c. 900). About 885 King Alfred the Great invited him to his court as tutor and companion; he helped Alfred with his ambitious program of creating a center of popular learning. He wrote a biography of Alfred (c. 893), which includes a history of England from 849 to 887 and of Alfred's career until 887.

Assommoir, L' (The Dram Shop, 1877). One of the novels in the ROUSSON-MAQUART series by Émile Zola. Written in the argot of the Paris streets, L'Assommoir is a study of the demoralizing effects of alcohol on the lives of working-class people. Although Zola had great compassion for these miserable people, his book was attacked as immoral because of the sordid nature of the subject.

assonance. In poetry and prose, the identity of vowel sounds, as in the words "scream" and "beech." Assonance is one of the many phonetic devices that serve to unify poetry and prose. In poetry it is frequently substituted for rhyme, and in this use it is sometimes referred to as vowel rhyme. See CONSONANCE; ALLITERATION.

Assumption, Feast of the. August 15th, so called in honor of the Virgin Mary. In Catholic tradition, she was taken to heaven that day (A.D. 45) in her corporeal form, being at the time seventy-five years of age. There is a legend that the Virgin was raised soon after her death, and assumed to glory by a special privilege before the general resurrection.

Assumption of Hannele, The (Hanneles Himmelfahrt; 1893). A symbolic drama by Gerhart HAUPTMANN. It is the story of a maltreated girl who tries to drown herself and is taken to a wretched almshouse where she lapses into delirium. In her dreams she transforms the place and its dreary inhabitants into a fairy paradise of immense poetic beauty.

Assur or Ashur. The principal god of Assyria, which bears his name. The Baal of the Assyrian capital of Nineveh, he took over much of the dominant role that had been played by the Babylonian MARDUK.

Assur-bani-pal or Ashurbanipal (d. 626 B.C.). King of Assyria. The son of Esar-Haddon, he ruled Assyria, while his twin brother Samus-sum-ukin ruled Babylonia. Against great odds, Assur-bani-pal maintained his supremacy over Egypt and put down a Tyrian revolt. The most powerful of Assyria's rulers, he either subjugated or dominated the Mannu, the Elamites, and the Cilicians. He also quelled a revolt by his brother in Babylonia, and harassed the northern Arabians. However, Assur-bani-pal had overreached himself and exhausted the resources of his own country to the extent that it collapsed completely not long after his death. He left behind him, however, a legacy of enormous importance for modern times: he had caused to be prepared for his royal library a large number of the most important literary works of the Near East; preserved on tablets, these were excavated in the middle of the 19th century in the ruins of Nineveh, his capital. Some characteristics of Assur-bani-pal are recognizable in the legendary SARDANAPALUS.

Astarotte. A fiend in Pulci's comic epic MORGANTE MAGGIORE. He takes Rinaldo from Egypt to the battle of Roncesvalles in a few hours by magic, discussing on the way about theological questions. He has been regarded as Pulci's mouthpiece in the poem.

Astarte. See ISHTAR.

Astolfo. In medieval romance one of the twelve famous PALADINS of Charlemagne. An English duke, he joined the Emperor in his struggles against the Saracens. Known primarily for his great boasting, he was also generous, courteous, gay, and singularly handsome. In the MORGANTE MAGGIORE of Pulci and the Orlando poems of Boiardo and Ariosto he appears as Astolfo. In Ariosto, he rides a whale to the enchanted island of the witch Alcina and is detained by her until she tires of him. Transformed into a myrtle tree, he is rescued by Melisande. Astolphe then journeys to the moon in search of Orlando's lost wits, which he brings back in a phial.

Astor, John Jacob (1763-1848). German-born American fur trader. Astor opened a fur store in New York City in 1786 and became the dominant figure in the fur trade of the Old Northwest. He later shifted his attention to the Far West, establishing Astoria, a trading post near the mouth of the Columbia River, in 1811. At his death he was the wealthiest man in the U. S. Washington Irving, on commission from the Astor family, wrote a laudatory account of ASTORIA.

Astoreth. See ISHTAR.

Astoria, or, Anecdotes of an Enterprise Beyond the Rocky Mountains (1836). A narrative arranged by Washington Irving from material supplied by John Jacob Astor. Irving assumed the part of Astor's glorifier because he needed money, but parts of the work remain interesting as a record of life on the northwestern frontier. Astoria is a town established by Astor on the site of Fort Clatsop in Oregon, at the mouth of the Columbia River. Astor opened his fur-trading post there in 1811 and sold it to the British in 1812. It was subsequently returned to the U. S. by the treaty of Ghent (1814).

Astraea (Astraia). In classic mythology, the goddess of justice. She was generally said to be the daughter of Themis and Zeus. She was the last of the immortals to withdraw from the earth after the Golden Age. Afterward she became the constellation Virgo.

Astrate, Roi de Tyr (Astrate, King of Tyre, 1664). The most popularly successful tragedy of Philippe QUINNAULT. The commoner Astrate loves Elise, queen of Tyre, but discovers that she has usurped the throne and that he is the lost son of the murdered king. The play aroused Boileau's harshest ridicule; the dilemmas of love, however improbable, are a recurring theme in Quinnault's work.

Astrolabe, A Treatise on the (1391). An unfinished adaptation by Geoffrey CHAUCER of contemporary lore on astronomy and astrology. It is addressed to "little Lewis my son" (probably his own son, but possibly his godson Lewis Clifford), and explains the works of Messiah (eighth-century Arabian astronomer, known to Chaucer in Latin) in terms a child can understand. Of all Chaucer's prose works, it is the one that follows its model least closely, and therefore the best indication of Chaucer's own prose style.

Astrophel and Stella. A sonnet sequence by Sir Philip Sidney, written 1580-1584 and posthumously published in 1591. The "Stella" of the sonnets was Penelope Devereux. "Astrophel" (meaning star-lover) is a Greek pun on Sidney's name. After Sidney's death in 1586 his friend Edmund Spenser wrote an elegy called Astrophel.

Astyanax. See TROJAN WOMEN, THE.
Asur. See Asur.

Asura. In Hindu mythology, a demon, an opponent of the gods.

Asushu-Namir. In Babylonian mythology, a hermaphroditic creature. It was created by the god Ea to rescue Ishtar from the underworld.

Asvins. In Hindu mythology, twin gods of light, the youngest of the gods. More than 50 hymns of the Rig Veda are addressed to them. See Vedas.

Asynja. The goddesses of Asgard; the feminine counterpart of the Asir.

As You Like It (c. 1600). A pastoral comedy by William Shakespeare. Duke Frederick has banished the rightful duke, who is his brother and Rosalind's father, to the Forest of Arden. Rosalind first meets Orlando after a contest in which he has felled Duke Frederick's wrestler Charles. Shortly afterwards, Orlando is forced to flee to the forest to escape the plots of his jealous brother Oliver. When Rosalind incurs her uncle's wrath and must also flee, Frederick's daughter Celia and Touchstone the clown accompany her. In the forest of Arden, Rosalind, who has disguised herself as a youth by the name of Ganymede, meets Orlando and leads him through a series of episodes in which he unwittingly confides his love for her. Meanwhile, Oliver comes to the forest and, when Orlando saves him from death, the brothers are reconciled. In subsequent scenes, Touchstone woos the dull-witted Audrey, Oliver woos Celia, the shepherd Silvius woos Phoebe, and Phebe woos the disguised Rosalind. At last, Rosalind reveals her identity, and the four pairs of lovers are united in the feast of Hymen before the banished duke and his followers. Rosalind's father is restored to his dukedom when Duke Frederick is converted by a monk and decides to enter a monastery. The story is based on Thomas Lodge's romance Rosalyned: Epheues' Golden Legacie (1590). See Jaques.

Atahuapla (1500?-1533). Inca emperor of Peru. Becoming ruler of the northern part of the Inca empire upon the death of his father Huayna Capac in 1527, Atahuapla wrested the southern portion from his half-brother Huascar. The dissension produced by this fratricidal conflict facilitated the Spanish conquest led by Francisco Pizarro, who captured Atahuapla in 1532. Although Atahuapla was promised his freedom in exchange for a huge ransom of gold and silver, Pizarro accused him of conspiring against the Spaniards and had him executed.

Atala (1801). A novel by Francois Rene de Chateaubriand. A melancholy tale of violent passion, set in the primeval woods of North America, it is generally cited as signaling the beginning of the romantic movement in French literature.

Atalanta (Atalante). In Greek legend, a daughter of Iasus (some authorities say Zeus) and Clymene. She took part in the Calydonian boar hunt and drew first blood. Being very swift of foot, she refused to marry unless the suitor should first defeat her in a race. Melanion overcame her at last by dropping, one after another, during the race, three golden apples that had been given him for the purpose by Venus. Atalanta was not proof against the temptation to pick them up, and so lost the race and became a wife. In the Boeotian form of the legend Hippomenes takes the place of Melanion. In some legends, Atalanta was also one of the Argonauts. William Morris made this legend the subject of one of the tales in his Earthly Paradise and Swinburne wrote a dramatic poem Atalanta in Calydon on the same theme.

Atalanta in Calydon (1865). A tragedy by Al-gernon Charles Swinburne. It is based on the Greek legend of Atalanta and the Calydonian boar. It is remembered today chiefly for its choruses, particularly the Hymn to Artemis.

Atalide. In Jean Racine's tragedy Bajazet, the princess beloved by the titular hero.

Ate. See Faerie Queene, The.

Atellanae, or Atellan farces. Low comedy interludes in the Roman theaters, introduced from Atella, in Campania. The characters of Macchus and Bucco are the forerunners of the modern Punch and Clown.

Athaliah. In the Old Testament (II Kings 11), the daughter of Ahab and Jezebel, and wife of Joram, king of Judah. After the death of her son Ahaziah, she gained the throne by murdering 42 princes of the house of David. She reigned six years, but in the seventh, Joash who had escaped the massacre was proclaimed the rightful king. Attracted by the shouts of the people at his coronation, Athaliah entered the temple where she was killed by the mob. Racine's last tragedy Athalie (1691) is based on this story.

Athalie (1691). A tragedy by Jean Racine. It is based on the Old Testament story of Athaliah and Joash. Because it was written for the schoolgirls of St-Cyr, the play includes songs sung by a chorus of Levite maidens. Athalie was Racine's last work for the stage, and is considered by many critics the most perfect example of French classical tragedy.

Athamas. A mythological Greek king of Boeotia, son of Aeolus and brother of Sisyphus and Salmo- neus. He married the phantom Nephelé at Hera's command and by her had a son, Phrixus, and a daughter, Helle. The sacrifice of these children was prevented by the arrival of a ram with Golden Fleece. Athamas also fathered Learchus and Melicertes by Ivo.

Athanasius, St. Called Athanasius the Great (293?-373). A Greek father of the Church and life-long opponent of the Arians. He is not the author of the Athanasian creed, which originated in the 5th or 6th century.

Atheist's Tragedy, The (1611). A tragedy by Cyril Tourneur. It presents the downfall of the self-seeking materialist D'Anville, whose early successes later turn to death and destruction.

Athene. The Greek goddess of war, handicraft, and wisdom. According to the most familiar story, she sprang fully armed from the head of Zeus when Hephaestus split it open with an axe. Zeus had previously swallowed his consort Metis, her mother, on learning that she would bear a child who would rule the gods. Another story, perhaps earlier, indicates that her birth was associated with some stream or lake; this may have been told of her as an ancient pre-Hellenic deity. In a dispute with Poseidon who should be patron of Athens, she won that distinction by bestowing on the Athenians the boon of the olive tree. The Parthenon was dedicated to her.
In most myths, Athena was a virgin, though originally she may have been a mother-goddess. She appears in innumerable myths, but none better displays her unique intellectual qualities than her role in the Odyssey as the constant friend and adviser of the clever and imaginative Odysseus.

Atreus. The capital of modern Greece and one of the chief city-states of ancient Greece, situated in Attica. Its name was synonymous with outstanding cultural achievement for centuries after its political ascendency had ceased to exist with its defeat in the Peloponnesian War.

Atherton, Gertrude [Franklin] (1857-1948). American novelist. Among her numerous books, the most famous are The Conqueror (1902), a fictional biography of Alexander Hamilton, and Black Oxen (1923), a novel about the rejuvenation of an older woman. Much of her writing deals with California, as in The Californians (1898) and California: An Intimate History (1914).

Athos. One of the famous friends and adventurers in Dumas' The Three Musketeers. Athos also appears in the sequels Twenty Years After and The Viscoun of Bragelonne. He is unfailingly the gallant gentleman, quiet and reserved.

Atlantic (Atlantic). A magician and sage in the Orlando poem of Boiardo and Ariosto. Atlante is the teacher of Ruggiero the Saracen warrior destined to be converted and marry Bradamante.

Atlantic Monthly, The. An American magazine founded in Boston in 1857. Named by Oliver Wendell Holmes, it has been edited by a series of distinguished men: James Russell Lowell, James T. Fields, William Dean Howells, Thomas Bailey Aldrich, Horace E. Scudder, Walter Hines Page, Bliss Perry, Ellery Sedgwick, and Edward A. Weeks. Among its contributors are numerous of the most outstanding writers in America. Since 1938, the magazine has been noted for greater breadth, international outlook, and increased interest in current affairs. Several collections have been issued, including Atlantic Harvest (1947) and Jubilee (1957), a selection from the magazine's first hundred years.

Atlanticis. A mythic island of great extent, anciently supposed to have once existed in the western sea. It is mentioned by Plato (in the Timaeus and Critias), and Solon was told of it by an Egyptian priest, who said that it had been overwhelmed by an earthquake and sunk beneath the sea 9,000 years before his time. See Lemuria; Lyonesse; New Atlantic, The.

Atlas. In Greek mythology, one of the Titans, son of Iapetus and Clymene. He was condemned by Zeus for his share in the war of the Titans to uphold the heavens on his shoulders. He was stationed on the Atlas mountains in Africa, and the tale is merely a poetical way of saying that they prop up the heavens, because they are so lofty. The Pleiades were Atlas' daughters.

The figure of Atlas with the world on his back was employed by the Flemish geographer Mercator (1512-1594, real name Gerhard Kremer), on the title page of his collection of maps in the 16th century. The name has since been used to mean a book of maps.

Atman (Sansk., "breath, self, soul"). In Hinduism the internal essence of the single individual. Atman can also be used to refer to the universal Self, the source of all other selves.

atonality. In music, the absence of tonality. Atonality negates the primacy of a keynote or tonic; the notion of a scale built upon the tonic, to which certain of the 12 notes of the chromatic scale belong and to which others are foreign; the building of harmonic combinations exclusively in thirds; and the distinction between consonant and dissonant combinations, especially the need to resolve dissonances into consonances.

Arnold Schoenberg is generally considered to have been the first composer of atonal music and the prime systematizer of its methods. He eventually elaborated a 12-tone method of composition in which the notes of the chromatic scale were organized into an indivisible order, or "row," so that no note might be emphasized at the expense of any other. While the term atonal first implied an experimental rebellion against the single tonal center, it eventually came to designate the systematic negation of tonality through absolute equality of all tones. The organizational methods by which such music has sought to preserve its atonality have proved to be of greater value to contemporary music than the somewhat negative doctrine of atonality itself. Theoreticians, including Schoenberg, have questioned whether it is not a contradiction in terms to speak of "atonal music," and many hold that true atonality is, in practice, impossible.

Atreus, the house of. The royal line of Mycenae, whose terrible story was a favorite source for the Athenian tragic dramatists. Atreus and Thyestes, sons of Pelops, became rivals for the throne of Mycenae, left vacant by the death of their brother-in-law Sthenelus and his son Eurystheus. Thyestes suggested that it should go to the possessor of the golden lamb. Atreus, who had previously hidden one in a chest, agreed, not knowing that his wife Aeore had given it to Thyestes, who had seduced her. Thyestes won the throne, but lost it when Atreus, with the aid of Zeus, made the sun move backward, an omen that proved Thyestes a usurper. Learning of the seduction, Atreus invited Thyestes to a banquet, served him his sons in a stew, then banished him, but not before Thyestes had cursed the house of Atreus.

Thyestes learned from the Delphic oracle that only by begetting a son by his own daughter Pelopia could he avenge himself. He ravished her at night, unrecognized. Atreus, having killed Aeropole, the mother of Agamemnon and Menelaus, now married Pelopia, thinking her the daughter of King Thesprotus of Sicyon. Bearing Thyestes' child, she exposed it out of shame, but it was rescued by shepherds and named Agisthus. Atreus learned of the child and believed it to be his own. Later he sent Agisthus to kill Thyestes, but Thyestes revealed himself as Agisthus' father. Pelopia killed herself in shame, but Agisthus killed Atreus. Thyestes, avenged, became ruler of Mycenae again. Later, however, Atreus' son Agamemnon drove out Thyestes and killed his son TithONUS, married the latter's wife Clytemnestra, and became king of Mycenae.

Clytemnestra bore a son, Orestes, and three daughters, Iphigenia, Electra, and Chrysothemis. She never forgave her husband for the sacrifice of Iphi-genian, but, taking Aegisthus as a lover, conspired with him to kill Agamemnon. When he returned from the Trojan War, they slew him in his bath.
They also slew his captive, CASSANDRA. Electra, however, had smuggled away Orestes for his safety to the Phocian king Strophius, who brought him up with his own son Pylades. Grown to manhood, Orestes returned and, with Electra’s help, avenged his father by killing both his mother and Aegisthus.

For this crime, which had been approved in ad-dvance by the Delphic oracle, he was driven mad by the ENYSES (Furies) of his mother. Later he was tried for his crime on the Areopagus, with Apollo pleading his case. He did not regain his sanity, however, until, on the advice of Apollo, he recovered an image from the temple of Taurian Artemis. There his life was saved by Iphigenia, who had been transported thither by Artemis at the time of the supposed sacrifice. Returning to Mycenae, he killed the new king Aletes, Aegisthus’ son, and ultimately ruled Argos and Sparta, as well. His friend Pylades, who had accompanied him to Tauris, married Electra.

With the return of Orestes’ sanity, Thyestes’ curse on the house of Atreus—or that of Myrtilus on the seed of Pelops—was finally lifted.

The events from the return of Agamemnon to the trial of Orestes are told in the only extant trilogy of Greek tragedies, the Oresteia (458 B.C.) of Aeschylus:
the Agamemnon recounts his murder; The Libration Bearsers (Choephor), the vengeance of Orestes;
the Eumenides his trial. Various parts of the story are also told in Sophocles’ Electra, Euripides’ Electra, Orestes, and his plays on Iphigenia, and in Seneca’s Thyestes and Agamemnon. Eugene O’Neill retold much of the story in modern terms in his MOURNING BECOMES ELECTRA. Jean-Paul Sartre
adapted the story for his play THE FLIES.

Atropos. In Greek mythology, that one of the three FATES whose office it was to cut the thread of life with a pair of scissors.

Atticus, Titus Pomponius (109–32 B.C.). Roman man of letters. He left Rome in 88 B.C. and took up residence in Athens (hence his added surname Atticus), where he remained for 23 years. He was famed for his ability to keep on good terms with men of conflicting personalities and political views, such as Brutus, Marcus Antonius, and Cicero.
In his Athenian villa, he kept a staff of slaves whose work was to make copies of contemporary writings.

It was Atticus’ publishing house which kept the letters of Cicero, the Epistulas ad Familiares and the Epistulas ad Atticam, invaluable sources of information about behind-the-scenes politics in the last years of the Roman republic.

Attila (d. 453). King of the Huns. He is notorious for his attacks and invasions on Europe during the final stages of the Roman Empire. He over-ran the Balkans (447–450) causing great destruction.
In 451 he invaded Gaul, but was forced to withdraw after a series of defeats. He and his soldiers were feared for their cruelty and vandalism; Attila himself was called “the scourge of God.” Pierre Corneille made him the hero of a tragedy Attila (1667).
He appears in the Nibelungenlied under the name
Etzel and in the Völsunga Saga as Atli.

Attila (1667). A tragedy by Pierre CORINNE.
One of Corneille’s least successful works, it recounts the villainy and death of the murderous king of the Huns.

Attucks, Crispus. See BOSTON MASSACRE.

Atwill, Lionel (1885–1946). English-born stage and screen actor. Famous for his roles in Ibsen plays, he supported Katharine Cornell and Helen Hayes and played opposite Nazimova. In the movies most of his parts were in horror pictures.

Atys or Attis. The Phrygian counterpart of the Greek Adonis and Phoenician TAMMUZ. He was beloved by Cybele, the mother of the gods, but out of jealousy, she drove him mad. He castrated himself, died at a pine tree, and violets sprang from his blood. Catullus wrote a poem in Latin on the subject, which has been translated into English by Leigh Hunt.

Aub, Max (1903–1970). Spanish author and dramatist. Aub, a prolific writer, is known for his ironic humor, revealed in his novels Campo de sangre (1945) and Las buenas intenciones (1954). He is also the author of a tragedy, Descada (1950).

Auber, Daniel François Esprit (1782–1871).
French composer of opera, especially comic opera.
His best known work is Fra DIAVOLO. He was director of the Paris Conservatoire, 1842–1871.

Aubignac, Abbé d’. François Hédelin (c. 1604– c. 1673). French writer. Although Aubignac was a mediocre playwright, his Pratique du Théâtre (Theatrical Practice, 1657), urging the observance of the classical unities in drama, offers useful information on the French theater of the 17th century.

French poet and historian. A fervent supporter of the Protestant cause during the religious wars, he fought in numerous campaigns and, for 20 years, was the friend and adviser of Henry IV. Les Tragiquises (1616), his great epic poem of the religious wars combines satire, allegory, and invective. Composed of seven books, it describes the horrors of the war, the vice and corruption of the Valois kings and the courts of justice, the sufferings of the Protestant martyrs and concludes with a vision of the final judgment in Heaven. The use of the Alexandrine in Les Tragiques was influential in establishing it as the vehicle of elevated French poetry. The third volume of his Histoire Universelle (1616–1619), an account of the Protestant struggle in Europe from 1553 to 1601, was ordered burned by the Parlement of Paris.

Aubrey, John (1626–1697). English antiquary.
His best-known work is the anecdotal Minutes of Lives, now commonly known as Brief Lives, which first appeared as part of Anthony à Wood’s Athenae Oxonenses (1690). First published separately in 1813, it is a valuable source of information on the lives of important 17th-century figures.

Auburn. The name of the village in Oliver Goldsmith’s poem THE DESERTED VILLAGE. It is an inaginary English village, but some of its features suppport Goldsmith’s wistful recollections of his own youth in the Irish village of Lissoy where his father was rector.

Aucassin and Nicolette (early 13th century).
French chante-fable in alternating prose and verse, one of the best medieval love romances. Aucassin, son of the Provengal Count of Beaucar, falls in love with Nicolette, a slave captured from the Saracens. The Count separates them by imprisonment, but Nicolette escapes and Aucassin follows, and they spend three years together until they are captured by Saracens. Aucassin is shipwrecked near home and, his father having died, becomes Count. Nicolette is carried to Carthage, where she is recognized as the king's daughter; but she flees an unwelcome marriage and finds her way to Beaucaire disguised as a minstrel, so that the lovers are happily reunited.

Auden, W[ystan] H[ugh] (1907– ). English poet and dramatist. His most influential work was written during the 1930's. He was the best known of the group of British writers of Marxist sympathies who hoped that socialism might be the answer to the economic and political problems of the period. The group included the poets C. Day-Lewis and Stephen Spender, and the dramatist and novelist Christopher Isherwood. Auden served in the Spanish Civil War. In 1938 he married Erika Mann, daughter of the novelist Thomas Mann. In 1939 he emigrated to the U.S. and later became an American citizen.

During World War II, Christianity took the place of socialism as Auden's central preoccupation, and the influence of Marx and Freud gave way to the influence of Kierkegaard and the modern Protestant theologians. In his early work Auden expressed the idea that civilization could be cured of its economic and political diseases by socialism, and from its psychological diseases by psychoanalysis, the general cure being love. The same themes appear in his later work but with an added spiritual dimension. Auden's indebtedness to T. S. Eliot is particularly evident in the imagery of his earlier poems. The poem New Year Letter (1941; U.S. title The Double Man) is an analysis of the poet's intellectual development and changing views. He edited and rewrote subsequent reprints of his poetry in order to omit what no longer suited his poetic, political, or religious ideas. He also wrote much verse in the popular music-hall tradition.

Auden's chief early works are Poems (1930), The Orators, Look Stranger (1936; U.S. title On this Island), and Another Time (1940). For the Group Theatre he wrote the Marxist and experimental plays The Dance of Death (1933) and, in collaboration with Christopher Isherwood, The Dog Beneath the Skin, The Ascent of F6, and On the Frontier (1938). He collaborated with Louis MacNeice on the verse and prose work Letters from Iceland (1937), and with Christopher Isherwood on Journey to a War (1939), about the war between Japan and China (it contains Auden's sonnet sequence In Time of War). The work of Auden's later period includes The Quest (1941), a sonnet sequence; For the Time Being, a "Christmas Oratorio"; The Sea and the Mirror (1944), a "commentary" on The Tempest; and The Age of Anxiety. Nones (1951), The Shield of Achilles (1955), and Homage to Clio (1960) are collections of poetry. Auden collaborated on the libretto of Stravinsky's opera The Rake's Progress. The Enchained Flood (1950) and The Dyer's Hand (1963) are critical works. He edited the Oxford Book of Light Verse (1938) and selections from Kierkegaard (1952, 1955).

Audiberti, Jacques (1899– ). French novelist, poet, and dramatist. All his writing is characterized by verbal extravagance and imaginative exaltation of modern man. His works include poetry: Race des hommes (1937) and Toujours (1944); novels: Abraxas (1938) and Carnage (1941); plays: Quoat-Quoat (1946), Le Mal court (1947), Les Femmes du Bœuf (1948), and La Hoberaute (1956).

Audrey. In Shakespeare's As You Like It, an awkward country wench who jilts William for Touchstone.

Audubon, John James (1785–1851). Haitian-born American naturalist and artist. Educated in France, Audubon came to the U.S. in 1806. He traveled widely in the U.S. and Canada in search of material for his study of animals, which he depicted in firm, detailed drawings tinted in clear watercolor. His drawings reveal a good sense of design in the placement of animals and in the suggestion of their setting. The Birds of America, published in England from 1827 to 1838, is his most famous work.

Aue, Hartmann von. See HARTMANN VON AUE.

Auerbach, Berthold (1812–1882). German novelist of Jewish background, known especially for his collection of stories about rustic life, Schwarzwalder Dorfgeschichten (Village Stories from the Black Forest, 1843–1854). His deep awareness of problems faced by the Jews led him to write both the essay Das Judentum und die neueste Literatur (Judaism and Recent Literature, 1836) and a novel Spinosa (1835–1837).

Aufidius, Tullus. In Shakespeare's Coriolanus, the Volscian general whom Coriolanus defeats in battle. Coriolanus refers to him as "a lion that I am proud to hunt." Although Aufidius is responsible for the death of Coriolanus, he is immediately remorseful and vows to honor his memory.

Augustan stables. The stables of Augeas (Augeas), a mythological king of Elis, in Greece. These stables, in which he kept 3,000 oxen, had not been cleaned for thirty years. One of the labors of Heracles was to clean them, which he did by causing two rivers to run through them. Hence the phrase to clean the Augustan stables means to clear away an accumulated mass of corruption.
Augie March, The Adventures of (1953). A novel by Saul Bellow. This modern picaresque novel about a Chicago youth who grows up during the depression years brought its author national recognition. Because he will not accept any defining role in life, Augie finds himself being swept along in a current of alternately hilarious and tragic events. Unlike his brother Simon, who marries the daughter of a wealthy Chicago coaldealer in order to rise from his lower-class Jewish environment, Augie refuses every opportunity for a settled existence. He suffers some hard knocks, but, as he says, there is an “animal ridens in me, the laughing creature, forever rising up.”

Augier, Émile (1820–1889). French dramatist. Reacting against the extravagances of the romantic drama, Augier wrote comedies that affirmed respectable bourgeois values. His Gabrielle (1849) satirizes exaggerated sentiment, while Le Fils de Giboyer (1862) levels a sharp attack on current attempts to disregard the differences between politics and religion. Among his other works are Le Gendre de Monsieur Poirier (1854), Les Effrontés (1861), and Maître Guérin (1865).

Augustan age. The golden age of Roman literature which covered the reign of Augustus Caesar (27 B.C.—A.D. 14). The Augustan age has, also, come to describe the apogee of any national literature, as, for example, the age of Swift and Pope in 18th-century England, which is often called the Augustan age of English prose.

The imperial period of Roman history begins with the establishment (27) of the principate (a thinly disguised monarchy) of Augustus after his decisive defeat of Mark Antony at Actium (31 B.C.). Unlike republican Rome (see Ciceronian age), the long, dictatorial peace of Augustus was not at a time of free public debate. Oratory was useless, for there was no one to be swayed by skilful argument: the senate was a rubber-stamp parliament, and the people were voiceless. Augustus alone steered the ship of state. Historians had to be wary of adhering too closely to the facts of recent history. Only Livy, with his lofty, patriotic aim of reminding his contemporaries of the glories of their republican past, could survive as a practicing historian.

Poetry, however, was not so inhibited. Under the patronage of the emperor and his wealthy supporter Marcus, the period was the crowning epoch of Latin poetry. Vergil, perhaps the greatest of the Roman poets, began his first successful work, the Geaces, in the year of Cicero’s death (43 B.C.). He soon found encouragement and patronage in the retinue of the young Octavius (Augustus). His subsequent works, the Georgics (30 B.C.) and the Aeneid (19 B.C.), were intended, at least in part, to support the large-scale reforms in public morality and public thinking instituted by Augustus.

Another great poet of the period, the satirist and lyricist Horace, was very different from Vergil in style and subject. His great achievement was to give new life to Roman satire and to naturalize in Rome the metrical forms of the older Greek odes. Other poets of this period include Tibullus and Propertius, both writers of love elegies.

Although the Augustan Age was an age of poetry, the one great poet who was born at its beginning and who was, in certain ways, its popular spokesman, died in exile three years after the emperor’s death. This poet was Ovoc, who wrote love elegies, mock didactics, and the phantasmagorical epic, The Metamorphoses. This poet’s last, pathetic years on the bleak shores of the Black Sea bring to a close the Augustan Age of Roman literature.

Augustine, St. Lat., Aurelius Augustinus (354–430). Early Christian church father and philosopher. Born in Roman North Africa of a Christian mother and a pagan father, he received his early training primarily in Latin literature and earned his living as a teacher of rhetoric in Carthage, Rome, and Milan from 374 to 387. He joined the Manicheans for a number of years, but was disillusioned and after a period of skepticism was converted to Christianity by St. Ambrose and baptized in 387. He returned to Africa and established a monastic community; in 391 he had ordained a priest at Hippo, becoming bishop there in 395. His Confessions vividly record his spiritual experiences and development during this period.

For the remainder of his life he preached and wrote prolifically, defining points of Christian doctrine and engaging in theological controversy with the Manicheans, the Donatists, and the Pelagians. He maintained the importance of a single, unified Church, and developed a theory of sin, grace, and predestination that became basic to the doctrines of the Roman Catholic Church, but that later was also used as the justification for the tenets of Calvin, Luther, and the Jansenists.
Other important writings include On the Trinity (De Trinitate; 400-416), The City of God, On Nature and Grace (De Natura et Gratia; 415), and the Retractions (Retractiones; 426), in which he revised some of the more exaggerated statements he had made earlier.

Augustine of Canterbury. St. (d. 604?). First archbishop of Canterbury. He was responsible for the Christianization of England and called “Apostle of the English.” A prior of the Benedictine monastery of St. Andrew in Rome, he was sent by Pope Gregory (c. 595) to lead a missionary group of 40 monks to England. When he landed at Thanet in 597, King Ethelbert of Kent received him hospitably; Ethelbert’s Frankish wife Bertha was already a Christian, and he soon accepted baptism. Augustine went to Arles in France to be consecrated as “bishop of the English,” then returned and with Ethelbert’s support of his mission baptized 10,000 converts the same year. He was made archbishop of Canterbury in 601, consecrated Christ Church there in 603, and tried in vain to reconcile the Celtic bishops in the rest of England with the Roman Church.

Augustus. Original name, Caius Octavius (63 B.C.-A.D. 14). First emperor of Rome. After his adoption by his great-uncle Julius Caesar (about 49 B.C.), he called himself Caius Julius Caesar Octavianus. It was thus, as Caesar’s lawful heir, that the 19-year-old Octavius, upon Caesar’s assassination (44 B.C.), skillfully lured Caesar’s legions over to his side and formed, with Mark Antony and Lepidus, the Second Triumvirate. He pressed the war against Caesar’s assassins, Brutus and Cassius, and, after helping to crush the rebels at Philippi (42 B.C.), he successfully maneuvered Antony into accepting as his share of empire the eastern Mediterranean provinces. Between the years 40 and 31 B.C., Octavius consolidated his control over the West, that is, Italy, Gaul, and Spain. His “cold war” with Antony finally broke out into open hostilities at Actium (31 B.C.) off the northwestern coast of Greece. There the combined naval forces of Antony and of Cleopatra, the ambitious queen of Egypt, met Octavius’ well-trained armada and were decisively defeated.

After this victory, Octavius celebrated a splendid triumph: Rome greeted him as her savior and showed herself willing to accept his sole sovereignty for 44 years. In 28 B.C. he was made princeps senatus (first senator); on January 17 of the next year he received the honorary title Augustus (by which he was thenceforth known); and in a series of senatorial bequests, he was made consul, tribune, and proconsul. Despite this gradual assumption of complete dictatorial power, his avowed aim was the restoration of the Roman Republic and the purification of its social and religious life. Whatever reforms he did accomplish, however, he did so on his own, by passing the Senate and the Comitia. (See PRINCES.)

The accomplishments of Augustus include the construction of public buildings (libraries, temples, monuments—he boasted that he had found Rome in brick and left it in marble); the revival of ancient religious rites; the restoration of the calendar (the month August was named after him); the reorganization of the political structure of the Empire; and the fostering of a native Roman literature. (See AUGUSTAN AGE.) His greatest accomplishment, however—the one that made all these others possible—was the long periods of peace he was able to maintain through his mastery of the art of statesmanship.

Octavius Caesar appears briefly in Shakespeare’s Julius Caesar. In Shakespeare’s Antony and Cleopatra, he is presented as a cold and puritanical man of relentless purpose, the “man of the future” as contrasted with the declining Antony.

Auld Hornie. An epithet for the devil in Scotland. Pan, with his horns, crooked nose, goat’s beard, pointed ears, and goat’s feet, was transformed by the Scottish into Satan. In Scotland and northern England, Satan is also Auld Cootie, Auld Hangie, Auld Nick, and Auld Ane. The use of Auld seems to imply that he can appear only as an old man.

Auld lang syne. In the olden time, in days gone by. Lang syne is Scotch for long since. Auld Lang Syne, the song (1788, pub. 1796), usually attributed to Robert Burns, is really a new version by him of a very much older song: in Watson’s Collection (1711), it is attributed to one Francis Sempill (d. 1682), but it is probably even earlier. Burns, in a letter to James Thomson, writes that “It is the old song of the olden times, which has never been in print.... I took it down from an old man’s singing.” See Robert AYTOUN.

Auri, Georges (1899- ). See LES SIX.

Aurispa, Giovanni (1376-1459). Sicilian scholar and teacher in several northern Italian cities. He is noted for his trip to Constantinople to obtain manuscripts for Italian patrons of the new learning in the Renaissance.

Aurora Leigh (1856). A narrative poem by Elizabeth Barrett Browning. The heroine, a talented girl who is left an orphan without financial resources, learns to support herself by her pen. She falls in love with and eventually marries her cousin, Romney Leigh, a man whose passion for social reform has involved him in strange and varied experiences.

Aus dem Leben eines Taugenichts (From the Life of a Ne'er-Do-Well, 1826). A story by Joseph von Eichendorff, about a lazy young man who picks up his fiddle one day and goes off to see the world. His light-hearted adventures carry him through Germany, Austria, and Italy, but finally he settles down and marries the girl of his dreams. The basic attitude of the book is summed up in the last words: “And everything, everything was good.”

Auslander, Joseph (1897- ). American poet. In collaboration with Frank Ernest Hill, he wrote The Winged Horse (1927), a history of poetry for young people. His own poetry employs conventional forms with varied themes. His collections include Sunrise Trumpets (1924), Cyclops' Eye (1926), Riders at the Gate (1938), and The Unconquerables (1943).

Austen, Jane (1775-1817). English novelist, often regarded as the greatest of women novelists. The seventh child of a country parson, Jane Austen passed her days, like many an English lady of the time, almost entirely within her family circle. The only dramatic event of her life was an attachment to a clergyman who died before they could become engaged, but this was an obscure and doubtful episode, producing little outward change in her life. She never married; had no contact with London literary life; spent all her time, when not writing, on ordinary domestic duties, among her numerous nephews and nieces. Out of the materials of such a narrow world, precisely by sticking scrupulously to that narrow world, she made great literature. Her completed novels, Sense and Sensibility, Pride and Prejudice, Mansfield Park, Emma, Northanger Abbey, and Persuasion, are distinguished by their satirical wit and brilliant comedy, complex and subtle view of human nature, exquisite moral discrimination, and unobtrusive perfection of style. These qualities elevate her little world of struggling clerical families, husband-hunting mothers and daughters, eligible clergymen and landowners, country fools and snobs, into an enduring microcosm of the great world.

Austerlitz, battle of. Also called the battle of the three emperors (December 2, 1805). A famous battle taking place in Moravia (now Czechoslovakia) where Napoleon Bonaparte inflicted a heavy defeat upon the armies of Russia and Austria. The emperors of all three states were on the field, being in personal command of their forces.

Austen, William. See Peter Rugg, the Missing Man.

Autobiography of Alice B. Toklas, The (1933). An autobiography by Gertrude Stein, written as though the author were her secretary, Miss Toklas. Although the book provoked an attack by other Parisian writers and artists in Testimony Against Gertrude Stein (1935), it remains a fascinating account of expatriate life in the Paris of the period.

Autobiography of Benjamin Franklin, The. One of the most popular works of Benjamin Franklin, translated into virtually every language. Covering only the period of his life up to his pre-war stay in London as representative of the Pennsylvania Assembly, it was written at intervals beginning in 1771; the final segment was completed shortly before the author's death. Parts of the autobiography were published in France between 1791 and 1798, but the complete work did not appear until 1858. Franklin's many interests—philosophy, politics, religion, literature, and practical affairs—and his energetic pursuit of them have made his autobiography an American classic.

Autocrat of the Breakfast-Table, The (1858). A series of essays by the elder Oliver Wendell Holmes. A heterogeneous collection of boarders gather around the table, providing an audience for the wit and philosophy of the Autocrat. The essays take the form of conversations that generally develop into monologues. Cleverly and epigrammatically, the Autocrat discourses on social, theological, and scientific topics. The book, seemingly disconnected, is unified by the recurring themes and personalities. Holmes includes several of his poems.

auto-da-fé (Port. act of faith). The ceremony accompanying the pronouncement of judgment by the Inquisition. It was followed by the execution of sentences by the religious authorities. This ceremony usually took the form of a procession through the chief streets of the city or town to the church where a sermon was preached on the true faith.

Autolycus (Autolykos). A notorious thief of Greek mythology. A son of Hermes, he taught Heracles to wrestle, but later sold him mares stolen from Eurytus. Traveling with Heracles to Amazon country, he was stranded in Paphlagonia, but rescued by the Argonauts. When he stole Sisyphus' cattle, changing their color by magic, he was detected by the owner, who seduced his daughter Anticlea in revenge. Thus he became the grandfather of Odysseus.

Shakespeare uses his name for the merry ballad-singer and peddler in The Winter's Tale, who "having flown over many knavish professions, . . . settled only on rogue." His songs, such as "When daffodils begin to peer," are justly famous.

Automedon. According to Homer, the companion and the charioteer of Achilles, but according to Virgil the brother-in-arms of Achilles' son, Pyrrhus. Hence, a coachman.

Autonoe. In Greek mythology, a daughter of Cadmus. She married Aristaeus and bore him Acasteon. Having joined with Ino and Agave in denying that the lover of their dead sister Semele had been Zeus, she was punished by the son of this union, Dionysus. Driven into a Bacchic frenzy by the god, she helped to kill her nephew, the Theban king Pentheus. See Bacchants, The.

auto sacramental. A one-act religious drama popular in Spain from the 13th to the 18th century. Performed at Corpus Christi, these dramas were allegorical in character, dealing with historical, biblical, and mythological subjects by which the tenets of Catholicism could be expounded. The genre was perfected by Calderón, who wrote over 80 autos. In 1736 Charles III prohibited their performance.

Avalon. (1) In Arthurian legend, the island to which King Arthur is taken after he has been mortally wounded in the terrible, final battle. One of the earliest mentions of the island occurs in the 12th-century Latin History of the Kings of Britain by Geoffrey of Monmouth. A short time later, in his Roman de Brut, Wace mentions that King Arthur expects to return from Avalon as "the hope of Britain" after his wounds have been healed. Later versions of this dramatic incident elaborate on and expand the whole considerably. In Malory's Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469), for example, the barge that comes to take Arthur to Avalon is signaled to by throwing the sword Excalibur into the lake, and the barge itself is filled with the three mysterious and beautiful, other-world queens. See Glastonbury.

(2) A Celtic word meaning "the island of apples," and applied in Celtic mythology to the Island of Blessed Souls, an earthly paradise set in the Western seas.

Avanti. Another name for Ujjain, the capital of Malwa, often mentioned in classical Sanskrit literature.

Avare, L' (The Miser, 1668). A comedy by Molière. It is derived from Plautus' Aulularia. Harpagus, a wealthy miser, wishes to marry his daughter Elise to an old man, Anselme, since Anselme does not require a dowry. The miser himself wants to marry his cousin Cléante's beloved, Mariane. Cléante arranges the theft of his father's money box, and in order to regain his treasure Harpagus permits Cléante to marry Mariane. Elise is allowed to marry her beloved, Calêtre, when her father discovers him to be the son and heir of Anselme. A happy ending balances the grim picture of inhuman greed.

avatar (Sans., avatāra, descent; hence, the incarnation of a god). In Hindu mythology the advent to earth of a deity in a visible form. The 10 avatars of Vishnu are the most celebrated. The word is used metaphorically to denote a manifestation or embodiment of some idea or phase.

Ave atque vale! (Lat., "Hail and farewell!"). The words of Catullus at his brother's tomb.

Ave Maria, or Hail Mary or Angelic(al) Salutation. A prayer to the Virgin Mary. Its first phrases are based on the angel's address to Mary (the Annunciation, Luke 1:28) and the greeting of her cousin Elizabeth (Luke 1:42). The present form of the prayer was fixed by Pope Pius V in the 16th century. It has appeared in many musical settings, the most popular of which are by Schubert and Gounod. The smaller beads of a rosary are often called Aves or Hail Marys, the longer ones paternosters or Our Fathers.

Avernus. A lake in Campania in central Italy. Its sulphurous and mephitic vapors gave rise in ancient times to the belief that it was the entrance to the infernal regions. Hence, Avernus is used as a synonym for hell or the infernal regions.

Averroes or Averrhoes. Arabic name: Ibn-Rushd (1126–1198). Spanish Muslim philosopher and scholar. He is best known for his commentaries on Aristotle, which had an important influence on medieval Christian scholasticism. He also wrote treatises on astronomy, medicine, and jurisprudence. All his works were written in Arabic, but became widely known through Hebrew and Latin translations.

Avesta. The sacred book of the Zoroastrians and Parsees, dating in its present form from the third and fourth centuries A.D., collected from the ancient writings, sermons, and oral traditions of Zoroaster before 800 B.C. The books are sometimes called the Zend-Avesta from a misunderstanding of the term Avesta-Zend (Avesta means the text and zend its interpretation; hence the latter name has been given to the ancient Iranian language in which the Avistak-va-Zand is written).

It is only a fragment and consists of five parts: (1) the Yasna, the chief liturgical portion, including Gathas, or hymns; (2) the Vpered, another liturgical work; (3) the Vendidad, which, like the biblical Pentateuch, contains the laws; (4) the Yashts, dealing with stories of the different gods; (5) the Khordah, a book of private devotions.

Avignon captivity, the (1309–1377). The period of the residence of seven popes at the palace of Avignon in Provence, under the control of French kings. During the papal schism two anti-popes resided there from 1378 to 1408. Clement VI bought the palace in 1348, and it remained a papal possession until 1791.

Avvakum, Archpriest (1621–1682). A leader of the Old Believer religious sect in Russia. He is famous for his Life (Zhitie; 1672–1675), written in a racy mixture of Church Slavonic, the old church language, and Russian vernacular.

Awake and Sing! (1935). A play by Clifford Odets. It presents the various frustrations and tragedies of the Bergers, a lower-class Jewish family in the Bronx. The mother, with the best of intentions, browbeats her husband, forces her daughter to marry a man she doesn't love, and opposes her son's romance with a poor orphan. The results are disastrous but lead the one idealistic son to devote his life to the betterment of humanity.

Awkward Age, The (1899). A novel by Henry James. It concerns the emergence of an English society girl from "the awkward age" into maturity and understanding. A rival of her mother in love for young Vanderbilt, Nanda Brookeham is surrounded by older persons who are scheming andplotting. Vanderbilt marries neither her nor her mother, and Nanda, disillusioned by her friends, goes to live in the country home of Mr. Longden, an older man who had once been in love with her grandmother.

Axe-Helve, The (1917). A poem by Robert Frost. Written in blank verse, it tells of a conversation between Frost and a neighbor, and then describes the poet's visit to the neighbor's home. Osten-sibly the story of a craftsman who hates the inferior products of the machine age, the poem is reinforced by religious references which give it a deeper meaning.

Aymon, Four Sons of (Fr. Les Quatre Fils d'Aymon). French chanson de geste. Aymon is the father of Guiscard, Alard, Richard, and Renaud de Montauban, who escape from Charlemagne's court after Renaud kills the emperor's nephew. Charlemagne forces a long war on them until his paladins urge a settlement, whereupon Renaud goes... to Palestine to fight the Saracens. For Renaud's exploits in the Italian romances see RINALDO.

Aymot, Jacques (1513–1593). French humanist and translator. Tutor and then chaplain to Charles IX and Henry II, he later became bishop of Auxerre, which he made a center of humanism. He is best remembered for his translation (1559) of Plutarch's Lives.

Aytoun or Ayton, Sir Robert (1570–1638). Scottish poet and courtier. A friend of Ben Jonson, he was one of the first Scots to use English as a literary language. He is believed by some to be the author of the original version of Auld Lang Syne.

Aytoun, William Edmonston (1813–1865). Scottish poet and teacher. His best work consists of parodies of Tennyson, the Brownings, and other poets, and ballads in the vein of Scott. The former are collected in Bon Gaultier's Ballads (1845, with T. Martin); the latter in Lays of the Scottish Cavaliers (1848) and Ballads of Soiland (1858). He is also known as the originator of the name Spasmodic School for P. J. Bailey and his followers.

Azazel. A Hebrew name symbolizing an evil spirit living in the wilderness. It is mentioned in connection with services held on the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur), in which lots were cast on two goats; one for the Lord and the other for Azazel (Lev. 16). The goat for Azazel was referred to as the scapegoat. Milton uses the name for the standard-bearer of the rebel angels in Paradise Lost (1667).

Azeglio, Marchese d'. See Marchese Massimo Taparrelli D'Azeglio.

Azevedo, Aluizio (1857–1913). Brazilian novelist. The first exponent of naturalism in Brazil, Azevedo was a shrewd critic of contemporary society. His best-known work, O Mulato (1881), deals with the status of the mixed-blood in Brazil. He also wrote Casa de Pensão (1884), about the residents of a boarding house in Rio de Janeiro, and O Cortiço (1890), translated as A Brazilian Tenement.
Mr. In Samuel Richardson's novel Pamela, a gentleman of station who attempts to seduce Pamela, but ends by marrying her. Henry Fielding satirically expanded the initial "B" into "Booby" in Shamela (1741), his parody of Pamela, and in Joseph Andrews; some of the later editions of Pamela, however, attempted to avoid the implication by giving Mr. B. the name of Boothby.

Baal. An epithet for any of a number of ancient Semitic gods. A Semitic word meaning lord or possessor, it was usually applied to a god as lord of a city or other place. The title thus became applied to a great many local gods; even the Hebrew Yahweh was so referred to in earlier days by the ancient Israelites. Originally a sort of fertility demon, Baal became individualized in various localities, notably as the Babylonian Bel and the Canaanite Baal. As the storm-god, he plays the principal role in the Canaanite Poem of Baal. Variations of the name also occur in the Greek Belus and in such Carthaginian compounds as Hannibal. In Tyre, the local Baal was known as Melkarth. The worship of Baalim was firmly established in Canaan at the time of the Israelites' entry. The Israelites adopted many of the Canaanite rites in their own worship of Jehovah. Moses, Elijah, and other prophets denounced this form of Baalim worship as heathenism; hence Baal came to mean a false god. Baal was also a nature god symbolizing generation whose appearance, along with that of Ashtoreth (Ishtar), was considered a necessary prelude to spring.

Babar. The little elephant in a series of French children's books. Written and illustrated by Jean de Brunhoff (1899–1937), and translated into English, they proved very popular in the U.S.

Babbitt (1922). A satirical novel by Sinclair Lewis. It presents a portrait of George Folansbee Babbitt, a middle-aged realtor, booster, and joiner in Zenith, the Zip City. He is unimaginative, self-important, and hopelessly middle class. Withal, he is vaguely dissatisfied and tries to alter the pattern of his life by flirting with liberalism and by entering a liaison with an attractive widow, only to find that his dread of ostracism is greater than his desire for escape. He does, however, encourage the rebellion of his son, Ted, saying "Don't be scared of the family. No, nor all of Zenith. Nor of yourself, the way I've been." The name of the book identified an American type and gave a new word to the language.

Babbitt, Irving (1865–1933). American critic, essayist. One of the founders of the New Humanism movement of the second decade of the 20th century, Babbitt taught at Harvard for many years and in many ways epitomized the "professors" against whom H. L. Mencken and other "literary radicals" railed for their conservatism and traditionalism. A theorist about criticism rather than a critic per se, he saw in a return to the classical concept of man a possible solution to the excesses of romanticism and naturalism, and urged the necessity of moral and ethical standards for the evaluation of literature. His books include The New Laokoon (1910); The Masters of Modern French Criticism (1912); Rousseau and Romanticism (1919); Democracy and Leadership (1924), an extension in the political realm of his theories about literature; and On Being Creative (1932).

Babel, Isaak [Emmanuilovich] (1894–1939). Russian short-story writer. Babel was born in Odessa of a middle-class Jewish family. He developed an early interest in literature, particularly the works of Flaubert and Maupassant. His first published stories appeared in a journal edited by Maksim Gorki. The older writer recognized Babel's talent, but advised him to see more of life before doing more writing. During the civil war following the revolution, Babel was attached to the cavalry detachment of General Budenny fighting in Poland. He recorded his experiences in the volume of stories entitled Red Cavalry. The next year he published Odessa Tales about his early life in the port city. A memorable character of the Odessa stories is Benya Krik, the Jewish gangster leader.

The success of Babel's work was immense. His vivid descriptions of the brutality rampant during the war in Poland were rendered in short, exquisitely polished stories. A unique feature of his work was his habit of treating his romantic material in a sharply honed classical style, reminiscent of Maupassant at his most concise. Babel's knowledge of the powerful effect of concision in literature is revealed in a line from one of his stories: "There is no iron that can enter the human heart with such stupefying effect as a period placed at just the right moment." The effort it took to achieve his remarkable effects is revealed by Babel's friend, the writer Konstantin Paustovski in his reminiscences. Babel showed Paustovski a 200-page manuscript, which turned out to be 22 versions of one of Babel's short stories.

Babel's popularity waned in the 1930's. The chief reasons for this seem to have been his neglect of political themes in his work and a growing resentment, under Stalin, of the way he depicted the warriors of Budenny's regiment. He disappeared about 1938, apparently a victim of the purges then going on. He is reputed to have been executed or to have died in a concentration camp, but no real facts about his fate have been divulged.

Babel, Tower of. A structure erected after the Flood by the descendants of Noah when they reached Babylonia. According to Gen. 11, the plan was to build a tower that would reach to heaven; but Jehovah, to prevent its completion, "confounded their language" so they could not understand one another.

Thus, a tower of Babel has come to signify a visionary scheme, while the word babel itself has become associated with a confused uproar in which nothing can be heard but hubbub.

Babes in the Wood. Characters in an old English ballad and nursery tale.

Babevuf, Francois Noel. Pen name of Cracexus Babevuf (1760–1797). French journalist during the French Revolution. His ideas anticipated present-day communist theories. Accused of conspiring to overthrow the Directory and re-establish the constitution of 1793, he was guillotined.

Babington's conspiracy. A plot against the life of Elizabeth I. Anthony Babington (1561–1586), formerly a page to Mary, Queen of Scots, was induced by the priest John Ballard to organize a conspiracy in 1586 to assassinate Queen Elizabeth, lead a Catholic uprising, and release Mary from confinement. The plot was detected and Babington and a dozen others were executed. A few months later Mary was beheaded, largely on the grounds of evidence of her complicity in the plot supposedly contained in letters between her and Babington.

Baboon, Lewis. A character in John Arbuthnot's political satire The History of John Bull. He is meant to represent King Louis XIV of France and, in a larger sense, the French nation. Baboon is a play upon the word Bourbon.

Bacchus. See Oracle of the Holy Bottle.

Bacchanalia. Festivals held in ancient Rome in honor of Bacchus, the name under which the Greek god Dionysus was better known in Rome. Like the Greek Dionysia, the fest was eventually characterized by drunkenness, debauchery, and licentiousness of all kinds, so that the word bacchanalian came to mean wild and drunken.

bacchants (bakchoi). Followers of the Greek god Dionysus or Bacchus. Also known as maenads, they engaged in wild ritual dancing on wooded mountains, during which they tore apart and ate fawns and perhaps human victims. They are probably an oriental addition (see Cybele) to the cult of the Thracian god Dionysus. Their revels on Mount Cithaeron are detailed in Euripides' drama The Bacchae.

Bacchae, The (Bacchae; 408–406 B.C.). A tragedy by Euripides. It deals with the tragic punishment of Pentheus, King of Thebes, who imprisons Dionysus and is torn to pieces by his own mother. Agave, during a bacchanalian orgy. Gilbert Murray pointed out that this of all plays most closely resembles in form the Dionysian mysteries from which Greek tragedy sprang. (See Bacchae.)

Bacchelli, Riccardo (1891–__). Italian critic, novelist, dramatist, and poet. A writer of historical novels, he has been compared to Alessandro Manzoni because of the serenity of his outlook on life, his congenial humor, serious scholarship, and preoccupation with language and style.

Bacchelli was an artillery officer in World War I and the editor of La Ronda (1919–1923), an influential literary review published in Rome. The review proposed that contemporary Italian literature reaffirm its classical traditions by drawing inspiration from the Renaissance, Leopardi, and Manzoni.

Bacchelli's best-known work is the 2,000-page historical novel Il Malino del Po (1935–1940, pub. 1948–1950), translated as The Mill on the Po and Nothing New Under the Sun. The novel is a saga of Italian life from the Napoleonic Wars to World War I. The principals are several generations of the Saccerni family, Lombard millers whose gristmill stands for over a century on the banks of the River Po. The author draws from their story the conclusion that life itself is an unending flow of pain and sorrow, as regular and rhythmic in its course as the river that runs alongside the mill. Another historical novel, Il Diavolo di Pontilungo (1927), narrates the attempts of the Russian anarchist Michael Bakunin to foment a revolution in Italy and concludes with a description of an unsuccessful socialist revolt in Bologna (1864). Mal d'Africa (1934) recounts the African travels of the 19th-century Italian explorer Gavanzo Casati.

Bacchus. In Roman mythology, the god of wine. He was, in fact, a Greek god (Bakchos was one of the names of the Greek Dionysus), the Roman god of wine having been Liber. Bacchus was worshipped in the annual, riotous festival called the Bacchalia, similar to the Greek Dionysia. However, the fat and drunken Bacchus familiar from so many paintings of the Renaissance period was a later concept, completely out of keeping with the classic view of Bacchus as a handsome young man and a powerful god. In the Lusiad (1572) of Camoens, Bacchus is the guardian power of Islam and an evil demon of Zeus.

Bach, Johann Sebastian (1685–1750). Outstanding German composer of the late Baroque. He came of a family that produced many musicians in the 17th and 18th centuries. His vast output includes all types of music current at the time, except opera; he was also a violinist and a renowned organist. By the end of his life his compositions were considered old fashioned, even by his gifted composer sons. Though Bach's music attracted some attention from Mozart and others in the period 1750–1829, its modern revival may be said to date from Mendelssohn's revival, in the latter year of the St. Matthew Passion (1729). Other large choral works are St. John Passion (1723), Mass in B minor (1733–1738), and Christmas Oratorio (1734). Bach also wrote 198 cantatas for various occasions of the church year, 23 secular cantatas, orchestral music, chamber music, and outstanding works for organ, harpsichord, and clavicord. For the organ, he wrote sonatas, fantasias, preludes, fugues, toccatas, and 143 chorale preludes based on Lutheran hymn tunes; for harpsichord or organ, French suites, English suites, partitas, etc. The Italian concerto (1735), Goldberg variations (1742), and Das wohltemperierte Clavier (The Well-Tempered Clavier, 1722 and 1744). The last is two monumental sets of preludes and fugues in each of the 24 major and minor keys, written to exploit the advantages of equal temperament or tuning, which made it possible to play equally well in all keys; up till then this had not been possible.

Bachaumont, François de (1624–1702). French writer. He is coauthor with Claude-Emmanuel Chapel de Voyage en Provence et Languedoc (Journey to Provence and Languedoc, 1656), a humorous compilation in prose and verse of outrageous scenic and gastronomic descriptions, laced with literary satires and burlesques.

Bachelier de Salamanque, Le (1736). The last novel of Alain René Lesage. It is the story of the adventures of a young Spanish bachelor of arts, Don Chérubin de la Ronda, who meets a vast number of people in his profession of tutor. The novel is a vehicle for a cynical satire of the ruling classes: the nobility, the bourgeoisie, and the clergy. The picturesque plot, though Spanish in setting, is merely an excuse to penetrate the thousand and one turpitudes of French society, in which those who have succeeded in life have done so only by intrigue.

Bachiller, Irving [Addison] (1859–1950). American newspaperman and novelist. His most popular novel was Eden Holden (1900); the story of a young man in the middle years of the 19th century, it sold over 1,000,000 copies. Dri and I (1901) was a novel set at the time of the War of 1812. A Man for the Ages (1919) dealt with Lincoln. His other novels include Keeping Up with Lizzie (1911) and A Candle in the Wilderness (1930).

Bachofen, Johann Jakob (1815–1887). Swiss jurist and classical scholar, known for his recognition of a matrilineal principle in ancient societies. In Das Mutterrecht (Matriarchal Right, 1861), which has since been refuted, he claimed that the matrarchal stage precedes the patriarchal in the social development of all peoples.

Back to Methuselah (1922). A 5-play cycle by George Bernard Shaw. Extremely long and not very dramatically theatrical, this collection of plays is a satirical fantasy on the prolongation of life and the perfectibility of the human race. The scenes are laid in the Garden of Eden, in England at the time of the play's composition, and in successive stages of the future, until the span of life has been increased and man has become almost wholly intellect. This progress is accomplished, not through science, but through the strength of the human will engaged in creative evolution.

Bacon, Francis (1561–1626). English philosopher, statesman, and essayist. Having served as solicitor general and attorney general, he was appointed lord chancellor in 1618; he was created Baron Verulam in the same year and Viscount St. Albans in 1621. With the intention of becoming a "second Aristotle," he carried on scientific and philosophical investigations and planned to reorganize on an experimental basis the systems of thought and the practical methods of obtaining power over nature that were current in his day. He was violently opposed to reasoning from authority and the syllogistic quibbling to which scholastic philosophy had declined in the early 17th century, and argued always for clarity of observation and the development of keen critical faculties of mind.

Most of his work on philosophy and science was written in Latin. Bacon's most important writings are The Advancement of Learning and Novum Organum, which formed the first two parts of his projected Instauratio Magna; Sylva Sylvarum (1627); and New Atlantis. He is best known in the field of literature for his series of Essays. See Baconian Controversy.

Bacon, Frank (1864–1922). American actor and playwright. He is best known for his role of the amusing liar Lightnin' Bill Jones in Laggardin', a play he wrote in collaboration with Winchell Smith.

Bacon, Leonard (1887–1954). American poet and critic. Known for his satiric verse, he won the Pulitzer Prize with his book of poems, Sunderland Capture (1940). Other volumes of verse are Ulug Beg (1923), The Legend of Quincibald (1928), and Day of Fire (1944). Semi-Centennial (1939) is his autobiography.

Bacon, Nathaniel. See Bacon's Rebellion.

Bacon, Roger (c. 1214–1294). English philosopher and scientist. He was called "Doctor Mirabilis" or "the Admirable Doctor." His encyclopedic Opus Majus (1267) urged that in order to make the Roman Catholic Church the leader in the civilization of mankind, Christian studies should be expanded to include all the sciences; he placed great emphasis on the importance of mathematics and experimental science, disciplines practically ignored in the learning of the time. His writings indicate his own interest in optics, chemistry, and astrology, and he is credited with having foreseen the practical possibilities of the telescope, lenses to correct vision, gunpowder, and mechanical navigation and flight. His Opus Minus is an alchemical treatise; the Opus Terrium stresses the utility of scientific knowledge, saying that without it philosophy becomes absurd. In 1278 the Franciscans, whom he joined about 1250, declared his works heretical, and he was imprisoned until 1292. He was working on a "compendium of theological studies" when he died.

Because of his advanced thinking on the need for experimental science and its practical possibilities, the popular imagination credited him with all sorts of magical achievements, supposedly the result of a league with the Devil. These legends began gathering at the beginning of the 14th century and appear in such works as Robert Greene's comedy Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay (1589).

Baconian controversy. An argument, first advanced in the mid-18th century, that William Shakespeare did not write the plays attributed to him. The idea is based on the notion that Shakespearian, being a nobody from provincial Stratford, lacked the social background, education, and temperament to have written his masterpieces. The first claim for Sir Francis Bacon as the true author was put forth by William Henry Smith in 1856; the following year Delia Bacon made an elaborate defense for Bacon's authorship in The Philosophy of Shakespeare's Plays. New "proof," in the form of a cryptogram of Bacon's signature in some of the plays, was offered by Ignatius Donnelly in The Great Cryptogram (1888) and by Mrs. E. W. Gallup in The Bi-Lateral Cipher of Francis Bacon (1900). Other writers, not satisfied that the evidence of authorship pointed to Bacon, attempted to prove the plays were really the work of Edward de Vere, earl of Oxford; or Roger Manners, earl of Rutland; or William Stanley, earl of Derby; or Henry Wriothesley, earl of Southampton; or Christopher Marlowe. There is no evidence that any of these men except Marlowe (who died in 1593 at the age of 29) ever wrote a line of blank verse. In orthodox Shakespearean scholarship, these controversies are ignored and it is assumed that Shakespeare wrote the plays.

Baconian philosophy. A philosophical system oriented toward experimental science and based on the principles laid down by the English philosopher Francis Bacon in the second book of his Novum Organum.

Bacon's Epitaph. 2 elegiac poems, first published in 1814, on the death (1676) of Nathaniel Bacon, the leader of Bacon's Rebellion, "made by his man." The poems are attributed to John and Ann Cotton of Queen's Creek, Va., and express opposed views of Bacon's character. Most critics consider them to be among the best early American poems. See Burwell Papers.

Bacon's Rebellion (1676). An uprising of Virginia colonists, led by Nathaniel Bacon (1647–1676), a recent settler. Ostensibly the colonists wanted to quell Indian disturbances in the region, but they were actually protesting the dictatorial regime (1642–1676) of Governor William Berkeley (1606–1677). Although Bacon and his followers won some successes and burned Jamestown, his sudden death from fever resulted in the collapse of the rebellion.

Bactrian sage. A name given to Zarathustra, or Zarathustra, the founder of the Perso-Iranian religion, which flourished in Bactria (the modern Balkh) before 800 B.C.

Badebee (Fr., "open-mouthed"). In Rabelais' Gargantua and Pantagruel, the wife of Gargantua and mother of Pantagruel. The effort of giving birth to Pantagruel, as well as to a train of mules, dromedaries, and camels laden with salted and smoked foods, costs Badebec her life.

Badon or Mount Badon, battle of (c. A.D. 520). In Arthurian legend, the place of King Arthur's great victories over the pagan Saxons invaders. See Annales Cambriae.

Badroulboudour. In the Arabian Nights, the daughter of the sultan of China who becomes the wife of Aladdin. Twice she nearly causes his death; by exchanging "the wonderful lamp" for a new copper one, and by giving hospitality to the false Fatima.

Baedeker, Karl (1801–1859). German printer who began the publication of a widely known series of guidebooks. His name has since become almost synonymous with guidebook.

Baena, Cancionero de. See Cancionero de Baena.

Bagehot, Walter (1826–1877). English economist and critic. He was editor of the Economist (1860–1877) and is known for his lucid, highly readable, idiosyncratic works on political economy, history, and literature. His The English Constitution (1867) is a classic in its field; other works are Physics and Politics (1872) and Literary Studies (1878).

Baglioni. A notorious Italian family. It dominated the affairs of the city of Perugia during the medieval period and the early Renaissance. When they were not slaughtering the rival Oddi family and other enemies, they were kept busy by internal feuds.

Bagnold, Enid. Maiden and pen name of Lady Roderick Jones (1899– ). English novelist and playwright. She is the author of the successful novels Serena Blandish (1925) and National Velvet. In later life she wrote such plays as The Chalk Garden (1956) and The Chinese Prime Minister (1961).

Bahaism. The doctrines of the Bahais, emphasizing the spiritual unity of mankind, advocating universal peace, and imbued with mild Oriental mysticism. The Bahais succeeded the Persian religious sect of Babism. Bahaism was founded (1863) by Molla Husayn Ali.

Bahr, Hermann (1863–1934). Austrian critic and playwright. Like the writers of German naturalism, he wished to see the growth of a literary movement which would take account of the peculiarities of the modern age; but in his Die Überwindung des Naturalismus (The Overcoming of Naturalism, 1891) he made it clear that he favored a more sophisticated style than that of naturalism. His best-known play is Das Konzert (The Concert, 1909), an urban and witty comedy.

Bahtote. Also known as Bajardo or Bayard. Rinaldo's horse, of a bright bay color, once the property of Amadis of Gaul. He was found by Malagigi, the wizard, in a cave guarded by a dragon, which the wizard slew. According to tradition he is still alive, but flies at the approach of man, so that no one can ever hope to catch him.

Boiardo's Orlando Innamorato, the pagan king Gradasso comes to Paris to fight Charlemagne's paladins in hopes of winning the horse and Orlando's Durindana, a sword supposed to have belonged to Hector of Troy.
Baif, Jean Antoine de (1532–1589). French poet and member of the Pléiade, who is remembered not so much for his poetry as for his inexhaustible interest in experimentation. Besides writing love poetry—Amours de Méline (1552) and Amours de Francine (1555)—he tried his hand at scientific poetry in Le Premier des Mâtures (1567), championed a reform in spelling, and introduced his own metric form, le vers baifin. Perhaps his most promising project was the short-lived Académie de Poésie et de Musique, which he persuaded Charles IX to found in 1570 in the interest of uniting the two arts.

Bailey, Nathan or Nathaniel (d. 1742). English lexicographer. His Universal Etymological English Dictionary (1721) marks the beginning of modern English lexicography in the sense of objective registration of the complete body of words in the language. It served as the point of departure for the famous dictionary of Samuel Johnson.

Bailey, Philip James (1816–1902). English poet. He wrote Festus, a long and heavily moralized version of the legend of Faust which won fleeting critical esteem and enduring popularity throughout the 19th century. The poem alternates ratiocinative writing with bursts of nebulous rhapsody; the portions in the latter manner were imitated by the Spasmodic School of poets. Festus kept reappearing in new and larger editions, incorporating other works of Bailey, until by 1889 it had quadrupled in size (40,000 lines).

Ball, Harry. See Canterbury Tales.

Balbim. The name given to two great Muslim fears. The Lesser begins on the new moon of the month Shawwal, at the termination of the fast of Ramadan, and lasts three days. The Greater is celebrated on the 10th day of the 12th month, Dhul Hijja, lasts for four days, and forms the concluding ceremony of the pilgrimage to Mecca. It comes 70 days after the Lesser Bairam.

Balsecul. See Lord Kiersbreech.

Bajardo. See Bajardo.

Bajazet (1672). A tragedy by Jean Racine. The play is purportedly based on actual events that took place in Constantinople in 1638. It depicts the imprisoned Bajazet's pretense of love for the sultana Roxane, who plans to free him in order to marry him and place him on the throne, which is to be seized from her husband. Discovering Bajazet's love for the princess Atalide, Roxane allows him to be executed; discovering her infidelity, the sultan orders Roxane's execution; and, discovering her lover's death, Atalide commits suicide.

Baker, Ray Stannard. Pen name, David Grayson (1870–1946). American journalist and authorized biographer of Woodrow Wilson. Baker joined the staff of McClure's Magazine during the muckraking days and continued his contributions to that movement as an editor of the American Magazine. (See Muckrakers.) Under his pen name, he wrote a series of essays which first appeared in the latter magazine and were later published in book form as Adventures in Contentment (1907) and similar volumes.

baker, the. A name applied to Louis XVI of France. He was called "the baker" (le boulanger), his queen Marie Antoinette, "the baker's wife" (la boulangère), and the dauphin "the shop boy" (le petit mitron) by the rabble who, after besieging Versailles on Oct. 6th, 1789, escorted them to Paris. When the king learned from them that there was a bread famine in Paris, he ordered supplies of flour sent there. During the return to Paris, chariots loaded with wheat and flour preceded the king's carriage, and National Guards carried loaves of bread, or sausages, on the end of their bayonets.

Bakunin, Mikhail Aleksandrovich (1814–1876). Russian revolutionary and anarchist leader. Born into a cultured noble family, Bakunin was educated at a military school in St. Petersburg, and served for a short time as an army officer. He resigned from the army and moved to Moscow, where he met the radical journalists Vissarion Belinsky and Alexander Herzen and plunged into the study of German philosophy, which was in vogue with the Russian intellectuals of the time. In 1840, Bakunin went to Berlin to continue his studies. He befriended the novelist Ivan Turgenev, who was also studying in Berlin. Turgenev is reputed to have used Bakunin as the model for the idealistic hero of his novel Rudin. While in Berlin, Bakunin published one of his most important early articles, Reaktsiya u germanii (Reaction in Germany, 1842). In the article is the phrase that was later adopted as an anarchist slogan: "The passion for destruction is also a creative passion."

Bakunin took part in revolutionary agitation in Germany, Austria, and France during 1848. He was arrested and extradited to Russia the following year. After being in prison for almost 10 years he was exiled to Siberia, from which he escaped in 1861, making his way to Europe via Japan and the U.S. He remained in Europe for the rest of his life, mostly in Geneva and London. By the late 1860's, Bakunin's anarchist views were fully formed, and he expounded them in the periodical Narodnoe Delo (The People's Cause), which he published in Geneva.

Bakunin was a tireless, if not always effective, revolutionary schemer. An observer of his activities during the Paris revolt of 1848 said of him: "On the first day of a revolution he is a treasure; on the second he ought to be shot." This kind of revolutionary zeal led to Bakunin's expulsion from the First International in 1872 on charges of opposing the leadership, headed by Karl Marx, and of setting up a rival revolutionary organization.

Balaam. In the Old Testament (Num. 22–23), a prophet of Pethor whom Balak, king of Moab, had persuaded to prophesy against the Israelites invading his territory. On the way to utter the curse, Balaam was forced three times to beat the ass upon which he was riding when it stopped short, blocked by God's angel. "Then Jehovah opened the eyes of Balaam and he saw the angel of the Lord standing in the way" (Num. 22:31). Balaam refused to curse Israel, but pronounced his blessing instead.

Balan. The name of a strong and courageous giant in many medieval romances. He was the father of Sir Fierabras, a paladin in Charlemagne's court. In the Arthurian cycle, he is brother of Sir Batin.

balance of power. A policy of preventing one nation from gaining so much power that it will be in a position to threaten the security of other nations. It was formulated by Prince Metternich at the Congress of Vienna in 1815, and became a leading principle of the continental policy of Great Britain with regard to France and Germany. In European history after Napoleon it played an important part in the wars and shifting diplomatic alliances of the nations on the continent.

Balaustion. An imaginary character of ancient Greece in Browning’s Balaustion’s Adventure (1871) and Aristophanes’ Apology, including a Transcript from Epitaphs, being the last Adventure of Balaustion (1875). Balaustion’s Adventure is the most part a free version of Epitaphs’ drama Acrisius.

Balbec. The French seaside resort visited by the narrator in Marcel Proust’s Remembrance of Things Past. It is based on resorts of the Normandy coast, such as Trouville and Cabourg.

Balboa, Vasco Núñez de (1475–1517). Spanish explorer. Sailing to America in 1500, Balboa became leader of the small colony of Darien on the isthmus of Panama. In 1513, after an arduous trek across the isthmus with 190 picked companions, Balboa discovered the Pacific Ocean, which he named the “South Sea,” and took possession of it in the name of Spain. He later incurred the enmity of Pedro Arias de Avila (known as Pedrarrias), governor of Panama, who had him beheaded on a trumped-up charge of treason.

Balbuena or Valbuena, Bernardo de (1568–1627). Spanish-born Mexican poet and bishop of Puerto Rico. Balbuena is remembered mainly for two long poems, both examples of the baroque style in literature: La grandeza mexicana (1604), a patriotic description of Mexico City, and El Bernardo (1624), a fantastic epic of chivalry.

Balchin, Nigel (1908– ). English novelist. He is the author of The Small Back Room (1943), a story of wartime scientific researchers, or “back room boys”; Mine Own Executioner (1943), a psychological thriller; and Seen Dimly Before Dawn (1962), a novel about a 15-year-old English schoolboy.

Balcony, The (Le Balcon; 1956). A play by Jean Genet. Men who come to Madame Irma’s brothel to enact their secret ambitions begin to fulfill the roles of the images they have been playing. All, however, find that active responsibility is less satisfying than their dream projections. The Chief of Police discovers that he cannot become the modern hero until a customer comes to enact a heroic image of him.

Balder or Baldur. In Norse mythology, the god of light, summer, innocence, and purity, called “the good.” The son of Odin and Frigga, he dwelt at Breidhollak, one of the mansions of Asgard. He is said to have been slain by his rival Hoder while fighting for possession of the beautiful Nanna after Holder had obtained Miming’s sword, by which alone Balder could be wounded. Another legend tells that Frigga bound all things by oath not to harm him, but accidentally omitted the mistletoe. Loki learned this and armed his blind brother Hoder with a mistletoe twig, with which, after all else had been tried, Balder was slain. His huge ship was used for his funeral pyre, where he was united by his faithful wife Nanna. His death brought general consternation to the gods, and formed the prelude to their final overthrow. See Vili.

Among modern poems written around the Balder legend are Matthew Arnold’s Balder Dead, William Morris’ Funeral of Balder, Robert Buchanan’s Balder the Beautiful, and Longfellow’s Tegner’s Drapa.

Balderton, Caleb. In Scott’s Bride of Lammermoor, the intensely loyal but tedious old butler of the master of Ravenswood. His ingenuity in concealing the signs of poverty is equalled only by the faithfulness with which he serves the impoverished Ravenswoods without hope of reward.

Baldovino Di Buglione (Baldwin of Bouillon). The brother of Goffredo (Godfrey of Bouillon), commander of the Crusaders in Tasso’s epic Gerusalemme Liberata. Baldovino, one of the best fighters in the Christian camp, staunchly defends his brother when the Crusaders rebel against Goffredo’s leadership.

Bald Sopranó, The (La Cantatrice chauve; 1948). An antiplay by Eugène Ionesco. It burlesques the nonsensical stufiness of a middle-class English home by stringing together the clichés of a foreign language phrase-book.

Baldwin, Faith [Cuthrell] (1893– ). American novelist. Miss Baldwin, who has been called a "circulating-library" novelist, has written with great popular success a steady stream of lightly sentimental books for the feminine audience. Her many titles include Those Difficult Years (1925), Three Women (1926), Woman on Her Way (1946), Blaze of Sunlight (1959), and Testament of Trust (1960).

Baldwin, James (1924– ). American novelist and essayist. His first novel, Go Tell It on the Mountain (1953), tells of the religious awakening of a 14-year-old Negro boy living in the Harlem section of New York City, where Baldwin himself was born. With this book Baldwin established his reputation as a writer of deep insight. His nonfiction, which includes Notes of a Native Son (1955), Nobody Knows My Name: More Notes of a Native Son (1961), and The Fire Next Time (1963), contains a passionate and clearly articulate statement on the suffering of the American Negro and an angry indictment of a society that permits such conditions to exist. Many feel that Baldwin is more distinguished as an essayist than as a novelist, although both of his later novels have received critical praise. Giovanni’s Room (1956), a novel about a homosexual relationship, is set in Paris, where Baldwin exiled himself for a number of years. Another Country (1961) is a powerful though uneven novel of personal relationships among Negroes and whites.

Bale, John (1495–1563). English author and prelate. He was one of the most outspoken and vituperative critics of Roman Catholicism at the time of the English Reformation. A protégé of Thomas Cromwell and under Cromwell’s patronage, Bale produced a number of morality plays and interludes attacking the Catholic clergy. The most important of these is his Kyng Johan (c. 1548), considered the first example of the Chronicle Play later developed by Shakespeare. Bale is also noted for his Illustrium Majoris Britanniae Scriptorum

Balfour Declaration (1917). An assurance by Great Britain of protection for the Jewish settlement of Palestine. After British forces had captured Palestine, the British Government declared its support for limited Jewish immigration into the area. Arthur James Balfour, the foreign secretary, drew up the statement of policy, which thus acquired his name. The Balfour Declaration formed the basis for British policy on the mandate of Palestine for the next 30 years.

Ballin, Sir. One of the knights of the Round Table in Arthurian legend, brother of Sir Balan. In Malory's Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469), the two brothers unwittingly kill each other in single combat, neither recognizing the other until just before death. At their request they are buried in one grave by Merlin. Tennyson gives a much altered version of the story in Idylls of the King (1859-1872).

Balisand (1924). A novel by Joseph Hergetheimer. The story of a Federalist in tidewater Virginia in the days of the Revolution and afterward, Balisand pictures the conflict between the ideals of aristocracy and Jeffersonian democracy.

Balisarda. In the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto a famous sword made in the garden of Orgagna by the sorceress Falerina. It has the power to cut through even enchanted substances and was given to Ruggiero for the purpose of killing Orlando:

He knew with Balisarda's lightest blows,
Nor helm, nor shield, nor cuirass could avail,
Nor strongly tempered plate, nor twisted mail.

Ball, Hugo (1886-1927). German writer and actor. He was one of the founders of the Dada movement in Zürich (1916). His Hermann Hesse, Sein Leben und sein Werk (Hermann Hesse, His Life and Work, 1927), a biography, stems from a personal acquaintance with the novelist.

Ballad. A narrative song, originally chiefly of popular origin. Ballads fall into types according to subject and include the domestic tragedy, concerning a murder or family feud; the historical ballad, dealing with historical events; the outlaw ballad, celebrating a popular rebel against established law, such as Robin Hood or Jesse James; the Scottish coronach, or lament ballad; and the folkloric ballad. Among early ballads, coronach and historical ballads and those involving romance elements were usually composed by minstrels attached to noblemen's courts and were written with a sense of literary values and for a definite audience. The other types were popular products transmitted by oral tradition and had much charm but little artistic value. In the U.S. many folk ballads are survivals or variants of the old English ballads. However, there are a number of indigenous types dealing with such subjects as occupational pursuits (Casey Jones), the Negroes and other national or ethnic groups (John Henry),

English and Scottish ballads dating from the 14th to the 16th century are to be found in Percy's Reliques of Ancient Poetry and Child's English and Scottish Popular Ballads. Many literary ballads have been written by later poets; among them may be mentioned Campbell's Lord Ullin's Daughter, Scott's Rosabelle, Rosetti's Sister Helen, and Stephen Vincent Benét's Ballad of William Sycamore.

Ballade. A traditional verse form first appearing in Provençal literature. The ballade was developed in France and reached its height during the 14th century, when it first came into English. François Villon (15th century) probably wrote the best-known ballades in literary history.

The ballade consists of three stanzas and an envoi, and its distinguishing feature is a refrain that appears as the last line of each stanza. The stanza may be of seven, eight, or ten lines. The ballade royal, written in rhythme royal, has a fourth stanza instead of an envoi. Only three or four rhymes are used in all. The refrain adds to the meaning of the poem in every occurrence; the envoi is usually addressed to the poet's patron or to someone concerned with the subject of the poem. Chaucer's Ballade of Good Counsel and Swinburne's Ballad of Dreamland are good examples in English. See Chant royal.

Ballad of Dead Ladies, The (1869). An English translation by Dante Gabriel Rossetti of the famous Ballade des dames du temps jadis of the medieval French poet François Villon.

Ballad of Reading Gaol, The (1898). A poem by Oscar Wilde. It is the study of a man condemned to die and is drawn from the author's experiences in the prison of the title.

Ballata. An Italian dance song popular among the folk as well as the learned during the Middle Ages and the Renaissance. Derived from the Italian word for dance (ballo), it was usually made up of a stanza of varying length and a two-line refrain intended for a soloist and a chorus of dancers. Ballate were written by Boccaccio, Poliziano, Lorenzo de' Medici, and many others. Many were set to music by such famous composers as Francesco Landini.

Ballet. An art form combining music, dance, and pantomime. Ballet originated in ancient Roman pantomimic performances, and was a popular entertainment at the courts of the Italian princes. In the 17th century Catherine de' Médicis imported ballet to France, where it acquired the corps de ballet, elaborate sets and costumes, and dramatic plots, often the work of leading poets and playwrights. After the French Revolution, ballet in western Europe became an adjunct to the opera, but survived in Russia in its classical form. The ballet of the 20th century, largely the creation of the Ballet Russe (Russian ballet) of Serge Diaghilev, is a synthesis of classical dance with modern dance of the sort pioneered by the American Isadora Duncan. Contemporary ballet can range from pure dance, without dramatic plot or incident, to danced drama, with fully developed plot and characterization, lacking only speech. Balletic elements have infiltrated and influenced opera, films, and stage plays.
balm. A curative. In the Bible, Jeremiah asks, "Is there no balm in Gilead?" meaning is there no medicine, or consolation (Jer. 8:22). "Balm" in this passage is the Geneva Bible's translation of the Hebrew sori, which probably means mastic, the resin yielded by the mastic tree, Pistacia terebinthus, which was formerly used in many medicines. In Wyclif's Bible the word is translated "gumme," and in Coverdale's "tricle." Balm of Gilead is also the name given to the black or balsam poplar.

Baltmont, Konstantin Dmitriyevich (1867-1943), Russian poet. He was the first of the Russian symbolists to become widely popular, primarily because of the musical quality of his poetry. His first work appeared in 1894, followed by other collections and translations, chiefly from English poetry. His favorite foreign poets were Shelley and Poe. Baltmont emigrated after the revolution and lived in France until his death.

Balor. In the Gaelic mythological cycle, a Fomorian giant with an evil eye, which kills whomever it is turned on. In the tale Battle of Mottura, he is slain by Lug who casts a stone from his sling into the eye of Balor, so that the eye comes "out through the back of his head."

Balsamo, Giuseppe. See Count Alessandro di Cagliostro.

Balthazar. (1) One of the three Magi. (2) In Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors, a merchant and friend of Antipholus of Syracuse.

(3) A servant to Don Pedro in Shakespeare's Much Ado About Nothing.

(4) One of the four novels in Lawrence Durrell's Alexandria Quartet.

Balue, Jean de la (1422-1491). French cardinal and politician. Accused of treason by Louis XI, he was imprisoned, it is said, in an iron cage. After 11 years he was freed as a result of papal intervention. Baluc is a character in Scott's Quintin Durward (1823).

Baly or Bali. One of the great kings in the legends of India. He founded the city called by his name, redressed wrongs, upheld justice, was generous and charitable, so that at death he became one of the judges of hell. One day a dwarf asked the mighty monarch to allow him to measure three of his own paces for a hut to dwell in. Baly smiled and gave him permission. The first pace of the dwarf encompassed the earth, the second the heavens, and the third the infernal regions. Baly realized immediately that the dwarf was an incarnation of Vishnu and worshiped him. Vishnu made Baly king of hell and permitted him to revisit the earth once a year, on the first full moon of November.

Balzac, Honoré de (1799-1850). French novelist. Born at Tours, Balzac attended the Sorbonne where he acquired a passionate interest in literature. Unsuccessful experiments in the sensational novel and increasing debts marked his early career. At the age of 30, Balzac published his first successful novel, Les Chouans, and began the literary career that was to become as astounding as it was important—he wrote more than 90 novels and tales. As in Stendhal and Flaubert, the romantic and the realistic coexist in both Balzac's character and his writings. Considered to be a founder of the realistic school, Balzac uses vast reams of meticulous detail and faithfully depicts ordinary and undistinguished lives. Carefully documented, his novels are objective in their point of view and wide in their scope. Juxtaposed, however, with these realistic elements are the flagrantly romantic qualities of melodramatic plots, violent passions, and rhetorical passages. Balzac's characters are romantic in their extremism. Like the men and women of Dickens, they are painted in such bold strokes that they move away from human reality. Character traits, in such people as M. Grandet or Père Goriot, become heightened and exaggerated.

La Comédie Humaine is Balzac's tour de force, his masterpiece. The product of 20 years of creative labor, La Comédie Humaine is an attempt to present a complete social history of France in a thorough and scientific manner. The conception alone testifies to Balzac's almost superhuman energy and his unfailing vitality. Some of the finest novels in the series include Eugénie Grandet, Le Père Goriot, La Recherche de l'Absolu, and César Birotteau. In style, Balzac's works are not graceful and polished. A strain of coarseness in the man and the work, a lack of concern with delicacy and subtlety, contributed to the clumsy strength of his prose. Balzac worked in breadth, not depth, and on his enormous canvas an unwieldly but intensely alive panoramic vision of France took shape.

Ban, King. In Arthurian legend (e.g., Malory's Morte d'Arthur), the king of Benwick and father of Sir Launcelot.

Bancroft, George (1800-1891). American diplomat and historian. A Democrat when most men of his background in Massachusetts were Whigs, Bancroft was named collector of the port of Boston as a reward for his party services in 1837. He later served as secretary of the navy and as minister to Great Britain and to Germany. He is best known, however, as the author of a 10-volume History of the United States (1834-1874), which he revised and cut to six volumes in 1876. A final revision (1883-1885) contained a volume on the History of the Formulation of the Constitution. Bancroft's historical work, which reflects his ardent faith in democracy and in the American people, has sometimes been compared to a Fourth-of-July oration. Although it is often considered outmoded, it is representative of 19th-century American nationalism.

Bandello, Matteo (1485-1561). Italian author. His Novelliere (1554), a collection of more than 200 short tales (see Novella) which were translated into French and English, provided the basic plots for Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, Much Ado About Nothing, and Twelfth Night.

Banerjee, Tarashankar (1898- ). Bengal's greatest living novelist. His writings are largely concerned with the decay of the landlord class and the realistic attitude toward the oppressed peasants in Bengal's villages. Rai Kamal (1934) is considered his greatest work, but his enormously prolific output makes it difficult to assess the quality of his achievement.

Bang, Herman Joachim (1857-1912). Danish novelist and short-story writer. Acute sensitivity, loneliness, and compassion for those who suffer color all his work. After an abortive stage career, Bang turned to writing; his work is sometimes... marked, however, by a certain preciousness and affectation that recalls the actor. Tine (1889) is a critical account of the weakness shown by the Danes in the defeat of 1864. In the novel Det hvide Hus (The White House, 1898), he paints a vivid reminiscence of his childhood and of his mother, who died when he was 14. Ved Vejen (By the Wayside, 1886) and Ludvigsbakke (Ida Brandt, 1896) are both tragic idylls, which depict with sympathy the drab, gray lives of unhappy women. Although his subjects are naturalistic, Bang never attempts detachment, but views the world from the perspective of his own dramery and isolation. His impressionistic style is delicate and graceful.

Bangorian controversy. A theological war of words. It was stirred up by a sermon preached March 31, 1717, before George I, by Dr. Hoadly, bishop of Bangor, on the text, "My kingdom is not of this world," the argument being that Christ had not delegated His power or authority to either king or clergy. Arguing against High Church prerogative, Hoadly denied virtually all independent political power to the Established Church. Hoadly was strongly attacked on this point by William Law. The sermon, which was printed by royal command, led to such discord in Convocation that this body was prorogued, and from that time till 1852 was allowed to meet only as a matter of form.

Banks, John (c. 1650–1706). English dramatist. He wrote the tragedies Virtue Betrayed, or Anna Bullen (1682) and The Island Queens, or The Death of Mary, Queen of Scotland (pub. 1684).

Banks' horse. A horse called Marocco trained to do all manner of tricks. It belonged to one Banks about the end of the reign of Queen Elizabeth. One of Marocco's supposed exploits was the ascent of the steeple of old St. Paul's. He is frequently mentioned in contemporary literature.

Bankside. The southern bank of the Thames River. In Elizabethan times it was outside the city limits of London and therefore suitable for the production of plays. (Puritan opposition to the theaters outlawed the presentation of theatrical events within the city.) Shakespeare's Globe was located on the Bankside.

Banquo. In Shakespeare's Macbeth, the thane of Lochaber and a general in the king's army. He is slain by order of Macbeth because the witches had foretold that his descendants would reign over Scotland. His ghost later appears to Macbeth at a banquet, though it is invisible to the others present. Described as having a "royalty of nature," a "dauntless temper of mind," and a "wisdom that doth guide his valor," he serves as a foil to the ambition-driven Macbeth.

banshee. The domestic spirit of certain Irish or Highland Scottish families. Banshees were supposed to take an interest in the welfare of the family, and to wail at the death of one of its members. The word is the Old Irish ben sidhe, a woman of the elves or fairies.

Banville, Théodore de (1823–1891). French poet, dramatist, and man of letters. Banville was a contributor to the Parnasse Contemporain (1866). His best collections of poetry are Les Stalactites (1846), Le Sang de la coupe (1857), and Les Exilés (1867). See PARNASSIANS.

banzai (Jap. ban, ten thousand; sai, year). A Japanese cheer of enthusiasm or victory.

Baptize. To baptize is the rite of Christian initiation. It is performed by pouring or sprinkling water on a person, or by immersing him briefly in water, accompanied usually with the formula "I baptize thee in the name of the Father, and of the Son, and of the Holy Ghost." The rite is held to wash away the stain of ORIGINAL SIN and to make the recipient a member of the Christian church. Much controversy has surrounded the mode of administration, and the age at which baptism should be administered. See ANABAPTISTS; SACRAMENT.

Baptist. In Shakespeare's Taming of the Shrew, a rich gentleman of Padua, the father of Katharina and Bianca.

Barabbas. The robber and insurrectionary leader whom Pilate released from prison instead of Jesus, according to the custom that, at the feast of Passover, one prisoner, by popular demand, should be freed (Matt. 27).

Various baptismal practices ridiculed in Daniel Deafly's The Dippers Dipt (1660).
Barabbas (1950). A novel by Pär Lagerkvist. The book tells the story of the fate of Barabbas, the criminal who was released instead of Christ, by Pilate. A reproulable, Barabbas is strangely affected by the Crucifixion and drawn, almost against his will, toward Christ's believers. Tortured by doubt, isolated from his fellow human beings, Barabbas seeks some certain meaning in existence. He dies with a cry of uncertainty still on his lips. Lagerkvist uses the biblical story to express his vision of man's anguish, his loneliness, and his desperate quest for meaning. He offers no simple, sure solution, but he does offer an intense compassion.

Barbara Allan (1724). A ballad by Allan Ramsay, which appears in Percy's Reliques. Sir John Grehme is dying of love for Barbara Allan. Barbara goes to see him and, drawing aside the curtain, says, "Young man, I think ye're dyin'." She then leaves him, but she has not gone more than a mile away when she hears the death-bell toll and bitterly regrets what she has said.

Barbara Frietchie (1863). A poem by John Greenleaf Whittier. The central incident in the poem is the fictional encounter between Barbara Frietchie and Stonewall Jackson. He forbade his Confederate troops to harm her, when she prominently displayed a Union flag. Ninety-six years old, she stood at her window in Fredericktown:

"Shoot, if you must, this old gray head,
But spare your country's flag," she said.

Barbarossa (It., "red-beard"). The surname attached to Frederick I (1123?–1190). King of Germany and Holy Roman emperor (1152–1190), he was a gifted ruler who helped unite Germany, but spent much of his time in the subjugation of Italy. He died on his way to the Third Crusade. There was a legend that he never died, but is still sleeping in the Kyffhäuser in Thuringia. There he sits at a stone table with his six knights, waiting the "fulness of time," when he will come from his cave to rescue Germany from bondage, and give her the foremost place of all the world. His beard has already grown through the table's slab, but must wind itself thrice round the table before his second advent. This legend originally grew up about Frederick's equally remarkable grandson, Frederick II.

Barbe-bleue. See Bluebeard.

Barberino, Andrea da (c. 1370–1431). Tuscan cantastorie or minstrel and author of popular prose narratives of romantic material. I Reali di Francia (The Nobility of France) deals with the Carolingian heroes and feasts; Guerriero il Meschino (Guerrino the Wretched) is his own creation of epic material, and is still popular today.

Barber of Seville, The (1775). The title of a comedy by Beaumarchais, and of two operas, one by Rossini (1816) and the other by Giovanni Paisiello (c. 1776), both based on the play. Figaro, a rascal of a barber, aids his former master, Count Almaviva, to gain entrance to the house of Bartholomew, so that the count can woo the latter's ward, Rosine, a beautiful young girl with whom Almaviva is in love. He succeeds with Figaro's help in marrying her in spite of old Bartholomew's precautions.

Barber's pole. A spirally painted pole, striped in red and white, displayed outside barber shops. A relic of the days when the callings of barber and surgeon were combined, it is symbolic of the winding of a bandage round the arm previous to blood-letting. The gilt knob at its end represents a brass basin, which is sometimes actually suspended on the pole.

Barbey d'Aurevilly, Jules (1808–1889). French novelist and critic. A minor romantic, Barbey d'Aurevilly is the author of two excellent novels, L'Ensercelé (1854) and Le Chevalier des Touches (1864). Writing as literary or dramatic critic for such papers as the Constitutionnel, he produced reviews that were vigorous and perceptive, if somewhat prejudiced by his Royalist and Roman Catholic sympathies.

Barbizon school. The name given to a group of French landscape painters. Opposed to the classical teachings of the Academy, they withdrew and, from 1830 to 1870, made their center at Barbizon in the forest of Fontainebleau, seeking a new directness of observation from nature. Among them were Jean Baptiste Camille Corot, Jean François Millet, Théodore Rousseau, and Charles Daubigny.

Barbour, John (1316–1395). Scottish poet. He was archbishop of Aberdeen in 1375 and one of the auditors of the exchequer in 1372, 1382, and 1384. He is best known for his epic poem, The Brut. Other poems, almost certainly his, include Legend of Troy and Legends of the Saints, both translations of works of Guido da Colonna.

Barbusse, Henri (1873–1935). French novelist and journalist. Barbusse is most famous for Under Fire (Le Feu; 1916), a brutally realistic picture of the absurdity of war. Other novels include L'Enfer (The Inferno, 1908), Clarté (Light, 1919), and Les Enchaînements (Chains, 1925).

Barchester Towers (1857). One of the best known of the novels of Anthony Trollope in the Barchester series. A sequel to The Warden, it is a novel of clerical intrigue showing the struggle between the trenchant Mrs. Proudie, the bishop's wife, and the insidious chaplain, Mr. Slope. Each wishes to become the dominant voice in the quiet cathedral town of Barchester. Mrs. Proudie eventually triumphs.

Barclay, Alexander (1475–1552). English poet and divine. Barclay is famous for The Ship of Fools (The Shyp of Folyes of the World, 1509), a satire on English life based on the German Das Narrenschiff by Sebastian Brant. He wrote a volume of Elegories (1513), which is considered to be one of the earliest examples of pastoral verse in English. He also translated some of the Latin poetry of Aeneas Silvius (1405–1464), who became Pope Pius II.

Barclay, Florence (1862–1921). English popular novelist. Her The Rosary was sensationallly successful. Her ingredients were love, blood, tears, and purple religiosity.

Bard, The (1757). A Pindaric ode by Thomas Gray, concerning a prophecy made by a Welsh bard to the invading King Edward I of England. It is based on Welsh legendary material and contains the famous line "Weave the warp and weave the woof." The central idea of the poem is that mankind from earliest times has been visited by the highest poetic inspiration.
Bardell, Mrs. In Charles Dickens' Pickwick Papers, a widowed landlady of "apartments for single gentlemen" in Goswell Street. Long an admirer of Mr. Pickwick, she misinterprets some innocent remarks of his as a proposal of marriage and is induced by the unprincipled Dodson and Fogo to sue for breach of promise. A verdict is obtained against Pickwick, but Mrs. Bardell is subsequently arrested for refusing to pay the costs of the trial and lodged in prison.

Bard of Avon. A popular epithet for William Shakespeare, who was born and buried at Stratford on Avon.

Bardolph. Sir John Falstaff's corporal in Shakespeare's Henry IV: Part I and Part II and The Merry Wives of Windsor. In Henry V he is promoted to lieutenant. He is a lowbred, drunken swagrener whose red, pimply nose wins him the nickname "Knight of the Burning Lamp."

Barea, Arturo (1897-1957). Spanish novelist. Exiled as a result of the Spanish Civil War, he is best known for his autobiographical novel, The Forging of a Rebel (La forja de un rebelde; 1951), originally published in English in three parts: The Forge (La forja), The Track (La ruta), and The Clash (La llama). He also wrote the essay Lorca, the Poet and his People (Lorca, el poeta y su pueblo; 1944).

Baring, Maurice (1874-1945). English novelist, essayist, poet, and playwright. Until 1912 he worked as a journalist in Russia, and wrote several studies of Russian culture and literature. His interesting autobiography is entitled The Puppet Show of Memory (1922).

Barker, George (1913- ). English poet. Like that of his contemporary, Dylan Thomas, his poetry is ecstatic, romantic, and violent, characterized by extravagant imagery and great technical dexterity in the use of puns, rhythms, and verbal devices. It is often also didactic, and concerned with moral and political issues. Collections of his poetry include Poems (1935); Calamiterra (1937), inspired by the Spanish Civil War; Lament and Triumph (1940); Eros in Dogma (1944); and A Vision of Beasts and Gods (1954).

Barker, Harley Granville-Barker. See Harley Granville-Barker.

Barker, James Nelson (1784-1858). American dramatist. In his plays, Barker, who held numerous public offices, expressed his ardent Americanism and his interest in politics. His best work is probably Superstition (1823), a blank-verse tragedy dealing with the English regicide Goffe and witchcraft trials in New England. He also wrote The Indian Princess (1808), in which Pocahontas figures prominently, and Marmion (1812), an adaptation of Scott's poem.

Barkis. In Charles Dickens' David Copperfield, the carrier who courts Clara Peggoty by asking David to tell her "Barkis is willin'!" Peggoty takes the hint and becomes Mrs. Barkis.

Barkley, Catherine. The heroine of Ernst Hemingway's novel A Farewell to Arms. An English nurse in an Italian hospital, she has a brief affair with the American lieutenant Frederic Henry but dies bearing his child.

Barlaam and Josaphat. An Eastern romance, probably written in the seventh century and popular in the Middle Ages, telling how Barlaam, an ascetic monk of the desert of Sinai, converted the Indian prince Josaphat to Christianity. It is believed to have been put in its final form by St. John of Damascus, a Syrian monk of the eighth century. Some authorities consider this a Christianized version of the story of Buddha. It includes the story of the three caskets which was used by Shakespeare in The Merchant of Venice (c. 1595).

A poetical version of the romance was written in the 13th century by the minnesinger Rudolf von Ems.

Barlach, Ernst (1870-1938). German dramatist and famous sculptor. His expressionistically tinged plays include Der tote Tag (The Dead Day, 1912) and Die Sündflut (The Flood, 1924).

Barleycorn, Sir John. An old song. As it was written down by Robert Burns, his neighbors vowed that Sir John should die, so they hired ruffians to "plough him with ploughs and bury him"; this they did, and afterward "combed him with harrows and thrust clods on his head," but did not kill him by these or by numerous other means which they attempted. Sir John bore no malice for this ill usage, but did his best to cheer the flagging spirits even of his worst persecutors. The song seems to recall fertility rites at corn-planting time.

Jack London wrote an autobiography called John Barleycorn (1913), which he described as his "alcoholic memories."

Barlow, Joel (1754-1812). American poet and diplomat, a leader of the anti-Federalist party, and one of the best-known of the Hartford Wits. In 1788 he left for Europe as a representative of some American business interests. He stayed abroad for 17 years and in 1795 was appointed American consul to Algiers. In Europe he shed his conservatism, became an ardent democrat, and befriended Thomas Paine.

Barlow's most popular poem was The Hasty Pudding; his most ambitious was The Vision of Columbus, first published in 1787, and later revised, lengthened, and reissued in epic form as The Colossus. He was one of the authors of The Anarchiad and also wrote Advice to the Privileged Orders, a controversial prose tract embodying his democratic ideals.

Barmecide feast. An imaginary feast where the dishes are empty; hence a reference to any appealing illusion. The allusion is to such a banquet given in jest for the poor Schacabac by a rich Barmecide prince in the Arabian Nights' story, "The Barber's Sixth Brother." The starving Schacabac pretends to eat and enjoy the empty dishes set before him, but when illusory wine is offered him, he feigns drunkenness and knocks the Barmecide down. The latter sees the humor of the situation, forgives Schacabac, and provides him with food to his heart's content.

Barnabas. In the New Testament, a companion of Paul and Mark. He accompanied them both on the first missionary journey. Barnabas was to go with Paul on his second journey and urged Paul to take
Barnaby Rudge

Mark, Barnabas' nephew, with them. Paul refused, however, since Mark had left them before the first journey was over. As a result, Paul took Silas with him and neither Mark nor Barnabas went. It is thought that Mark wrote his Gospel at the urging of Barnabas, perhaps under his direction.

Barnaby Rudge (1841). A novel by Charles Dickens. The book revolves around the anti-Catholic Gordon Riots of 1780 in which the titular hero innocently participates for the pleasure of carrying a flag and wearing a blue bow. Barnaby is a half-wit, a fact mysteriously connected with the fact that his father murdered his employer and a fellow servant on the night of Barnaby's birth. Of conspicuous appearance, Barnaby is pale with long red hair; he dresses all in green and carries a large raven named Grip in a basket on his back. He is identified as a leading rioter and condemned to death, but is reprieved through the influence of Gabriel Varden. He spends the rest of his life with his mother in a cottage near Maypole, happily employed with his poultry and his garden.

Barnaby's father, Mr. Rudge, is mistakenly believed to have been murdered the same night as Mr. Haredale, his employer. After the murder, he is seen by many in the locality, but is thought to be a ghost. Years later he joins the Gordon rioters and is sent to Newgate, but makes his escape when it is burned down.

The plot of this book is one of Dickens' weakest, and the novel's chief interest lies in its depiction of the terrible riots. In exploring causes for the riots, Dickens finds the answer in a government that is heedless of the needs of its poor. A similar theme is dealt with in A Tale of Two Cities.

Barnacle. The name given by Charles Dickens in Little Dorrit to a "very high family and a very large family" active in governmental circles, none of whom appear in the novel. They are bungling and incompetent. In all of them—particularly in Mr. Tite Barnacle, a permanent official in the Circumlocution Office—Dickens satirizes governmental red tape.

Barnburners. The reform wing of the Democratic Party in New York during the 1840's. They were so called in allusion to the Dutch farmer who burned his barn in order to get rid of the rats. Led by Martin Van Buren, his son John, and Silas Wright, the Barnburners were opposed to the extension of slavery; in 1848 they bolted the Democratic Party and joined other antislavery elements to form the Free-Soil Party.

Barnes, Barnabe (1569?-1609). English poet. Barnes wrote Parthenophyl and Parthenophyle, Sonnets, Madrigals, Elegies, and Odes (1593) and A Divine Century of Spiritual Sonnets (1595).

Barnes, Djuna (1892- ). American novelist and short-story writer. For many years a resident of Europe, Miss Barnes is the author of the most experimental plays produced in 1919-1920 by the Provincetown Players: Three from the Earth, An Irish Triangle, and Kurzy from the Sea. Ryder (1928) and Nightwood (1936) are her best-known books. The latter, which has an introduction by T. S. Eliot, is a novel dealing with the Parisian artistic underground. The Antiphon (1958) is a surrealist play in blank verse.

Barnes, Jake. The principal male character in Ernest Hemingway's novel The Sun Also Rises. Made impotent by a war wound, he is hopelessly attracted to Lady Brett Ashley. Though in many ways his life is as aimless as the other "lost generation" characters, he lives by a code of behavior that gives him considerable stability.

Barnes, William (1801-1886). English poet and philologist. Of Dorsetshire yeoman stock, Barnes educated himself and the family in archeology, music, and mathematics. He spent most of his life as a country schoolmaster and parson, publishing numerous philological works and composing the poems in Dorset dialect on which his fame rests. The poems are distinguished by simplicity and humor, fresh and vivid descriptions of nature, an unaffected and native pastoral quality. His works include Poems of Rural Life in the Dorset Dialect (1844, 1862), and Poems of Rural Life in Common English (1868).

Barnfield, Richard (1574-1627). English poet, author of The Affectionate Shepherd (1594), Cynthia (1595), and The Encomium of Lady Pecunia (1598). His fame, in large measure, rests on the fact that three of his lyrics, published (1599) in The Passionate Pilgrim, were long thought to be Shakespeare's.

Barnhelm, Minna von. See Minna von Barnhelm.

Barnum, Phineas T[a]aylor (1810-1891). American circus man, impresario, and author. Barnum exhibited the midget, General Tom Thumb, in 1844, and brought Jenny Lind to America during 1850-1852. He entered into partnership with James A. Bailey, to present the famous Barnum & Bailey show; after Bailey's death in 1905, the show was absorbed by Ringling Brothers. Barnum's shows appealed to public curiosity, and the thirst for the sensational and the novel; the originator of this type of showmanship in America wrote The Humbugs of the World (1866) and possibly the Life of P. T. Barnum, Written by Himself (1855, frequently revised).

Baroja y Nessi, Pio (1872-1956). Spanish novelist. Known for his individualism and the cynical stoicism of his works, Baroja was a member of the Generación del 98. His best-known work is the novel El árbol de la ciencia (The Tree of Knowledge, 1911). The tale is a study of Andrés Hurtado, a restless and selfish intellectual, who ends in suicide—thus reflecting the author's skepticism. Baroja is also the author of the trilogy Tierra vascas (1900-1909), La sensualidad pervertida (1920), and a novel dealing with Basque maritime life, Las inquietudes de Shanti Andia (The Restlessness of Shanti Andia, 1911).

baroque. A term applied to certain tendencies in European art in the latter 16th, the 17th, and the first half of the 18th centuries. Initially, and still primarily, the term referred to a free, exuberant style of architecture which supplanted the restrained and balanced style of the earlier Renaissance, but it was later applied to similar tendencies in painting, music, sculpture, and literature. The baroque style was dramatic, grandiose, ornate, full of motifs and forms expressive of conflict and energy. Originating in Italy and Spain, it spread throughout Europe, but is closely identified, especially in architecture, with Catholic Europe and was virtually the official style of the Counter Reformation. In literature the baroque spirit manifested itself in such movements as Marinism in Italy, Gongorism in Spain, and Euphuism in England. The word baroque has been used pejoratively, signifying a false, fantastic, over- emphatic style, but such a sense would be justified, if at all, only when applied to late baroque style such as rococo.

Barr, Amelia E[dith] (1831-1919). English-born American novelist. She is noted for her highly romantic and sentimental works. Especially popular were Jan Vedder's Wife (1885); The Bow of Orange Ribbon (1886), a novel of early New York; and Remember the Alamo (1888).

Barr, Robert (1850-1912). Scottish editor and popular novelist. He concluded Stephen Crane's unfinished novel, The O'Ruddy (1903).

Barrack-Room Ballads (1892). A volume of poems by Rudyard Kipling, celebrating the British soldier and army life throughout the Empire, in ballad meters and, frequently, cockney diction. See Tommy Atkins; Gunga Din; Fuzzy Wuzzy; Mandelay.

Barrault, Jean Louis (1910- ). French producer and actor. In 1947, Barrault founded the Compagnie Jean-Louis Barrault-Madelaine Renaud with his actress wife. On the stage of their theater, the Théâtre Marigny, could be seen experimental productions, some of which Barrault describes in his two published works: Reflexions sur le théâtre (1945) and Nouvelles Reflexions sur le théâtre (1961).

Barren Ground (1925). A novel by Ellen Glasgow. It is a realistic work of ingenious incidents and rich characterization in which Miss Glasgow touches successfully on many themes. The antithesis of the conventional romance, it is the story of Dorothy Oakley, a poor white who has been disappointed in love and turns her father's barren acres into a prosperous farm, but is less successful in her relations with the opposite sex.

Barrès, [Augustin-] Maurice (1862-1923). French novelist, journalist, and politician. His first novel trilogy, Le Culte du moi (1888-1891), portrayed the inner life of an egoist who in trying to develop his individual self discovers his need for others. The trilogy Le Roman de l'énergie nationale (1897-1903) is a social and philosophical commentary based on his own public life. Most famous of the nationalistic trilogy Les Bastions de l'Est (1905-1921) is Colette Badoche; The Story of a Young Girl of Metz (1918). Barrès wrote other novels, including The Sacred Hill (La Colline inspirée; 1913), and many articles about World War I, collected in L'Ame Française et la guerre (11 vols., 1917-1922) and Chronique de la Grande Guerre (14 vols., 1920-1924).

Barretts of Wimpole Street, The (1930). A successful play by Rudolf Besier (1878-1942). It was produced in London and New York and based on the romance of Robert and Elizabeth Barrett Browning.

Barrie, Sir James Matthew (1860-1937). Scottish dramatist and novelist, known for the whimsy and sentimental fantasy of his work. His best-known plays are Quality Street, The Admirable Crichton, Peter Pan, Alice Sit-by-the-Fire (1905), What Every Woman Knows, and Dear Brutus (1917). His outstanding prose works include A Window in Thrums (1889); Margaret Ogilvy, a biography of his mother; The Little Minister, a novel dramatized in 1897; and Sentimental Tommy, a novel. See Kailyard; Thrums.

barring out. The closing of a schoolroom against a schoolmaster, a prank once common in British schools. The Barring Out; or, Party Spirit is the title of a novel by Maria Edgeworth.

Barrington, E. See Mrs. Lily Adams Beck.

Barrios, Eduardo (1884- ). Chilean novelist and short-story writer. After wandering throughout Latin America and working at a variety of jobs, Barrios settled in Santiago, where he served as minister of education and director of the national library in the 1920's. Regarded as a master of the psychological tale, he excels in the portrayal of the hypersensitive personality. Such is the 10-year-old protagonist of the novelette El niño que enloqueció de amor (1915), who suffers physical and mental torment when he falls in love with Angélica, a friend of his mother, and ultimately loses his reason. In Un perdido (1917), the hero is an overwrought weakling who, unable to cope with reality, finds refuge in alcohol. Barrios' best work is probably El hermano ario (1922), which deals with the inner conflicts of two Franciscan monks: Brother Lázaro, who fears that he may violate his monastic vows, and Brother Rufino, who is disturbed by his reputation for sanctity.

Barry, Philip (1896-1949). American playwright. His work consists of sophisticated comedies and dramas of life among the wealthier classes, although he experimented with fantasy and mysticism in such plays as Hotel Universe and Here Come the Clowns (1938). Notable among his plays are You and I (1922), Paris Bound (1927), Holiday (1929), The Animal Kingdom, and The Philadelphia Story.

Barrymore. The name of an American family of actors. Maurice Barrymore, whose real name was Herbert Blythe (1847-1905), and his wife Georgiana Drew (1856-1893), the daughter of the famous actor John Drew (1827-1862), were the initial users of the name. Their children were Lionel (1878-1954), Ethel (1879-1959), and John (1882-1942). Among them they scored many great stage and motion-picture successes. The Royal Family (1927), a play by George S. Kaufman and Edna Ferber, is considered a satire on the family. Gene Fowler's Good Night, Sweet Prince (1943) is mainly about John, but tells much about the others also.

Barsetshire, Chronicles of. A series of novels by Anthony Trollope. Known also as the Cathedral Stories, they comprise The Warden (1855), Barchester Towers, Doctor Thorne (1858), Framley Parsonage (1861), The Small House at Allington (1864), and The Last Chronicle of Barset (1867). In them Trollope disturbs the placidity of the cathedral town of Barchester with a series of events which ripple the clerical pools. The same characters reappear in most of them; among the best-known characters are Bishop and Mrs. Proudie, Archdeacon Grantly, Rev. Septimus Harding, Rev. Mr. Crawley, the Thornes, Mr. Slope, Lady Arabella Gresham, and Signora Madeleine Neroni. Descendents of these families appear in the novels of Angela Thirkell.

Bar sinister. In heraldry, a bar drawn in the reverse of the usual way. It was popularly but erroneously supposed to indicate bastardy. See BATON.

Bart, Lily. See House of Mirth, The.

Bartas, Guillaume du (1544–1590). French poet, recognized throughout Europe in his time as the master of grave religious themes. Of a retiring and studious nature, he spent some time in the service of Henry IV during the religious wars. Despite his Protestant sympathies, his poetry was impartially Christian and appealed to Protestants and Catholics alike. His works include Judith (1573); La Semaine (1578), an account of the Creation; and the uncompleted Seconde Semaine (1584), in which he proposed to follow man from the Garden of Eden to the Last Judgment. Though frequently achieving eloquence and grandeur, his religious epic poetry lacked taste and abounded in the extravagant metaphors in vogue at the time. Soon outdated, it had dropped into obscurity by the 17th century.

Barthélemy, Jean Jacques (1716–1795). French orientalist, man of letters, numismatist, and author. It was his erudition and love for antiquity that brought him, during the years 1757–1788, to write the historical romance Le Voyage du jeune Anacharsis en Grèce, dans le milieu du IVe siècle avant l’ère vulgaire (see ANACHARSISS). The book enjoyed a huge success and opened the doors of the French Academy to Barthélemy in 1789.

Bartholdi, Frédéric Auguste. See Statue of Liberty.

Bartholomew, St. One of the 12 disciples of Jesus. The symbol of this saint is a knife, in allusion to the knife with which he was slayed alive. He is commemorated on August 24.

Bartholomew Anglicus (13th century). English scholar and Franciscan friar. His comprehensive Latin encyclopedia, De Proprietatibus Rerum (c. 1230–1250), was translated into all the European languages—into English by John de Trevisa—and remained in widespread popular use through the 16th century.

Bartholomew Fair (1614). A comedy by Ben Jonson. The enormous vitality of the fair, and not the plot, is the focus of attention. In this noisy and colorful play, Puritans and prostitutes, bumptkins and pickpockets, salesmen, rogues, gallants, and do-gooders rub shoulders and occasionally clash. Among the many incidents: a “reforming” but bungling justice constantly gets into trouble with the authorities and is carted off to the stocks; a foolish young man loses his fiancée through his own stupidity; and a crusading Brother loses a debate with a puppet on the morals of the theater. The exuberance of the play places it among Jonson’s finest dramatic works.

Bartleby the Scrivener (1853). A long short story by Herman Melville. The narrator, who operates a law firm on Wall Street, employs a scrivener, Bartleby, whose job it is to copy and proofread legal documents. Eventually he rejects these chores, stirs blankly at an empty wall, and answers all entreaties with, “I should prefer not to.” Unable to persuade Bartleby to work or to leave, the narrator moves to a new office, and the scrivener is taken to prison. Refusing all the privileges his former employer’s vague sense of responsibility has bought for him, he dies of starvation.

Bartlett, John (1820–1905). American bookseller, editor, and publisher. Self-taught, Bartlett impressed the customers in the University Book Store in Cambridge, Mass. with the breadth of his learning. He was employed by Little, Brown & Co., becoming in time a partner (1865) and a senior partner (1878). His most famous book was the collection of Familiar Quotations (1855), which ran through nine editions in his lifetime. It has subsequently been revised and issued three more times. Bartlett also published A New Method of Chess Notation (1857), A Shakespeare Phrase Book (1882), and A New and Complete Concordance to Shakespeare (1894).

Bartók, Béla (1881–1945). Hungarian composer, pianist, and collector of folk songs. The folk songs of his native land provided material for a number of musical arrangements and scholarly treatises, but they also partly inspired the style of his original compositions, such as The Castle of Duke Bluebeard (1911), an opera with libretto by Balázs (see BLUEBEARD); Allegro barbaro (1911), a popular piano piece; a dance suite for orchestra (1923); Music for String Instruments, Percussion and Celesta (1937); Mikrokosmos (6 vols., 1926–1937), a famous pedagogical work for piano; string quartets; and piano concertos.

Bartolommeo, Fra. Real name, Bartolommeo di Pagolo del Fattorino. Familiarly, Baccio della Porta (c. 1472–1517). Italian painter. He worked in his native Florence, and at Venice and Rome. His style, strongly influenced by that of Leonardo da Vinci, is characterized by the employment of noble types and gestures, and by a reliefflike clarity of outline. Among his masterpieces are the Last Judgment, the Virgin and Child with Saints, and the posthumous portrait of Savonarola, of whom he was an ardent follower.

Barton, Bernard (1784–1849). English poet known as the Quaker Poet. Barton is chiefly remembered as a close friend of Charles Lamb. A collection of his work, Poems and Letters of Bernard Barton, was published by his daughter Lucy in 1849.

Barton, Clara. Full name Clarissa Harlowe Barton (1821–1912). American philanthropist and founder of the American Red Cross. During the Civil War, although she had no official connection with any organization, she gathered and distributed supplies for the sick and wounded and ministered personally to casualties at the front. In 1882, as a result of her efforts, the U.S. joined the International Red Cross, and she became the first president of the American branch. Hers was the innovation whereby the Red Cross alleviates distress in peacetime disasters as well as in war.

Bartram, William (1739–1823). American botanist, explorer, and writer. He is best known for his Travels Through North and South Carolina (1791). His descriptions of tropical plants and animals were used as source material by a number of writers, including Wordsworth and Coleridge.

Baruch, Bernard [author] (1870– ). American businessman and statesman. A graduate of the City College of New York, whose school of business... administration is named after him, Baruch held several government posts connected with the war effort during World War I. In 1943 he became adviser to James F. Byrnes, war mobilization director, and was named U.S. representative to the UN Atomic Energy Commission in 1946. He is the author of American Industry in the War (1941), A Philosophy for Our Time (1954), Baruch: My Own Story (1957), and Baruch: The Public Years (1960). Long known as America’s “elder statesman,” he has been for many years a valued, if unofficial, adviser to presidents, his office lies in a park bench in Jackson Square, opposite the White House.

Basheh. See Matsuo Bashō.

Basic English. A simplified system of learning English from a selected vocabulary of the 850 most essential words. It was set up by C. K. Ogden and propagated, also as an international auxiliary language, by the Orthological Institute, Cambridge, England. J. A. Richards was one of its strongest advocates. Supporters claim that the system, which has no emotive words, encourages logical thought and expression; opponents say it destroys stylistic modulation, and they point to such examples as the translation into Basic of a famous phrase coined by Sir Winston Churchill: “Blood and eye-water and face-water.”

Basile, Giambattista (c. 1575–c. 1632), Italian writer. He was the author of a collection of 50 stories in the Neapolitan dialect, called Lo cunto de li cunti (The Story of Stories). Because its storytelling is divided into five days and its general structure resembles that of the Decameron, it is also called Il Pentamerone (The Pentameron). Published posthumously in 1634, it is one of the first European books of folk tales, including such favorites as Cinderella, Puss in Boots, and Beauty and the Beast, which were later popularized by Perrault’s Contes des Fées (1697). The Neapolitan was translated into Italian by Benedetto Croce and into English by Sir Richard Burton.

basilisk (Gr., basileos, a king). The king of serpents, a fabulous reptile, also called a Cockatrice. It was believed to be hatched by a serpent from a cock’s egg. It was supposed to have the power of “looking any one dead on whom it fixed its eyes.”

Bassani, Giorgio (1916– ). Italian novelist and writer of short stories. His most noted novel, Il Giardino dei Finzi-Contini (1962), narrates the plight of an aristocratic Jewish family of Ferrara during the Fascist racial persecutions. His short stories are collected in Cinque Storie Ferraresi (1956). Bassani’s writing describes his native Ferrara, and his fictional characters are seen as they experience the tensions of certain periods in history.

Bassanio. The improvident and quick-witted friend of Antonio in Shakespeare’s Merchant of Venice. He borrows 3,000 ducats from Antonio in order to woo Portia, a wealthy heiress of Belmont. In accordance with her father’s will, Portia can marry only that one of her suitors who successfully chooses from among three caskets the one that contains her portrait. With the help of a hint from Portia, Bassanio rejects the gold and silver caskets and, selecting the leaden one, opens it to find “fair Portia’s counterfeit.”

Basse, William (c. 1583–c. 1653). English poet. A member of the Spenserian school, he was the author of Sword and Buckler (1602), Three Pastoral Elegies (1602), and Great Britain’s Sunset (1613), an elegy on the death of Prince Henry, the elder son of James I.

Basselin, Olivier. A French song writer of the 15th century. He is especially known for his drinking songs.

Bassett, John Spencer (1867–1928). American writer and educator. He was a bold commentator on the Negro question, and, from 1906 on, a teacher at Smith College. Among his writings are Anti-Slavery Leaders of North Carolina (1898), The Life of Andrew Jackson (1911), and Expansion and Reform (1926).

Basso, Hamilton (1904–1964). American novelist. Basso is best known for Sun in Capricorn (1942), which depicts a demagogue thought to be modeled on Huey Long, and for The View from Pompey’s Head (1954), a novel of the South and New York. His other works include Court Square (1936), The Light Infantry Ball (1959), A Quota of Seaweed (1960), and the biography Beau-regard: The Great Creole (1933).

Bastille (O. Fr., bastir, now bâti, to build). A famous state prison in Paris. It was commenced by Charles V as a royal château in 1370, and was first used as a prison by Louis XI. It was seized and sacked by the mob in the French Revolution, July 14, 1789, a date that has become Bastille Day, which is celebrated much as is the American Fourth of July. The final demolition of the prison was commenced and the Place de la Bastille laid out on its site. A Bastille has come to mean a state prison for political offenders.

Bates, Charley. In Charles Dickens’s Oliver Twist, one of Fagin’s pickpockets-in-training. He is always laughing uproariously and is almost equal in artifice and adroitness to the Artful Dodger.

Bates, Miss

of a country setting, he uses it notably in The Darling Buds of May (1958) and in other novels about the comic, Rabelaisian farming family of Pop and Ma Larkin.

Bates, Miss. A character in Jane Austen’s Emma. An old maid, garrulous and a dreadful bore, she is nevertheless “a happy woman and a woman no one named without good will. . . . She loved everybody, was interested in everybody’s happiness.”

Bates, Ralph (1899— ). English proletarian novelist. He described life in Spain and the Spanish civil war (1936–1939) in Lean Men (1934), The Olive Field (1936), and Sirocco and Other Stories (1939).

Bathsheba. In the Old Testament, the beautiful wife of Uriah the Hittite, sinfully loved by David who gave orders that Uriah, his captain, should be sent into the most dangerous part of the battle where he was slain. She was afterwards the wife of David and mother of Solomon (II Sam. 11:1–24).

baton. In heraldry, a bend or double line, from an upper corner of a shield to the opposite base point. When cut off at the ends, the baton indicated bastardly, as the bar or bend sinister was erroneously thought to have done.

Batrachomyomachia. See Battle of the Frogs and Mice.

Battle Hymn of the Republic, The (1862). A patriotic song whose words were written by Julia Ward Howe. It was written in December, 1861, during the Civil War after a visit to a detachment of McClellan’s army near Washington, D.C., when Dr. James Freeman Clark, a member of the party accompanying Mrs. Howe, urged her to write new words for the music of John Brown’s Body, a song then popular with the Union soldiers. That night, towards dawn, Mrs. Howe awakened and found the words of a poem in her head, ready to march with the tune. She sprang out of bed, she relates, and without a light, in order not to awaken a baby who slept near her, wrote the Battle Hymn.

Battle of Britain. A term applied to bombing raids on Great Britain by German airplanes during World War II, especially during the summer of 1940.

Battle of Moytura, The. A 9th or 10th century Gaelic tale from the MYTHOLOGICAL CYCLE. It is a tale of the battle between the Tuatha Dé Danann and the Fomorians. The principal figure of the Fomorians is Balor whose evil eye is put out by Lugh, thus turning the battle in favor of the Tuatha Dé Danann.

Battle of the Books, The (1704). A prose, mock-heroic satire by Jonathan Swift, written in 1697 and published with A Tale of a Tub. It ridicules a literary squabble of the day as to the comparative merits of ancient and modern authors, touched off by Sir William Temple’s essay Of Ancient and Modern Learning and continued by Richard Bentley, among others. Swift showed his contempt for the entire controversy and, more broadly, for modern scholarship, criticism, and poetry by giving an account of a battle between modern and ancient books in St. James’s Library, the outcome of which remains uncertain. The mock epic similes of the spider, signifying the moderns, and the bee, signifying the ancients, are among the most famous in all of literature.

Battle of the Frogs and Mice (Batrachomyomachia). A mock-heroic Greek poem of early date. War is caused by a frog’s leaving his mouse friend to drown in the middle of a pond. When both sides are arrayed for battle, a band of gnats sounds the attack, and after a bloody battle the Frogs are defeated; but an army of land-crabs coming up saves the race from extermination, and the victorious Mice make their way home in terrible disorder. The name of the Mouse-king is Troxartes, probably a pun on Tros, a Trojan, and the poem is in many ways a burlesque of the Iliad. There is a 15th-century German skit on the same theme by G. Rollenhagen, a Meistersinger.

Battle of the Giants (1515). The battle of Marignano, in which Francis I of France won a complete victory over the duke of Milan and his Swiss allies. The battle is so called because the skill and obstinacy shown by the contenders on both sides.

Battle of the Herrings (Feb. 12, 1429). A battle during the siege of Orleans in the Hundred Years’ War. The French attempted to intercept a supply of food being brought to the English by Sir John Fastolf, but the English repulsed them with barrels of herrings.

Battle of the Kegs, The (1778). A humorous ballad by Francis Hopkinson. Composed to the tune of “Yankee Doodle,” it tells of the alarm felt by the British over kegs charged with gunpowder which were floated down the Delaware.

Battle of the Lake Regillus, The. A ballad by Thomas Babington Macaulay in his LAYS OF ANCIENT ROME. Lake Regillus was the name of a small lake near Rome, traditional site of a Roman victory over the Latins (496 B.C.).

Battle of the Moat. A battle between Muhammad and Abu Sofan, chief of the Koreishites, before Medina. The Prophet had a moat dug before the city to keep off the invaders, and in it much of the fighting took place.

Battle of the Spurs. (1) A battle (1302) near Courtrai, Belgium, between a Flemish army and the French under Philip IV. The battle is so called because the victorious Flemings gathered from the field more than 700 gilt spurs worn by French nobles slain in the fight.

(2) A battle (1513) near Guinegate, France, between the English under Henry VIII and the French under Louis XII. The name is said to derive from the flight of the French cavalry.

Battle-Pieces and Aspects of the War (1866). A collection of poems by Herman Melville. The tone of these 72 poems is elegiac rather than vengeful. Melville does not celebrate martial spirit in the best of his work; he mourns the early death of young men and the ruin of the country.

Baty, Gaston (1892–1952). French theater director and producer. His company, Les Compagnons de la Chimère, formed in 1922, performed such expressionistic plays as Le Simoun by Henri Lenormand and Martine by Jean Bernard. Noted for his splendid and imaginative settings, costumes, and lighting effects, Baty created drama in his Théâtre Monoparcours that joined stage magic and reality.

Baubo. In myth, an Eleanian slave woman. In the allegory of Goethe’s Faust, Part II, she symbolizes sensuality.
Baucis and Philemon. See Philemon and Baucis.

Baudelaire, Charles Pierre (1821–1867). French poet, one of the most important figures among the French Symbolists. His typically décadent life was ultimately tragic; his debauched, violent, and eccentric existence brought him to an early and painful death at the age of 46. In Paris he first began to write as a critic and translator, introducing the works of Edgar Allan Poe to Europe through translations that have since become French classics. Baudelaire published only a single volume of poetry, Les Fleurs du Mal. Stylistically, in its pure and carefully classical form, his verse in some ways resembles that of the Parnassians, but it is far more significant in that it foreshadows the development of modern poetry. Baudelaire’s poems are filled with subtle nuances and with almost painfully delicate suggestiveness. The sensuous matter of a poem is conveyed in beautifully striking images. He is famous for his doctrine of correspondences, an exploration of the relationship of the various senses that lends a startling newness to his work. Not only Baudelaire’s technique but his subject matter—the beauty of the verse or the morbid, and the probing analysis of complex emotional states—has been reflected in 20th-century poetry.

Bauhaus (Ger., “house of architecture”). A school of architecture and design, founded in Weimar, Germany, in 1919 by Walter Gropius. Its purpose was to unite the creative arts and the technology of modern mass production with 20th-century architecture. In addition to more strictly architectural studies, courses in painting, handicrafts, the theater, and typography were given by outstanding artists, including Lyonel Feininger, Vassily Kandinsky, and Paul Klee. Functionalism, or the international style, in architecture and a number of examples of industrial design, such as tubular lighting and steel furniture, were first developed at the Bauhaus. In 1925 the school moved to the buildings designed for it by Gropius in Dessau; three years later, Mies van der Rohe became its director. During the rise of Hitlerian Germany, the Bauhaus came increasingly under attack, and in 1933 it was forced to close; but in Europe and the U.S., through its masters and students, its great influence on modern architectural thought continued.

Baum, L[yman] Frank (1856–1919). American writer of children’s books. He was the author of The Wonderful Wizard of Oz (1900) and a subsequent series of tales for young folk dealing with the mythical country of Oz. The later books did not match the excellence of the first.

Baviad, The (1794). A biting verse satire by William Gifford written to ridicule the Della-Cruscans and their poetry. It was republished the following year with a second part called The Maeviad. Bavius and Maevius were two minor poets pilloried by Virgil in his Eclogues, and their names are still used for inferior versifiers.

Bay, Clifford (1886–1932). English dramatist and poet. Among his plays are The Poetasters of Ipswich (1912), The Rose without a Thorn (1932), and Circe (1948). His books include Ideas and People (1936) and Some I Know Well (1951).

Bax, Richard (1615–1691). English divine. A member of the Parliamentary faction during the English Civil War, he opposed the execution of Charles I. He supported the Restoration, but suffered imprisonment as a nonconformist under Charles II. His Saint’s Everlasting Rest (1690), a fervent appeal for the Christian life, is a classic of English religious writing.

Bayard (bay-colored). (1) The horse of the four sons of Amon. He grew larger or smaller as one or more of the four sons mounted him. According to tradition, one of his footprints may still be seen in the forest of Soignes, and another near Dinant.

(2) The French name for Rinaldo’s horse Bazarro.

Bayard, Seigneur de Pierre du Terrail (1473–1524). French knight and national hero, renowned for his valor. Known as le chevalier sans peur et sans reproche, he distinguished himself in the Italian campaigns of Charles VIII, Louis XII, and Francis I.

Bayle, Pierre (1647–1706). French philosopher. The son of a Calvinist minister, a convert to Catholicism and ultimately reconverted to Calvinism, he held that neither faith nor reason can lead to certainty. He condemned superstition and advocated religious tolerance in Pensées sur la comète (Thoughts on the Comet, 1682) and Commentaire philosophique sur les paroles de Jésus-Christ (Philosophical Commentary on the Words of Jesus Christ, 1686). The Dictionnaire Historique et Critique (Historical and Critical Dictionary, 1697–1706), his most important work, treats its biographical, theological, and philosophical subjects orthodoxly and reserves dissent for the voluminous footnotes. Its directness pleased the philosophes, and it influenced Diderot in the compiling of the Encyclopédie.

Bazarov, Evgeni Vasil’yev. The central character of Ivan Turgenev’s novel, Fathers and Children. A representative of the young democratic generation rising in Russia about the middle of the 19th century, Bazarov is a hard-headed materialist with nothing but scorn for the old aristocratic order. He is regarded as one of Turgenev’s most successful character portrayals.

Bazin, Hervé (1917– ). French novelist, grandnephew of René Bazin. In Viper in the Fist (Vipère au Poing; 1947), he describes the psychological battle between a boy and his extraordinarily hateful mother. His later novels describe various kinds of love-hate relationships, such as the provincial setting: Head Against the Wall (La Tête contre murs; 1949); Constance (Lève-toi et marche; 1952); In the Name of the Son (Au nom du Fils: 1960).

Bazin, René (1853–1932). French novelist. His books concerned with the country life of rural Catholics are This, My Son (Les Noëllet; 1890), Those of His Own Household (Madame Corentine: 1893), and Redemption (De toute son âme; 1897). The problem of the desertion of the land for the cities is treated in The Penitent (Donatienne; 1903) and The Coming Harvest (Le Blé qui lève; 1907). Bazin discusses the political destiny of the disputed Alsace-Lorraine in The Children of Alsace (Les Oberlé; 1901).

BBC. See British Broadcasting Corporation.

Beaconsfield, 1st earl of. See Benjamin Disraeli.

Beacon Street. A famous street in Boston. It runs from Tremont Street along the Common and westward through the Back Bay district. Because of its residents, it became synonymous with wealth, social position, culture, and conservatism.

Bear, The. See Go Down, Moses.

Beard’s best-known work is An Economic Interpretation of the Constitution (1913), in which he examined the backgrounds of the men who framed the U.S. Constitution and concluded that as property-owners they were interested chiefly in constructing a charter to protect their wealth. Beard, denied, however, that he was an economic determinist. He also wrote several books with his wife, Mary R[iter] Beard (1876–1958), notably The Rise of American Civilization (1927), America in Midpassage (1939), and The American Spirit (1942). In his later years, Beard became increasingly conservative and isolationist, expressing his views in such works as American Foreign Policy in the Making (1946) and The Coming of the War (1948). He also wrote Economic Origins of Jeffersonian Democracy (1915) and The Economic Basis of Business (1922).

Beardsley, Aubrey Vincent (1872–1898). English artist. Beardsley is known for his black-and-white drawings on fantastic and erotic subjects, chiefly as illustrations for books and periodicals representative of an English aesthetic movement during the 1890’s.

Beatitudes. The sayings of Jesus in the opening verses of the Sermon on the Mount (Matt. 5:3–12), beginning “Blessed are the poor in spirit” and naming the virtues that make their possessor blessed.

beat movement. A part-social, part-literary phenomenon of the mid-1950’s centered in Greenwich Village in New York, the North Beach district of San Francisco, and Venice West, a suburb of Los Angeles. Socially, the beat movement represented a rejection of middle-class values, of commercialism, and of conformity to a social norm; it advocated voluntary poverty, individualism, and release or “illumination” through jazz, sexual experience, and drugs. The term “beat” is meant to convey the usual connotations of worn-out and exhausted, but also to suggest beatitude or blessedness.

The chief spokesmen of the movement are Allen Ginsberg, Jack Kerouac, Gregory Corso, William S. Burroughs, Lawrence Ferlinghetti, and Gary Snyder. Ginsberg was at least partially responsible for bringing the movement to national attention when his Howl and Other Poems (1956) was charged with obscenity and became something of a cause célébre. Like Ginsberg, most of the beat writers are poets, and most work in loose structures and in the free-verse, incantatory tradition of Whitman. One of the more sensitive of the beat poets is Gary Snyder (1930– ), whose poems of the Pacific Northwest, where he spent part of his childhood, are controlled and sometimes compelling. His books include Riprap (1959) and Myths and Texts (1960). Lawrence Ferlinghetti (1919– ) is both poet and publisher (City Lights Books) and has published the work of many of the beat writers. His poetry includes Pictures of the Gone World (1955) and A Conel Island of the Mind (1958). Gregory Corso (1930– ) tends to be provocative and impudent in his work, which is collected in Gasoline (1958) and The Happy Birthday of Death (1960).

Of the beat novelists the most widely known is Jack Kerouac, many of whose loosely constructed, picaresque works are set in beat environments. His books include On the Road (1957), The Subterraneans (1958), and The Dharma Bums (1960). William S. Burroughs (1914– ), also a novelist, is known for The Naked Lunch (Paris, 1959; U.S.,

Beatrice. (1) The beloved of Dante. He records the history of his love for her in La Vita Nuova, increasingly idealizing her until she becomes his spiritual inspiration. Thus, in the Divine Comedy she is the symbol of divine revelation through faith, and guides him through Paradise. The original Beatrice was probably Beatrice Portinari (1266-1290), who married Simone de' Bardi.

(2) The high-spirited niece of Leonato in Shakespeare's Much Ado About Nothing. Although she has sworn to have no man, she is attracted to Benedick, with whom she engages in a constant battle of wits. She is one of Shakespeare's most famous heroines.

Beattie, James (1735-1803). Scottish poet and philosopher. His opposition to the skeptical philosophy of Hume is set forth in his common-sense and orthodox reply, the Essay on Truth (1770). The essay contains what may be called an official doctrine of preromanticism. His best-known poem is The Minstrel; or, the Progress of Genius.

Beauchamp, Lucas. A character in William Faulkner's Intruder in the Dust and in his Fire and the Hearth, a short story in Go Down, Moses. Lucas, the part-Negro grandson of Carother McCaslin, is a dignified and independent man who lives on the borderline between the white and black worlds, thus causing a great deal of consternation among those white people who consider him arrogant and disrespectful.

Beauchamp, Mary Annette. See Elizabeth, Countess Russell.

Beau Geste (1924). A best-selling novel by P. C. Wren about life in the French Foreign Legion. Beau Geste is the name the hero assumes.

Beauharnais, Joséphine de. Born Marie Joséphine Rose Tascher de la Pagerie (1763-1814). French empress. Born in Martinique, Josephine was first married to the vicomte Alexandre Beauharnais, who was executed as a counter-revolutionist in 1794. She had two children by this marriage, Eugène and Hortense, who became queen of Holland and mother of Napoleon III.

Josephine was a prominent figure in Parisian society when she met Napoleon Bonaparte, then a comparatively obscure army officer whose reputation was on the rise. He fell passionately in love with her, as his letters testify, and they were married on March 9, 1796. At Napoleon's coronation she was crowned empress of France (Dec. 2, 1804). In 1809 Napoleon divorced his wife and empress as she had not provided him with an heir. She spent her last years in retirement at her lovely home in La Malmaison, occasionally receiving a visit from Napoleon.

Beaumarchais. Assumed name of Pierre Augustin Caron (1732-1799). French dramatist, courier, and watchmaker to Louis XV. He is best known for his two comic masterpieces The Barber of Seville and The Marriage of Figaro (1784), both of which deal with the exploits of one of the world's cleverest servants, Figaro. In addition to his Mémoires (1774), he wrote three minor plays: Eugénie (1767), Les Deux amis (1770), and La Mère coupable (1792). He was also librettist of the opera Tarare (1787).

Beaumont and Fletcher. Beaumont, Francis (c. 1584-1616) and Fletcher, John (1579-1629), English dramatists. Their names are always linked together because of the plays on which they collaborated; these include such tragi-comedies as Philaster, A King and No King (1611), and The Maid's Tragedy. In these and other plays, Beaumont and Fletcher foreshadowed and influenced Restoration drama. Other fruits of the collaboration include The Nice Valour (1605?), Wit at Several Weapons (1606), The Captain (c. 1611), Love's Pilgrimage (1615?), and The Scornful Lady (c. 1614).

In addition, Fletcher wrote a number of plays both alone and in collaboration with other dramatists. He was at his best when he could bring his lyric talents and sophistication to bear on such comedies of manners as The Wild Goose Chase, The Scornful Lady (c. 1614), Wit without Money (1614), and Rule a Wife and Have a Wife (1624). He also excelled at tragi-comedy, a form he and Beaumont had made their own. His unaided plays in this genre include A Wife for a Month (1624) and The Humorous Lieutenant (1619). Fletcher is the author of the famous pastoral play The Faithful Shepherdess. In collaboration with Philip Massinger, he wrote The Bloody Brother (1615?), The Tragedy of Sir John Van Olden Barnavelt (1619), The False One (1620), and The Double Marriage (1620). He is said to have collaborated with Shakespeare on Henry VIII and The Two Noble Kinsmen.

Beaumont also wrote several plays alone, two of which are noteworthy: The Knight of the Burning Pestle and The Woman Hater (c. 1606), a comedy of humors.

Beautiful Litigant, The. See François de Bolskont.

Beauty and the Beast. A well-known fairy tale. Beauty saves the life of her father by consenting to live with the Beast. The Beast, being freed from a spell by Beauty's love, becomes a handsome prince, and marries her.

Beauvoir, Simone de (1908- ). French novelist and essayist. She abandoned the teaching of philosophy with the publication of her first novel, She Came to Stay (L'Invisite, 1943), which, like The Mandarins, is important as a rarely fictionalized document about Jean-Paul Sartre, his circle of leftist intellectuals, and their interpretations of Existentialism. The Blood of the Others (Le Sang des autres; 1944) and All Men Are Mortal (Tous les hommes sont mortels; 1947) are novels that preach existentialist doctrines about human possibility in a world without God.

The long essay The Second Sex (Le Deuxième Sexe; 1949) analyzes the difficult position of woman in the modern world; The Long March (1957) is a sympathetic description of Communist China. Mémoirs of a Dutiful Daughter (Memoire d'une jeune fille rangée; 1958) is her autobiography to the age of 21; The Prime of Life (La Force de l'âge) continues it through the Resistance and records her close personal attachment to Sartre. Her other works include the essays in Pyrrhus et Cinéas (1944), the play Les Bouches inutiles (1945), and the travel diary America Day by Day (1948).

Beaux Stratagem, The (1707). A comedy by George Farquhar. Thomas Aimwell and his friend Archer, the two beaux, having run through all their money, set out fortune-hunting and come to Lichfield as "master and man." Aimwell pretends to be very unwell, and as Lady Bountiful's hobby is tending the sick, she orders him to be removed to her mansion. Here he and Dorinda, daughter of Lady Bountiful, fall in love and finally marry. Archer falls in love with Mrs. Sullen, wife of Lady Bountiful's son Squire Sullen.

Beaver Coat, The (Der Biberpelz; 1893). A comedy by Gerhart Hauptmann. It recounts the machinations of the thieving washerwoman, Mrs. Wolff, and her poacher husband. She steals a beaver coat and then manages to escape detection by the stupid and officious magistrate, Wehrhahn. In fact, in the end she convinces him that she is the most virtuous and upright woman in the village.

Bebel, August (1840–1913). German socialist and member of the Reichstag. He was a very popular and influential leader of the German Social Democratic Party, which he and Wilhelm Liebknecht had helped to found in 1869, and was opposed to Bismarck's war policies.

Beccadelli, Antonio. See Panormita, I.

Beccari, Agostino (d. 1590). Italian poet. A native of Ferrara, he wrote the first Renaissance pastoral drama, the Sacrificio (1554). It influenced Tasso's Aminta.

Beccaria, Cesare (1735–1794). Italian economist and penalist. In his influential and humanitarian Trattato dei Delitti e delle Pene (1764) he opposed capital punishment and torture. He also was a contributor to the review Il Caffè.

Becher, Johann Joachim. See Philognost.

Beck, Beatrix (1914– ). French novelist, formerly secretary to André Gide. In The Passionate Heart (Léon Morin, prêtre; 1952) the narrator is converted by a beloved Catholic priest during the Occupation.

Beck, Mrs. L.[Ily] Adams, born Moresby (d. 1931). English popular romantic novelist and mystical Orientalist, who wrote under the pen names E. Barrington and Louis Moresby as well as under L. Adams Beck. As E. Barrington she wrote bestselling historical novels, including The Divine Lady (1924), about Nelson and Lady Hamilton, and Glorious Apollo (1925), about Byron.

Becker, Carl [Lotus] (1873–1945). American historian. A disciple of Frederick Jackson Turner and professor of history for many years at Cornell University, Becker published a number of important books, including The Declaration of Independence: A Study in the History of Political Ideas (1922), Our Great Experiment in Democracy (1924), The Heavenly City of the Eighteenth-Century Philosophers (1932), Progress and Power (1936), and Modern Democracy (1942).

Beckett, Samuel (1906– ). Irish-born French novelist and dramatist. A close friend of James Joyce, he settled in Paris in 1937. The novels Murphy (1938) and Watt (1944, pub. 1953) were written in English; in 1945 Beckett began writing first in French, then translating most of his own works into English. From 1947 to 1949 he wrote the novel trilogy composed of Molloy, Malone Dies, and The Unnamable, and the play Waiting for Godot. Later plays are Endgame, Krapp's Last Tape, Happy Days (1961), and Play (1963). Krapp's Last Tape and Happy Days were written in English.

Considered major works in the literature of the absurd, all Beckett's pieces present a comically pessimistic allegory of man's condition. Often the traditionally farcical gestures of the circus clown and the vaudeville actor are used to portray human weakness, frustration, and helplessness. Beckett's plays often parody past literary classics, or Cartesian rational thought. His characters typically advance through worsening stages of decertitude or paralysis. Such human bonds as they form are the coupling of tyrant and victim, or at best of two pathetically groping dependencies. The only freedom they have exists within their own minds, where they invent characters whose existence becomes the proof of their own. Nevertheless, the freedom to invent is linked with the compulsive need to express, in the absence of anything to express or any meaningful language for expression. This need is the only force that maintains life in a world of progressive disintegration.

Other works include the English radio plays All That Fall (1957, translated as Tous Ceux Qui Tombent) and Embers (1960; translated as Cendres), and the French novel Comment C'est (1960).

Beckford, William (1760–1844). English man of letters. He is best known for Vathek, an Arabian Tale; an Oriental romance, it was written in French and translated into English probably by Samuel Henley in 1786. The associated Episodes of Vathek was translated from the French by Sir F. T. Marzials in 1912. Beckford's eccentric literary career and his penchant for the extravagant Gothic form in art and architecture (particularly his estate at Fonthill Abbey) place him in the tradition of Horace Walpole.

Beckmesser. The town clerk, a leading character in Wagner's opera, Die Meistersinger. He is the savage caricature of a contemporary critic named Hanslick, who had criticized Wagner's poetic accomplishments. The composer was dissuaded by his friends from naming the character Hans Lick.

Becque, Henri (1837–1899). French dramatist. Becque wrote plays that were naturalistic both in subject matter and in technique. In such dramas as Michel Pauper (1870), Les Honnêtes Femmes (1880), Les Corbeaux (The Vultures, 1882), and La Parisienne (1885), he presented realistic portraits of life, handicapped by a dearth of action and colorless characterization.

Bécquer, Gustavo Adolfo (1836–1870). Spanish poet. With the exception of some individual poems his works first appeared posthumously as Rimas (1871). Approximately 80 poems are to be found in this work, but though few in number, their quality established Bécquer's reputation as one of the major poets of the romantic era. With apparent simplicity, he created a delicately lyrical and deeply spiritual tone which infuses such poems as Volverás las oscuras golondrinas or Del salón en el angulo obscuro and reappears in his prose treatments of legend, as in Los ojos verdes.

Beddoes, Thomas Lovell (1803-1849). English poet and playwright. An eccentric, melancholy man with a taste for the macabre, he wrote in the tradition of the Elizabethan poetic drama. He was a great admirer of Shelley and was in some degree influenced by him. His chief work, Death's Jest Book, or The Fool's Tragedy, was printed posthumously in 1850.

Bede. Called the Venerable [also Baeda or Beda] (c. 673-735). English historian and scholar. A monk at the Northumbrian monastery at Jarrow, he wrote over 30 works of history, grammar, science, theological commentary, etc. His best-known work is the Latin Ecclesiastical History of the English People (Historia Ecclesiastica Gentis Anglorum; 731), from the Roman invasion of England to 731, now a major source of historical and legendary information. It was translated into Old English under King Alfred, and also provided the material for the early part of the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle.

Bede, Cuthbert. See Edward Bradley.

Bedivere, Sir. In Arthurian legend, a dignitary of King Arthur's court. In Malory's Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469), it is he who, at the request of the dying Arthur, throws the sword Excalibur into the lake, and then bears the king to the barge that waits to carry him to Avalon.

Bedlam. A lunatic asylum or madhouse. The word is a contraction of Bethlehem, St. Mary of Bethlehem being the name of a religious house in London that was converted into a hospital for lunatics in 1402. See Tom o’ Bedlam.

Bednyi, Demyan. Pen name of Efm Alekseyevich Pridvorov (1883-1945). Russian poet. A peasant by origin, Bednyi became the most popular Soviet poet in the early years of the regime, churning out topical verse in profusion. His pen name, Bednyi, means “poor” in Russian. His crude propaganda poetry earned him a prominent place in Soviet letters until 1936 when his opera libretto, Epic Heroes (Bogatyri), displeased the authorities because of its spoiling of the Russian epic tradition of folk poetry and of the introduction of Christianity to Russia. The old Bolshevnik failed to realize that, at that point in history, the party viewed the epic tradition as a national treasure and the spread of Christianity as a progressive occurrence. Bednyi was reprimanded, and never regained his popularity.

Beebe, Lucius [Morris] (1902- ). American journalist. Known also as a chronicler of café society, in 1952 he revived and became editor of the Territorial Enterprise, a weekly in Virginia City, Nev., for which Mark Twain once wrote. The colorful history of the paper is recounted in Comstock Commotion, The Story of The Territorial Enterprise (1954). He is also known for his books on trains, the latest of which is Mr. Pullman's Elegant Palace Car (1961).

Beecham, Sir Thomas (1879-1961). English conductor. Noted for the performance of works of Handel, Mozart, and Delius, whose works he championed, he is also remembered for his acid wit and pungent comments. He wrote an autobiography, A Mingled Chime (1944).

Beecher, Henry Ward (1813-1887). American clergyman, editor, and writer. The son of Lyman Beecher and brother of Harriet Beecher Stowe, he attended a school conducted by his sister Catherine in which he was the only boy among some 40 girls. He was graduated from Amherst College in 1834 and from Lane Theological Seminary in Cincinnati in 1837. An intensely emotional man, Beecher won a huge following with his sermons, in which he extolled the love of God and man; he also attacked slavery and advocated woman's suffrage and free trade. From 1861 to 1864 he was editor of The Independent, and from 1870 to 1881, of The Christian Union. In 1874 he was sued for damages by Theodore Tilton, who accused him of adultery with Mrs. Tilton. Although the jury could not reach a verdict and a council of Congregational churches found him innocent, Beecher's reputation was permanently damaged.

Beecher, Lyman (1775-1863). American preacher and author. Beecher became one of the outstanding preachers of his day; he was the father of a large family of which four children became famous: Catherine, Edward, Henry Ward, and Harriet Beecher Stowe. Opposed to Catholicism and the use of liquor, Beecher supported traditional Calvinism, and instituted drastic domestic discipline in his home. Even he, however, was accused of heresy, although he was finally acquitted by the synod. In addition to several pastorates in New England and New York, Beecher was president of the Lane Theological Seminary in Cincinnati (1832-1852). His sermons and articles were collected in Worley (1852), and his Autobiography appeared in 1864. The Beecher household probably provided the details for Harriet Beecher Stowe's Oldtown Folks (1869).

Beezlebub. One of the "false gods" worshiped by the Israelites. He was originally a local Philistine god (or Baal) of Ekron, whose name meant "Lord of Flies." In this capacity, Baalzebub, as his name was properly spelled, probably had the power to send or protect from sickness, which was known to be carried by flies. Another Lord of Flies was Zeus Apomyios to whom the Greeks annually sacrificed at Actium. The Romans also sacrificed to flies in the temple of Hercules Victor. In the New Testament (Matt. 12:24) the Jews accuse Christ of driving out devils by the power of Beezlebub, called the Prince of Devils. In Paradise Lost, Milton makes Beezlebub one of the chief lords of Hell, next to Satan in power and rank.

Beerbohm, Sir Max (1872-1956). English essayist and caricaturist. The half-brother of Sir Herbort Beerbohm-Tree, he was a brilliant figure in the London of the decadents and the Gay Nineties, contributing to the Yellow Book, and writing irreverent parodies (as in A Christmas Garland, 1885) and drawing brilliant caricatures under the signature "Max." His later works included the novel Zuleika Dobson, essays such as those collected in the volume In Defense of Cosmetics (1922), and Around Theatres (1930). He remained a legend for his wit, brilliance, and powers of satire even after he had retired to live quietly in Italy during his middle and old age.

Beer-Hall Putsch (1923). A revolt in Munich led by Adolf Hitler and General Erich Ludendorff, who sought to overthrow the Bavarian government. Hitler was arrested and spent several months in prison, where he wrote Mein Kampf.

Beer-Hofmann, Richard (1866-1945). Austrian poet and playwright with neurasthenic leanings. Active in Vienna and a friend of Hugo von Hofmannsthal, he often treated Jewish themes, as in his plays Jakobs Traum (Jacob's Dream, 1918) and Der junge David (Young David, 1933).

Beethoven, Ludwig van (1770-1827). German composer. A student of Haydn, he added the new, emotional qualities of romanticism to the tradition of formal precision that he inherited from the 18th-century masters of music. His nine symphonies are the most widely known among his works, although he wrote in a number of other musical forms, including chamber music, sonatas, and concertos. The most famous symphonies are the Third, called the Eroica, the Fifth (1808), the Sixth, or Pastoral (1808), and especially the Ninth, or Choral (1823). See Fidelio.

Beggar on Horseback (1924). A fantastic comedy by George S. Kaufman and Marc Connelly, with music by Deems Taylor. A satyr on business in the form of a dream, it is the story of a poverty-stricken composer, Neil McRae, who is persuaded to pose as a rich girl, Ginsby Cady. In a dream he learns the horrible consequences of such a marriage; he is set to work in the Cady factory, murders the Cady family, and is thrown in prison. Upon awakening he is released from the engagement.

Beggar's Opera, The (1728). A ballad opera by John Gay, first produced at Lincoln's Inn Fields in London, a theater managed by John Rich. Very little escapes satiric treatment in this work; bars are aimed at the elaborate, current Italian operatic style, at the prime minister Walpole, at marriage, at ladies and gentlemen, at lawyers, and at trade. The songs, many of them set to popular English and Scottish tunes, were arranged and scored by John Christopher Pepusch, who composed the overture.

The story concerns Peachum, a receiver of stolen goods. His biggest business is done with Captain MacHeath, a highwayman with whom Peachum's daughter Polly has fallen in love. They marry secretly, and Peachum, now unable to use Polly in his business, gets his revenge by informing on MacHeath and collecting the reward money. MacHeath is taken off to Newgate prison which is run by the corrupt Lockit, who is in league with Peachum. Lockit's daughter Lucy falls in love with MacHeath and helps him to escape. He is captured but saved from hanging by the mock intervention of a beggar and a player, since it would never do to let the fine hero die. This happy ending satirizes the sentimental tragedy of the day. Bertold Brecht and Kurt Weill used The Beggar's Opera as the basis for their ThreePenny Opera.

Behan, Brendan (1923-1964). Irish playwright and wit. Born in Dublin at the time of civil strife in Ireland, Brendan Behan reflected in his life and works the zest, vitality, and macabre sense of humor of that tempestuous era. His early life was strongly influenced by the close association of his family with the Irish Republican Army, an association continued by Behan who, at the age of 16, was arrested by English authorities for possessing explosives with the intent of blowing up a battleship. He was found guilty and sentenced to three years in an English reform school, an experience he recounts with uninhibited gusto in the autobiographical Borstal Boy (1958). Behan subsequently served two more prison terms, the second of which resulted in his being deported to France. Having spent a good portion of his youth in jail, he utilized this experience as the basis of his two plays, The Quare Fellow (1956), a memorable exercise of "gallows humor," and The Hostage (1958). Despite his considerable reputation as a playwright, he was perhaps better known for his alcoholic exploits, accounts of which were featured prominently in the English and American press. For this reason he was dismissed by some critics as a buffoon, more interested in publicity than in playwrighting, and trading on a stereotyped conception of the wild young Irishman. For Behan, however, drinking was an essential expression of his approach to (and quarrel with) social reality, Hold Your Hour and Have Another (1964) is a collection of Behan's humorous pieces. A novel, The Scarpener (1964), was published posthumously.

Behemoth. The animal described in Job 40:15-24. If an actual animal were intended, it would seem to describe the hippopotamus; but modern scholarship tends to the opinion that the reference is purely mythological.

Behn, Mrs. Aphra (1640-1689). English novelist and dramatist. The first English female professional writer, she wrote a number of complicated comedies of intrigue, such as The Rover, or The Banished Cavaliers: Parts I and II (1677, 1680), Sir Patient Fancy (1678), and The City Heirress, or Sir Timothy Treat-All (1682). Her best-known novel is Oroonoko, or the History of the Royal Slave (c. 1678). She served Charles II as a spy in Antwerp.

Behrman, S[amuel] N[athanial] (1893- ). American playwright. He is especially known for his sophisticated comedies of ideas. The Second Man (1927) was his first play. Among his better-known later works are Serena Blandish (1928), a dramatization of a novel by the British novelist and playwright Enid Bagnold; Biography (1932), about a woman portrait painter and a journalist; Rain from Heaven (1934), one of the earliest anti-Nazi plays; End or summer; Amphictyons 38 (1937), an adaptation from Jean Giraudoux; Wine of Choice (1938), on liberalism and its difficulties; No Time for Comedy; and I Know My Love (1949). Behrman is the author of the biography of Eugene O'Neill (1952), a work on the famous art dealer, and Porterfield's Man (1960), a profile of Max Beerbohm. He has also written several film scripts. In 1958 he dramatized his autobiographical The Worcester Account (1954) as The Cold Wind and the Warm.

Being and Nothingness (L'Étret et le Néant; 1943). A long philosophical treatise by Jean-Paul Sartre. Subtitled "an essay on phenomenological ontology," it is Sartre's major attempt to systematize his theoretical analysis of man's condition and consciousness which underlies existentialism. Postulating that for man existence precedes essence, he concludes that the very "nothingness" of man's essence in a world without God or meaning allows each person infinite potentialities in the shaping of his life, limited by the facts of the external world, but not by any a priori conditions of the so-called human nature.

Bel, Sir John Hay. See Jan Hay.

Bekennnisse des Hochstaplers Felix Krull. See Confessions of Felix Krull: Confidence Man.

Bel. The supreme Babylonian god of the earth and atmosphere, called the god of lords. He is said to have created man and the universe and symbolizes male generative power. Bel is the same word as Baal in Phoenician and Hebrew.

In the story Bel and the Dragon, an Old Testament Apocryphal book appended to the book of Daniel, Daniel exposes the trickery of the priest of Bel in Babylon and convives the king that Bel is only an image and not an actual living deity.

Belarius. In Shakespeare's Cymbeline, a noble and worthy lord banished by Cymbeline, king of Britain. He kidnaps Cymbeline's two sons and, using the name Morgan, raises them in a rustic region of Wales as his own sons. He is a spokesman for the pastoral life far from the deceit and intrigues of the court.

Belasco, David (1859–1931). American actor, theatrical producer, and dramatist. Belasco produced nearly 400 plays, many of them by native dramatists, and greatly influenced the American theater in the direction of greater emotionalism and more realistic stage properties. He developed the talents of many performers, such as David Warfield and Minnie Maddern Fiske.

His best-known plays include The Heart of Maryland (1895), a Civil War story inspired by Rose Hartwick Thorpe's poem Curfew Must Not Ring Tonight (1867); The Girl of the Golden West; and The Return of Peter Grimm (1911), a fantasy to which Cecil B. DeMille also contributed. Belasco also collaborated with other writers, notably with James A. Herne on Hearts of Oak (1879) and with John Luther Long on Madame Butterfly (1898).

Belcari, Feo (1410–1484). Florentine writer of sacred plays and a celebrated life of Giovanni Colonnini. His sacra rappresentazione (mystery or miracle play) entitled Abramo ed Isac is one of the best of the genre, as well as the earliest by a known author.

Belch, Sir Toby. In Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, Olivia's riotous, bibulous uncle. He extracts drinking money from the foolish Sir Andrew Aguecheek by pretending to advance the latter's suit for Olivia.

Belgari. A famous novella by Niccolò Machiavelli about the adventures on earth of the archdevil Belgari. He has been sent here from Hell to determine whether matrimony has been the principal cause of the damnation of its residents, as they all claim. In Florence, he poses as a Spaniard, Roderigo of Castile, and marries Onesta Donati, but the more he loves her the happier she becomes, until he is forced to flee from her. Later, faced with the possibility of living with her again, he prefers to return to Hell.

Belford, John. The libertine friend and correspondent of Lovelace in Samuel Richardson's epistolary novel Clarissa Harlowe. Horrified by the rape of Clarissa, he reforms; he becomes Clarissa's executor and the editor of her voluminous correspondence.

Belg. See Faerie Queene, The.

Belge. See Faerie Queene, The.

Belinda. The heroine of Alexander Pope's mock-heroic poem The Rape of the Lock, who is described as the fairest of mortals:

> If to her share some Female Errors fall,
> Look on her Face and you'll forget 'em all.

Belinski, Vissarion Grigoryevich (1811–1848). Russian literary critic and journalist. Belinski gained prominence in literary circles for his Literaturnye mechthaniya (Literary Reveries, 1834), dealing with the development of Russian literature since the 17th century. He became the literary critic on the influential journal Otechestvennye Zapiski (Fatherland Notes), and, from 1846 to his death, on the Sovremennik (The Contemporary). The critical articles he wrote during these years, such as his annual surveys of Russian literature, were to have an overwhelming influence on the future course of Russian literary criticism. Belinski's ideas formed the theoretical basis for the natural school in Russian literature, which insisted that literature treat its subjects—especially poverty and exploitation of the people—realistically, with the aim of social reform. Although later critics exaggerated the social aspect of Belinski's literary doctrine, he was not entirely unaware of artistic quality. This fact is particularly evident in parts of the series of articles that he wrote from 1843 to 1846 on the work of Pushkin. But Belinski's fervent interest in social issues did occasionally blind him in regard to literary facts; he hailed Gogol as a great realist, and this erroneous label stuck to Gogol until the 20th century. Whatever confusion he introduced into Russian critical theory and practice, Belinski did—albeit not at all—serve Russian literature by insisting on its importance. He also encouraged the early efforts of some of Russia's finest writers, such as Lermontov, Gogol, Turgenev, and Dostoevski. Belinski's social bias has made him one of the ever quoted oracles of Soviet literary criticism.

Belinus. One of the kings in Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the Kings of Britain. According to the writer, Belinus founded Cælebon, and, when he died, his ashes were put into an urn and then placed on top of a tower.

Belisarius (505–565). Byzantine general, responsible for the military success of Justinian I. Accused of conspiring against the life of the emperor, he was imprisoned in 562 and released in 563. Much later, an exaggerated version of his punishment made him a blind beggar, and this account was popularized by Jean-François Marmontel's philosophical novel Bélisaire (1767).
Belkin, Tales of (Povesti Belkina; 1830). A cycle of 5 short stories by Aleksandr Pushkin, with an introduction dealing with the life of the fictitious compiler of the tales, Ivan Petrovich Belkin. The tales are Vysvétel (The Shot), Metel (The Snowstorm), Groboshchik (The Undertaker), Staro- onnymy smotritel (The Stationmaster), and Baryshnya-Krest'yanka (The Lady-Rustic). The best known of the tales is probably The Stationmaster, which contains one of the first carefully drawn portraits in Russian literature of a character who is not a member of the nobility. The fictitious compiler of the tales, Ivan Belkin, whose rather commonplace life is recounted in the introduction, became famous as a literary character in his own right. Pushkin later wrote a prose fragment, Istoriya sela Goryukhino (History of the Village of Goryukhin, 1830), which purports to be an autobiography of Belkin. The extraordinary description of such an ordinary figure as Belkin is credited with being one of the first steps toward the realism which predominated in later 19th-century Russian literature.

Bell, Acton, Ellis, and Currer. The pseudonyms adopted by Anne, Emily, and Charlotte Brontë respectively. In 1846 they published a volume entitled Poems by Currer, Ellis, and Acton Bell.

Bell, [Arthur] Clive [Howard] (1881– ). English critic of art and literature. A member of the Bloomsbury group, he married Vanessa Stephen, the sister of Virginia Woolf. His major works of criticism include Art (1914), Since Césanne (1922), Proust (1929), and Account of French Painting (1931). His son Julian (1908–1937), author of Work for the Winter (1936), a collection of poems, was fatally wounded while driving an ambulance for the Loyalists during the civil war in Spain.

Bell, Gertrude (1868–1926). English travel writer and authority on Arabia. Her books include The Desert and the Soum (1907). Her interesting Letters were published in 1927.

Bell, Laura. The heroine of William Makepeace Thackeray's Pendennis. As Mrs. Arthur Pendennis, she also appears in The Newcomes (1853–1855) and The Adventures of Philip (1862).

Bell, The (1858). A comic, philosophic novel by Iris Murdoch. The story is set in a lay religious community attached to a convent and is concerned with the complex needs and self-deceptions that bind each member to the group. The bell, which represents the ideals of the community, precipitates the final scandal that forces the group to disband. The members regain their freedom, but not all are able to deal with it.

Bellamy, Edward (1850–1898). American novelist and reformer. He is best known for his popular utopian novel Looking Backward: 2000–1887. Bellamy earlier wrote several romances, including The Duke of Stockbridge (1879), dealing with Shays's Rebellion, and two psychological studies, Dr. Heidenhoff's Process (1880) and Miss Ludington's Sister (1884). His short stories were collected in The Blind Man's World and Other Stories (1889).

Bellamoure, Sir. See FAERIE QUEENE, THE.

Bellay, Joachim Du. See Joachim Du Bellay.

Bell, Book and Candle (1950). A play by John Van Druten. It is about a beautiful present-day witch who falls in love with a man and loses her powers as a sorceress.

Belle au bois dormant, La (The Sleeping Beauty). A charming nursery tale that first appeared in the Contes de ma mère l'oye of Charles Perrault. A magic spell confines a beautiful princess to a castle where she must sleep for 100 years. Only the kiss of a young prince brave enough to penetrate the dark wood which springs up about the castle can, and eventually does, awaken her from the enchanted sleep.

Belle Dame sans Merci, La (1819). A ballad by John Keats. Its title and general theme are taken from an early French poem by Alain Chartier that was translated into English by Sir Richard Ros, and not by Geoffrey Chaucer, to whom it is often mistakenly attributed. Keats retains much of the medieval imagery of the French original.

Belle Plaideuse, La. See François de Bore- Robert.

Bellerophon or Bellerophonites. A grandson of Sisyphus. While living at the Argive court of King Proetus, he incurred the enmity of the queen, Antaea, by rejecting her advances. She falsely accused him to her husband, who sent Bellerophon with a letter to Iobates, the king of Lycia, his wife's father, recounting the charge, and praying that the bearer might be put to death. Iobates, unwilling to slay him himself, gave him many hazardous tasks (including the killing of the Chimaera), but as he was successful in all of them, Iobates made him his heir and gave him his daughter for a wife. Later Bellerophon is fabled to have attempted to fly to heaven on the winged horse Pegasus, but Zeus sent a gadfly to sting the horse, and the rider was overthrown. The revenge of Antaea is a familiar theme in folklore, found also in the stories of Phaedra and of Joseph and Potiphar's wife.

Bellerus. A giant, the legendary guardian of Lands End, England, once known as Bellerium.

Bell for Adano, A (1944). A novel by John Hersey. It details the attempt of a sympathetic American officer to secure a new bell for an Italian village church which has been partially destroyed in World War II. Hersey won a Pulitzer Prize for the novel, which was later dramatized.

Bellini, Giovanni (c. 1430–1516). Venetian painter. The son of the artist Jacopo Bellini (c. 1400–c. 1470), both he and his brother Gentile Bellini (c. 1427–1507) were strongly influenced by their father's work and also by their brother-in-law, the painter Andrea Mantegna, during their early years at Padua. Within the context of the new medium of oil painting, however, Giovanni moved away from Mantegna's severity, towards a great richness and mellowness of color. His devoutly religious Madonnas and serene altarpieces also reveal a deep appreciation of landscape, and of the effect of light and color on atmosphere. His interest in light and color, when contrasted with the Florentine emphasis on line and modeling, was to become in the hands of Giorgione and Titian, his two greatest pupils, the glory of the Venetian school of painting. Among his masterpieces are Chris Blessing, the Pietà, and the Agony in the Garden.

His father Jacopo left few surviving works, but influenced his sons chiefly through his sketchbooks, which have entitled him to be called the initiator of the Venetian Renaissance in painting. His brother Gentile is noted for his ceremonial pageant pictures (especially the  Miracle of the Cross) and for his portrait of Muhammad II, for whom he was court painter at Constantinople. Despite the Islamic prohibition of images, Gentile was cherished by the sultan because of his great artistry.

Bellini, Vincenzo (1801–1835). Italian opera composer. His works are characterized by elegance and lyrical charm. His principal operas are Norma (his masterpiece), I Puritani, and La Sonnambula.
Bellini was a close friend of Chopin, and his music is thought to have had some influence on the work of that composer.

Bellissant. The mother of the twins Valentine and Obson in French romance and the sister of the CAROLINGIAN king Pepin. Falsely accused of infidelity, she is banished to the forest for a while by her husband, Alexander of Constantinople.

Bello, Andrés (1781–1865). Venezuelan scholar and poet. As one of the most promising young men in Caracas, Bello studied classical literature, law, and philosophy; his interest in the natural sciences was stimulated by his meeting with Alexander von Humboldt, who greatly influenced him. In 1810, Bello was sent to England to seek support for the revolutionary junta of Caracas as part of a three-man delegation that also included Simón Bolívar.
In England, where he remained for nearly 20 years, he began his famous edition of the Poema del Cid, based on the 12th-century text, and wrote his best-known poems: Alocución a la Poesía (1823), a declaration of literary independence in which he exhorts the Muse to abandon Europe for America, and La agricultura de la soma tórrida (1826), notable for its description of the plants of America in which realistic detail is combined with classical allusions. From 1823 until his death, Bello resided in Chile where he held important government posts, was a founder and first president of the University of Chile, and was the chief architect of the Chilean civil code.
During this period, he published La oración por todos (1843), an adaptation of Hugo's La prière pour tous (1830) which is sometimes considered better than the original. His most enduring achievement, however, is probably his Gramática de la lengua castellana (1847), still the outstanding authority on Spanish grammar. See Domingo Faustino Sarmiento.

Belo, Hilaire. Pen name of Joseph Hilaire Fierre Bello (1870–1953). English writer. Born in France, Bello was a prolific author of light verse, short stories, travel books, history, biography, works of Roman Catholic and conservative polemic, and fiction. Like G. K. Chesterton, with whom he had many attitudes in common, he engaged in a great deal of influential controversy attacking the ideas of H. G. Wells and Bernard Shaw; Shaw called the pair "the Chestello-Bello." He is now best remembered for his light, witty writing and for his verse for children. His humorous, mock-moral books for children include The Bad Child's Book of Beasts (1896), Cautionary Tales (1898), and Cautionary Verses (1941).
His elegant, witty essays appeared in such volumes as
On Nothing (1908) and On Everything (1909).
The Path to Rome is a travel book strongly flavored with humor and Catholic feeling; Places (1942) is a collection of short travel essays. He also wrote History of England (1925–1927) and biographies of Robespierre (1901), Wolsey (1930), and others. A collection of his letters was published in 1959.

Bello Lowndes, Marie Adelaide. See Mrs.
Bello Lowndes.

Bellona. In Roman mythology, the goddess of war and either wife or sister of Mars.

Bellow, Saul (1915– ). American novelist Best known for his picarise Adventures of Augie March, Bellow has a style that is rich, complex, and often comic. His first novel, Dangling Man (1944), is the story of a young man who is waiting to be inducted into the army. His second novel, The Victim (1947), deals with relations between Jew and Gentile. Seize the Day (1956) contains the excellent long story that entitles the volume, a play, and a shorter story, Looking for Mr. Green.
The hero of Henderson the Rain King (1959) is a giant of a man with aspirations that match his bulk;
the book departs from a realistically described American setting to a fantasy world where Henderson finds his destiny in a series of comic adventures that culminate in his becoming the rainmaker for a savage tribe. Herrzog (1961), a novel about a college teacher, is highly autobiographical.

Bellows, George Wesley (1882–1925). American painter and lithographer. He is best known for his scenes of prizefights.

Bells and Pomegranates (1841–1846). A series of pamphlets containing poems by Robert Browning.
They were issued by his publishers in an effort to popularize his work.

the 12 apostles.

beloved physician. Luke the evangelist. The beloved physician mentioned by St. Paul in Colossians (4:14) is presumed to be this Luke.

Beloved Returns, The (Lotte in Weimar; 1939). A novel by Thomas Mann. It is based on an imaginary incident in the life of Goethe: Charlotte ("Lotte") Buff, who was Goethe's sweetheart when he was young and who is thought to have been the model for the character Lotte in Goethe's
THE SORROWS OF YOUNG WERTHER, comes to Weimar many years later and re-encounters the now old and established Goethe. Although in real life this incident never occurred, Mann has used it to make many intriguing explorations into Goethe's work and personality.

Beloved Vagabond, The (1906). A best-selling novel by William J. Locke. The vagabond is Parag-et, a Bohemian philosopher and violinist, who wanders about Europe with a stray small boy (Anticot, who tells the story) and a homeless country girl.

Belphoebe. See FABRIC QUEENS, THE.

Belshazzar. The son of Nebuchadnezzar and the last of the Chaldean dynasty, whose name means "may Bel protect the king." When his father fled the city of Babylonia after being defeated by Cyrus, Belshazzar assumed the throne in 539 B.C.; he was killed the next year in the sack of the city by Cyrus.
According to scriptural narrative, he was warned of his coming doom by Daniel who interpreted the HANDBRITING ON THE WALL* (Dan. 5:5–27).*
Beltine

Beltine (Céshamain). May 1, one of the 4 great feast days of the ancient Celtic year. Samain and Céshamain (Beltine) are the feast days that divide the year into two halves, the hot and the cold seasons. See Imbolc; Lugnasadh.

Belvédère. See Venice PRESERVED.

Bely, Andrei. Pen name of Boris Nikolayevich Bugayev (1880-1934). Russian poet and novelist. One of the symbolists, Bely, like Blok, was early in his career under the influence of the mystical ideas of the philosopher Vladimir Solov'ev. A student of philosophy and mathematics at the University of Moscow, Bely published his first poetry in 1901.

He greeted the revolution enthusiastically with a long poem, Christ Is Risen (Kristos voskrese; 1918). Bely's best work is his prose, which includes the novels The Silver Dove (Serebryany golub'; 1910), Petersburg (Peterburg; 1913), and Kozh Letayev (1918). Bely's prose style is rich, ornamental, and complex, often reminiscent of that of James Joyce in English. His later ideas had their source mainly in the anthroposophy of Rudolf Steiner, of whom Bely became a disciple. Bely left Russia in 1921, but returned in 1923, when he tried unsuccessfully to acclimatize himself to the new society. His last years were spent writing his three volumes of memoirs which were published between 1929 and 1933: On the Border of Two Centuries (Na rubezhe dvuh stoletii), The Beginning of a Century (Nachalo veka) and Between Two Revolutions (Mehdu dvuh revolyutsii). In his memoirs he included his reminiscences of Aleksandr Blok, his friend and fellow poet.

Bembo, Cardinal Pietro (1470-1547). Italian prelate and man of letters. Famed as a reformer and legislator of language and literature, he imposed classicist norms on the Tuscan tongue through his writings and inspired writers such as Petrarch to raise themselves to the level of classical models. Made a cardinal in 1539, he was a candidate for the papacy at the time of his death. His most famous works are the Asolani (1509), a group of dialogues on the nature of love which take their title from Asolo, the setting of the work, and the Prose della volgar lingua (Essays on the Vernacular Tongue, 1525).

Bemelmans, Ludwig (1898-1962). Austrian-born American writer and painter. Bemelmans' experiences in the hotel and restaurant business furnished material for his many entertaining stories and novels; he is also known for the charm of his books for children, especially Madeleine (1939). His work, written in a seemingly naïve though highly sophisticated style, was often illustrated by his own water colors and drawings. Among his many books are Harri (1934), My War with the United States (1937), Hotel Splendide (1940), Now I Lay Me Down to Sleep (1944), The One I Love Best (1954), The World of Bemelmans (1955), My Life in Art (1958), and Are You Hungry Are You Cold (1960).

Benares or Varanasi. A holy city on the Ganges River in central India, famous as a place of pilgrimage.

Benassio, Dr. See Country Doctor, THE.

Benavente [y Martínez], Jacinto (1866-1954). Spanish playwright. Benavente was one of the leaders of Spanish drama during his day. He was a prolific writer whose works stress social satire or rural life. Los intereses creados (1907) is considered Benavente's masterpiece and is reminiscent of the Italian commedia dell'arte. His other well-known plays include La mal querida (The Passion Flower, 1913) and Senora ama (1908). In 1922 he was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature.

Ben Bolt. A popular song by Thomas Dunn English. It was first published in The New Mirror (1843). The heroine of George du Maurier's novel, Trilby, sings the song while hypnotized by Svengali. Several tunes have been used for English's lyrics, which begin "Oh, don't you remember sweet Alice, Ben Bolt?"

Benchley, Robert [Charles] (1889-1945). American drama critic, essayist, humorist, actor, and screenwriter. Highly successful in movies and on the radio, Benchley was admired for his short film How to Sleep (1935) and his famous sketch, The Treasurer's Report (1930). In his essays, Benchley portrayed his life as a series of frustrations and humiliations; his humor is based on the situation of the average American man, faced with the complexities of 20th-century life. Among his works are 20,000 Leagues under the Sea, or, David Copperfield (1928), From Bed to Worse (1934), My Ten Years in a Quandary (1936), Benchley Beside Himself (1943), and the posthumous Chips Off the Old Benchley (1949). His son, Nathaniel, wrote a biography of him in 1955.

Benda, Julien (1867-1956). French philosopher and essayist. A violent defender of strict rationalism, he wrote a controversial attack on Bergsonism in 1912 and condemned the esthetics of contemporary literature for sensational emotionalism in Belphegor (1918). Benda is best known, however, for his attack on The Treason of the Intellectuals, The Yoke of Pity (L'Ordination; 1912) is a novel.

bend sinister. In heraldry, two parallel lines from the upper right hand corner of a shield to the opposite base point. It was erroneously supposed to indicate bastardy. See BATON.

Benedick. In Shakespeare's Much ADO About Nothing, a self-assured, cynical, and witty young nobleman of Padua. Although he has forsaken women, he constantly engages in repartee with the sharp-tongued Beatrice, with whom he is last united through the conspiracy of their friends.

Benediktsson, Einar (1864-1940). Icelandic poet. Benediktsson was the leader of a nationalist movement that reacted against the bleakness and pessimism of the naturalist school. Active in political affairs, he published the newspaper Dagaksra for several years. In his verse, too, he expressed both optimism and patriotism, as well as his mystic beliefs. His volumes of poetry include Soga@r og Koe@i (1886), Hrannir (1913), Hvammar (1930), and Lindamorki (3 vols., 1945).

Benelli, Sem (1877-1949). Italian dramatist. His best-known play is La Cena delle Beffe (1909), a melodrama set in Renaissance Florence, which was produced (1919) in New York as The Jest with John and Lionel Barrymore. He also wrote La Maschera di Bruto (1909) and L'Amore dei Tre Re (1910), which was the source of Italo Montemezzi's opera (1913) of the same name.
Bennet, Elizabeth

Beneš, Eduard (1884–1948). Czechoslovak statesman. Named foreign minister of Czechoslovakia when the republic was created in 1918, Beneš served for 17 years and was elected president in 1935. He held the post again after World War II, but resigned after the Communist coup d'état of 1948.

Benét, Laura (1884?— ). American poet and biographer. The sister of William Rose and Stephen Vincent Benét, she has published several books of verse, including Fairy Bread (1921) and Is Morning Sure? (1947), as well as a series of biographies for young people. Among her later books are Coleridge, Poet of Wild Enchantment (1952) and Famous American Humorists (1959).

Benét, Stephen Vincent (1889–1943). American poet and short-story writer. Known for his interest in fantasy and American themes, Benét also used his literary gifts as a novelist and writer for radio. His early collections of verse include Five Men and Pompey (1915), Young Adventure (1918), Heavens and Earth (1920), The Ballad of William Sycamore (1923), and Tiger Joy (1925). King David (1923) is a narrative poem about the biblical ruler. Benét's most famous poem, John Brown's Body, won a Pulitzer Prize. In Litany for Dictatorships (1935), he attacked totalitarian states. Western Star (1943), the first part of an American epic left incomplete at his death, was awarded a posthumous Pulitzer Prize.

Benét's first collection of short stories was Thirteen O'Clock (1937), which includes The Devil and Daniel Webster and Sobbin' Women. Other stories were collected in Tales Before Midnight (1939) and The Last Circle (1946). His novels include Spanish Bayonet (1926) and James Shore's Daughter (1934). Interested in the dramatic possibilities of radio, he wrote They Burned the Books (1942) and A Child Is Born (1942), a retelling of the birth of Jesus.

Benét, William Rose (1886–1950). American poet, critic, and editor. The elder brother of Stephen Vincent Benét, he wrote much poetry, collected in such volumes as Merchants from Cathay, (1913), Starry Harness (1933), The Stairway of Surprise (1947), and The Spirit of the Scene (1951). Rip Tide (1932) is a novel in verse. His verse autobiography, The Dust Which Is God (1941), won a Pulitzer Prize. One of the founders of the Saturday Review of Literature, he served on its editorial board and conducted the column of literary miscellany called "The Phoenix Nest" for many years. He was the original editor of The Reader's Encyclopedia.

Bengali Lancer. See Francis Yeats-Brown.

Bengodi. (It., "enjoy well.") The name of a "land of Cockaigne" in Boccaccio's Decameron (VIII, 3). This is the land where "they tie the vines with sausages, where you may buy a fat goose for a penny and have a Gambling in the bargain; where there is also a mountain of grated Parmesan cheese, and people do nothing but make cheesecakes and macaroons." It occurs in the tale of Calandra and the Heliotrope, and is described to Calandrino by his friends, who are trying to persuade him that he will find precious stones there. But since it is "farther away even than the Abruzzi," he decides not to go.

Bengtsson, Frans Gunnar (1894–1954). Swedish poet, historian, novelist, and essayist. Legenden om Babel (1925) is a collection of poems that express in polished verse a love of the heroic. His most famous work, the novel Röde Orm (Red Orm, 1943; The Long Ships, 1954) also deals with the heroic: it is a lusty and amusing account of Viking exploits.

Ben-Hur: A Tale of the Christ (1880). A novel by Lew Wallace. The book grew out of a railroad car discussion that the author had with Robert Ingersoll, the free thinker. They discussed the divinity of Christ, and Wallace decided to study the life and times of Jesus. The book centers around Judah Ben Hur, a young aristocratic Jew, who is falsely accused of seeking to murder the Roman governor of Palestine. Sent to the galleys, he escapes, becomes a Roman officer, engages in a climactic chariot race with his betrayer, the false friend Messala, and is finally converted to Christianity. The book, highly popular, has been staged and twice made into a motion picture.

Benito Cereno (1856). A short story by Herman Melville, collected in his volume Piazza Tales. Benito Cereno, the captain of a slave ship, appears to be in command; in reality, he is the prisoner of the slaves, who are led by Babo, a Senegalese posing as Cereno's valet. The story is narrated by Captain Amasa Delano, an innocent who can only suspect the presence of evil. Finally, the conspirators are undone, Cereno dies, and Babo is executed.

Benivieni, Girolamo (1453–1542). Florentine poet, member of the Medici circle. Benivieni is the author of a famous Renaissance poem, the Cansone dell'Amor Divino (Song of Divine Love), which summarizes the Platonic love theory of Ficino. The poem was the subject of an extensive commentary by Pico della Mirandola, and influenced such writers as Bembo, Castiglione, and Spenser.

Benjamin. In the Old Testament, the youngest and favorite son of Jacob and Rachel, whose name means "son of the right hand." When, during the famine, Jacob sent his sons forth from Canaan to buy bread, he refused to let Benjamin go "lest peradventure mischief befall him" (Gen. 42:4). Jacob's son Joseph who was in charge of the granaries in Egypt told his brothers, without revealing his own identity, that they must bring Benjamin with them if they returned for more corn. When they did so, Joseph feasted them and gave them grain, but sent word after them that his silver cup was missing; when search was made it was found in Benjamin's sack, where it had been placed by Joseph's orders. Joseph then disclosed his identity and arranged for his father's migration to Egypt.

Benjamin's descendants formed the tribe of Benjamin; they were stalwart warriors and defenders of freedom. Israel's first king, Saul, came from this tribe as did the Apostle Paul.

Benn, Gottfried (1886–1956). German poet, short-story writer, and essayist. He was strongly influenced by Nietzsche. His early collections of expressionistic verse, Morgue (1912), Flesh (Fleisch, 1916), and Schutt (Rubble, 1919), are the best known.

Bennet, Elizabeth. See Pride and Prejudice.
Arnold Bennett, [Enoch] Arnold (1867–1931). English novelist, playwright, and journalist. His finest novels are _The Old Wives' Tale_ and _Clayhanger_. Both are set in the industrial district in the English midlands where he was born, known as Five Towns in his novels. A humble clerk with literary ambitions, Bennett went to London at 21 (his autobiographical _A Man from the North_ [1898] describes this period). He became a successful journalist, editing a woman's magazine, writing "Pocket Philosophies" such as _How to Live on 24 Hours a Day_ (1908), and doing influential reviewing. In 1903 he went to live in Paris for some years and married a Frenchwoman. Influenced by the writings of Emile Zola, Bennett wrote naturalistic novels, studies of how his characters are the creatures of their environment. Among these are his two best novels, and _Anna of the Five Towns, Whom God Hath Joined_ (1906), _Hilda Lessways_ (1911), _These Twain_ (1915), _Riceyman Steps_ (1923), _Lord Rario_ (1926), and _Imperial Palace_ (1930). Among his collections of short stories are _Tales of the Five Towns_ (1905) and _The Master of the Five Towns_ (1912). His successful comic novels are _A Great Man_ (1904), _Burned Alive, the Card_ ( _Derry the Audacious_ in the U.S.), and _Mr. Prohack_ (1922). He wrote, with Edward Knoblock, _Milestones_ (1912), a successful drama about the rise of an industrial family. Bennett also wrote deliberate commercial fiction, such as _Sacred and Profane Love_ (1905), for he wanted—and achieved—success, a famous actress mistress, and a yacht.

Like the naturalistic novelists who were his contemporaries, his friend H. G. Wells and John Galsworthy, Bennett was attacked by the modernist Virginia Woolf, and is now somewhat neglected. His best work is distinguished by his rendering of the passage of time, his accurate descriptions of ordinary, apparently quite dull and unromantic lives, and his sympathetic portrayals of women.

Bennett, James Gordon (1795–1872). Scottish-born American newspaper editor. Bennett came to America in 1819 and settled finally in New York City, serving on the staff of _The Enquirer_ and _The Courier_. On May 6, 1835, he founded the _New York Herald_ and remained its editor until his retirement in 1867. It was an aggressive, widely read paper, notable for its extensive news coverage and lively editorials. According to Gerald W. Johnson, Bennett "filled his paper with vulgarity, vituperation, and scandal, but he got the news." His son, James Gordon Bennett (1841–1918), succeeded him as editor in 1867. The younger Bennett sent Stanley to Africa to find Livingstone and supported other expeditions to Africa and the Arctic. He was the founder of the Paris edition of the _Herald_ (1887).

Benoit de Sainte-Maure or Sainte-More (12th century). Medieval French poet, attached to the court of Henry II of England from 1154 to 1189. He is said to be the author of the _Roman de Troie_ ( _Romance of Troy_ , c. 1160), which gives the history of the Trojan War the atmosphere of medieval feudalism and the chivalric code; this seems to be the first appearance of the story of Troy and Greeks (here called Briseida). Benoît is also considered the author of the _Chronicle of the Dukes of Normandy_ to 1135.

Benserade, Isaac de (1613–1691). French poet. A member of the Académie Française, Benserade specialized in writing masques and ballets, the popular court entertainments of his day. His sonnet on Job was so admired that a dispute arose whether this or Voltaire's sonnet _Uranie_ was better. Corneille had to call for an end to the quarrel, which had divided the literary world into _jofelins_ and _Uraniens_.

Benson, A[rth]ur C[hris]topher (1862–1925). English scholar, best known as the author of volumes of essays, including _From a College Window_ (1906). He wrote the words of the song _Land of Hope and Glory_. His father was archbishop of Canterbury. His brother, E[dward] F[redric] Benson (1867–1940), wrote light novels, including _Dodo_ (1893), which was supposed to be based on the character of the future Lady Oxford and created a sensation; a third brother, R[obert] H[ugh] Benson (1871–1914), became a Roman Catholic and wrote historical and contemporary novels with a strongly religious tone.

Benson, Sally (1900– ). American short story writer. She is the author of _Junior Miss_ (1941), a best seller which was later made into a highly successful play, a movie, and a radio series. Among her other books are _People Are Fascinating_ (1936), _Meet Me in St. Louis_ (1942), and _Women and Children First_ (1944).

Benson, Stella (1892–1933). English novelist and adventurous traveler. Her novels include _Tobit Transplanted_ (1931), a retelling of the apocryphal story in a Korean setting.

Bentham, Jeremy (1784–1832). English philosopher of the utilitarian school. His social and philosophical ideas are to be found in his _Fragment on Government_ (1776) and _Introduction to Principles of Morals and Legislation_ (1789). His watchword was "the greatest good for the greatest number," and he tried to work out scientifically on a quantitative scale the values of pleasure and pain in moral motivation. See UTILITARIANISM.

Bentley, Lawrence (1908– ). Indian poet writing in English. He has worked for a commercial firm, a newspaper in Calcutta, and is currently a columnist for a New Delhi weekly. _Graffiti_ (1962) is a collection of poems.

Bentley, Phyllis (1894– ). English regional and historical novelist. Her Yorkshire novels include _The Inheritance_ (1932) and _The House of Moreys_ (1953). _O Dreams, O Destinations_ (1962) is an autobiography.

Bentley, Richard (1662–1742). English classical scholar. His _Dissertation on the Letters of Phalaris_ (1669) is one of the first studies to use philology as a test of authenticity. It sprang from a controversy (1695–1699) with Charles Boyle which Johnathan Swift had started in the _Battle of the Books_. Swift, like other literary men of the day, saw nothing but modern pedantry in Bentley's painstaking scholarship. Bentley's Homeric studies are fragmentary, but historically important for showing that early Greek had a sound, later lost, which was represented by the letter Digamma and pronounced like the English w.

Beppo, Thomas Hart (1782–1858). American statesman. From 1821 to 1851, Benton represented Missouri in the U.S. Senate, where he strongly favored Western interests. A vigorous supporter of Andrew Jackson, he fought the U.S. Bank, and was finally defeated for re-election because he championed the Union against the South. He wrote a well-known autobiography, Thirty Years View (2 vols., 1854, 1856). His daughter Jessie married John C. Frémont.

Benton, Thomas Hart (1889– ). American painter and muralist. Born in Missouri, he became a leading advocate of regionalism, depicting in his work a contemporary view of life in the Middle West. He inveighed against all the European movements and is the author of An Artist in America (1937), which he also illustrated.

Benu. The Egyptian prototype of the Greek Phoenix. It was a heronlike bird, the embodiment of Ra, worshiped under the composite form of Osiris with the head of a bird.

Benvolio. In Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, a nephew of Montague and Romeo's friend. Hoping that Romeo will be cured of his infatuation for the fair Rosaline, Benvolio persuades him to attend the Capulets' ball, so that he can compare her with the other beauties present. On several occasions he tries unsuccessfully to avert strife between the feuding Montagues and Capulets.

Beolco, Angelo (1502–1542). Italian dramatist. He is also known as Ruzzante (the Flower), after the chief peasant character in his dramas. They were performed by one of the first acting companies organized in Italy. The best of his seven comedies are the Moschetta (Little Mosquito, 1520) and the Fiorina (Florin, 1521).

Beowulf (early 8th century). An Old English (Anglo-Saxon) epic of almost 3200 lines in alliterative verse. It is the earliest extant written composition of such length in English, and indeed in all Teutonic literature. Its content was based on Norse legends merged with historical events of the early sixth century in Denmark; this oral tradition was carried to England by Danish invaders of the mid-sixth century, fused with the Christianity they absorbed there, and finally written down by a single but unknown poet shortly before or after 700.

Hrothgar, king of the Danes on the island of Zealand, has built the mead hall Heorot for feasting his warriors, but they abandon it because of the murderous ravages of the monster Grendel. Beowulf, nephew of King Hygelac of the Geats (on the coast of southern Sweden facing the Danes), comes with 14 warriors to challenge the monster, and is received by Hrothgar at a great feast. The Geats spend the night in the mead hall; Grendel comes, and in a mighty fight Beowulf with his bare hands wrenches the monster's arm from his shoulder, and mounts it as a trophy. The next day Hrothgar gives a triumphant feast in Heorot; but as they sleep that night, Grendel's mother comes to avenge her son, slaying a Dane and stealing the severed arm. Beowulf plunges into the demon-infested pond where the monsters live and wrestles with Grendel's mother. His own sword Hrunting proves of no use, but he finds a sword crafted by the giants and beheads her. Then he severs the head of Grendel, who has died there of his wound, to bring back as a trophy. He and his Geats receive many gifts from Hrothgar when they leave, and from Hygelac when they reach home. Hygelac and his son both die in wars with the Swedes, so that Beowulf eventually becomes king of the Geats, ruling well for 50 years. Then a fire-breathing dragon, angered because a man has stolen a goblet from his hoarded treasure, begins to ravage the land. Beowulf goes out to slay it, but all his warriors fearfully desert him, except young Wiglaf. Although together they kill the dragon, Beowulf receives his own death-wound. Wiglaf be- rates his companions for cowardice, and Beowulf is given a stately burial.

The story is not told chronologically, however; events are often anticipated in prophecy or interpolated later in retrospect. Long speeches of celebration or lamentation, long descriptions of the feasts, and digressions into genealogy and history all give a colorful picture of life at that time. Memorable episodes not actually a part of the main action include Unferth's insult to Beowulf at the first feast and Beowulf's answer to his swimming contest with Breca, and the tale of Finn and Hildeburh, sung by a minstrel at the second feast (see Finnm- burg).

lady. He is taken captive at Troy, becomes a Turk, joins a band of pirates, grows rich, and, after several years' absence, returns to his native land, where he discovers his wife at a carnival ball with her cavalier servente. He makes himself known to her, and they live together again as man and wife.

Béranger, Pierre Jean de (1780-1857). French folk poet. His songs, variously sentimental or witty, ribald or light-hearted, gay, assured him of fame during his lifetime. In such songs as Le Roi d'Yvetot (1813) he gave expression to popular feeling after the Napoleonic Wars when the French people, weary of the quest for glory, longed instead for comfort and peace. His song Le Marquis de Carabas (1816) satirized the vain pretensions of nobles during the Bourbon restoration. Although Chansons inédites (1828), his collection of political verse celebrating Napoleon Bonaparte, won him a prison term, it earned him staunch popular approval.

Berceo, Gonzalo de (c. 1180-c. 1246). Earliest Spanish poet known by name. A secular priest at the Benedictine monastery of San Millán de la Cogolla, Berceo was a prolific writer of pious religious verse in the vernacular. His best-known poems are works dedicated to the Virgin, notably Milagros de Nuestra Señora, and lives of saints, such as Vida de Domingo de Silos. See MÉSTER DE CLEREÇA.

Berchtesgaden. A district in Bavaria, site of Hitler's country house. It was razed by Allied bombings in 1945.

Bercilak. See SIR GAWAIN AND THE GREEN KNIGHT.

Berdyayev, Nikolai Aleksandrovich (1874-1946). Russian religious philosopher. A Marxist in his youth, Berdyayev turned to religious views and played a large part in the renaissance of religious and philosophical thought in Russian intellectual life early in the 20th century. His writings, mainly aphoristic in form, often deal with the problem of freedom and man's relationship to the world in the light of this problem. His works include The Spiritual Crisis of the Intelligentsia (Dukhovnyi krisis intelligentsiya; 1910), The Philosophy of Freedom (Filosofiya svobody; 1911), The Meaning of Creativity (Smysl tvorchestva; 1916), and studies of Dos toevski and of Russian religious and philosophical thinkers.

In 1922, with a number of other Russian intellectuals, Berdyayev was expelled from the Soviet Union. He went to Berlin and then to Paris in 1925 where he continued to write, edited a journal (The Way; Russian Put'), and worked for the Y.M.C.A. Press, a publisher of religious and philosophical works.

Bérénice (1670). A tragedy by Jean Racine. The emperor Titus, newly ascended to the throne, learns that the Romans object to his marrying the foreigner Bérénice, queen of Palestine. Despite his love for her, he obeys the mandate of his people, and the lovers separate forever. Literary tradition holds that the duchesse d'Orléans arranged for Racine and Corneille to write plays on this subject, each in ignorance that the other was doing the same. In the resulting contest, Racine's play was judged the better. See TITTE ET BÉRÉNICE.

Berenice (1835). A tale by Edgar Allan Poe. Egaecus is in love with his epileptic cousin, Berenice. Fascinated by her teeth, he draws them when she is presumed dead, after a fit. Berenice returns to life in a comic-horror climax.

Berenson, Bernard (1865-1959). Lithuanian-born American art connoisseur. A longtime resident of Italy, he was recognized by his generation as the greatest authority on Italian art from the 13th to the 17th century. Collectors and specialists alike have relied on his judgment. His Italian Painters of the Renaissance and other books and monographs remain classics in their field. I Tatti, his villa near Florence, with its magnificent library and superb art collection, has become, since his death, a European outpost of Harvard University. Excerpts from the diaries he kept from 1947 to 1956 were published as The Passionate S挤e×er (1960).

Beresford, John Davys (1873-1949). English novelist. He was the author of Jacob Stahl (1911), a once popular story about a young man growing up.

Berezina. A river in western Russia. It flows into the Dnieper, and was the scene of battles in both 1812 when Napoleon's army retreated westward and in 1941 when the German army invaded the Soviet Union.

Bergamín, José (1894- ). Spanish critic and dramatist. Bergamín directed (1933-1936) the critical review Cruz y Raya whose literary influence favored Spanish neo-Catholicism. He is also known for his dramas, which include La hija de Dios (1945), Una mujer con tres almas (1950), and for his collection of essays, El cohete y la estrella (1922).

Berggren, Werner (1892- ). German novelist, known for his interest in historical subjects and for the humor of his style. Among his novels are Der Grosstypen und das Gericht (The Tyrant and the Court, 1935), Am Himmel wie auf Erden (In Heaven as on Earth, 1940), and Das Feuerzeichen (The Fiery Sign, 1949).

Bergeret, M. The central figure in the four satiric novels that comprise Anatole France's Histoire Contemporaine. In the first volumes M. Bergeret holds an official position in a French provincial university. In the last two books, he is divorced from his wife and lives in Paris. These last books in the series deal extensively with the Dreyfus case, Bergeret serving as a vehicle for many of France's own feelings and convictions on the subject.

Bergman, Hjalmar Frederik (1883-1931). Swedish dramatist, novelist, and short-story writer. The son of a wealthy banker, Bergman did not develop his own unique literary qualities until his father's financial failure forced him to write for a living. Lively humor and ironic tenderness characterize Bergman's work; in both his novels and his plays the people are amusingly grotesque clowns. Among his novels and stories are Hans nåds testament (1910), Markurrells i Wadkoping (God's Orich, 1919) and Chefen fru Ingeborg (The Head of the Firm, 1924). His plays include Marionettenspel (1917), Swedenhems (1925), and Patatsek (1928).

Bergman, Ingmar (1918- ). Swedish motion-picture director, writer, and producer. The son of a clergyman, Bergman has throughout his career been associated with A. B. Svensk Filmindustri; he first came to public attention with the script he wrote for Torment (1944). His own productions, made with a small company of devoted actors, are often concerned with questions of faith and belief; they include Smiles of a Summer Night (1955), The Seventh Seal (1956), Wild Strawberries (1957), The Magician (1958), The Virgin Spring (1959), Through a Glass Darkly (1960), Winter Light (1962), and The Silence (1963).

Bergotte. A famous author in Marcel Proust’s Remembrance of Things Past. His work greatly influences the narrator, who admires the delicate, exquisite style of his writing.

Bergson, Henri (1859–1941). French philosopher. During his lifetime Bergson enjoyed wide popularity as a professor at the Collège de France; his lectures were always crowded and his books were eagerly read. His influence upon modern literature and thought has been of profound significance. Bergson’s philosophy is complex, but the basic premise of his intellectual system is a faith in direct intuition as a means of attaining knowledge. To the experimental and rationalistic methods of science he opposed an antirational and mystical approach to understanding. Change or movement, Bergson believed, was the basis of all reality. Time should not be measured scientifically or mechanically, since for the human being time operates as a continuous flow in which past and present are inseparable to the consciousness and the memory. This theory of time in relation to the human self figures prominently in the long work of Marcel Proust, Remembrance of Things Past.

Bergson’s interest in biological evolution led to the formulation of his theory of élan vital, a spirit of energy and life that moves all living things, and to the publication of his famous work L’Evolution créatrice (1907). His chief philosophical works are Essai sur les données immédiate de la conscience (1888; translated as Time and Free Will), Matière et mémoire (1896), L’Energie spirituelle (1919; translated as Mind-Energy), Durée et simultanéité (1922), Les Deux Sources de la morale et de la religion (1932), and La Pensée et le mouvant (1934). Of Jewish parentage, Bergson renounced the honors and posts awarded him by the French government in 1940, as a protest against hostile legislation passed by the Vichy government against the Jews.

Berkeley, George (1685–1753). Irish-born English bishop and philosopher. He was one of the earliest and most influential thinkers of the philosophical school of idealism. The exponent of a theory of philosophical immaterialism based on the proposition that to be is to be perceived, he maintained that material objects are ideas in our minds, with no independent existence, and that, therefore, the whole of reality consists of ideas in the mind of God. His chief works are Essay Towards a New Theory of Vision; Treatise concerning the Principles of Human Knowledge (1710); Three Dialogues between Hylas and Philonous (1713); Alciphron, or The Minute Philosopher, a collection of popular pseudo-Platonic dialogues; Theory of Vision (1733); and Siris: A Chain of Philosophical Reflections and Inquiries Concerning the Virtues of Tar-Water. He was active in attacking the opinions of freethinkers, and was associated with a number of prominent 18th-century literary figures including Addison, Pope, and Swift. From 1728 to 1732, he lived in America, in the colony of Rhode Island, where he wrote Alciphron and founded the Literary and Philosophical Society and a college for the education of colonists and Indians.

Berkeley, Sir William. See Bacon’s Rebellion.

Bergløchen, Götz von. See Götz von Berlichingen.

Berlin, Irving. Real name, Israel Baline (1888–). Russian-born American composer. He is known for his popular songs and lyrics, especially sentimental or patriotic nature, such as Blue Skies (1927), God Bless America (1939), and White Christmas (1942). He also wrote the scores for many musical comedies, including As Thousands Cheer (1933), Annie Get Your Gun (1946), and Call Me Madam (1954).

Berlioz, [Louis] Hector (1803–1869). French composer and conductor. His Treatise on Modern Instrumentation and Orchestration (1844) established a new concept of the symphony orchestra, and is still a basic text. His literary works give excellent descriptions of his musical environment, and have been collected in 10 volumes. His musical works are conceived almost entirely as musical embodiments of literary ideas. The Symphonie Fantastique (1830), subtitled épisode in the life of an artist, is the first piece of sustained narrative music, the forerunner of the tone poems of Franz Liszt and Richard Strauss. Berlioz also invented the idée fixe, a basic theme that occurs in various forms in all movements of a work. Harold en Italie (1834) and Roméo et Juliette (1839) are two other programmatic symphonies. Other important works are the Grande Messe des Morts (Requiem Mass), the oratorio L’Enfance du Christ (The Childhood of Christ), and the gigantic opera Les Troyens (The Trojans, 1865–1869), which is based on the tragic love of Dido and Aeneas.

Berma. A great actress in Marcel Proust’s Remembrance of Things Past. Partially modeled on Sarah Bernhardt, she is particularly famous for her roles in Racine’s plays.

Bermoothes. An old name for Bermuda and the name of the island in Shakespeare’s The Tempest. The adventures of Sir George Somers, who was shipwrecked there with a group of colonists in 1609, may have furnished some of Shakespeare’s material for the play.

Bernabò of Genoa. A tale from Boccaccio’s Decameron (II, 9). Bernabò makes a wager with a fellow merchant, AmbrogioUolo, that his wife Ginevra will not succumb to any man in his absence. AmbrogioUolo, stealing into Ginevra’s room while she is asleep, removes some of her garments and observes that she has a mole under her breast. He then confronts Bernabò with the items he stole and his knowledge of the mole as proof of his having slept with Ginevra. Convinced he has truly lost his wager, and deeply grieved by his wife’s supposed infidelity, he orders her death. But Ginevra persuades her executioner to show Bernabò her blood-stained garments and let her flee into exile. Disguising herself as a youth, Sicurano da Pisa, Ginevra goes to sea with a Catalan merchant and reaches Alexandria, where the sultan takes her into his service. One day, she encounters AmbrogioUolo, who has come to sell his goods, including the garments taken from her room in Genoa that fateful night. Recognizing them, she asks to buy them and persuades him to tell how Bernadette of Lourdes, St. Real name, Bernadette Soubirous (1844-1879). French peasant girl canonized as a saint on Dec. 8, 1933. Bernadette was tending her sheep in February, 1858, when the Virgin Mary appeared to her several times in a vision and revealed the miraculous healing properties of the waters springing from the grotto in which she was standing. Lourdes, a town of the Gave de Pan in the department of Hautes-Pyrénées, is the site of the famous grotto which has become one of the principal Roman Catholic shrines and where many miraculous cures have been reported. Emile Zola drew inspiration from this story for his novel Lourdes (1894). The Song of Bernadette is a similarly inspired historical novel by Franz Werfel.

Bernanos, Georges (1888-1948). French novelist and political writer. His novels reflect his fervent Catholicism and his intense concern with moral and spiritual problems. Sous le Soleil de Satan (Under the Sun of Satan, also translated as The Star of Satan, 1926), and DIARY OF A COUNTRY PRIEST both stress the heroism of sanctity in the struggles or rural clerics. His other novels include MONSIEUR OUINE and Un mauvais rêve (1951). In his political essays, Bernanos opposed parliamentary democracy because it did not provide enough protection from the greedy and the power mad, and urged a return to monarchy to institute a new moral order. Les Grands Cimetières sous la lune (A Diary of My Times, 1938) was inspired by his fury against Franco in the Spanish Civil War. His anti-Vichy writings of World War II are collected in Lettre aux Anglais (Plea for Liberty, 1942), La France contre les robots (1947), and Le Chemin de la Croix des Ames (1948). Dialogues des Carmélites (1949), a play, is the basis of Poulenc's opera of the same name.

Bernard, Jean Jacques (1888- ). French dramatist, son of Tristan Bernard. A major exponent of the school of silence, he maintained that the theater is the art of "expressing what is unspoken," using delicate dialogue about trivia to capitalize on what is not said. Among his plays are The Sulky Fire (Le Feu qui reprend mal; 1921), Martine (1922), and The Unquiet Spirit (L'âme en Peine; 1926).

Bernard, Tristan. Pen name of Paul Bernard (1866-1947). French dramatist and novelist. Bernard is best known for his popular traditional comedies, such as the two he wrote with A. Godferneaux: Triplepatte (1905), adapted by Clyde Fitch as Toddles (1908), and Monsieur Codomat (1907). His own comedies include Le Petit Café (1911), Jules, Juliette, et Julie (1929), and Le Sauvage (1931).

Bernard de Ventadour. See TROUBADOURS.

Bernardin de Saint-Pierre, Jacques Henri (1737-1814). French author and one-time civil engineer. He travelled extensively from 1761 to 1766 in western Europe, with the intention of promoting a scheme to regenerate society. A malcontent like Rousseau, he returned to Paris in 1770, where he became the former's disciple and intimate friend, sharing his love of nature and horror of civilization. In 1784 he published his Etudes de la Nature, a remarkable series of exotic descriptions of nature. Their object is to show the perfection of Nature, the work of a good God solicitous of man's welfare. The precision, charm, and mastery of the language, new to French literature, are marred at times by the infantilism of the author's reasoning and by his sentimentality; his "philosophy" is at times a caricature of Rousseau's. The fourth part of these Etudes comprises his most famous work, the short novel PAUL ET VIRGINIE. Stylistically, Bernardin de Saint-Pierre is a precursor of Chateaubriand in his vivid use of pictorial description.

Bernardino da Siena (1380-1444). Italian Franciscan friar. Famous for his sermons, he was a frequent subject for the artists of the time.

Bernardo. See MARCELLUS.

Bernard of Clairvaux, St. (1090-1153). French ecclesiastic. In 1113 he entered the Cistercian abbey of Citeaux; two years later he became the founder and abbot of a new Cistercian monastery at Clairvaux, a post he held until his death. His fame as a preacher soon spread, bringing crowds of pilgrims to Clairvaux, but Bernard refused all offers of ecclesiastical preferment. Nevertheless, his importance and prestige grew rapidly: through his work, the Cistercians became the greatest order in western Christendom, and he himself the greatest influence, at first in France and later throughout western Europe. He was instrumental in the success of Pope Innocent II's cause over the claims of the antipope, Cardinal Peter of Leon. In 1141 he secured an official condemnation of Pierre Abelard's works at the Council of Sens. In 1146 he summoned the people to join in a crusade, in the name of Pope Eugenius II, and Louis VII of France with many others were moved to organize the Second Crusade. He was canonized in 1173.

Bernard of Cluny or Morlaix (c. 1100-c. 1156). French Benedictine monk. He wrote a Latin poem De Contemptu mundi, famous through the English translation of John Mason Neale.

Bernels, Lord. See John Bourchier.

Bernesque satire or poetry. See Francesco Berni.

Beri, Francesco (c. 1498-1536). Florentine author of popular satires on contemporary social and literary conventions. His favorite forms were the extended or tailed sonnet, and the long poem in terza rima called capitolo. One of the latter, his Capitolo al Fracastoro, is widely admired for its vividly humorous description of a night's lodging in a vicarage, cast in the form of a letter to his friend Fracastoro. Bernesque satire, or the Bernesque style, refers to his treatment in a seriocomic way of such trivial subjects as eels, melons, peaches, or jelly. He is also noted for his rewriting of Boiardo's Orlando innamorato in a more Tuscan style.

Bernini, [Giovanni] Lorenzo (1598-1680). Italian sculptor and architect. The dominant influence on European sculpture for over a century, he was a typically baroque artist and did not shy away from whirling movement and illusionistic representation in stone. He is known for his consummate portrait busts and his fountains, particularly the fountain of Trevi, and, in Rome, the fountain of the Four Rivers. His religious works include the skillfully carved Saint Theresa group in Rome's Santa Maria della Vittoria, theatrically lit by a hidden overhand window, and the exuberant setting for the chair of Saint Peter. His best-known architectural achievement is the double colonnade of the Piazza of Saint Peter (1655-1668).

Bernstein, Eduard (1850-1932). German socialist. His Die Voraussetzungen des Socialismus und die Aufgaben der Sozialdemokratie (The Premises of Socialism and the Tasks of Social Democracy, 1899) modified Marxist theory. He denied the necessity for a proletarian revolution, and urged the workers to improve their position through democratic activity.

Bernstein, Leonard (1818- ). American conductor and composer. He is widely known for his television lectures on music, some of which were published as The Joy of Music (1959). He has written classical pieces, such as the Symphony No. 2 (1949), subtitled The Age of Anxiety, after W. H. Auden's poem, and musical comedies, such as Candide (1956) and West Side Story (1957). He succeeded Dimitri Mitropoulos as musical director of the N.Y. Philharmonic Orchestra in 1958.

Berowne. See Biron.

Berzerker. In Scandinavian mythology, a wild, ferocious, warlike being who was sometimes possessed of supernatural strength and fury. One account says the name originated from the grandson of the eight-handed Starkader, called boar-serce (bare of mail) because he went into battle unharnessed. Another holds that the name means simply men who have assumed the form of bears. The word is used in English both as an adjective denoting excessive fury, and a noun denoting one possessed of such.

Berthe aux grands pieds (Fr., "Bertha with the large feet"). The title of a popular chanson de geste by the 13th-century minstrel Adenet le Roi. Historically, Berthe was the wife of Pepin the Short. She was influential at court in guiding the policies of her son Charlemagne (see Carolingians) until her death in 783.

Bertram. In Shakespeare's All's Well That Ends Well, the arrogant young count of Roussillon, who initially spurns the lovely Helena because she is a commoner.

Bertram, Edmund. See Mansfield Park.

Bertram, Harry. See Guy Mannering.

Bertran[de] de Born (c. 1140-c. 1215). Provençal warrior and troubadour. He is denounced in Dante's Inferno for having stirred up hostility between Henry II of England and his sons.

Berzelius, Baron Jöns Jakob (1779-1848). Swedish chemist. Founder of the present system of writing chemical symbols, Berzelius discovered selenium and thorium, and experimented in the field of electrolysis. A passage in his writings dealing with elective affinities in chemistry became the nucleus of Goethe's famous novel, Die Wahlverwandtschaften. Læreboek i Kemien (1808-1828) is a handbook on chemistry.

Bes. The Egyptian god of pleasure.

Besant, Annie, born Wood (1847-1933). English author, theosophist, and political radical. A clergyman's wife, Mrs. Besant separated from her husband and became associated with Charles Bradlaugh in the free thought movement. An advocate of socialism and social reform, she was a member of the Fabian Society, an organizer of labor unions, a worker among impoverished and delinquent children. Later, after meeting Mme. Blavatsky, she became a leading theosophist in England. Interest in occult theology took her to India (1889), where she founded the Central Hindu College at Benares. Both in India and later back in England, she agitated for home rule in India. Among her best-known religious works are Karma (1895), Four Great Religions (1897), and Wisdom of the Upanishads (1906). Her other works include Autobiography (1893), How India Wrought for Freedom (1915), and India, Bond or Free (1925). See THEOSOPHY.

Besant, Sir Walter (1836-1901). English novelist, historian, and critic. A prolific writer, Besant is best known for his novels dealing with social evils in East London, such as All Sorts and Conditions of Men (1882) and Children of Gibeon (1886). His interest in social reform led to his participation in the founding of The People's Palace in London (1887), an institution for the recreation and education of workingmen that ultimately developed into part of London University. He was also actively engaged in the improvement of copyright laws, and the betterment of the financial position of authors. His other works include historical novels and books on French literature and on the history of London, fields in which he was a noted authority. His Autobiography appeared in 1902.

Bessarion (1403-1472). Greek churchman and scholar. He came to Italy for the unity council of 1438-1439 and stayed to become a Roman Catholic cardinal. His scholarly activities influenced the revival of classical learning and humanism generally. His collection of books became the nucleus of the Venetian Library of St. Mark's.

Bessie Bell and Mary Gray. A ballad by Allan Ramsay. Two young ladies of Perth, to avoid the plague of 1666, retire to a rural retreat called the Burnbraes, the residence of Mary Gray near Lynedock. A young man in love with both carries provisions to them. They all die of the plague and are buried at Dornock Hough.

bestiaries. Allegorical poems or books giving descriptions of various animals, or stories concerning them, with a Christian application or moral appended to each. Although the characteristics and habits assigned to each animal were largely legendary, the bestiaries were often treated during the Middle Ages as treatises on natural history as well as moral instruction, and were highly popular. The beast-fable, popular from Aesop to the medieval Reynard the Fox, was usually satirical and pragmatic in its moral; a fourth-century work in Greek was probably the first to turn animal descriptions into specifically Christian allegory, and its translations into Latin Physiologus were the basis of most English and Continental bestiaries. The best known are the Latin Physiologus (11th century) by the abbot Theobaldus, the Bestiary by the Anglo-Norman poet Philippe de Thaun, and an anonymous Middle English Bestiary (c. 1250).

Bethany. A town of Palestine on the Mount of Olives. It was the home of Lazarus, brother of Mary and Martha, who was raised from the dead by Christ.

Bethgelert or The Grave of the Greyhound (1811). A ballad by William Robert Spencer (1769–1834) retelling a story common in Oriental and then in medieval European literature. In this version Gelert is a hound given by King John to Llewelyn the Great, who returns from the hunt one day to find his dog covered with blood and his infant son missing from an overturned cradle. Believing that Gelert has eaten the child, Llewelyn stabs him; but the hound’s dying scream awakens the infant, who cries out from where he is hidden under a pile of coverings, and under the bed is found a huge wolf killed by Gelert.

Bethlehem. The ancient town in Judea, Palestine, where Jesus was born. Also the scene of Rachel’s death, the home of Ruth and Naomi, and the city of David, it is mentioned frequently in both the Old and the New Testament.

Bemmann-Hollweg, Theobald von (1856–1921). Chancellor of the German Empire (1909–1917). He defended the German violation of Belgian neutrality (1914) at the beginning of World War I.

Betjeman, John (1906– ). English poet and architectural authority. In satirical light verse, his poems celebrate the English countryside and ordinary provincial and suburban life. They nostalgically evoke the Victorian era and a past of passing English culture. Among collections of his poems are Continental Dew (1937), New Bats in Old Belfries (1945), A Few Late Chrysanthemums (1955), and Summoned By Bells (1960), a verse autobiography.

Betterson, Thomas (1635–1710). English actor. The son of an under-cook in the service of Charles I, he joined Davenant’s company at Lincoln’s Inn Fields Theatre in 1661 and became its manager upon Davenant’s death. The greatest actor on the Restoration stage, he excelled in Shakespearean roles, being equally adept in tragedy and comedy. His wife, Mary Saunderson, was a leading actress of the times.

Bettina. The name taken by Elisabeth Brentano, Countess von Arnim (1785–1859), in her publication Letters to a Child (1835). The letters purported to be her correspondence (1807–1811) with Goethe.

Between the Acts (1941). A novel by Virginia Woolf. It describes a pageant on English history, written and directed by Miss La Trobe, and its effects on the people who watch it. Most of the audience misunderstand it in various ways; a clergyman reduces its vision to a sermon. But, for a moment, Virginia Woolf implies, the pageant, or art, has imposed order on the chaos of human life.

Beulah, land of. In Bunyan’s Pilgrim’s Progress, that land of heavenly joy where the pilgrims tarry until they are summoned to enter the Celestial City; the paradise before the resurrection. The name occurs in the Bible (Isa. 62:4).

Beveridge, Albert [Jeremiah] (1862–1927). American historian and statesman. Elected to the U.S. Senate in 1899, Beveridge was defeated in 1911 when Old Guard Republicans refused to support him. He joined Theodore Roosevelt’s Progressive Party and later turned to writing biographies. His Life of John Marshall (2 vols., 1916, 1919) won a Pulitzer Prize. At his death he was working on a biography of Lincoln, two volumes of which were published in 1928.

Beverley, Ensign. See CAPTAIN JACK ABSOLUTE.

Beverly, Robert (c. 1673–1722). American historian of the Virginia colony. His chief work is The History and Present State of Virginia, issued in London in 1705. It is one of the earliest self-consciously American works. “I am an Indian,” Beverly wrote, “and don’t pretend to be exact in my language.”

Bevis of Hampton or Southampton, Sir. A medieval chivalric romance. It has a slight connection with the Charlemagne cycle. In the English version, found in Michael Drayton’s Polyolbion, (1622), the mother of Bevis slays his father and sells Bevis as a slave to Eastern merchants when he tries to avenge the murder. After many adventures, Bevis converts Josian, the daughter of the Soldan, to Christianity and carries her off to England, where he finally revenges the death of his father. See ASCARP.

Beyle, Marie Henri. See STENDHAL.

Beyond Good and Evil (Jenseits von Gut und Böse, 1886). A philosophical work by Friedrich Nietzsche in the form of a collection of aphorisms. In it, Nietzsche expresses his desire for a "transvaluation of all values." He contends that no human values are absolute; that all value distinctions (such as that between "good" and "evil") are artificial, the result of mere traditional prejudices; and that man should discard his old, outmoded values (such as "good" and "evil") in favor of ones more suited to contemporary cultural reality.

Beyond the Horizon (1920). A play by Eugene O'Neill. The Mayo brothers love the same girl; Robert, who had wanted to seek adventure "beyond the horizon," stays home to marry the girl, and the prosaic Andrew goes to sea and later to the Argentine. In the end Robert dies embittered but happy "with the right of release—beyond the horizon." The play was awarded a Pulitzer Prize.

Bezuikhov, Pierre. A central character in Count Leo Tolstoï's novel War and Peace. Like Prince Andrei Bolkonski, Pierre has a poor first marriage, but later falls in love with Natasha Rostova. After an attempt to assassinate Napoleon, Pierre is captured by the French and must take part in their disastrous retreat from Moscow. Released during a Cossack raid, Pierre learns of the death of his wife and of his great friend, Prince Andrei. Nearly overwhelmed by life, Pierre at last learns of the sheer joy of being alive. His eventual marriage to Natasha is a happy one for them both. Pierre represents to Tolstoi the triumph of a humanistic way of life.

Bhagavadgita (Sansk., the song of God). An 18-part discussion between Krishna and Arjuna on the nature and meaning of life. It forms part of the MAHABHARATA. The dialogue takes place on the battlefield of Kurukshetra, the scene of the epic battle between the Kauravas and the Pandavas described in the Mahabharata. Arjuna, dejected and confused, refuses to fight his kinsmen, and Krishna counsels him on the "selfless act" performed within the context of duty, on the three ways to moksha or liberation (work, knowledge, and devotion) and on the three gunas, or qualities that constitute nature, human or otherwise. The Gita has profoundly influenced philosophers and creative writers in the West. It is paraphrased in Edwin Arnold's Song Celestial (1855). A readable contemporary version, The Song of God (1954), is by Christopher Isherwood and Swami Prabhavananda.

Bhagirath. In Hindu legend, the bringer of the Ganges River from heaven to earth after a 1,000-year penance. He wanted to cleanse the honor of his ancestors, who were cursed by the sage Kapila and burned into cinders. The Ganges is sometimes known as the Bhagirathi.

Bharata. (1) In Hindu legend, the son of Dushyanta and Shakuntala in Kalidasa's play Shakuntala.
(2) The author of the NATYA-SHASTRA, a first-century treatise on drama.
(3) The name of the son of Dushyanta and Shakuntala in Kalidasa's play Shakuntala.
(4) The eldest son of the ancient sage Rishab-hadeva. India, therefore, is sometimes called Bharatavarsha, or land of Bharata.

Bhasa (3rd century?). Sanskrit dramatist. His works show great skill in narration, exquisite poetry, and excellent stagecraft. Svapna-Vasavadatta (The Dream of Vasavadatta) is the most popular of the 13 Bhasa plays unearthed in 1912 in Trivandrum, South India, by Pandit Ganapati Sastri.

Bhattacharya, Bhabani (1906– ). Indian novelist writing in English. Educated in India and at the University of London, he was for a time press attaché at the Indian embassy in Washington. He has published So Many Hungers (1948), Music for Mohini (1952), He Who Rides a Tiger (1954), and A Goddess Named Gold (1961).

Bhababhuti (8th century). Sanskrit playwright. He is praised for subtle handling of poignant scenes. Two of his plays, Mahavira Charita (Portrait of a Hero) and Utтарa-rama-charita (The Later Story of Rama), retell the Ramayana story in a highly dramatic and sometimes sentimentalized form; a third, Malati and Madhava, deals with a legendary tale.

Biacie. See GOLDEN FLEECER.

Bianca. (1) In Shakespeare's TAMING OF THE SHREW, the younger daughter of Baptista of Padua. She is as gentle and meek as her sister Katharina is violent and irritable.
(2) In Shakespeare's OTHELLO, the mistress of Cassio. She unwittingly aids Iago in his plot against Othello.

Blanchi and Neri (Whites and Blacks). Rival factions within the Guelph party in Tuscany about 1300 (see GUELPHS AND GIBELLINES). The Blanchi wanted to maintain Florence as a democratic constitutionality independent of both emperor and pope; the Neri were willing to compromise with the pope to gain power against the emperor. See DANTE.

Bianchon, Horace. A tolerant and charitable Parisian physician who appears in many of the novels of Balzac's COMÉDIE HUMAINE. Bianchon is a member of Balzac's fictional CÉNACLE.

Biberius, Calidius Mero. The punning nickname of Tiberius Claudius Nero, the Roman emperor Tiberius who reigned from A.D. 14 to 37. Biberius means drink-loving; Calidius Mero, by metathesis is calidus mero, which means hot with wine.

Biberpelz, Der. See BEAVER COAT, THE.

Bible. The Christian sacred book. Actually a collection of books, the Holy Bible, as it is often called, is divided into two parts: the OLD TESTAMENT and the NEW TESTAMENT. The former contains 39 books according to the Protestants, with a supplement of 14 books known as the APOCRYPHA; other churches include either part or all of the Apocrypha in the Old Testament. The New Testament contains 27 books.

The word bible is from the Greek word biblos, which means books, and is derived from byblos, "papyrus.

The Old Testament was compiled from the 13th to the first century B.C. No original manuscripts have survived and present versions are based on two primary sources: the Septuagint, a Greek translation made from the Hebrew in Alexandria about 250 B.C., and the Massoretic Text, the work of a group of trained Jewish scholars, beginning in the sixth century after Christ, whose purpose was to correct and preserve the Hebrew versions then available. The Massoretic Text was completed by the end of the 10th century. The Septuagint became the accepted Christian version of the Old Testament, while the Massoretic Text has remained the Hebrew canon. Other important versions of the Old Testament are the Samaritan Pentateuch, a fourth-century B.C. text preserved by the Samaritan community, and the Vulgate, a Latin translation by St. Jerome begun in A.D. 382. The Vulgate is still the authorized Roman Catholic version.

The New Testament was written, probably in Greek, during the first century; however, the earliest manuscripts date from the third and fourth centuries. There is no doubt that, in the years between the date of its original composition and those of extant manuscripts, numerous textual changes were made through poor copying and interpretive additions or substitutions. There are five general types of text identifiable in early manuscripts. When the New Testament canon was defined in 367, an attempt was made to standardize the texts. Of the 150,000 variants of New Testament text only 50 are significant, and no essential doctrine is affected by any of them.

The greatest number of New Testament texts are in Greek, but there are early Latin texts, parts of which were incorporated into the Vulgate. The New Testament is by far the best preserved document from the ancient world; there are about 175 papyri from the second to the fourth centuries and close to 3,000 manuscripts that date from before the invention of printing.

Bible, English versions. The principal versions of the English Bible are:

- American Revised Version. A separate version published in 1901, the work of the American Committee on the Revised Version. It differs in a few particulars from the Revised Version (see below).
- Authorized Version (King James Version). The version in general use in England. It was made by a body of scholars working at the command of King James I (hence sometimes known as the King James Bible) from 1604 to 1611, and was published in 1611. The modern Authorized Version is, however, by no means an exact reprint of that originally authorized by King James; a large number of typographical errors which occurred in the first edition have been corrected, the orthography and punctuation have been modernized, and the use of italics, capital letters, etc. altered. The Bishops' Bible (see below) was used as the basis of the text, but Tyndale's, Matthew's, Coverdale's, and the Geneva translations were also followed when they agreed better with the original. The King James Version became the Bible of almost all English-speaking Protestant sects, and its influence can be detected in nearly every subsequent version. It is still much in use and remains, in its simplicity and eloquence, the most beautifully written of all Bibles in the language. Its literary influence is inestimable; besides its direct effect on many important writers, it has been regarded as a major force in keeping English relatively unchanged since the 17th century. See HAMPTON COURT CONFERENCE.

- Bishops' Bible. A version made at the instigation of Archbishop Parker (hence also called "Matthew Parker's Bible"), to which most of the Anglican bishops were contributors. It was a revision of the Great Bible (see below); it first appeared in 1568 and by 1602 had reached its 18th edition. It is this edition that forms the basis of the Authorized Version. See TREACLE (below).

- Coverdale's Bible. The first complete English Bible to be printed. It was published in 1535 by Miles Coverdale. As Coverdale knew neither Hebrew nor Greek, his translation is from Latin and German sources, notably the Vulgate, another Latin version by Sanctes Pegyninus (1527-1528), Luther's German version (1534), and the Swiss-German version of Zwingli and Judä (Zurich, 1527-1529). He used Tyndale's translations of the New Testament and the Pentateuch. The first edition was printed in Antwerp, but the second (Southwark, 1537) was the first Bible printed in England. Matthew's Bible (see below) is largely based on Coverdale's. See Bug Bible (below).

- Cranmer's Bible. A name given to the Great Bible (see below) of 1540. It, and later issues of it, contained a prologue by Archbishop Cranmer, and on the title page a woodcut by Holbein shows Henry VIII seated while Cranmer and Thomas Cromwell distribute copies to the people.

- Douay Version. A translation of the Vulgate made by English Catholic scholars in France. The New Testament was published in Rheims in 1582 and the Old Testament in Douay in 1609. It is sometimes called the Rheims-Douay Version. See Rosin Bible (below).

- Geneva Bible. A revision of the Great Bible, undertaken by English exiles in Geneva during the Marian persecutions and first published in 1560. It was the work of William Whittingham (a brother-in-law of Calvin), assisted by Anthony Gilby and Thomas Sampson. Whittingham had previously published a translation of the New Testament (1537). The Geneva version, of the most important in the history of the English Bible, was the first to be printed in roman type instead of black letter, the first in which the chapters are divided into verses (taken from Robert Stephan's Greek-Latin Testament of 1537), and the first in which italics are used for explanatory and connective words and phrases (taken from Theodore Beza's New Testament of 1556). It was immensely popular: from 1560 to 1616 no year passed without a new edition, and at least 200 are known. It was the Bible used by Shakespeare. In every edition the word "breeches" is used in Gen. 5:7; as a result this is popularly called the Breeches Bible (see below). See Goose Bible; Place-makers' Bible (below).

- Great Bible. Coverdale's 1539 revision of his own 1535 edition collated with Tyndale and Matthew. It was made at the request of Thomas Cromwell. Its name comes from its large size (10 by 15 in.). The printing was begun by Regnault in Paris, halted by the Inquisition, and completed by Richard Graf-ten and Edward Whitechurch in London. A second revision in 1540 is often called Cranmer's Bible (see above).

- King James Bible. See Authorized Version (above).

- Matthew Parker's Bible. The Bishops' Bible (above).
Matthew's Bible. A pronouncedly Protestant version published in 1537 as having been "truly and purely translated in English by Thomas Matthew," which was a pseudonym, adopted for purposes of safety, of John Rogers, an assistant of Tyndale. It was probably printed in Antwerp. The text is made up of the Pentateuch from Tyndale's version together with his hitherto unprinted translation of Joshua to II Chronicles inclusive and his revised edition of the New Testament, with Coverdale's version of the rest of the Old Testament and the Apocrypha. It was quietly suppressed by the Great Bible (see above), but it is of importance as it formed the starting-point for the revisions which culminated in the Authorized Version. See Bug Bible (below).

Revised Standard Version. The newest American version which appeared in 1952; the New Testament was published in 1946. It employs a modern American idiom and has been widely accepted by Protestant churchmen.

Revised Version. A revision of the Authorized Version begun in 1870 by a body of 25 English scholars (assisted and advised by an American Committee). The New Testament was published in 1881, the complete Bible in 1885, and the Apocrypha in 1895.

Rheims-Douay Version. See Douay Version (above).

Taverner's Bible. An independent translation by a Greek scholar, Richard Taverner, printed in 1539 (the same year as the Great Bible) by T. Petit for T. Berthelet. It had no influence on the Authorized Version, but is remarkable for its vigorous, idiomatic English, and for being the first English Bible to include a third book of Maccabees in the Apocrypha.

Tyndale's Bible. The first printed English New Testament, translated by William Tyndale (Cologne, Worms, 1525). He followed it with the Pentateuch (Marburg, Freiburg, 1530 or 1531), Jonah, Old Testament Proverbs appointed to be read in place of the Epistles, and a manuscript translation of the Old Testament to the end of Chronicles that was afterwards used in Matthew's Bible (see above). His revisions of the New Testament were issued in 1534 and 1535. Tyndale's principal authority was Erasmus' edition of the Greek Testament, but he also used Erasmus' Latin translation of the same, the Vulgate, and Luther's German version. Tyndale's version fixed the style and tone of the English Bible: about 90 per cent of his translation is retained in the Authorized Version. In 1535 he was arrested and put to death as a heretic the following year.

Wyclif's Bible. The name given to two translations of the Vulgate, one completed in 1380 and the other a few years later. Wyclif was neither the translator nor concerned with the translation of either of these. Nicholas of Hereford made the first version as far as Baruch 3:20; who was responsible for the remainder is not known. The second version has been ascribed to John Purvey, a follower of Wyclif. The Bible of 1380 was the first complete version in English, being a word-for-word translation of the Vulgate into a Midland dialect. The complete Bible remained unprinted until 1850, when the monumental edition of both versions was published by Forshall and Madden. Printings of the New Testament had appeared in the previous century.

Bible, specially named editions. The following Bibles are named either from typographical errors or archaic words that they contain, or from some special circumstance connected with them:

Adulterous Bible. The "Wicked Bible" (see below).

Bamberg Bible. The "Thirty-six Line Bible" (see below).

Bear Bible. The Spanish Protestant version printed at Basle in 1569; so called because the woodcut device on the title-page is a bear.

Bedell's Bible. A translation of the Authorized Version into Irish carried out under the direction of Bedell (d. 1642), bishop of Kilmore and Ardagh.

Breeches Bible. A name given to the Geneva Bible because Gen. 3:7 is translated, "The eyes of them both were opened . . . and they sowed fig-tree leaves together and made themselves breeches." This reading occurs in every edition of the Geneva Bible, but not in any other version though it is given in the then unprinted Wyclif manuscript ("ya sewiden ye levis of a fige tre and madin brechis"), and also in the translation of the Pentateuch given in Caixton's edition of Voragine's Golden Legend (1483).

Brother's Bible. The "Kralitz Bible" (see below).

Bug Bible. A name given to Coverdale's Bible (see above) of 1535 because Ps. 91:5 is translated, "Thou shalt not neede to be aрайзд for any bugges by night." The same reading occurs in Matthew's Bible and its reprints; the Authorized and Revised Versions both read "terror."

Complutensian Polyglot. The great edition, in six folio volumes, containing the Hebrew and Greek texts, the Septuagint, the Vulgate, and the Chaldee paraphrase of the Pentateuch with a Latin translation. It also includes Greek and Hebrew grammars and a Hebrew dictionary; it was prepared and printed at the expense of Cardinal Ximenes, and printed at Alcala (the ancient Complutum) near Madrid, 1513—1517.

Discharge Bible. An edition printed in 1596 containing discharge for charge in 1 Tim. 5:21, "I discharge thee before God, . . . that thou observe these things. . . ."

Ears to Ear Bible. An edition of 1810, in which Matt. 13:43 reads, "Who hath ears to ear, let him hear."

Forty-two Line Bible. The "Mazarin Bible" (see below).

Goose Bible. The editions of the Geneva Bible printed in Dort (or Dordrecht), Holland; the Dort press had a goose as its device.

Gutenberg Bible. The "Mazarin Bible" (see below).

He and She Bible. The two earliest editions of the Authorized Version (both 1611). In the first (now known as the "He Bible"), Ruth 3:15 reads "and he went into the city"; the other (now known as the "She Bible") has the variant "she." "He" is the correct translation of the Hebrew, but nearly all modern versions—with the exception of the Revised Version—perpetuate the confusion and print "she."
Idle Bible. An edition of 1809 in which "the idle shepherd" (Zech. 11:17) is printed "the idle shepherd." In the Revised Version the translation is "the worthless shepherd."

Kralitz Bible. The Bible printed by the United Brethren of Moravia (hence, known as the Brother's Bible) at Kralitz (1579–1593).

Leda Bible. The third edition (second folio) of the Bishop's Bible published in 1572, and so called because the decoration to the initial in the Epistle to the Hebrews is a startling and incongruous woodcut of Jupiter visiting Leda in the guise of a swan. This, and several other decorations in the New Testament of this edition, were from an edition of Ovid's Metamorphoses; they created such a storm of protest that they were never afterwards used.

Leopolita Bible. A Polish translation of the Vulgate by John of Lemberg (ancient Leopolis) published in 1561 at Cracow.

Mazarin Bible. The first Bible to be printed (an edition of the Vulgate), and the first large book to be printed from movable metal type. It contains no date, but was probably printed in 1455, and was certainly on sale by the middle of 1456. It was printed at Mainz, but there is some question about who the printer was; it is now thought to have been either Johannes Gutenberg or Fust and Schöffer. It is frequently called the Gutenberg Bible. By bibliographers it is usually known as the Forty-two Line Bible (having 42 lines to the page), to differentiate it from the Bamberg Bible of 36 lines. Its popular name is due to the fact that the copy found in the Mazarin Library, Paris, in 1760, was the first to be known and described.

Murderers' Bible. An edition of 1801 in which the misprint murderers for murmurers makes Jude 16 read, "These are murderers, complainers, walking after their own lusts...."

Ostrog Bible. The first complete Slavonic edition, printed at Ostrog, Volhynia, Russia, in 1581.

Pfister's Bible. The "Thirty-six Line Bible" (see below).

Place-makers' Bible. The second edition of the Geneva Bible, 1562, so called from the printer's error in Matt. 5:9, "Blessed are the placemakers [peacemakers], for they shall be called the children of God." It has also been called the "Whig Bible."

Printers' Bible. An edition of about 1700 which makes David pathetically complain that "printers [princes] have persecuted me without a cause" (Ps. 119:161).

Proof Bible (Probe-Bible). The revised version of the first impression of Luther's German Bible. A final revised edition appeared in 1892.

Rebecca's Camels Bible. An edition printed in 1823 in which Gen. 24:61 reads, "Rebecca arose, and her camels," instead of "her damsels."

Rosin Bible. A name sometimes given to the Douay Version of 1609, so called because it has in Jer. 8:22, "Is there noe rosin in Galaad." The Authorized Version translates the word by "balm," but gives "rosin" in the margin as an alternative. See Treacle Bible (below).

Sacy's Bible. A French translation, so called from Louis Isaac le Maistre de Sacy, director of Port Royal, 1650–1679.

Schelhorn's Bible. A name sometimes given to the "Thirty-six Line Bible" (see below).

September Bible. Luther's German translation of the New Testament, published anonymously at Wittenberg in September, 1522.

She Bible. See He Bible (above).

Standing Fishes Bible. An edition of 1806 in which Ezek. 47:4 reads, "And it shall come to pass that the fishes [fishers] shall stand on it...."

Thirty-six Line Bible. A Latin Bible of 36 lines to the column, probably printed by A. Pfister at Bamberg in 1460. It is also known as the Bamberg and Pfister's Bible, and sometimes as Schelhorn's, as it was first described by the German bibliographer J. G. Schelhorn in 1760.

Thumb Bible. An edition printed at Aberdeen in 1670; it measures one inch square by a half inch thick.

To-remain Bible. A Bible printed at Cambridge in 1805, in which Gal. 4:29 reads, "he that was born after the flesh persecuted him that was born after the spirit to remain, even so it is now." The words "to remain" were added in error by the compositor, the editor having answered a proofreader's query as to the comma after "spirit" with the penciled reply "to remain" in the margin. The mistake was repeated in the first 8vo edition published by the Bible Society (1805) and in their 12mo edition (1819).

Treacle Bible. A popular name for the Bishops' Bible (1568) because in it Jer. 8:22 reads, "Is there no tryacle in Gilead, is there no phision there?" In the same Bible "tryacle" is also given for "balm" in Jer. 46:11, and Ezek. 27:17. Coverdale's Bible (1535) also uses the word "tryacle." See Rosin Bible (above).

Unrighteous Bible. An edition printed at Cambridge in 1653, containing the printer's error, "Know ye not that the unrighteous shall inherit the Kingdom of God?" (1 Cor. 6:9). It should read "shall not inherit." The same edition gave Rom. 6:13 as, "Neither yield ye your members as instruments of righteousness unto sin," in place of "unrighteousness." This edition is sometimes known as the "Wicked Bible."

Wicked Bible. An edition in which the word not is omitted in the seventh commandment, making it, "Thou shalt commit adultery." It was printed in 1632 in London by Barker and Lucas who were fined £300 for their unfortunate error. See Unrighteous Bible (above).

Wife-hater Bible. An edition of 1810 in which the word "life" in Luke 14:26 is printed "wife." It reads, "If any man come to me, and hate not his father...yes, and his own wife also...."

Wuyck's Bible. The Polish Bible authorized by the Roman Catholics and printed at Cracow in 1599. The translation was made by the Jesuit Jacob Wuyck.

Zurich Bible. A German version (1530) composed of Luther's translation of the New Testament and portions of the Old, with the remainder and the Apocrypha by other translators.

Bible in Spain, The (1843). A travel book by George Borrow, considered one of the best in the English language. Supposedly based on the author's experiences in Spain as a colporteur for the Bible Society, it probably contains much material of his own invention. However, the book is thought to give a valid picture of Spanish life during the Carlist troubles.

Biblia Pauperum (Lat., “the poor man's Bible”). A picture-book, widely used by the illiterate in the Middle Ages in place of the Bible. It was designed to illustrate the leading events in the salvation of man; later manuscripts as a rule had a Latin inscription to each picture. These Biblia were probably the earliest books to be printed, first from blocks and later with movable type.

Bickerstaff, Isaac. A fictitious astrologer invented by Jonathan Swift to silence John Partridge, an almanac maker who had achieved a reputation as something of a prophet. In his almanac Predictions for the ensuing year by Isaac Bickerstaff (1708), Swift predicted Partridge's death on March 29. On March 30, he published a convincing account of the prophecy's fulfillment in An Elegy of Mr. Partridge (1708). The hoax was successful despite Partridge's protests that he was still very much alive. The joke was popular, and Richard Steele capitalized on Bickerstaff's fame by making him the supposed editor of the Tatler.

Bickerstaff-Drew, Monsignor Count Francis Browning Drew (1858-1928). English Roman Catholic clergyman and author. Under the pen name John Ayscough he wrote several novels, including Dromina (1909), Mezzogiorno (1910), and Faustula (1912).

Biddle, Nicholas (1786-1844). American financier. Named president of the Bank of the United States (1819), he opposed Andrew Jackson's contention that the bank charter was unconstitutional. His attempt to renew the national charter was defeated, and in 1836 the bank was renamed the Bank of the United States of Pennsylvania (1836); Biddle resigned in 1839.

Bidpai (also Bidpay, Pilpay), Fables of. Also known as Kalilah and Dimnah (c. 750). An Arabic version of a collection of Indian fables common to Buddhism and Brahminism. They were collected in the Sanskrit Panchatantra and translated into Persian about A.D. 55. Bidpai means court scholar, and the allegorical animal stories are told as a wise man's advice to a young Indian prince.

Biedermeier. In German literature, a tendency found most strongly in the period 1815-1848, during which most parts of Germany were governed by oppressive conservative regimes such as those of Prussia and Austria. It is often thought of as the antithesis of the Jung Deutschland (Young Germany) movement. Whereas the Young Germans stressed social criticism in thought, vigorous realism in style, and heroism in their characters, Biedermeier authors favored social conservatism in thought, didacticism in style, and a capacity for quiet resignation in their characters. The Biedermeier tendency is distinguished from romanticism by its emphasis on a sober, resigned attitude toward the world, as opposed to the romantics' highflown, fundamentally optimistic striving for the ideal. The late Swabian phase of German romanticism, however, nearly coincides with the Biedermeier. No major authors are purely and simply Biedermeier, but the three most important figures in whom the tendency is clearly marked are Grillparzer, Mörike, and Stifter.

Bienville, Sieur de Jean Baptiste Lemoine (1680-1768). French explorer of the lower Mississippi and Red River (1699). He was a lieutenant of the French king in Louisiana (1700) and governor of the colony (1701-1712; 1718-1725; 1733-1743). In 1718 he founded New Orleans.

Bierce, Ambrose [Gwinett] (1842-1914). American journalist, short-story writer, and poet. Bierce had little education and was frankly ashamed of his sternly religious Ohio family; he fought bravely in the Civil War and left the federal army with the brevet title of major. Later coming to doubt the cause for which he had fought, he refused a large sum in back army pay, saying bitterly, "When I hired out as an assassin for my country, that wasn't part of the contract."

Bierce settled in San Francisco after the war, holding a variety of jobs. He published in local newspapers, The Overland Monthly, and his own newsletter; soon he became the literary dictator of the West Coast, his gibes determining the fate of books and authors. Bierce began to publish his stories, and with his friends, Joaquin Miller, Bret Harte, and Mark Twain, formed an important literary circle.
He married the daughter of a wealthy Nevada miner, whose wedding gift of $10,000 enabled the young couple to live abroad for four years. When Bierce returned from England, he had become witty and polished. Back in San Francisco, he wrote his famous column, "The Pratler," a mixture of literary gossip, epigrams, and short stories. Employed by the young William Randolph Hearst in Washington, he also wrote for The Cosmopolitan and prepared a collected edition of his works (12 vols., 1909–1912). Divorced from his wife in 1904, he broke off connections with his whole family. In 1913, tired of existence, he disappeared into Mexico. According to one story, he was killed in the war between Villa and Carranza.

Bierce's wit is cruel and brilliant; he was a clever epigrammatist and a forerunner of such American realists as Stephen Crane. His fame rests on three volumes in his collected works: In the Midst of Life, a collection of short stories; Can Such Things Be? (1893), a group of weird stories; and The Devil's Dictionary (1906). Bierce has been called a difficult genius who never attained full stature.

Bifrost (Icel., bifa, tremble; rost, path). In Scandinavian mythology, the rainbow bridge between Asgard, heaven, and Midgard, earth. The various colors of the rainbow were said to be reflections of its precious stones. Heimdall was keeper of the bridge, which was expected to collapse at Ragnarok under the weight of the onrushing stones of Muspelheim.

Big Ben. London's famous bell. It is attached to the "Westminster clock," standing in the Parliament tower, or St. Stephen's Tower. Big Ben weighs 13½ tons; it is named after Sir Benjamin Hall, chief commissioner of works in 1856, when the bell was cast.

Big Bertha. See Kruipp.

Big Brother. A tyrannical political leader who assumes the role of protective elder brother. The term was invented by George Orwell. See 1984.

Bigelow, John (1817–1911). American writer and diplomat. Bigelow served as American consul-general at Paris and later as minister to France. He worked with William Cullen Bryant on the New York Evening Post and was secretary of state to the New York governor, Samuel J. Tilden. Out of these experiences he wrote two biographies, William Cullen Bryant (1893) and Samuel J. Tilden (1895). Bigelow's autobiography is called Retrospections of an Active Life (5 vols., 1909–1913). He is also the author of several historical works.

Big-Endians. In Jonathan Swift's Gulliver's Travels, a religious faction in the kingdom of Lilliput, who make it a matter of conscience to break their eggs at the big end. They are looked on as heretics by the orthodox party, who break theirs at the little end. The Big-Endians typify the Catholics, and the Little-Endians the Protestants.

Biggers, Earl Derr. See Charlie Chan.

Biglow Papers, The (1848). A series of poems and prose sketches by James Russell Lowell. A second series was issued during the Civil War and collected in 1867.

This work marks Lowell's first appearance as poet, abolitionist, and defender of American democracy. The first series is concerned with the Mexican War, while the second treats the Civil War; the poems are written in dialogue, while the accompanying prose remains in standard English. There are three central characters: Hosea Biglow, a forthright commentator on current affairs; his friend, Birdsofred Samin, a scoundrel; and the Reverend Homer Wilbur, used by Lowell as a foil for the first two characters. The series satirizes politicians and their doctrines, the cowardice of editors, and the follies of the wealthy, North and South. More significant than his satire is Lowell's use of language. His treatment of Yankee dialect is an important contribution to the literature of the American language. See Courtin', The.

Big Money, The (1936). A novel by John Dos Passos, the last book in the trilogy U.S.A. (q.v.). It portrays the extravagance and corruption of the 1920's, culminating in the stock-market crash of 1929 and in the personal tragedy or moral defeat of several of the leading characters. There are short interspersed biographies of such men as Henry Ford, Frank Lloyd Wright, William Randolph Hearst, and Rudolph Valentino.

Bildungsroman (Ger., "novel of Education"). Also called Entwicklungsroman ("novel of development"). A type of novel common in German literature, which treats the personal development of a single individual, usually in youth. The definitive example of the form is Wilhelm Meisters Lehrjahre (Wilhelm Meister's Apprenticeship, 1799–1796; see Wilhelm Meister) by Goethe, which exercised an extremely strong influence on subsequent German novels. The Bildungsroman represents the culmination of a long tradition, but strictly speaking, the term may not be applied to any work earlier than Wilhelm Meister. Both Wolfram's Parzival (early 13th century) and Grimmelshausen's Simplicissimus (1668 ff.), though treating individual development, are primarily concerned with depicting a Christian world order; and Wieland's Agathon (1766) concentrates more on philosophical ideas than on personal development as such. Among the greatest 19th-century Bildungsromane, all of which were influenced by Wilhelm Meister, are Novalis' Heinrich von Ofterdingen (1802), Eichendorff's Ahnung und Gegenwart (Presentiment and the Present, 1815), Stifter's Der Nachsommer (Indian Summer, 1857), and Keller's Green Henry. A 20th-century example is Mann's The Magic Mountain (1924), and among English novels Dickens' David Copperfield (1850) shows the general characteristics of the form. See Künstlerroman.

Billings, Josh. Pen name of Henry Wheeler Shaw (1818–1885). American auctioneer, real-estate agent, and humorist. After taking up many occupations, Shaw turned to writing humorous essays; when he studied the techniques of Artemus Ward and adopted caricography he became famous. He published volumes of Sayings (1865, 1866) and a series of Almanax (1869–1879). Among his other writings are Josh Billings on Ice and Other Things (1868), Josh Billings' Struggling with Things (1881), and Josh Billings, His Works Complete (4 vols., 1888). His Yankee humorist has been both highly praised and ignored; Charles H. Smith called him "Aesop and Ben Franklin, condensed and abridged."

Billingsgate. The site of an old passage through that part of the city wall that protected London on the river side. It was so called from the Billings, who were the royal race of the Varini, an ancient tribe mentioned by Tacitus. Billingsgate has been the site of a fishmarket for many centuries, and its porters and other workers were famous at least 300 years ago. Hence billingsgate became a synonym for vulgar and profane language.

Bill of Divorcement, A. A play by Clemence Dane.

Bill of Rights. The first 10 amendments to the Constitution of the United States, guaranteeing civil liberties against infringement by the federal government. Among these rights are freedom of speech, of press, of religion, and trial by jury. The Bill of Rights became part of the Constitution on Dec. 15, 1791.

Billy Budd, Foretopman (post. 1924). A novel by Herman Melville. Billy, innocently good, is cruelly antagonized by Claggart, the evil master-at-arms. Unjustly accused before the captain by Claggart, Billy, speechless with rage, strikes the schemer and kills him. Captain Vere, who loves Billy as his son, decides that he must hang the boy and uphold law. Vere's first obligation is the preservation of social welfare; justice, rather than mercy, must be administered to maintain order. Billy, understanding, mounts the yardarm willingly, crying "God bless Captain Vere."

Bimini. An island of the Bahama group. The Fountain of Youth on Bimini, according to the legend, conferred eternal youth on all who drank its waters. Many journeys were made in search of it. See Ponce de León.

Bingham, George Caleb (1811–1879). American painter. He is best known for scenes of life on the Mississippi and Missouri rivers. Their clear and strong composition is imbued with the poetry of subtle colors intensified by bright accents. The creator of political genre paintings, he became increasingly involved in politics, to the detriment of his painting.

Binyon, Laurence (1869–1943). English poet, dramatist, and art historian. His best-known work is his translation of Dante's Divine Comedy into English terza rima. His volumes of poetry include The Burning of the Leaves (1944), and his poetic dramas include Attila (1907).

Biographia Literaria (2 vols., 1817). A prose work by Samuel Taylor Coleridge. It contains essays on literary criticism and develops the author's distinction between fancy and imagination. The book also contains a discussion of the distinction between reason and understanding, a trenchant critical analysis of Wordsworth's poetry, and detailed discussions of portions of the philosophies of Kant, Schelling, and Fichte.

Bion (2d cent. B.C.). Greek pastoral poet of Smyrna. A contemporary of Theocritus, he was best known for Lament for Adonis.

Biondo, Flavio (1392–1463). Italian historian. He was the author of Historiarum ab Inclinatione Romanorum Decades, the first attempt at treating the "decline and fall" of the Roman empire.

Birch, Harvey. The hero of Cooper's The Spy. Birches (1916). A poem by Robert Frost. One of Frost's best-known poems, Birches describes the trees bent to the ground by ice storms; the poet imagines that they had been bent by a boy swinging on them, and wishes, when he himself is "weary of considerations," to climb toward heaven in a birch tree "till the tree could bear no more./ But dipped its top and set me down again."

Bird, Robert Montgomery (1806–1854). American physician, dramatist, and novelist. Bird reputedly gave up his medical practice because of an unwillingness to collect fees. He sold several of his plays to an unscrupulous friend, actor Edwin Forrest, who allowed him only a tiny fraction of the profits, while refusing to let him publish his own work. The plays include The Gladiator (1831), Oroloosa (1832), and The Broker of Bogota (1834). Dr. Bird turned to novel writing, publishing Nick of the Woods, his best book; Calaver (1834); The Infidel (1835); The Hawks of Hawk Hollow (1835); and others. Most of Bird's plays were included in Life and Dramatic Works of Robert Montgomery Bird (1919).

Birds, The (Ornithes; 414 B.C.). A famous comedy by Aristophanes. Eupelides and Pithecetus, fugitives from Athenian taxation and litigation, persuade the birds to found a city in the clouds, Nephelococcygia (Cloud-cuckooland). There they will be strategically placed to prevent the delightful smoke from the sacrifices of mortals from reaching the gods, unless the gods comply with the birds' demands. The plot is successful, the gods capitulate, and the birds and their two Athenian friends presumably live happily ever after. The comedy, filled with delightful fancies and lovely lyrics, is Aristophanes' masterpiece.

Bireno. In Ariosto's Orlando Furioso, the duke of Selandia. He is loved by Olimpia, whom he deserts after falling in love with the daughter of King Cinosco of Frisia.

Birkin, Rupert. The hero of D. H. Lawrence's novel Women in Love, in which he is Lawrence's spokesman.

Birmingham, George A. Pen name of James Owen Hamay (1865–1920). Irish clergyman and author. He wrote farcical novels of Irish life, the best of which was Spanish Gold (1908).

Biron or Berowne. One of the three lords of Navarre who take a three-year vow of celibacy and devotion to learning with King Ferdinand in Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost. Biron differs from the others in that, being a sensualist and a realist, he takes the oath only because he does not intend to be outdone by them.

Birrell, Augustine (1850–1933). English essayist and statesman. A lawyer, professor of law, parliamnetarian, and one-time chief secretary of Ireland (1907–1916), Birrell is known for his essays on English authors and literature, Loser Dicta, Res Indicae (1892), Collected Essays and Addresses (1922), and More Obiter Dicta (1924). These are usually acute, judicious, and trenchantly witty. He also wrote the biographies, Charlotte Brontë (1885), Hazlitt (1902), and Marvell (1905).
Birth (1918). A novel by Zona Gale. Family and associates look upon Marshall Pitt as a tiresome nonentity. His wife leaves him, he fails in all his ventures, and finally dies trying to rescue a pet dog. His son recognizes his goodness and courage too late. Mr. Pitt, a dramatization of the novel by the author, appeared in 1924.

Birthmark, The (1846). A story by Nathaniel Hawthorne. Aylmer, a scientist, insists on removing a small birthmark from the cheek of his otherwise perfect wife, Georgiana. He succeeds, but Georgiana, no longer human, must die. In his attempt to master nature, Aylmer has "rejected the best the earth could offer."

Birth of Tragedy from the Spirit of Music, The (Die Geburt der Trägödie aus dem Geiste der Musik; 1872). A long philosophical essay by Friedrich Nietzsche. As a work of classical scholarship, it marks the final overthrow of Winckelmann's naive conception of Greek culture as being perfectly static and blissful. Nietzsche sees in ancient Greece the tension and interaction of two opposed forces: the Apollonian, on one hand, which corresponds to Winckelmann's ideas, and the dark, mysterious Dionysiac, on the other. (See APOLLONIAN AND DIONYSIAC.) In particular, he attempts to trace the development of Greek tragedy from the original Dionysiac chorus and to show its decline as a result of Euripides' and Socrates' excessive Apollonian rationalism. The book ends with the hope that modern German music, specifically that of Richard Wagner, might give birth to a new tragic age. Nietzsche's early idolization of Wagner is still strong here, but in 1876 he broke with the composer and later polemized frequently against him.

Bishop, Elizabeth (1911— ). American poet. Winner of the Pulitzer Prize for poetry in 1956 for Poems (1955), Elizabeth Bishop writes mainly descriptive poems in the modern idiom with great stylistic subtlety. A regular contributor to periodicals, she brought out her first book of poems, North and South, in 1946. She was born in Worcester, Mass., and now lives in Petropolis, Brazil. She has held several fellowships, was a consultant at the Library of Congress 1949—1950, and was appointed honorary consultant in American letters in 1958.

Bishop, John Peale (1892—1944). American poet and essayist. Educated at Princeton, he was for a time managing editor of Vanity Fair and one of the American expatriates in Paris in the 1920's. Bishop is the author of several volumes of distinguished poetry, including Green Fruit (1917); The Undertaker's Garland (1922), with Edmund Wilson; Now with His Love (1933); Minute Particulars (1936); and Selected Poems (1941). After his return to the U.S., he wrote less poetry and produced some of his best work of criticism. Many Thousands Gone (1931) is a collection of short stories; Act of Darkness (1935) is a novel. His contributions both as poet and critic may be seen in the two volumes published after his death: Collected Poems (1948), edited with a memoir and preface by Allen Tate, and Collected Essays (1948), edited with an introduction by Edmund Wilson.

Bishop Blougram's Apology (1855). A poem in the form of a dramatic monologue by Robert Browning, originally published in his collection Men and Women. The speaker, Sylvester Blougram, confesses to intellectual skepticism yet continues to stand before the world as an exponent of doctrines he no longer holds. He justifies his position to Gigadib, a young poet.

Bismarck, Prince Otto von (1815—1898). German statesman. As chancellor of Prussia (1862—1890) and the German Reich (1871—1890), he pursued a practical, opportunistic course that led to the formation of the German Reich in 1871. (See Blood and Iron; Ems Telegram; Count Moltke.) In the later years of his office he was respected for his conservative, responsible statesmanship. See Dropping the Pilot; Kulturkampf.

Bitter Sweet. (1) A long metrical narrative (1858), by Josiah Gilbert Holland, at one time widely read.

(2) A popular operetta (1929), by Noel Coward.

Bitzius, Albert. See Jeremias Gotttheil.

Bizet, Alexandre César Léopold, called Georges (1838—1875). French composer. He is best known for his suite of incidental music to Alphonse Daudet's play L'Arlettiene (1872) and for his opera Carmen. The latter was Nietzsche's favorite opera after he had turned his back on Wagner's music.

Björnson, Björnstjerne (1832—1910). Norwegian poet, novelist, and playwright. Björnson is known for his interest in his people and their history, first reflected in his "peasant novels" Synnøve Solbakken (Trust and Trial, 1857), Arne (1858), A Happy Boy (1860), and The Fisher Maiden (1868). For two years the manager-director of the National Theater at Bergen, he carried his interest in Norwegian history and legend over into his early plays, notably the trilogy of Sigurd Slemb (Sigurd the Bastard, 1862). A friend and rival of Henrik Ibsen, he also wrote plays of social realism which, though inferior to Ibsen's work, had greater popular success; the best of these are The Editor (1874), A Bankruptcy (1875), The Gauntlet (1883), and Beyond Our Strength (1883). Björnson published two volumes of poetry, Poems and Songs (1870) and Arnjot Gelline (1870), an epic. Interesting among his later novels are Flags Are Flying in Town and Port (1884) and In God's Way (1889), both of which are concerned with the problems of heredity and education. He was awarded the Nobel Prize in 1903.

Black and Tan. A member of the irregular force enlisted in England for service in Ireland as auxiliaries to the Royal Irish Constabulary during the disturbances of 1919—1922. The name arose because the original uniform of the force was the army khaki with the black leather accouterments of the R.I.C.

Black Dwarf, The (1816). A novel by Sir Walter Scott. It is the tale of an apparently malignant dwarf dwelling in seclusion in 16th-century Scotland, who proves ultimately to be of kind disposition. He finally reveals himself as Sir Edward Mauley in order to prevent a forced marriage between Sir Frederick Langley and Isabella Vere.

black flag. The banner of a pirate ship. It usually was decorated with the skull and crossbones, and was known as the Jolly Roger.

Blackfriars. The name of 2 successive London theaters, both housed in the same building of an old Black Friars’ monastery between Ludgate Hill and the Thames. The building was first leased as a theater (1576) by Sir William More to the Master of The Children of Windsor Chapel for the public performance of their plays before production at Court, and was used by them until 1584.

The second Blackfriars Theatre was housed in the same building after James Burbage’s purchase (1596) of the property from More. After Burbage’s death (1597) the property became his son Richard’s, who leased it (1600) to Henry Evans and Nathaniel Giles for performances by the Children of the Chapel. Evans gave up his lease in 1608, and Burbage formed a company of owners consisting of himself, his brother Cuthbert, four of the King's Men (Shakespeare, Heminge, Condell, and Sly), and Thomas Evans. In 1609 the King’s Men moved into their new theater, which became the center of the War of the Theatres. Beaumont and Fletcher’s plays and Shakespeare’s last plays date from this time.

Blackfriars remained in operation as a theater until 1642, when all the theaters were closed. The building was dismantled in 1655. The site is now occupied by the offices of the London Times.

Black Hole of Calcutta. The punitive cell, measuring 14 ft. 10 in. by 18 ft., of the barracks at Fort William, Calcutta. In 1765, by order of Suraja Dowlah, 146 Europeans were thrown into it for a whole night; 23 survived to the next morning. Hence, a black hole is any lockup in military barracks.

Black Mass. See SATANISM.

Black Mischief (1932). A novel by Evelyn Waugh. It is a farcical satire on various attempts to “civilize” a primitive country. The emperor himself introduces boots and contraceptives, which his subjects eat. The English and French try to take over the country; in the course of their efforts the hero, at a native banquet, is given some of his girl-friend to eat.

Blackmore, Richard Doddridge (1825–1900). English novelist. He wrote a number of novels of romance and adventure, of which Lorna Doone is best known. His books are particularly notable for their secondary characters and for descriptions of England's West country, in which many of them are set. Among his other works are Craddock Nowell (1866), Clara Vaughan (1884), and Christowell (1882).

Blackmur, B[richard] [Palmer] (1904– ). American critic and poet. In The Double Agent (1935) he analyzed modern poetry, arguing that form and content together comprise the poem's meaning. In the title essay of Language As Gesture (1952), Blackmur described linguistic gesture as “the outward and dramatic play of inward and imaged meaning.” Among his other books are The Expense of Greatness (1940), The Lion and the Honeycomb (1955), and Form and Value in Modern Poetry (1957).

Black Prince. An epithet for Edward, prince of Wales (1330–1376), eldest son of King Edward III of England. Froissart says he was “styled black by terror of his arms.” The appellation is sometimes thought to refer to the color of his armor, but usually to his martial deeds.

Black Riders and Other Lines, The (1895). A book of poems by Stephen Crane. Partly inspired by the work of Emily Dickinson, the “other lines” of this collection are often epigrammatic parables written in free verse. The title poem comes from a boyhood experience in which Crane, after watching the waves beat against the shore, dreamed of black riders on black horses riding up, out of the water.

Black Shirt. One of the Italian Fascisti under Mussolini. The black shirt was the distinctive part of their uniforms. See S.S.

Blackstone, Sir William (1723–1780). English jurist. The famous Commentaries bearing his name for more than a century were fundamental in any study of English law. Hence Blackstone is synonymous with the law.

Black Tulip, The (La Tulipe Noire; 1895). An historical romance by Alexandre Dumas. Set in Holland in the 17th century, the tale revolves about the struggle between two political factions.

Blackwood's Magazine. An English literary magazine, founded in 1817. It was strongly Tory in its political sympathies and violently opposed in its literary outlook to the so-called Cockney School of poets. John Gibson Lockhart and James Hogg were well-known and influential members of Blackwood's staff.

Blagden, Isabella (1816–1873). English friend of the Robert Brownings. Dearest Isla (1951) is a collection of 154 letters written to her by Browning after his wife's death.

Blaine, James G[illespie] (1830–1893). American statesman. After serving in Congress (1862–1876), Blaine was a leading contender for the Republican presidential nomination in 1876 and was nominated in a famous speech by Robert G. Ingersoll, who referred to him as the “plumed knight,” a designation with which he was henceforth associated. Blaine lost the nomination because of charges that he had used his political office for personal gain, but he became the candidate in 1884 against Grover Cleveland. Blaine's defeat is often ascribed to a reputation among the voters and among the voters for a foreign policy that was too close to the Paris treaty with France of 1853, which granted the United States of America sovereignty over 1,400,000 square miles of territory in the American Southwest.

Blaine's defeat is often ascribed to a reputation among the voters and among the voters for a foreign policy that was too close to the Paris treaty with France of 1853, which granted the United States of America sovereignty over 1,400,000 square miles of territory in the American Southwest.
Blair, Eric.

Blake, Nicholas. The pen name under which C. Day-Lewis has written detective stories.

Blake, William (1757–1827). English poet, engraver, painter, and mystic. Apprenticed in 1771 to an engraver, he later illustrated his own work with copperplate engravings and water colors. He also illustrated Young's Night Thoughts, Gray's Poems, the Book of Job, and Dante's Divine Comedy. As a poet, he is known for his mysticism and complex, sometimes obscure symbolism. His visionary world is extremely important to his work. An antinomian, he bypasses the Church and experiences God directly; from boyhood on he had his visions, and from them created his personal mythology, of which Urizen is a part. As his devoted wife remarked, “I have very little of Mr. Blake's company; he is always in Paradise.” His works, in some of which both text and illustrations were engraved, include Poetical Sketches (1783); Songs of Innocence and Songs of Experience, and the so-called prophetic books including The Book of Thel, The Marriage of Heaven and Hell, The Gates of Paradise (1793), The Vision of the Daughters of Albion (1793), The Song and Book of Los (1795), and The Book of Ahania (1795). He also wrote Jerusalem, The Emanation of the Giant Albion (1804), and Milton.

Blanc, [Jean Joseph Charles] Louis (1811–1882). French socialist. Regarded as the father of state socialism, he founded (1839) the journal Revue du Progrès to promulgate his doctrines. One of the most prominent leaders of the abortive revolution of 1848, Blanc was forced to flee France that same year. His 12-volume Histoire de la révolution française (1847–1862) was written in England, where he lived until he returned to France in 1871.

Blanco Fombona, Rufino (1874–1944). Venezuelan novelist, short-story writer, poet, and essayist. Blanco Fombona was an exile during the long dictatorship of Juan Vicente Gómez, returning to Venezuela after the latter's death in 1935. His writing reflects his angry dismay at the stupidity, iniquity, and sordidness that he seemed to find everywhere. Accordingly his novels are weakened by bits of heavy-handed social satire and political propaganda. They include El hombre de hierro (1907), which depicts the triumph of evil over virtue; El hombre de oro (The Man of Gold, 1916), which exposes the venality and incompetence of Venezuelan politicians; and La mira en la mano (1927), the story of an ambitious priest, who has been called a Venezuelan Elmer Gantry. Cuentos americanos (1904) and Dramas mínimos (1920) are his best-known collections of short stories. His poetry, which includes the collections Pequeña ópera lírica (1904) and Cantos de la prisión y del destierro (1911), shows the influence of modernism. Among his other works are Letras y letrados de Hispano-América (1908) and Grandes escritores de América (1917), literary criticism; La lámpara de Aladino (1915), autobiographical sketches; and El conquistador español en el siglo XVI (1922), a study of the Spanish conquerors. He also edited the letters of Simon Bolivar, and edited and published several series of great American books.

Blandamour. See Fabre Queene, The.

Blanketeers. The name given to a body of Manchester workers who assembled in St. Peter's Field, Manchester, on March 10, 1817, with the purpose of marching to London to petition against what they considered unfair practices on the part of their employers. Each man was outfitted with provisions and a blanket. The leaders and some of the followers were arrested and imprisoned; the rest never got to London.

blank verse. In prosody, unrhymed verse. In English, the term usually means unrhymed iambic pentameter. In classical prosody, rhyme was not used at all; with the introduction of rhyme in the Middle Ages blank verse disappeared. It was reintroduced in the 16th century, and in England became the standard medium of dramatic poetry and frequently of epic poetry; Shakespeare's plays, for example, are written in blank verse.

Blanqui, Louis Auguste (1805–1881). French socialist. A fiery revolutionist who advocated the dictatorship of the proletariat, Blanqui served 46 years in prison for his efforts to bring about the overthrow of Louis Philippe.

Blarney Stone. A triangular stone in the wall of the castle at Blarney, Ireland, about 20 feet from the top and difficult of access. It contains the inscription "Cormac McCarthy fortis me fieri fecit, a.d. 1446." Tradition says that whoever can kiss this wins the power of being able to obtain all his desires by cajolery. As it is almost impossible to reach, a substitute has been provided by the custodians of the castle, and it is said that this is in every way as efficacious as the original.

Blas, Gil. See Gil Blas de Santillane, Histoire de.
Blasco Ibáñez, Vicente (1867–1928). Spanish novelist. His early, naturalistic novels, dealing with life in his native Valencia, are generally considered his best; these include La barraca (The Cabin, 1898) and Cañas y barro (Reeds and Mud, 1902). Later he wrote the novels that won him great popularity and financial rewards, perhaps at the expense of his literary reputation. Among these are Los cuatro jinetes del Apocalipsis (The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse, 1916), a World War I story, and Sangre y arena (Blood and Sand, 1909).

Blat. A “little” magazine edited by Wyndham Lewis in association with Ezra Pound. In unconventional typography it advocated VORTICISM in art and literature.

Blatant Beast. See Faerie Queene, The.

blaue Blume. See blue flower.

Blaue Reiter, Der (The Blue Rider). A group of artists established in 1911 in Munich around Wassily Kandinsky and Franz Marc. Interested in an expressionistic use of color to convey emotion, the group organized exhibitions of the works of such painters as Henri Rousseau, Georges Braque, Pablo Picasso, Casimir Malevitch, and Paul Klee. Their 1912 yearbook contained articles on cubism and other artistic movements in France, Germany, and Russia, as well as an article dealing with the music of Arnold Schoenberg. The group dispersed in 1914, with the outbreak of the First World War. See Brücke, Die.

Blavatsky, Helena Petrovna, called Mme. Blavatsky (1831–1891). Russian-born spiritualist medium, magician, and occultist. She founded the Theosophical Society (see Theosophy). She wrote Isis Unveiled (1877) and The Secret Doctrine (1888), influential books of occult lore. She toured India, Europe, and the U.S., developing and preaching her doctrines. The poet William Butler Yeats was profoundly influenced by her work.

Bleak House (1852). A novel by Charles Dickens. The heroine is Esther Summerson, or rather Esther Hawdon, illegitimate daughter of Lady Dedlock and Captain Hawdon; Esther herself does not know her origins, and Lady Dedlock believes Esther to be dead. A ward of Mr. Jarndyce, Esther lives with him at Bleak House. Lord Dedlock’s lawyer, Mr. Tulkinghorn, begins to suspect Lady Dedlock’s secret past and unravels it; when Tulkinghorn is found dead, Lady Dedlock is suspected; she disappears and is later found dead. Tulkinghorn was actually killed by Lady Dedlock’s maid. Esther ultimately marries Dr. Woodcourt.

In the background of the novel is the interminable suit of Jarndyce vs. Jarndyce. Beginning as a dispute as to how the trusts under a Jarndyce will were to be administered, the suit drags on from year to year, from generation to generation. Two of the heirs are Richard Carstone and Ada Clare, his pretty cousin, who marry and live at Bleak House with John Jarndyce and Esther. When the case is finally settled, it is in Carstone’s favor, but all the funds have been dissipated by the litigation. Carstone dies and Ada marries on at Bleak House with their son.

In this novel, Dickens attacks the delays and archaic absurdities of the courts, which he knew about firsthand from his frustrating and unprofitable experience of trying to sue the pirate publishers of A Christmas Carol. See Mr. Bucket; The Rev. Mr. Chadband; Miss Flite; Mrs. Jellyby; Jo; Krook; Harold Skimpole.

Blefuscuc. In Jonathan Swift’s Gulliver’s Travels, an island, northeast of Lilliput, inhabited by pygmies. It is supposed to represent France.

Bleibtreu, Karl (1859–1928). German author in the movement of NATURALISM. In his critical work, Revolution der Literatur (Revolution of Literature, 1886) he advocates what he calls “true romanticism,” a genuine, heartfelt striving for human ideals. Among his creative works, Dies Irae (1882), the fictional diary of a French officer in the Franco-Prussian War, was most influential.

Blenheim, battle of (1704). During the War of the Spanish Succession, the battle in which John Churchill, duke of Marlborough, defeated Marshal Tallard at Blenheim on the upper Danube. It was the most resounding and decisive victory enjoyed by the British on the Continent since Agincourt. Louis XIV’s schemes for pushing his frontiers up to the Rhine were thus thwarted and French prestige was badly shaken. The poem The Battle of Blenheim (1798) was written by Robert Southey.

Blenheim Steps. The site of an anatomical school on Bond Street in London, over which Sir Astley Cooper presided. Here “resurrectionists” were sure to find a ready market for their gruesome wares, for which they received sums of money varying from £3 to £10, and sometimes more. Hence, going to Blenheim Steps means going to be dissected, or unearthed from one’s grave.

Blessed Damozel, The (1850). A poem by Dante Gabriel Rossetti giving expression to the longing of the “blessed damozel” in heaven for her lover on earth.

Blessington, countess of. Margaret Power (1789–1849). Irish writer. Her Conversations with Lord Byron (1834) are still interesting, but she is better known for her dramatic life. Sold by her father into marriage at 14, she fled from a brutal husband into a liaison with an English officer, who later gave her up (for £10,000) to the earl of Blessington. Her remarkable beauty, cleverness, and charm established her as a leading hostess of the day. After Blessington’s death (1829), she became the companion, if not mistress, of Alfred, count d’Orsay, 12 years her junior, celebrated for his looks and accomplishments. To provide for “the last of the dandies” and her own luxurious tastes, she took to writing, but her novels and travel books failed to avert bankruptcy in 1849. She died a few months later, after following d’Orsay to France.

Blest Gana, Alberto (1830–1920). Chilean novelist. One of the outstanding realists of Latin-American fiction, Blest Gana, who spent many years in France, sought to be the Balzac of Chile. His best-known novel is Martín Rivas (1862). Dealing with the experiences of an impoverished provincial youth who falls in love with a girl of the aristocracy, the work gives an anecdotic, satirical view of Chilean society in the 1850’s. Other works by Blest Gana include Durante la Reconquista (1897), an epic of Chile’s struggle for independence, and Los trasplantados (1904), which depicts decadent Chilean émigrés in Paris.

Blifil, William. See Tom Jones.
Bligh, William (1754-1817). English admiral and master of the H.M.S. Bounty. Having sailed with Captain Cook on his second expedition when the breadfruit tree was discovered, Bligh was sent in 1787 on the Bounty to acquire specimens of the tropical tree for transplantation in the West Indies. His extreme severity led to mutiny, and Bligh, with 18 others, was set adrift. He succeeded in navigating nearly 4,000 miles of open sea and lived to carry out his original mission. His adventure is known from Byron's poem The Island and from a trilogy of novels by Charles Nordhoff and James Norman Hall, beginning with Mutiny on the Bounty.

Blind Bard or Poet. An epithet frequently applied to Homer. The tradition of Homer's blindness may possibly be related to that of Democritus, the blind rhapsode at the court of Alcinous in the Odyssey.

Blind Harry. See Henry the Minstrel.

Bliss (1920). A short story by Katherine Mansfield. It describes a blissful afternoon and evening in the life of Bertha Young, who loves her husband, her baby and her home. In Mansfield's typically ironic ending, Bertha discovers that her husband is being unfaithful to her.

Blithedale Romance, The (1852). A novel by Nathaniel Hawthorne. Blithedale, a Utopian community, is modeled on Brook Farm, the Transcendentalist experiment at West Roxbury, Mass., in which Hawthorne had participated 10 years before he wrote the novel. Miles Coverdale, the narrator, is a coldly inquisitive observer; in revealing his knowledge of the other members of the community, he reveals himself. Zenobia, a dark, queenly woman, is in love with Hollingsworth, an egotistic reformer who plans to convert Blithedale into an experiment in prison reform.

Priscilla, a pale innocent girl, fallen under the evil influence of the mesmerist Wertervelt, has performed as the Veiled Lady. Taking refuge at Blithedale, she is revealed to be the half-sister of Zenobia. When Hollingsworth admits his love for Priscilla, Zenobia draws herself. Hollingsworth, shocked by the experience, abandons his schemes, depending on Priscilla for strength. Coverdale, in the final chapter, admits that he, too, had always loved Priscilla. See Margaret Fuller.

Blitzkrieg (Ger., "lightning warfare"). A form of large-scale surprise attack involving motorized forces with air support, developed by Germany in World War II.

Blitzstein, Marc (1905-1964). American composer and playwright. He is known for his experimentation with formal technique and his use of proletarian themes. The Cradle Will Rock (1937), an experimental play with music on the capital-labor theme, is his best-known work. He also wrote I've Got the Tune (1937), a radio song-play, No for an Answer (1941), and the libretto for the American adaptation of Bertolt Brecht and Kurt Weill's Three-Penny Opera.

Blies, Baroness Karen. See Isak Dinesen.

Bloch, Ernst (1880-1959). Swiss-born composer. Many of his works have a Hebraic flavor derived from traditional Jewish melodies and modes, such as his cello rhapsody, Schelomo (1916). His Concerto Grosso No. I (1925) is a typical example of the return to old forms engendered by neoclassicism.

Bloch-Michel, Jean (1912—). French novelist. Active in the Resistance movement, Bloch-Michel worked on the journal Combat during the Liberation years. His novels are similar in spirit to the work of Albert Camus: sober, stoical, and grimly honest about the human condition. Les Grandes Circonstances (1949), Journal du désordre (1955), and Un Homme estimable (1956) are among his works.

Blok, Aleksandr Aleksandrovich (1880-1921). Russian poet. The greatest of the Russian symbolists, he is generally ranked as one of the half-dozen major poets in Russian literature. Blok's early poems Songs of the Beautiful Lady (Sikhî o prekrasnoy damy; 1904) are hymns to a mystical vision of Sophia, a tendency originating with the philosopher Vladimir Solovtsov that played a large role in Russian symbolist poetry. Blok's loss of faith in his mystical experience of the eternal feminine was reflected in later poetry and plays, which grew increasingly bitter, gloomy, and ironic. In his lyrical drama, The Puppet Show (Balaganchik; 1905) he ridiculed his former beliefs. Another play, The Stranger (Neznakomtsy; 1906), depicts the former Beautiful Lady as a common prostitute. A poem of this title, written at the same time, expresses Blok's wish to escape the pain of his disappointment in drink. He also attempted to find solace in love affairs although toward the end of his life he claimed that he had had only two loves in his life: his wife Lyubov (a daughter of the scientist Mendeleyev) "and all the others."

Blok's masterpiece is his long poem The Twelve, an impressionistic picture of St. Petersburg during the early days of the revolution. Another well-known work is The Scythians (Skify; 1918), an address of both challenge and proffered friendship to the West from the new revolutionary Russia. Blok worked on a long autobiographical poem, Retribution (Vosmendyje), from 1910 until his death, completing one chapter and parts of two others.

Blok's standing as one of the greatest Russian poets is based on a large body of lyrics, several excellent verse dramas, and his long poem The Twelve. His importance as an innovator in Russian prosody is also great. He created the new accentual verse in Russian known as dolniki, which is based only on the number of stresses per line, allowing any number of unstressed syllables between the stresses. This break with the classic prosody of syllabic-accentual verse, which took into account both stressed and unstressed syllables, introduced a new freedom into modern Russian poetry, which was used to good account by later poets such as Mayakovski, Eshnin, and Anna Akhmatova.

Blood and Iron (Ger., "Blut und Eisen"). A phrase used by Bismarck at a meeting with members of the Reichstag (1862), to describe his political policies. He said, "The great questions of the day will not be settled by resolutions and majority votes, ... but by blood and iron.

Blood Wedding. See Federico Garcia Lorca.

Bloody Assizes. The popular name for the trials conducted in England in 1855 by Lord Chief Justice George Jeffreys after the collapse of Monmouth's Rebellion. Hundreds of both actual and presumed supporters of the duke of Monmouth were executed... or sold into West-Indian slavery. The trials, which were brief, brutal, and flagrantly unjust, became a byword for relentless cruelty.

Bloody Mary. See Mary I.

Bloody, Hyman (1913– ). Latvian-born American painter. He is known for his hypnotic, hallucinating pictures.

Bloom, Leopold. The central character in James Joyce's novel Ulysses. Bloom is an advertising canvasser of Jewish origin, living in Dublin. He is an unheroic but affirmative character, whose wanderings about Dublin are ironically contrasted with the epic voyage of Ulysses. Humane and generous, self-conscious and guilt-ridden, throughout the book his quest for love is frustrated and his best instincts are stifled. Only through his daydreams does Bloom find fulfillment as a social, political, and ethical human being. His rejection by Ireland may thus be seen as Joyce's indictment of a culture that is only artificially civilized. Symbolically, he is linked to a variety of literary and historical figures, among them, Elijah, Moses, and Christ.

Bloom, Molly. One of the three chief characters in James Joyce's novel Ulysses. She is the wife of Leopold Bloom, to whom she is unfaithful. A sardonic counterpart of Penelope in the Odyssey, she is a sensual, intuitive woman, for Joyce a symbol of the universal feminine principle. The final section of the novel consists of her famous stream-of-consciousness monologue: a single, uninterrupted sentence ending in an affirmative of life, "Yes."

Bloom'sbury group. The name given to a group of English writers, artists, and philosophers who began to meet about 1906. They include the writers Virginia and Leonard Woolf, E. M. Forster, and Lytton Strachey; the artists and art critics Roger Fry and Vanessa and Clive Bell; the economist John Maynard Keynes; and the philosopher Bertrand Russell. Bloomsbury was then an artistic, Bohemian section of London.

Blot on the 'Scutcheon, A (1843). A poetic drama by Robert Browning. Thorold, Earl Tresham, boasts that no blot has ever stained his noble family's escutcheon. Henry, Earl Mertoun, who is Thorold's neighbor, asks permission to marry Thorold's young sister Mildred. Thorold, unaware that Mertoun has already seduced Mildred, consents; but when he learns the truth he is himself with fury and shame. He kills Mertoun and poisons himself; Mildred dies soon after.

Bloody Tenent, The (1644). A tract pleading for religious toleration, written by Roger Williams during a controversy with John Cotton. Its full title is The Bloody Tenent of Persecution, for Cause of Conscience, Discussed in a Conference between Truth and Peace. It urges freedom of belief for Catholics, Jews, and pagans, as well as for Protestants. An advocate of democracy in government, Williams also declared that the "foundation of civil power lies in the people." Cotton wrote a reply entitled The Bloody Tenent, Washed, and Made White in the Blood of the Lamb (1647). Williams rejoined with The Bloody Tenent Yet More Bloody by Mr. Cotton's Endeavour to Wash it White in the Blood of the Lamb (1652), in which he reaffirmed that each man must believe what his conscience tells him. Both writings are considered to be among the most forceful and eloquent prose written in the American colonies in the 17th century.

Bloy, Léon [Marie] (1846–1917). French novelist and essayist. Bloy was a Catholic author who attacked contemporary society and prophesied an impending transformation in Le Salut par les Juifs (1892), La Femme Pauvre (1897), Le Pèlerin de l'absolu (Pilgrim of the Absolute, 1914).

Bluebeard. The villain of the tale Barbe-bleue (1697) by Charles Perrault in his Contes de ma mère l'Oye. Bluebeard entrusts the keys of his castle to each of his new brides in turn with the warning not to open a door behind which, unknown to them, are strewn the bodies of his previous wives. None can restrain her curiosity, and Bluebeard murders six wives for their disobedience before the seventh bride has the good fortune to escape him. Based on the crimes of the murderer Gilles de Rais, the Bluebeard story has been the basis for numerous burlesques and dramatizations. Maurice Maeterlinck made it the subject of his Ariane et Barbe-bleue (1901).

Béla Bartók's opera Duke Bluebeard's Castle (1911) was composed to a libretto by Béla Balâsz in which the horrific elements of the tale were minimized and Bluebeard became a discontented, searching philosopher. Jacques Offenbach's operetta Barbe-Bleue (1866) was a rollicking burlesque, based only loosely on the Bluebeard theme.

Blue Flower (Ger., Blaue Blume). A symbol in Novalis' novel Heinrich von Ofterdingen. It was later taken by a number of authors, including Heine in his Die romantische Schule (The Romantic School, 1833), as the representative symbol of all German romanticism. At the beginning of Novalis' novel young Heinrich is filled with a longing whose actual object he does not yet know, and the blue flower appears to him in a dream as the fulfillment of this longing. Thus, basically, it symbolizes the yearning for an ideal so distant that one does not yet know what it is, the romantic yearning for infinity. Novalis might have been thinking of the blue haze of distance when he chose the color of the flower.

Blue Hotel, The (1899). A short story by Stephen Crane. First published in the volume The Monster and Other Stories, it is one of Crane's finest works. In the story, a Swede comes to a Nebraska hotel with his mind filled with the romantic violence of Western dime novels. Expecting the same violence, he finally causes a fight, leaves the hotel, and is killed in another argument in a bar. The story dramatizes the question of who was responsible for the Swede's death. Although one of the characters remarks, "Every sin is the result of a collaboration," the actual point of the story is not the moral complicity of the characters but rather the inexplicable mystery of a universe which, like the blizzard that rages throughout the story, cares nothing for the trials of mankind.

Blue Laws. The name given to all statutory regulations of personal conduct in matters of conscience. While the term has no technical legal meaning, it is also used to describe the severe laws enacted at various times and places in colonial America, whose object was to stamp out "heresy," enforce a strict observance of the Sabbath, and even regulate kissing between husbands and wives. "Blue laws" may also refer to Puritan legislation in England. Connecticut, because of an especially rigid group of laws passed at New Haven in 1732, is sometimes called the Blue Law State.

blues. Negro folk songs, distinguished by certain expressive out-of-tune notes, called "blue notes," by their prevailing melancholy (though often ironically humorous), and by their unique poetic and musical form. The latter is as simple as it is effective: within each three-line stanza the first two lines are approximately the same; the third line resolves the tension caused by this repetition. Each line is followed by a brief musical interlude. Some poets have consciously imitated this form, notably Langston Hughes.

Blues and Grays. In the American Civil War, the Union and Confederate forces respectively, from the color of their uniforms. The Blue and the Gray (1867), a sentimental poem by Francis Miles Finch which was often recited at Memorial Day ceremonies, was inspired by women in Columbus, Miss., who strewed flowers over the graves of both Union and Confederate dead.

bluestocking. A female pedant, a woman of pretentious intellectual and literary interests. The term was originally applied (c. 1750) to meetings which took place at the home of Elizabeth Montagu, where literary discussions replaced cards and gossip. Among the guests was Benjamin Stillingfleet who always wore blue stockings (instead of the customary white for formal wear). It is in reference to him that the group—and later any group like it—came to be called derisively "the Bluestocking Club."

Blum, Léon (1872–1950). French statesman and political leader. Leader of the Socialist party (from 1919) and editor of its newspaper Le Populaire, Blum first served as premier in a Popular Front government (June 4, 1936–June 21, 1937). He carried through radical reforms in banking, labor, and agriculture. For brief periods in 1938 and 1946–1947, Blum again occupied the office of premier. Arrested by the Vichy government, he was imprisoned in a German concentration camp but released in 1945 by the Allies.

Blunden, Edmund (1896– ). English poet and critic. Associated with the Georgian poets, he served in World War I, receiving the Military Cross; Undertones of War (1928) is a major book of wartime reminiscence. His volumes of poems include The Shepherd (1922), Shells by a Stream (1944), and A Hong Kong House (1962).

Blunderhead, Simpkin. See Christopher Anstey.

Blunt, Wilfrid Scawen (1840–1922). English poet, author, diplomat, and explorer. Blunt traveled in a diplomatic and private capacity throughout Europe, the Near East, and India. He was bitterly opposed to 19th-century British policies of imperialism and exploitation, and once served a prison term for an inflammatory speech in Ireland. His best poems, a few lyrics from Love Sonnets of Proteus (1880) and The New Pilgrimage (1889), survive through their genuine force, pathos, and subtlety. Blunt also wrote long political poems, such as The Wind and the Whirlwind (1883) and Satan Absolved (1889). Of his numerous prose works—mostly dealing with injustices of the British Empire—the most interesting are the famous My Diaries, 1888–1914 (1920–1921), which were withdrawn by their publisher because of their revelations of British secret diplomacy. A collection of his verse, Poems, appeared in 1914.

Blut und Eisen. See Blood and Iron.

Bly, Nelly. See Elizabeth Cochran Staman.

Boadicea (d. a.d. 62). Celtic queen of the Iceni, Britons of Norfolk and Suffolk. Also known as the Warrior Queen, she rebelled against Roman rule, taking poison after being defeated in battle when the revolt was quelled.

Boanerges (Gr., "sons of thunder"). Christ's name (Mark 3:17) for his disciples James and John, because they wanted to call "fire to come down from heaven" to consume the Samaritans for not "receiving" Jesus (Luke 9:54).

Boar's Head Tavern. A London tavern. It was made immortal by Shakespeare in Henry IV, as the favorite haunt of Prince Hal and Sir John Falstaff. The tavern was located in Eastcheap, on the site of the present statue of William IV, and was in existence until 1831.

Boaz. See Ruth.

Bobadill, Captain. A character in Ben Jonson's comedy Every Man in His Humour. A military braggart, he is an ignorant, clever bully, completely cowardly, but thought by his dupes to be an amazing hero.

bossy. A London policeman. This slang word is probably derived from Sir Robert Peel who was home secretary when the new Metropolitan Police Act was passed in 1829. Bobbies are also known as "peelers," a name originally applied to the Irish constabulary established by Peel.

Boccaccio, Giovanni (1313–1375). Italian prose writer and poet. He was born at Certaldo (or possibly, as he hinted in one of his works, at Paris) and spent part of his youth at Naples (1329–1335). He enjoyed fashionable Neapolitan society, but not his father's merchant trade and the study of the law. From 1341 to his death he was mainly at Florence, where he pursued his chosen career as a man of letters. His prolific output, including many works of prose and poetry that were the first of their kind in Italian or European literature, entitle him to a place beside Petrarch as a founder of the Italian Renaissance. His scholarly works in Latin were written mainly towards the end of his life, when a spiritual crisis persuaded him to reject all vernacular writing as sinful. While not enjoying the popularity of his earlier efforts, these Latin works, with their interest in classical antiquity, were seminal in the growth of Humanism. Of the same order are his attempts to have Homer translated and made more accessible at a time when few knew Greek. On the recommendation of his close friend Petrarch, he supported an incompetent Greek scholar in his own home until a bad translation was completed. Still loyal to the vernacular tradition, he also lectured on Dante and wrote a eulogy of him during that final period.

His works and their chronological order are as follows: Caccia di Diana (Diana's Hunt), the first Italian hunting poem, in terza rima, written 1336–1338; the prose romance Filocolo, including the Thirteen Questions of Love; the Filostrato, a romance in ottava rima and the first of its kind written by a man of letters; the Tesoro, in octaves, the first Tuscan epic; the Ameto (1341–1342), a prose romance with pastoral setting and characters; the Amoroso Vizzone (1342–1343), an allegorical poem in terzine; Fiammetta, a psychological romance whose heroine may be a real woman (see Maria D'Aquino) or the poetic equivalent of Beatrice and Laura; the Ninfale Fiesolanio (1346–1349), the first Italian idyll, in octaves; the Decameron, his most famous work. His last Italian works (1355–1375) were the Corbaccio, a satire against women; the eulogy of Dante; and a commentary on the Divine Comedy. The Latin works of the final period were De Casibus Virorum Illustrium (The Fate of Illustrious Men); De Claris Mulieribus (On Famous Women); and De Genealogiis Deorum Gentilium (Genealogies of the Pagan Gods), whose 13th book contains a defense of poetry.

Boccaccio, Francesco (1313–1375). Italian satirist. His Ragguggi di Paranza (Dispatches from Paranza, 1612–1614), literary and political satires, were popular and widely influential in 17th-century Europe because of their literary topicality and their anti-Spanish, prorepublican sentiments.

Bodenheim, Maxwell (1893–1954). American poet and novelist. One of the most notorious of the Bohemians who came to Greenwich Village during the 1920's, Bodenheim in his early work was influenced by the romanticists and imagists, but later, for example in his novel Lights in the Valley (1942), he espoused various proletarian causes. Among his volumes of poetry are Introducing Ironic (1922), Bringing Jaks (1930), and Selected Poems, 1914–1944 (1946). Crazy Man (1924), Sixty Seconds (1929), and Naked on Roller Skates (1929) are novels. Bodenheim carried on several feuds with his literary contemporaries, the most famous one being with Ben Hackett in 1954. He and his third wife were found murdered in a dingy, heatless room.

bodhisattva (Sans., "being of wisdom"). In Buddhism one who has attained the status of a Buddha but who postpones his entry to Buddhahood in order to assist others in their quest for the Truth.

Bodin, Jean (1530–1596). French lawyer and political philosopher. He is noted for his Six Books of a Republic (1576) and his Method for the Easy Comprehension of History (1566). Almost alone among 16th-century thinkers, Bodin attempted to devise a comprehensive theory of political society. He strove to discover some principle of order and unity that would reconcile liberty and subjection, yet satisfy conscience and reason, without regard to divine or supernatural sanction. Two principles are evident in his political philosophy. In the attempt to find a principle of order, he defined political sovereignty in terms of power, that is, he linked the state in terms of a relation between political inferior and a political superior, and law as a command from the latter to the former. And in the hope of resting this structure on grounds consonant with conscience, he affirmed the principle of natural law as an ethical and authoritative foundation for political power: both the Sovereign, or political superior, and the subject, or political inferior, were bound by natural law; the Sovereign to command in accordance with justice, the subject to obey in accordance with justice. These two tendencies in his thought were, however, not adequately drawn together, and consequently, each strain was given separate and definitive formulation later. Bodin's theory of sovereignty was systematically developed by Hobbes; his conception of natural law as an ethical foundation for the state, by Grotius and Locke.

Bodkin, Maud (1875–1939). English scholar. She applied Jung's psychoanalysis to literary criticism in her influential study, Archetypal Patterns in Poetry (1934).

Bodleian Library. A celebrated library at Oxford University in England. Projected by Sir Thomas Bodly in 1598, it was opened in 1602. It is famous for its collection of rare books and valuable manuscripts.

Boedeker, Johann Jakob (1698–1783). Swiss scholar and critic. He was a translator of Milton and a patron of Klostock and Wieland. A strong opponent of Görtzschel, he is most famous for his editions of medieval German literature, such as Parzival (the Parzival of Wolfram von Eschenbach, 1753) and Fabeln aus dem Zeitpunkt der Minnesinger (Stories from the Time of the Minnesingers, 1757), including the Nibelungenlied.

Body of Liberties. The (1641). A code of laws for the government of the Massachusetts colony, combining the common law of England with the Mosaic law. Prepared by a committee led by Nathaniel Ward, it is ranked by some critics with the Magna Charta and the Bill of Rights in its recognition of fundamental human rights. In 1648 an enlarged code was published under the title of The Laws and Liberties of Massachusetts.

Boece (probably 1318 or 1332). A prose translation by Geoffrey Chaucer of the Consolation of Philosophy by Boethius.

Boehme, Jakob. See Jakob Böhme.

Boeotian. A rude, unlettered person; a dull blockhead. The ancient Boeotians loved agricultural and pastoral pursuits, so the Athenians used to say they were as dull and thick as their own atmosphere. On the other hand, Hesiod, Pindar, Corinna, Pelpidas, Epaminondas, and Plutarch were all Boeotians.

Boer War (1899–1902). The usual name for the war between Great Britain and the joint forces of the Transvaal Republic and the Orange Free State. The war was the culmination of a long-standing conflict between the British and the Boers (South Africans of Dutch descent), both of whom had interests in South Africa. The immediate cause of the war was Great Britain's refusal to withdraw troops stationed in Transvaal. The Boers had considerable success in the beginning of the war, but soon gave ground to Britain's superior force. The war ended with the fall of Pretoria (1900) and organized Boer resistance disappeared. Peace was not formally arrived at until 1902.

Boethius, Anicius Manlius Severinus] (c. 480–c. 524). Roman philosopher. Appointed in 510, he served as consul under Theodoric the Great, until he was accused of treason and executed. Boethius is best known for his famous work, The Consolation of Philosophy, written while he was imprisoned, awaiting final sentence. He also translated works by Aristotle and the neo-Platonist Porphyry, and wrote a number of philosophical treatises, especially on logic, which became textbooks for the Schoolmen of the Middle Ages and their major source of knowledge about the thinkers of antiquity.

Boffin, Nicodemus. In Charles Dickens' Our Mutual Friend, the kindly "old-fashioned dustman," residuary legatee of John Harmon. He pretends that his inheritance has made him miserly and hard-hearted, but actually he is keeping the fortune for young John Harmon, the rightful heir.

Bogan, Louise (1897— ). American poet and critic. Miss Bogan's poetry, subtle and intellectual, shows the influence of the English metaphysical poets. Her work has appeared in Body of This Death (1923), Dark Summer (1929), Sleeping Fury (1937), and Collected Poems (a co-winner of the Bollingen Prize, 1954). A poetry reviewer for The New Yorker, Miss Bogan has also written the well-received Achievement in American Poetry, 1900–1950 (1951) and Selected Criticism: Poetry and Prose (1955).

Bohème, La (1896). An opera by Giacomo Puccini. It is based upon Henri Murger's Vie de Bohème (1848). The story deals with the love affair of Rodolfo, a poet, and Mimi, a Paris seamstress, as well as with Rodolfo's penniless friends and the ups and downs of artist life in the Latin Quarter. Mimi is ill and finally dies.

Bohemian. A term applied to literary men and artists of loose and unconventional habits living on what they can pick up on their wits. Originally the name was applied to the gypsies, from the belief that before they appeared in Western Europe they had lived in Bohemia, or because the first who arrived in France came by way of Bohemia (1427). When they presented themselves before the gates of Paris they were not allowed to enter the city, but were lodged at La Chapelle, St. Denis.

Bühl de Faber, Cecilia. See Fernán Caballero.

Böhme or Boehme, Jakob (1575–1624). German mystic. His thought is often termed nature mysticism because of his belief in the unity of nature as a vehicle for immediate contemplation of the divinity and because of his concept of natural language (lingua adamentica) as the language of the Holy Ghost. Böhme, who was a shoemaker by trade, thought of his ideas as a development of Protestantism, but found himself under attack by the Protestant as well as the Catholic clergy. His most famous works are Aurora oder die Morgenröte im Aufgang (Aurora, or The Rising Dawn, 1612), Beschreibung der drei Principien göttlichen Wesens (Description of the Three Principles of Divine Essence, 1619), and Mysterium Magnum (1622). He was of great influence on subsequent German thought, especially in the movement of romanticism.

Boiardo or Bojardo, Matteo Maria. Count of Scandiano (1441–1494). Italian poet at the ducal court of Ferrara. While serving the Este family as their regent for Modena and Reggio, he composed love poems and his famous romantic epic, Orlando Innamorato (Roland Enamoured). It was left unfinished at his death, then taken up and continued by Ariosto in his Orlando Furioso (Roland Mad).

Boileau[-Despréaux], Nicholas (1636–1711). French poet and critic. He was one of the earliest and most characteristic of the neoclassicists, who urged prudence, moderation, common sense, and obedience to authority in the writing of literature. In Satires (1660) he imitated Horace and Juvenal and attacked the social and literary foibles of his day, while his Le Lutrin is a mock epic in the manner of Pope's Rape of the Lock. His chief work is Art Poétique (1674), in which he formulated in verse the literary principles that were dominant throughout the 18th century. Known as le législateur du Parnasse ("the legislator of Parnassus"), Boileau greatly influenced his friends and literary associates, who included Racine, Mollière, and La Fontaine.

Bois de Boulogne. A large park west of Paris, France. It contains the famous race tracks of Longchamp and Auteuil. Parisians call it simply le Bois.

Bois-Guilbert, Sir Brian de. In Scott's Ivanhoe, the violent preceptor of the Knights Templars, who first insults Rebecca, then rescues her from a burning castle. When Rebecca is charged with sorcery, she demands a trial by combat, and Sir Brian is appointed to sustain the charge against her, while Ivanhoe is her champion. Sir Brian is found mysteriously dead in the lists, and Rebecca is declared innocent.

Boisrobert, François de (1592–1662). French playwright. With the exception of La Belle Plaideuse (The Beautiful Litigant, 1654), a depiction of the Parisian life of the time, his comedies and tragocomedies are today largely forgotten. One of the original members of the Académie Française and one of Richelieu's cinq auteurs, he generously employed his influence with the cardinal to the advantage of other writers.

Boito, Arrigo (1842–1918). Italian poet, librettist, and composer. Strongly influenced by the romantic cult of the Middle Ages, he wrote verse which linked an antiquarian's interest in medieval lore with a moralist's preoccupation with the Faust-like struggle of good and evil in the individual. A member of the Scapigliatura group of writers, he published his collected verse in Il Libro dei Versi (1877). A legend in verse, Re Orso, was published the same year.

Boito wrote the music and libretti for Mefistofele (1868) and Nerone, first presented at La Scala in 1924. An admirer of Shakespeare, he wrote excellent libretti for Verdi's Otello (1885) and Falstaff (1893). He based his libretto for Ponchielli's La Goccia (1879) on Hugo's Angelo, but used a pen name, apparently embarrassed over its old-fashioned melodrama.

Bojer, Johan (1872–1959). Norwegian novelist. A popular writer outside his own country, Bojer enjoyed a prolific literary career. His best known work in English translation is The Great Hunger (Den store hunger; 1916). More valuable for their artistic merit are his sensitive and powerful novels of peasant Bøll, Heinrich (1917– ). German novelist and short-story writer. Most of his writing was done after World War II. The religious and moral principles on which his critical attitude toward modern society is based are set forth in his Brief an einen jugendlichen Katholiken (Letter to a Young Catholic, 1958). His best known novels are Und sagte kein einziges Wort (And Did Not Say a Single Word, 1953) and Billiard um halbzehn (Billiards at Nine-Thirty, 1959).

Bollingen Prize. An annual award in poetry. First given in 1949 under the auspices of the Library of Congress, the award was supported by the Bollingen Foundation, a philanthropic trust created by Paul Mellon. A distinguished board of writers gave the first award to Ezra Pound for his Pisan Cantos, causing a lengthy and bitter controversy. The debate centered on whether the political and social views of a poet should affect an appraisal of his work, and thereafter the Bollingen Foundation canceled further prizes. In 1950, however, it was announced that the Bollingen Prize in poetry would be awarded by Yale University Library. Since then, distinguished living poets have been given the prize annually. Among the recipients are Wallace Stevens, Marianne Moore, E. E. Cummings, and Yvor Winters.

Bolshevik or Bolshevist. A member of the Russian revolutionary party headed by Lenin that seized power in October, 1917. The origin of the term was the congress of the Russian Social Democratic Party in London in 1903, when Lenin's radical wing of the party prevailed in a dispute, and the name Bolshevist was adopted by the group. The word comes from the Russian word bolshe, meaning "larger," while the name Menshevik adopted by the opposing faction comes from menshe, "smaller."

Bona Dea (Lat., "good goddess"). A Roman goddess of fertility and chastity, worshipped exclusively by women. She was the female counterpart of Faunus and was sometimes called Fauna. It was the rites of the Bona Dea that Claudius Pulcher profaned.

Bonaparte, Napoleon. See Napoleon Bonaparte.

Bonarelli, Guidobaldo (1553–1608). Italian dramatist. He wrote a famous pastoral play, Filli di Sciro (1607), which was translated into English as Phyllis of Scyros.

Bonario. A young soldier disinherited by his avaricious father, Corbaccio, in Jonson's comedy Volpone, or the Fox. His own blustering honesty proves to be his greatest disadvantage when he fights for his rights against such subtle rogues as Volpone and his own father.

Bonaventura. The pseudonym of the author of the German romantic novel Die Nachtwachen des Bonaventura (The Night-Watches of Bonaventura, 1805). The book is a witty and ironic account of the experiences of an ex-poet who has taken work as a town's night watchman in order to observe men without their deceptive, daytime façades. The author was probably Friedrich Gottlieb Wetzel (1779–1819), an otherwise insignificant poet.

Bonaventura or Bonaventura, St. Originally Giovanni di Fidanza (c. 1221–1274). Italian theologian, mystic, and scholastic philosopher, called the “Seraphic Doctor.” A Franciscan, he placed more emphasis on faith and less on reason than St. Thomas Aquinas, and is best known for his The Journey of the Mind to God (Itinerarium Mentis ad Deum). This, like his other works, explains that the direct contemplation of God is the goal of all the arts and sciences; philosophy's task is to discern intimations of God first in the external world, then in the soul itself, which is the image of God, and thus to prepare the mind for its ultimate mystic union with God. Bonaventure furthered the cult of the Virgin Mary, and wrote lives of Christ and St. Francis of Assisi, as well as the treatises Brevisilogium, Sylloquium, and De Reductione Artium ad Theologiam.

Bonhomme Richard. The French form of Benjamin Franklin's pseudonym, Richard Saunders. It is also the name of John Paul Jones's famous man-of-war, a refitted French vessel, which was rechristened in Franklin's honor.

Bonjoutr Tristes (1954). A short novel by Françoise Sagan about teenage Cécile's jealous and tragic plot to prevent her father's remarriage by scheming with his mistress and her own lover.

Bonnard, Sylvestre. See Crime of Sylvestre Bonnard, Th.

Bonnefoy, Yves (1923– ). French poet and critic. Bonnefoy is concerned with the mystic role of words in trying to immobilize experience in art. His poetry, imagistic and hermetic, includes Du Mouvement et de l'immobilité de Douce (1953), Hier régissant désert (1958), and Pierre écrite (1959).

bonnet rouge. The red cap of liberty worn in 1789 by the most fanatical French revolutionaries. It was officially adopted by the Commune in 1792, and is the emblem of red republicanism. The cap seems to have been derived from the Phrygian cap (see LIBERTY CAP) given to the freed slaves of Greece and Rome, and from the bonnet rouge worn by convicts. See Carmagnole.

Bonnivard, François de (1495–1570). Genevan prelate and politician. He appears in idealized form as the hero of Lord Byron's The Prisoner of Chillon.

bonsai. Japanese dwarf trees. Potted, they are stunted and trained, and attain great age.

bonsuki. Japanese tray landscapes.

Bonus Army. A so-called army of unemployed U.S. World War I veterans. They came to Washington in 1932 to try to persuade Congress to vote immediate payment of the bonus due them in 1945 through the World War Adjusted Compensation Act of 1925. The men camped near the Capitol, picketed the Congressional buildings, and were finally dispersed with tear gas. The bonus was finally given in 1936.

bonze. The European name for the Buddhist clergy of the Far East, particularly Japan.

Booby, Lady. In Henry Fielding's novel Joseph Andrews, a vulgar upstart who tries to seduce her footman, Joseph Andrews. She is a foil to Parson Adams as well as a caricature of Samuel Richardson's Pamela.

Book of Documents (Shu-ching). One of the Chinese Five Classics. The first Chinese work of history, it contains speeches, pronouncements, and treaties dating to the Chou dynasty (1027–256 B.C.). The language is obscure and much of the text is of doubtful authenticity. See Bernhard Karlgren, The Book of Documents (1930).

Book of Marriage, The (1926). A symposium on the subject of marriage with Count Hermann Alexander Keyserling as editor and chief contributor. George Bernard Shaw declined to participate because he felt that no man can tell the truth about marriage while his wife is alive.

Book of Martyrs, The. The popular title given to John Foxe's Actes and Monuments (1563).

Book of Rites (Li-chi). One of the Chinese Five Classics. A compilation of the first century B.C., it is composed of various older texts dealing with music, ritual practice, education, and other subjects. It is traditionally but inaccurately attributed to the disciples of Confucius.

Book of the Dead. A collection of magic incantations, prayers, and exorcisms, used in the religion of ancient Egypt as a guidebook for the dead on their journey through the underworld. Though not exactly such, it has been described by some as the Egyptian Bible.

Book of the Duchess, The (1369). A poem by Geoffrey Chaucer, of 1335 lines in octosyllabic couplets. Based largely on French sources, particularly the Roman de la Rose and several works of Guillaume de Machaut, it was almost certainly written as an elegy on the occasion of the death of Blanche of Lancaster, first wife of Chaucer's patron, John of Gaunt. The poet reads the story of Halcyon and Ceyx until he falls asleep. Then he dreams of A vignette from a Book of the Dead. The god Anubis weighs the dead man's tongue against his soul.
joining a hunt and meeting a knight in black, who laments the way Fortune has beaten him at the game of life by introducing him to a most perfect lady, letting him marry her and live with her in bliss, then snatching her away in death.

Book of Thel, The (1787). The first of William Blake's mystical writings known collectively as his prophetic books. Its theme is death, redemption, and eternity. It is written in free verse.

Boone, Daniel (1734-1820). American frontiersman. He is known for his exploration and settlement of Kentucky and has been celebrated by a number of American and English writers, including Cooper and Byron in Don Juan (1823). His adventures were popularized in the supposedly autobiographical account included in Discovery, Settlement and Present State of Kentucky (1784), written by John Filson, and have passed into American folklore.

Boötes (*Gr., "the ploughman"). The name of the constellation which contains the bright star, Arcturus. According to ancient mythology, Boötes invented the plough, to which he yoked two oxen, and at death, being taken to heaven with his plough and oxen, was made a constellation. Homer calls it the wazoner.

Booth, Amelia. See Amelia.

Booth, Edwin [Thomas] (1833-1893). American actor, son of Junius Brutus Booth. One of the most noted of Shakespearean actors, Booth was the founder and first president of the Players Club. His letters were edited by Otis Skinner in a volume called The Last Tragedian (1939).

Booth, John Wilkes (1838-1865). American actor and assassin. The son of Junius Brutus Booth and brother Edwin Booth, he was successful in playing Shakespearean roles. During a performance of Our American Cousin at Ford's Theater in Washington on April 14, 1865, he shot President Lincoln and escaped, shouting "Sic semper tyrannis! The South is avenged!" Two weeks later he was trapped in a barn near Bowling Green, Va.; the barn was fired after he refused to surrender, and he probably shot himself.

Booth, Junius Brutus (1896-1852). English- born American actor. Coming to the U.S. in 1821, Booth toured the country playing in romantic dramas of violence and bloodshed. Junius Booth was the father of Edwin Booth, who also became famous as a tragedian, and of John Wilkes Booth.

Booth, William (1829-1912). English preacher, founder of the Salvation Army (1865). He is noted for his work among the urban poor. He is the subject of a poem by Vachel Lindsay, General William Booth Enters into Heaven.

Borachio. In Shakespeare's Much Ado About Nothing, a villainous follower of Don John of Aragon.

Borah, William E[dgar] (1865-1940). American statesman. As U.S. senator from Idaho (1907-1940), he strongly opposed the World Court and American entry into the League of Nations. He was chairman of the powerful Senate Foreign Relations Committee from 1924 until his death, and was a leading isolationist in the period before World War II.

Borak, al. Muhammad's horse. It conveyed Muhammad from earth to the seventh heaven. It was milk-white, had the wings of an eagle and a human face, with horse's cheeks. Every pace it took was equal to the farthest range of human sight. The name is Arabic for "the lightning."

Bordeaux, Henry (1870-1963). French novelist and historical biographer. A Catholic writer of the Savoy region, Bordeaux is best known for the novels The Will to Live (Les Roquevillard; 1906), Footprints Beneath the Snow (La Neige sur les pas; 1912), and The Gardens of Omar (Yamîl sous les cîdes; 1923).
When he was bishop of Valencia in 1492 and a cardinal the following year. In 1498, released from ecclesiastical duties, he traveled to France as papal legate and was made duke of Valentinois by a grateful Louis XII (thereafter he was known as Valentino, or il duca Valentino). After a marriage to the sister of the king of Navarre, Cesare returned to Italy and became standard bearer of the Church as well as its captain general. Using his military skill and cunning, he proceeded to consolidate the states of the church and to carve out a principality for himself among the conquered territories, incidentally winning the admiration of Machiavelli, who found his swift cruelty and treachery appropriate to the goal envisioned. The death of his father and the accession to the throne of Peter by the hostile Julius II brought his brief but meteoric career to a halt, for he was unable to rally his forces in the midst of a serious illness and soon found himself compelled to leave Italy under guard. In Spain, where he managed to free himself from prison, he finally met his end in a skirmish at the age of 31. Like the other Borgias, he left behind a legend filled with murders, including that of his own brothers, incest with his sister, insatiable greed, and unbridled cruelty. Modern scholars doubt the incest and many of the murders, but cannot find evidence that the other ingredients of his reputation are mere fiction.

Borgese, Giuseppe Antonio (1882-1952). Italian novelist, critic, poet, professor, and advocate of world unity. An outspoken opponent of fascism, he emigrated to the U.S. in 1931, where he became a citizen (1938) and taught at the University of Chicago. He wrote in excellent English his Goliath (1937), which describes the rise and consolidation of fascism and presents an intelligent analysis of authoritarian rule. He returned to Italy in 1948.

His best-known novel, Rubè (1921), is a fictionalized study of an idealistic generation's disillusionment and embitterment at the outbreak of World War I. Borgese also wrote the novel I Vieri e I Mori (1923). Collections of his short stories include La Città Sconosciuta (1924), Le Belle (1927), and il Solo Non E' Tramontato (1929). Collections of verse include La Canzone Pasiente (1910) and Poesie (1922). Noteworthy among his works written for the theater are L'Arciduca (1924) and Lazzaro (1925).

Borgia or de Borja. A Spanish family that rose to prominence in Italy during the Renaissance. It has since become a symbol of unbridled power, lust, and greed because of the legends it spawned. Its chief figures are Alfonso Borgia (1385-1458), who became Pope Calixtus III in 1455 and laid the foundation of his family's power and influence in Italy.

Rodrigo Borgia (1431-1503), who reigned as Pope Alexander VI from 1492. A nephew of Calixtus III and father of Cesare and Lucrezia, he exerted tremendous efforts in order to secure wealth and high station for his children.

Lucrezia Borgia (1450-1519), daughter of Rodrigo Borgia and sister of Cesare Borgia, one of the most famous (and infamous) women of history. A pawn in the designs of her father and brother, she was married three times. The first marriage was annulled; the second ended when her husband was murdered; the third, to Alfonso I of Eusr, duke of Ferrara, was a purely political match forced down the reluctant throats of the Estensi. Despite Lucrezia's exemplary life at Ferrara, gossip, scandal, rumors, and legends swirled about her and her family, so that she came down to posterity burdened with imputations of poisonings, incestuous relations with brother and father, illegitimate children, and generally whorish behavior. Thus Victor Hugo's play Lucrece Borgia (1833), and Donizetti's opera Lucrezia Borgia (1833) tell the story of her natural son Gennaro, who turned against his mother before a final recognition and reconciliation, but there is no basis for the tale in fact. Modern scholars discount much, but not all, of her evil reputation on the grounds that as a Borgia and a Spaniard, as well as an illegitimate daughter of a pope, she became the target for the hatred sturred by her family's power and political activity in Italy. The praise heaped upon her by the poets Rembo and Ariosto is now regarded as more than merely flattering.

Cesare Borgia (1476-1507), son of Rodrigo, brother of Lucrezia and, for many, the very embodiment of Renaissance individualism in its sinister form.
ber, 1812. The battle, which opened the way for Napoleon’s entry into Moscow, has been dealt with in Russian literature. The most famous description is by Tolstoi in War and Peace.

Borrow, George (1803–1881). English traveler, philologist, and writer, noted for his works on gypsies. He wrote several volumes about his experiences as an agent of the Bible Society in Spain and Russia, including The Gipsies in Spain (1841), The Bible in Spain, Lavengro, and The Romany Rye (1857). Part autobiography and part fantasy, these works are exuberant, racy, and vivid in their description of scenes and incidents of vagabond life. As a philologist, Borrow is best known for his Romany Lave-Lil (1874), a work on Romany, the gypsy language.

Bors, Sir. In Arthurian legend, one of the knights of the Round Table and uncle of Launcelot. In Malory’s Morte d’Arthur (c. 1469), he is one of the three knights to be granted sight of the Holy Grail, the others being Percival and Galahad, who wins the quest.

Boru, Brian. See Brian Boru.

Bos, Charles Du. See Charles Du Bos.

Boscán Almogávar, Juan (c. 1498–1542). Spanish poet. A native of Barcelona, Boscán served as a soldier in Italy and a tutor to the duke of Alba. In 1526 he met Andrea Navagiero, the Venetian ambassador, who persuaded him to write Castilian poetry employing Italian forms and meters. Because of his efforts, he is remembered for having popularized Italianate verse in Spain. In 1543, the year after his death, his widow published his collected poetry. Included in this work are 92 sonnets and 11 Canciones; a long Historia de Leandro y Hero in unrhymed hendecasyllables; two Epistolae, one of which is addressed to Diego Hurtado de Mendoza; and Octava Rima, an allegory based on Bembo’s Stanze. He also wrote an excellent prose translation (1534) of Castiglione’s Il Cortegiano (1528). See GARCILASO DE LA VEGA.

Bosch, Hieronymus or Jerome. Real name, Hieronymus van Aken (1450–1516). Flemish painter. Bosch, who was so named from his birthplace Hertogenbosch, Netherlands, painted religious pictures, scenes of heaven and hell, and allegories in which exquisite panoramas serve as background to the action of fantastic creatures and demons. His personal symbolism of sin and evil, dependent on contemporary literature, astrology, and popular beliefs, has led to contradictory interpretations, but the extreme delicacy, the refinement, and the richness of imagination displayed by his work is incontrovertible. After Bosch’s death, a large portion of his work, including the famous Gardens of Delight, was brought to Spain by Philip II.

Bosco, Henri (1888– ). French novelist of the Provence region. His stories, characterized by poetic fantasy, are filled with both sensual human warmth and a mystic Catholicism. Best known for Le Mas Théotime (The Farm Théotime, 1946, also translated as Farm in Provence), he has also written L’Anu coute (1937), Le Jardin Hyacinthe (1940), Monsieur Carré-Benoît in the Country (1947), Dark Bough (Un Rameau de la Nuit; 1950), and Barboche (1958).

Bose, Buddhaeva (1908– ). Indian poet and novelist in Bengali. Head of the comparative literature department of Jadavpur University, and visiting professor at New York University in 1959–1960, he has published over 100 volumes, one of the latest being a book of verse, Je Andhar Aitor Adhik. He founded and edits Kavita, a poetry quarterly in Bengali.

Bosinney, Philip. In John Galsworthy’s A Forsyte Saga, an architect, lover of Soames Forsyte’s wife, Irene.

Boss, The (1911). A play by Edward Sheldon. The hero, Michael Regan, a corrupt contractor and politician, is based on James (Fingy) Connors of Buffalo, N.Y. He ultimately falls in love with a wealthy girl who marries him to save her father.

Bossuet, Jacques Bénigne (1627–1704). French prelate. A Roman Catholic bishop, educated by the Jesuits, Bossuet tutored the dauphin 10 fruitless years; it was for this apathetic pupil that he wrote his most important work, the Discours sur l’Histoire universelle (Discourse on Universal History, 1681), a treatise on history from the Christian viewpoint. Turning to ecclesiastical duties, Bossuet preached sermons in which he united exposition of pure dogma with a simple, moving style. In his funeral orations for such personages as Anne of Austria and Marie Thérèse, wife of Louis XIV, he eloquently drew from the lives of the illustrious the “great and terrible lessons” which God teaches kings and men. Bossuet tirelessly defended the Catholic faith against Protestants and heretics; his Relation sur le Quétisme (Statement on Quetism, 1689) is a criticism of the quietest movement.

Boston (1928). A novel by Upton Sinclair. Its central character is a lady of the Boston Brahmins who suffers pangs of social conscience and goes to work in a factory, where she meets Sacco and Vanzetti. She observes at close range the events following their arrest, appeal, and execution. Seething with indignation, the book partly follows the transcript of the trial.

Boston Hymn (1863). A poem by Ralph Waldo Emerson. The poet celebrates freedom, denouncing kings and aristocrats. Boston Hymn is one of Emerson’s most fervent expressions.

Bostonians, The (1886). A novel by Henry James. James satirically portrays a strong-minded Boston feminist, Olive Chancellor, representing a new generation of “do-gooders,” who thinks she has found a kindred soul in a beautiful and impressionable girl, Verena Tarrant. The plot turns on the domination of one woman by another and on the struggle between Olive and Basil Ransom for Verena. The theme was suggested by Alphonse Daudet’s Evangélisse (1883), but James intended it to be at the same time “a tale very characteristic of our social conditions.” Bostonians attacked the novel angrily as a false portrayal of their city, and many American critics censured James for his lack of local feeling. It was one of the first American novels to deal more or less explicitly with Lesbianism.

Boston Massacre (March 5, 1770). A clash between the townspeople of Boston and British troops. Sent to Boston to protect the customs commissioners, the soldiers fired on a mob of men and boys, killing five civilians. Further violence was averted by the withdrawal of the troops to some islands in the harbor. The slain leader of the mob was the Negro hero, Crispus Attucks (1723?-1770).

Boston News-Letter. The first newspaper published in the American colonies to have a permanent life. John Campbell, postmaster at Boston, published the first issue on April 24, 1774. The paper ran until 1776.

Boston Public Occurrences. The first newspaper to be published in the American colonies, appearing in 1690. It lasted only one day because its publisher failed to get a government license.

Boston Tea Party (Dec. 16, 1773). The destruction in Boston Harbor of 342 chests of tea by citizens disguised as Indians and led by Samuel Adams. The colonists were protesting an act of Parliament designed to save the East India Co. from bankruptcy at the expense of the colonists.

Boswell, James (1740-1795). Scottish man of letters and biographer. He is best known as a diarist and as the biographer of Dr. Samuel Johnson. He was called to the Scottish bar in 1766 and practiced law for 20 years. He met Dr. Johnson in 1763 and visited him yearly on vacation until he moved there. In 1786 he settled permanently in London, entered the English bar, but met with little success there. His literary fame and success began with An Account of Corsica (1768), a defense of Corsica's abortive struggle for freedom against the republic of Genoa. In 1773 he accompanied Dr. Johnson on a journey to Scotland; his account of the trip, The Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides with Samuel Johnson, LL.D., appeared in 1775, by which time he was already working on The Life of Samuel Johnson, LL.D. Boswell was a man of great wit and charm; his personality was marked with fascinating turns of hypochondria and gaiety. He noted with amusement the fact that while he defended Corsican liberty abroad, he was opposed to further extensions of liberty at home. His papers are full of detailed plans for reform and admonitory addresses to himself such as, "Desperate. This day Easter rouse. Be Johnson. You've done no harm. Be retenu [restrained], &c. What am I?" Occasionally he even took his own advice. See Boswell Papers.

Boswell Papers. The papers of James Boswell. Long believed to have been lost or destroyed, they constitute one of the most important literary finds of the 20th century. The discoveries include letters and manuscripts of Dr. Samuel Johnson and Sir Joshua Reynolds, as well as the manuscripts of The Life of Samuel Johnson, LL.D., The Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides with Samuel Johnson, LL.D., and Boswell's private journals. The bulk of the material was acquired by Yale University in 1949 and is in the process of being published in two series. The annotated "research edition" will run to at least 30 volumes. A shorter "trade edition" is being published under the editorship of Frederick A. Pottle and others: Boswell's London Journal, 1762-1763 (1950), Boswell in Holland, 1763-1764 (1952), Boswell on the Grand Tour: Germany and Switzerland, 1764 (1953), Boswell on the Grand Tour: Italy, Corsica, and France, 1765-1766 (1955), Boswell in Search of a Wife, 1766-1769 (1956), Boswell for the Defense, 1769-1774 (1959), and Boswell's Journal of a Tour to the Hebrides with Samuel Johnson, 1773 (1962), which was originally published in 1785. The Reynolds manuscript, Portraits by Sir Joshua Reynolds, was published by Yale in 1952.

Bottero, Giovanni (1540-1617). Italian political theorist. He defended church and monarchy in la Ragion di Stato (Reason of State, 1589), an anti-Machiavellian treatise which summed up the political thought of the Counter Reformation. Its title became a popular phrase in future political discussion.

Both Your Houses (1933). A play by Maxwell Anderson. A young congressman compiles evidence to prove political corruption, but finds that the father of the woman he loves is among those involved. It was awarded a Pulitzer Prize.

bottle tree. The pidal tree or Ficus religiosa of India, related to the banyan tree. It was under one of these trees that Gautama attained enlightenment or perfect knowledge (Sansk. bodhi) and so became the Buddha.

Botticelli, Sandro. Real name, Alessandro di Mariano del Filipepi (1444-1510). Florentine painter. A pupil of Fra Lippo Lippi, he depicted both religious and mythological subjects in a style dependent on the decorative patterns of flowing draperies and exquisite detail, on the graceful elongation of idealized figures, and on the swaying beauty of linear design. The Primavera (c. 1477) and The Birth of Venus (c. 1485), painted for the Medici and now in the Uffizi Gallery in Florence, are his masterpieces in this style. He also painted portraits of the Medici family and did some illustrations of Dante's Divine Comedy. At Rome he was commissioned to plan and execute with other artists the frescoes for the walls of the Sistine Chapel. His own contribution was the Punishment of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram. He became a follower of the religious reformer Savonarola during the last years of the 15th century and turned towards the illustration of allegories in a harsher, barer style.

Bottom. A weaver and the leader of the bumbling tradesmen-players who perform the tragedy of Pyramus and Thisbe for Duke Theseus in Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream. He is a blustering, pompous, but lovable character who constantly misuses words and wants to exact every part in the play.

Bottom is finally persuaded to settle for the part of Pyramus in one of Shakespeare's funniest burlesques. Flute the bellows mender is chosen to play the heroine Thisbe, though he has "a beard coming." Snout the tinker, who is also given to bombard, takes the part of a most garrulous "Wall." Robin Starveling plays the Moon but "wanes" early, and Peter Quince, in bewildered fashion, essays the direction of the whole affair and speaks the prologue. Their combined efforts provide one of Shakespeare's greatest low comedy scenes.

Botwinke, Phyllis. Pen name of Mrs. Ernan Forbes-Dennis (1884-1965). English novelist. A prolific writer, she is best known for two novels. Private Worlds (1934) is heavily influenced by the author's study with Alfred Adler, a prominent psychologist. In 1937 she published The Mortal Storm, an anti-Nazi novel written to warn the West. Phyllis Bottome also made several lecture tours in the U.S. before World War II. Search for a Soul (1948) is the first volume of an autobiography; the second, Challenge (1952), covers the years from adolescence to the early thirties. Walls of Glass (1958) is a book of short stories.

Bottomley, Gordon (1874-1948). English poet and poetical dramatist. Associated with the Georgians, he dedicated himself to the revival of English verse drama; his works in this genre include The Crier by Night (1902), King Lear's Wife (1915), and Gracchus (1921). Among his poems are Chambers of Imagination (1907 and 1912).

Boucher, François (1703-1770). French painter. His works include scenes, pastorals, portraits, and tapestry cartoons in the rococo style. He was very successful as a decorative artist in spite of a tendency toward the florid and sensual. His fashionable elegance made him a favorite of Madame de Pompadour and won him the title of court painter in 1765.

Boucicault, Dion. Original name, Dionysius Lardner Boursiquot (1820-1890). Anglo-Irish playwright, theatrical manager, and actor. Born in Ireland, he was educated in London and achieved success there, while still a minor, with the production of his play London Assurance (1841). In 1853, his reputation already established, he journeyed to New York City and became a leading figure on the U.S. stage. Boucicault dramatized Mayne Reid's novel The Quadrille (1856), which he rechristened Two Octobroons, and he collaborated with Joseph Jefferson on the famous stage version of Rip Van Winkle, which began its long run in London in 1865. In his later years, he specialized more and more on plays with an Irish setting, among them Arrah-na-Pogue (1865) and The Shaughraun (1874). He has been described as "a director-playwright with a genius for theatrical effect."

Bouhours, Dominique. Known as le père Bouhours (1628-1702). French Jesuit and grammarian. In Doutes sur la langue française (Doubts concerning the French Language, 1674), Bouhours supported the reforms proposed by the Académie Française and aimed at raising the standard of the language. After the death of Claude Vaugelas, Bouhours became the leading grammarian of France.

Boulanger, Georges Ernest Jean Marie (1837-1891). French general. Boulanger, who enjoyed tremendous popular support, advocated militarism and revenge upon Germany after the Franco-Prussian War; the political movement Boulangism adopted his name and his aims. Elected deputy of the department of the Seine in 1889, Boulanger might have seized dictatorial powers; accused of conspiracy, he fled the country without awaiting trial. His popular cognomen, Man on Horseback, resulted from his habit of appearing mounted before Paris crowds.

Boulez, Pierre (1925- ). French composer. He is best known for Le Marteau sans Mâtre (1955), with a text by René Char.

Bouille, Pierre (1912- ). French novelist. Like The Bridge Over the River Kwai (1952), most of his books are set amid the difficulties of war, international intrigue, or wilderness outposts. The novels satirize either the British code of conduct or the often ignoble origins of so-called heroes: Not the Glory (1950), Face of a Hero (1953), The Test (L'Epreuve des hommes; 1957), S.O.P.H.I.A. (1959), and A Noble Profession (Un métier de seigneur; 1960).

Bourderby, Josiah. In Charles Dickens' Hard Times, a vulgar banker and mill owner described as a "bully of humility." He is always boasting of his old ignorance and poverty, of an infancy passed in an "egg-box" under the care of his drunken grandmother. Actually, his parents doted on him, educated him at considerable sacrifice, and he now pays them a monthly stipend to keep out of sight. Bourderby marries Louisa Gradgrind, but later she separates from him.

bounds, beating the. An old custom, still kept up in many English parishes, of going round the parish boundaries on Holy Thursday, or Ascension Day. The schoolchildren, accompanied by the clergy and parish officers, walked through their parish from end to end; the boys were switched with willow wands all along the lines of boundary, the idea being to teach them to know the bounds of their parish. Beating the bounds was called in Scotland riding the marches (bounds), and in England the day is sometimes called gang-day.

Bourbon. A French royal family whose line also formed ruling dynasties in Spain and Naples. The Bourbon kings of France were Henry IV, Louis XIII, XIV, XV, and XVI (1589-1793). It was said that the family "learned nothing and forgot nothing." Hence a Bourbon is anyone who fails to learn by experience. In the U.S., the name was given to the Democratic Party by its opponents.

Bourchier, John. 2nd Baron Berners (1467-1533). English translator, a high court official under Henry VIII. At the king's request he translated Froissart's Chronicles (2 vols., 1523, 1525), a classic of Tudor English prose, and the French romance Huon de Bordeaux. The Golden Boke of Marcus Aurelius and The Castell of Love were translated from French versions of Spanish works by Antonio de Guevara and Diego de San Pedro, and printed after his death.

Bourdaloque, Louis (1632-1704). French Jesuit priest and preacher. He delivered his first sermons in Paris in 1669, and till his death he was considered the greatest preacher of his era. Dealing chiefly with moral and practical questions, his sermons were as calm and rational as Bossuet's were emotional and stirring. Bourdaloue was a formidable opponent of the Jansenists.

bourgeois drama (drame bourgeois). A type of French play, developed from the comédie larmoyante, which deals seriously with middle-class family relationships, problems, and duties. Representative plays of this type were often sentimental, morally edifiing, melodramatic, mediocre, and humorless. The most famous of these plays are Diderot's Le fils natu-rel (1771) and Le Père de famille (1761); Sédaine's Le Philosophe sans le savoir (1765); and Beaumarcrais' La Mère coupable (1792). Diderot's theories about this type of drama were to have an influence on the social theater of Émilie Augier and Dumas fils.

Bourgeois Gentilhomme, Le (The Would-be
M. Jourdain, a bourgeois and a boor, is determined to make a gentleman of himself and to that end studies dancing, fencing, and philosophy, allows himself to be fleeced by the unscrupulous nobleman Dorante, and forbids his daughter's marriage to her beloved Cléonte or to any other commoner. The resourceful Cléonte disguises himself as the son of the Grand Turk and, babbling pseudo-Turkish, dupes M. Jour-dain into granting him the girl's hand. A delightful comedy in its own right, the play has survived in the repertory for almost three centuries and has often served as a pretext for lavish ballets and divertisse-ments.

Bourget, Paul Charles Joseph (1852-1935).
French novelist and critic. Bourget's work occupies an important place in the development of the psychological novel, probing with new care and accuracy the state of the inner man. Among his finest novels are Criale Enigme (1885), Le Disciple (1889), Cosmopolis (1893), and L'Etape (1903). His critical works, such as Etudes de Portraits (1888) and Pages de Doctrine et de Critique (1912), use a similar analytical method. The tone of the later work, however, changed, becoming increasingly moralistic and didactic in such novels as L'Émigré (1907) and Le Démon de midi (1914).

Bourgh, Lady Catherine de. An overbearing
"great lady" in Jane Austen's Pride and Prejudice.
An inveterate snob, she tries to prevent the marriage of Elizabeth and Darcy.

Bourjaily, Vance [Nye] (1922- ). American writer. His first novel, The End of My Life (1947), was the story of a young man's mental and moral disintegration during World War II. Bourjaily was also an editor of discovery, a paperback periodical of the 1950's devoted to new authors. He has written several other novels and The Unnatural Enemy (1963), a book about the ethics of hunting.

Bourke-White, Margaret (1906- ). American photographer. Known for her photographic studies of industry, social and economic conditions, and news personalities, she has worked in 34 countries, including the Soviet Union and the Arctic.
She was a United Nations' war correspondent in Korea for Life magazine (1952) and was also associated with Fortune and PM as editor and photographer. She described her successful struggle against Parkinson's disease in her autobiography, Portrait of Bourne, Randolph [Silliman] (1886-1918).

American literary critic and essayist. An early accicent made Bourne a helpless cripple; he succeeded, however, in studying at Columbia University and abroad. He held radical views on education and politics and was an outspoken pacifist during World War I. He wrote for several publications, including

Among his books are Youth and Life (1913), The Gary Schools (1916), Education and Living (1917), and Untimely Papers (1919). After Bourne's death, Van Wyck Brooks edited The History of a Literary Radical (1920; reprinted 1956).

Bourrienne, Louis Antoine Fauvelet de (1769-1834). French diplomat, friend and secretary (1797-1802) to Napoleon. He wrote Mémoires sur Napoleon (10 vols., 1829), a vivid but untrustworthy work.

Boutelleau, Jacques. See Jacques CHARDONNE.

Bovary, Emma. The heroine of Gustave Flaubert's novel Madame BOVARY.

bowdlerize. To expurgate a book. In 1818 an English physician, Thomas Bowdler (1754-1825), gave to the world a 10-volume edition of Shakespeare's works "in which nothing is added to the original text; but those words and expressions are omitted which cannot with propriety be read aloud in a family." Bowdler later treated Gibbon's Decline and Fall in the same way. Hence, we have the words bowdlerist, bowdlerizer, bowdlerism, bowdlerisation, etc.

Bowen, Catherine [Shober] Drinker (1897-). American biographer. An accomplished mu-cion who first wrote about music, Mrs. Bowen later turned to biography. Two early biographies were of musicians: Tchaikovsky (Beloved Friend, 1937) and Anton and Nicholas Rubinstein (Free Artist, 1939).
These were followed by Yankee from Olympus: Justice Holmes and His Family (1944), John Adams and the American Revolution (1950), The Lion and the Throne: The Life and Times of Sir Edward Cole (1957), The Adventures of a Biographer (1959), and Francis Bacon: The Tempter of a Man (1963).

Bowen, Elizabeth [Dorothea Cole] (1899-
She knew members of the Bloomsbury group and wrote in the tradition of sensibility, following Henry James and E. M. Forster. With satire, irony, and occasional melodrama she explores the relationships, emotional crises, and failures of feeling of her upper-middle-class characters. Her best-known novels are The Hotel, The House in Paris, The Death of the Heart, and The Heat of the Day. Among her other books are The Last September (1929), A World of Love (1955), A Time in Rome (1960), and The Little Girls (1964). Bowen's Court (1942) studies the history of the Bowen family house in Ireland and 10 generations of the family. Seven Winters & After-thoughts (1962) consists of two sections. The first, an autobiographical fragment, was first published in 1943; the second is a collection of critical essays.
Among her collections of short stories are The Cat Jumps (1934), Look at All Those Roses (1941), and The Demon Lover (1945).

Bowen, John (1924- ). English novelist.
Among his satirical novels are The Truth Will Not Help Us (1956) and After the Rain (1958).

Bowen, Marjorie. See G. M. V. LONG.

Bower of Bliss, See FABERS QUEEN THE.

American historian and diplomat. His historical works include Jefferson and Hamilton (1925) and The Tragic Era: The Revolution after Lincoln.
Brackenridge, Hugh Henry

(1929). In My Mission to Spain (1954), and My Life (1963), he described his experiences in politics and as ambassador to Spain and Chile.

Bowery. A district of New York City, now known as the last refuge for derelicts of all types. Bowery or bouwerij is the old Dutch word for farm; and Bowery Lane received its name because it led to the farm of Peter Stuyvesant, one of the Dutch governors of colonial days. It was for a long time the height of fashion to live on Bowery Lane, but with the growth of the city the character of the district underwent a radical change, becoming the site of dance halls and gambling resorts. The Bowery, a popular song by Charles H. Hoyt, gives an indication of the reputation of the district at the close of the 19th century.

Bowling, Lieutenant Tom. In Tobias Smollett's novel Roderick Random, the generous uncle of the hero. A man too frankly the product of the sea to be anything but ill at ease on land, he is careless of the niceties of life ashore.

Bowra, Sir [Cecil] Maurice (1898- ). English classical scholar and author of criticism on ancient and modern European literature. Among his books are Greek Lyric Poetry (1936), Heroic Poetry (1952), and Primitive Song (1962).

Bow Street. A street near Covent Garden in London which contains the principal police court. The early police were called "Bow Street runners."

Box and Cox (1847). A farce by John Maddison Morton (1811-1891). It has been called "the best farce for three characters in the English language." The principal characters are Box and Cox; the third is the thrifty landlady who rents the same rooms to Box and Cox (one of whom is employed by night, the other by day) in the vain hope that her two tenants will remain ignorant of each other's existence. Hence, there developed the term a Box and Cox arrangement.

Boxer. A member of a secret society in China. This society took a prominent part in the rising against foreigners in 1900, which was suppressed by joint European action. The Chinese name was gee ho chuan, signifying "righteousness, harmony and fists," and implying training as in athletics for the purpose of developing righteousness and harmony.

Boy Bishop. St. Nicholas of Bari. He was so called because from his cradle he manifested marvelous indications of piety. The custom of choosing a boy from the cathedral choir on his day (December 6th), as a mock bishop, is very ancient. The boy possessed episcopal honor for three weeks, and the rest of the choir were his prebendaries. If he died during his time of office he was buried in pontificalis. Probably the reference is to Jesus Christ sitting in the temple among the doctors while he was a boy. The custom was abolished in the reign of Henry VIII.

boycott. To refuse to have commerce with any sort with a person, group, or country for punitive or retaliatory reasons. The term is derived from the experience of Charles Cunningham Boycott (1832-1897). In his capacity of agent for a large landowner in County Mayo, Ireland, Captain Boycott was thus ostracized (even his servants left him) by the Irish agrarian insurgents of 1880.

Boyd, Nancy. A pen name of Edna St. Vincent Millay. It was used on the title page of a series of sketches, Distressing Dialogues (1924).

Boyle, Kay (1903- ). American short-story writer and novelist. Miss Boyle was an expatriate for many years, living in France. As early contributor to "the little magazines," she is known for the stylish polish of her prose and psychological interest in character. Her books include Wedding Day (1931), The White Horses of Vienna and Other Stories (1936), The Crazy Hunter (1940), American Citizen (a poem, 1944), 1939 (1948), His Human Majesty (1949), The Seagull on the Step (1955), and Generation without Farewell (1959).

Boyle, Robert (1627-1691). Irish-born English physicist and chemist. Boyle's Law states that, if the temperature remains constant, the volume of a gas varies inversely with the pressure.

Boz. The pen name of Charles Dickens. His Sketches by Boz (two series) appeared in 1836. "Boz, my signature in the Morning Chronicle," he tells us, "was the nickname of a pet child, a younger brother, whom I had dubbed Moses, in honor of [Goldsmith's] The Vicar of Wakefield, which, being pronounced Bozes, got shortened into Boz."

Brabançonne. The national anthem of Belgium, composed by Van Campenhout in the revolution of 1830. It is named from Brabant, of which Brussels is the chief city.

Brabantio. In Shakespeare's Othello, a Venetian senator and father of Desdemona. When he learns of Desdemona's secret marriage to Othello, he accuses the Moor of having won his daughter by witchcraft. Since Desdemona insists on remaining with her husband, he is forced to accept the situation, but warns Othello:

Look to her, Moor, if thou hast eyes to see;
She has deceiv'd her father, and may thee."

Bracciolini, Poggio (1380-1459). Italian Humanist. He served as chancellor of Florence and papal secretary during a varied career that saw him spend four years in England and many others in search of lost manuscripts of classical writers in continental monasteries. Among the early Italian Renaissance humanists, he wrote the best Latin letters and dialogues and was especially known for his De varietate fortunae (On the Vagaries of Fortune); a history of Florence; and a collection of jests and anecdotes, the Liber facietarium.

Bracebridge Hall, or The Humorists (1822). A collection of tales and sketches by Washington Irving. The book is a less successful sequel to The Sketch Book of Geoffrey Crayon, Gent.

Bracegirdle, Anne (1663?-1748). English actress. A protégée of Thomas Betterton, she was the intimate friend of Congreve and made her greatest successes as the heroines of his comedies, particularly as Millamant in The Way of the World. She retired in 1707, probably out of fear of being eclipsed by Mrs. Oldfield, a younger rival.

Brackenridge, Hugh Henry (1748-1816). American novelist and poet. One of the first writers to consider the native American scene valid material for literature, he collaborated with Philip Freneau on The Rising Glory of America (1772), a commencement ode at Princeton, and also wrote The Battle of Bunker Hill (1776) and The Death of General Montgomery (1777), blank-verse dramas in the 18th-century style. His most important work is Modern Chivalry, or The Adventures of Captain John Overall and Tragic O'Regan His Servant.

Bradamante or Bradamante. The warrior maiden of Carolingian legend, prominent in the Orlando poems of Boiardo and Ariosto (see ORLANDO FURIOSO) as the sister of Rinaldo and the beloved of Ruggiero. Known as the Virgin Knight, she wears white armor and a white plume; her spear magically unhorses any knight it touches. Her marriage to the Moor Ruggiero after his conversion, and the subsequent defeat of Rodomonte in single combat, form the subject of the last book of Ariosto's poem. The marriage of Bradamante and Ruggiero also enables Ariosto to flatter his noble patrons, the Este family, since it said to be the forerunner of the future house of Este. She is also the title character of a play by Robert Garnier.

Bradamante (1582). A play by Robert Garnier. It is derived from the Carolingian legend of Bradamante and from Ariosto's Orlando Furioso. Centering on a combat between the knight Roger and the warrior-maiden Bradamante, with emphasis upon Roger's dilemma in choosing between the claims of love and duty, the play was the first of the French tragœdies—an enormous popular genre in which romance and adventure led to a happy ending, the classical unities being freely disregarded.

Bradbury, Ray [Douglas] (1920— ). American writer of science fiction. Bradbury is noted for his unearthly, fantastic tales, many of which have appeared in short-story anthologies. Among his books are Dark Carnival (1947), The Martian Chronicles (1950), The Golden Apples of the Sun (1953), Dandelion Wine (1957), and A Medicine for Melancholy (1959).

Braddock, Edward (1695–1755). English general. He led an ill-fated expedition against Fort Duquesne during the French and Indian War. Washington was one of his junior officers.

Braddon, Mary Elizabeth. Pen name, Babington White (1837–1915). English novelist. She is best known for her first (and one of her weakest) books, the melodramatic Lady Audley's Secret (1862). She was the author of some 80 other novels of a high-flown, romantic character, which, though ephemeral, were not devoid of quality.

Bradford, Andrew (1686–1742). American printer and publisher. On Dec. 22, 1719, he brought out the first number of the American Weekly Mercury, the earliest newspaper in Pennsylvania. It continued for more than 26 years. From 1713 to 1723 Bradford was the only printer in Pennsylvania.

Bradford, Gamaliel (1863–1932). American biographer. He is best known for his "psychographs," interpretative portraits concerned with depicting the subjective life of literary and historical figures. Perhaps the best of these are contained in American Portraits (1914), discussing Mark Twain, Henry Adams, Henry James, and others; and Bare Souls (1915), portraying Keats, Lamb, Voltaire, and other writers. Damaged Souls (1923), analyzing P. T. Barnum, Aaron Burr, and others, was perhaps his most popular volume. His other books include Types of American Character (1895), Confederate Portraits (1914), Portraits of Women (1916), and Elizabethan Women (1936).

Bradford, Roark (1896–1948). American short-story writer and playwright. He is best known for the stories of Ol' Man Adam an' His Chill'en, John Henry (1951), dealing with the legendary Negro, was dramatized in 1940. Other books by Bradford include Ol' King David an' the Philistine Boys (1930), Let the Band Play Dixie (1934), a collection of short stories; and The Three-Headed Angel (1937).

Bradford, William (1590?–1657). English-born American statesman. A leader in the founding of Plymouth, he was governor of the colony from 1621 to his death, except for five years during which he refused election. He was one of the authors of an account of the settlement of Plymouth known as Mourt's Relation, and is best known for his History of Plimouth Plantation, a chronicle of events in the colony from 1620 to 1646, which was not discovered and published until 1856.

Bradlaugh, Charles (1833–1891). English social and political reformer. Like Mrs. Annie Besant, with whom he was associated, he was a free thinker. Although he was elected to Parliament for six years, he was not seated because as a free thinker he wished to affirm instead of swear on the Bible. Ultimately he won his point, and in 1886 was seated.

Bradley, Edward. Pen name, Cuthbert Bede (1827–1889). English clergyman and humorist. He wrote and illustrated Adventures of Mr. Verdant Green, an Oxford Freshman (1853–1856), Tales of College Life (1856), and other amusing, Dickensian accounts of Oxford life.

Bradstreet, Anne (1612–1672). English-born poet of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. By birth an aristocrat, she was the daughter of one governor of the colony and wife of another. Although her verse in general alternates between scenes of domestic affection and conventional professions of piety, it shows a sensitivity to beauty not usually associated with the Puritans. The Tenth Muse Lately Sprung Up in America is the only edition of her poems published in her lifetime and the first volume of original verse to be written in America. She also wrote Religious Experiences, an autobiographical sketch, and Meditations, Divine and Moral, a collection of aphorisms for the instruction of her son. John Berryman wrote a remarkable poem, Homage to Mistress Bradstreet (1956), in which the sexual tenderness of Anne Bradstreet is set against the sternly chaste background of Puritan New England.

Brady, Cyrus Townsend (1861–1920). American clergyman and author. He wrote many books for boys and historical stories, biographies of John Jones, Andrew Jackson, and others.

Brady, Mathew B. (1827–1896). American photographer. The first significant representative of his profession in the U.S., he is best known for his photographic record of the Civil War and for portraits of Abraham Lincoln and other outstanding personalities of the time.

Braes of Yarrow. See Yarrow.

braggadocio. A braggart; one valiant with his tongue but a great coward at heart. The character is from Spenser's Faerie Queene, in which Braggadocio appears as a kind of "Intemperance of the Tongue."

Bragi. In Scandinavian mythology, the son of Odin and Frigga, husband of Iduna, and god of poetry, eloquence, and song. He was represented as an old man with a long white beard. With Hermod, he received and welcomed to Valhalla all heroes who fell in battle.

Bragi’s apples. An instant cure for weariness, decay of power, ill temper, and failing health. The supply was inexhaustible; after one was eaten another took its place immediately.

Bragi’s cup. A cup which each new king had to drain and pledge by before he ascended the high seat of his fathers.

Bragi’s story. A lengthy but interesting tale.

Bragmaro, Janotus de. In Rabelais’ Gargantua and Pantagruel, a professor of theology sent by the Sorbonne to recover the bells of Notre Dame from Gargantua, who had taken them to hang around his mare’s neck. Although he has already decided to return the bells, Gargantua listens to the sophist’s harangue and is so amused by it that he sends him away amply rewarded.

Brahe, Tycho (1546–1601). Danish astronomer. He attempted to establish a system of astronomy midway between that of Copernicus and that of Ptolemy. The earth, he maintained, was motionless, and the five planets revolved around the sun, which circled the earth once every year. On Nov. 11, 1572, he discovered the celebrated "new star" in Cassiopeia, the first in a universe previously considered fixed for eternity, and his account of it, De Nova Stella, was published in 1573. He wrote a number of treatises on astronomy in Latin, the most important being Astronomiae Instauratae Progymnasmata (1602–1603), edited by Kepler, which dealt with the motions of the sun and the moon.

Brahma. In Hinduism, the Absolute, or God conceived as entirely personal. The theological abstraction was endowed with personality, and became the creator of the universe, the first in the divine Trimurti, or triad, of which the other partners were Vishnu the Preserver and Siva the Destroyer. The Brahmans claim Brahma as the founder of their religious system.

Brahma (1857). A poem by Ralph Waldo Emerson. In terms of Hindu philosophy, the poet expresses the pantheistic belief that God is everywhere and is found in the act of seeking.

Brahmin. A member of one of the four castes of Hinduism, representing the priestly and meditative order. See caste; Brahma.

Brahmo Samaj (Bengali, "the union of God"). A monotheistic offshoot of Hinduism. It was established in 1830 in Calcutta by Ram Mohun Roy (1774–1833), a wealthy and extraordinarily erudite Brahmin who wished to reform the ritualistic excesses of institutionalized Hinduism by founding an order free from idolatry and superstition. In 1844 the "church" was reorganized by Debendro Nath Tagore, and its reforming zeal and intellectual influence impressed sensitively the Hindu everywhere, but especially in Bengal. The Samaj provided a spearhead of morally excellent people whose example succeeded in convincing even orthodox Hindus of the necessity of reform; it also supplied an alert élite of educated Indians who did much for national autonomy, social reforms, and political independence. After 1947 its influence has gradually declined, partly because most of its ideas have been accepted and incorporated into the progressive sections of Hinduism.

Brahms, Johannes (1833–1897). German romantic composer. His works include four symphonies, concertos, chamber music, songs, and choral works, including the popular Ein deutsches Requiem (A German Requiem*, 1867). He was the most successful of the romantic composers in reconciling the conflicting claims of lyricism and classical form, partly because of his study and editing of 16th-, 17th-, and 18th-century music.

Braille, Louis (1809–1852). French teacher of the blind. In 1829, Braille, who was himself blind from the age of three, developed an alphabetic system of raised points that enabled the blind to read.

Brainworm. In Ben Jonson’s comedy Every Man in His Humour, the servant of Kno’well. A veritable Proteus in his metamorphoses, he appears first as Brainworm, then as Fitz-Sword, then as a reformed soldier whom Kno’well takes into his service, then as Justice Clement’s man, and lastly as valet to the courts of law. By his various transformations he is able to play upon the same group of characters, and his rascallies serve as the catalyst to the comedy.

Bramah, Ernest. See Ernest Bramah Smith.

Bramante. Real name, Donato d’Agnola (c. 1444–1514). Italian architect and painter. Born in Urbino, he worked mainly at Milan, serving Lodovico Sforza, and then at Rome for the papacy, where he was consulted on all important architectural undertakings. One of his paintings, Christ at the Column, is considered a masterpiece, but his great fame rests on his achievements as an architect. One of the finest examples of his work is the Tempietto, the severely classical, small-scale, and perfect circular temple erected at Rome in 1502 on the spot where Peter allegedly was crucified. In 1506, he began to execute his design for the new basilica that eventually became the modern St. Peter’s. Supposedly a rival of Michelangelo, he is thought to have secured for the latter the torturous and unwelcome task of decorating the ceiling of the Sistine Chapel.

Bramble, Matthew. The chief character in Tobias Smollett’s novel Humphrey Clinker. An irascible, eccentric, somewhat valetudinarian bachelor, he initiates the family expedition partly because of ill health and partly to distract the mind of his young niece Lydia Melford, whom he has fallen in love with a supposedly itinerant actor.

Tabatha Bramble. In the same book, the sister of Matthew Bramble, noted for her bad spelling. She is vain, priz, uncharitable, and in violent search for a husband. She contrives to marry Captain Lisma-hago, who is content to take her for the sake of her £4,000.

Bramine's Journal, The. A journal kept by Laurence Sterne and addressed to Mrs. Eliza Draper, whom he met in London. It is dated from April, 1767, to August, 1767, after her departure for India.

Brancati, Vittoriano (1907-1954). Italian novelist and essayist. He is noted for his satire of contemporary social manners and his ironic appraisals of fascist culture. His works include Don Giovanni in Sicilia (1942), a light-hearted spoofing of anachronistic Sicilian customs; Il Vecchio con gli Stivali (1945), a humorous treatment of the Italian bour-goisie's belief in fascist dreams of national glory; and Il Bell'Antonio and Paolo Il Caldo, both political satires. Brancati was essentially a realist of the school of De Roberto. He freely employed dialect in his fiction and, as a rule, used his native Catania as the setting of his novels.

Branch, Anna Hempstead (1875-1937). American poet. Noted for her lyricism, she wrote Nimrod, a narrative poem based on the biblical story. The Monk in the Kitchen (1905) is perhaps her best-known poem. Among her works are The Heart of the Road, and Other Poems (1901), The Shoes that Danced (1905), and Sonnets from a Lock Box and Other Poems (1929).

Brancusi, Constantin (1876-1957). Romanian sculptor, settled in France in 1904. He is known for his simplified abstracted forms, executed in wood, steel, stone, and bronze, and finished to a great smoothness or polish. His best-known work in the U.S. is Bird in Space (1919), a vertical swelling shaft of highly polished metal.

Brand (1866). A verse drama by Henrik Ibsen.
The first of Ibsen's major plays, Brand deals with a passionate and uncompromising idealist, a minister who sacrifices the health and finally the life of his child and his wife rather than violate his stern sense of duty to his parish. Finally, Brand tries to lead his parishioners to the greater Church of Life in the mountains, but the people fall behind and abandon him. In the symbolic closing scene on the mountain Ice Church, Brand, about to be crushed by an avalanche, calls out to God. He is answered by a voice saying "God is Love."

Brand, Max. Pen name of Frederick Faust (1892-1944). American writer. Although he published two books of verse under his own name, he is best known for his Max Brand books, which are old-style Westerns done with great storytelling power. The Untamed (1918) is the first of this lengthy series, while Destry Rides Again (1930) is perhaps the most famous. He also wrote the books and motion pictures about Dr. Kildare.

Brandon or Brendan, St. A semilegendary Irish saint. He is said to have been buried at Clonfert (at the age of about 94), in 577, where he was abbot over 3,000 monks. He is best known because of the very popular medieval story of his voyage in search of the Earthly Paradise, which was supposed to be situated on an island in mid-Atlantic. The voyage lasted for seven years, and the story is crowded with marvelous incidents, the very birds and beasts they encountered being Christians and observing the facts and festivals of the Church. As late as 1755 St.
Brandon's Island, or the Island of San Borand, was set down in geographical charts as west of the Canary group.

Brandes, Louis D[embtz] (1856-1941). American jurist. Born in Louisville, Ky., Brandes practiced law in Boston, becoming known as the "people's attorney" because of his opposition to vested interests and monopolies in every form. He was appointed to the U.S. Supreme Court by President Wilson in 1916, his nomination being confirmed only after a bitter struggle. Often joining Holmes and later Cardozo in their dissents, Brandes served on the court until his retirement in 1939. He wrote several books, including Business, A Profession (1914) and The Curse of Bigness (1934). Brandes University, founded in 1948 in Waltham, Mass., is named after him.

Danish literary critic and scholar. Brandes exercised great influence upon Scandinavian thought and literature, serving as leader of Det moderne gennembruch ("the modern breaking-through"). In 1871 he began to formulate the principles of a new realism and naturalism, condemning abstract idealism and fantasy in literature. Brandes was the author of several critical biographies, including a study of Henrik Ibsen, who shared his literary goals, in his volume of Critical Studies (1899). His other studies include Søren Kierkegaard (1877), Esajas Tegnérr (1878), Wolfgang Goethe (1914-1915), and François de Voltaire (1916-1917). After spending several years in Germany, Brandes came under the influence of Nietz-sche's philosophy and disavowed democracy for an aristocratic radicalism.

Brandimarte. In the Orlando poems (see Orlando Furioso) of Boiardo and Ariosto, the son of king Monodante, brother of Oriigile, and the trusted companion of Orlando, who had baptized him. He is followed about continually by his faithful wife Fiordiligii until Gradasso kills him.

Brandt, Margaret. In Charles Reade's historical novel The Cloister and the Hearth, the heroine and mother of Erasmis. Peter Brandt, her father, is also a prominent character.

Brangwen, Ursula. The heroine of 2 novels by D. H. Lawrence. In The Rainbow, her experience as a teacher and rebel from her environment reflects Lawrence's own; in the sequel, Women in Love, she is based more on Lawrence's wife, Frieda Lawrence.

Brant, Joseph. Indian name, Thayendanegea (1742-1807). Mohawk Indian chief. During the American Revolution, he commanded the Indian forces cooperating with the British and ravaged the Mohawk Valley of New York. An earnest Christian, he also translated the Book of Common Prayer into the Mohawk tongue.

Brant, Sebastian (1458-1521). German didactic poet and satirist. Most famous for The Ship of Fools, Brant was a highly conservative, even hide-bound thinker. Although he is often classified as a humanist, he was very much afraid of change in any form, and cannot properly be so called.

Brantôme, Seigneur de Pierre le Bourdeilles (1540?1614). French soldier, adventurer, and me-orialist. His two chronicles, Vies des hommes hi-

Gen Harragonien.

Aken dcredit vis ad alios & descendunt vis ad abyros: aia eor in malis tabeepbat Turbati sunt & mort fuit cebrius: & omnis fapiencia eor deus at sa.

Psalmo Cvi.

Title page of Sebastian Brant's Ship of Fools (1494).

Lutres et grands capitaines français and Vies des dames galantes (1665-1666), reveal him as credulous and uncritical, impressed by spectacle and fascinated by trivialities and gossip, but they survive as an interesting portrait of French-Renaissance manners.

Braque, Georges (1882-1963). French painter, associated with Pablo Picasso in the development of Cubism. His subjects were chiefly still lifes. In 1952 he began a series of designs of birds which bring to a culmination of simplicity his elegance of line and precision of color.

Brass, Sampson. In Charles Dickens' Old Curiosity Shop, a knavish, servile attorney, affecting great sympathy with his clients but in reality fleecing them without mercy.

Brave New World (1932). A satirical novel by Aldous Huxley. Set in the year 632 AF (After Ford), it is a grim picture of the world which Huxley thinks our scientific and social developments have already begun to create. Human embryos are developed in bottles and conditioned to collectivism and passivity. A "savage" is found in New Mexico and imported as an experiment. He has educated himself by reading Shakespeare and believes in spirituality and moral choice; in the new world he soon goes berserk and kills himself. The title, which is highly ironic, is from Shakespeare's The Tempest.

brazen head. A theme of many legends. The legend of the wonderful head of brass that could speak is common in early romances, and is of Eastern origin. In Valentine and Orson, a gigantic head kept in the castle of the giant Ferragus of Portugal tells those who consult it whatever they require to know, past, present, or to come. The most famous brazen head in English legend is that fabled to have been made by Roger Bacon. It was said if Bacon heard it speak he would succeed in his projects; if not, he would fail. His familiar, Miles, was set to watch, and while Bacon slept the head spoke thrice. "Time is," said half an hour later it said, "Time was." In another half-hour it said, "Time past," fell down, and was broken to atoms. References to Bacon's brazen head are frequent in literature.

Bread and Wine (Pane e Vino; 1937; revised, 1962). A novel by Ignazio Silone. The hero, Pietro Spina, returns to his native Abruzzi after 15 years of exile to continue his antifascist agitation. As he travels through the country, disguised as a priest, he sees the inroads made upon the Italian character by Mussolini's rule. Finding that the underground movement is in chaos and doubting the validity of his old revolutionary slogans, he eventually flees to avoid certain arrest. Other important characters include the devout Cristina and Don Benedetto, a priest who is an uncompromising opponent of the regime and who is poisoned by the sacramental wine he drinks as he celebrates mass. In the 1962 version of the novel, the Italian title was changed to Vino e Pane.

Break of Noon (Partage de Midi; 1906). A poetic drama, revised in 1948, by Paul Claudel. Mesa, struggling with his devotion to God, suddenly falls in love with Yse, mysterious and uncritical, who of his friend De Ciz, and acknowledges her as the necessary complement of his own being. However, when she senses that Mesa still secretly feels their human love is a barrier to spiritual love, Yse abandons him and her De Ciz children and takes Mesa's child to rejoin her former lover Amalric. When Mesa comes to woo her back, their child is dead, and they recognize the necessary impossibility of their earthly happiness.

Brecht, Bertolt (1898-1956). German dramatist. Despite his explicit commitment to Marxist dogma, his plays have been immensely popular in the West. His early plays, such as Drums in the Night (1922), Im Dickicht der Stâde (In the Jungle of Cities, 1924), and Mann ist Mann (Man Is Man, 1927), are closely related in technique to the movement of Expressionism, and though they are permeated by the cynical and critical irony toward modern society that appears in all his works, they do not yet systematically advocate any political doctrine. Brecht's decisive turn to Marxism, however, came shortly afterward in The Threepenny Opera and RISE AND FALL OF THE TOWN MAHAGONNY. It is also in these plays that his mature technique is first fully exemplified, the technique of the epic theater that was to dominate his subsequent production. In 1933, Brecht was driven from Germany by the rise of Nazism, and began a 14-year exile in Denmark, Sweden, Finland and, from 1941 to 1947, in the U.S. The plays written during this exile include direct attacks on Nazism, such as The Private Life of the Master Race and Schweyk im Zweiten Weltkrieg (Schweyk in the Second World War, written 1944–1945); plays with historical settings such as Life of Galileo and Mother Courage and Her Children; and two Chinese parables, The Good Woman of Sezuan and The Caucasian Chalk Circle. In 1947, Brecht returned to Zürich and went from there to East Berlin in 1948 where he founded his own company; his works of the last period consist almost entirely of adaptations.

Breck, Alan. In Robert Louis Stevenson’s novel Kidnapped, a high-spirited, courageous, and slightly unscrupulous supporter of the Stuart claimant to the throne. After being shipwrecked, he and David Balfour, the young hero of the book, travel through Scotland. His full name is Alan Breck Stewart (or Stuart) and he is very proud to bear the name of a king. He appears in Stevenson’s Catriona (1893) also.

Bregendahl, Marie (1867–1940). Danish novelist. A regionalist writer, she described peasant life in her native Jutland with quiet skill and sober sympathy. Her most important works are En Dødsnat (A Night of Death, 1912) and Spædsfølken (7 vols., 1914–1923).

Breitmann, Hans. The hero of a series of ballads written in German-American dialect; also, the pen name of his creator, Charles Godfrey Leland (1824–1903). The first and most famous of the ballads is Hans Breitmann’s Party, published in Graham’s Magazine (May, 1837), of which Leland was then editor. Leland’s published collections about Breitmann, a jovial Pennsylvania Dutchman, include The Breitmann Ballads (1871), Hans Breitmann in Tyrol (1890), and Hans Breitmann’s Ballads (1914).

Brennus. One of the kings of Geoffrey of Monmouth’s History of the Kings of Britain. He struggled with Belinus for the kingdom, but ultimately made a treaty with him.

Brentano, Clemens Maria (1778–1842). German romantic poet. He was the brother of Bettina von Arnim. In his lyrics, he had a genius for capturing the folk spirit, and it was he who invented the so-called folk legend of the Lorelei, in a poem that appeared in his novel Gödvi (1800–1801). But he was also capable of highly sophisticated poems, especially on religious subjects, as in his unfinished Romanzen vom Rosenkranz (Romances of the Rosary, written 1810 ff.). With his friend (and later brother-in-law) Achim von Arnim, he edited Das Knaben Wunderhorn, a collection of folk songs; and his private collection of folk books (see Volksbuch) provided the material for Görrs’ treatise on the subject. Brentano’s short narrative works include the novella Geschichte vom braven Kasperl und dem schönen Annerl (Story of Upright Casper and Lovely Annie, written 1816, pub. 1838), and numerous Märchen. See German Romanticism.

Brest-Litovsk, Treaty of (1918). A treaty between Germany and the Russian Bolshevik government, signed in the Polish city of the same name. Russia withdrew from World War I and ceded vast territories in eastern Europe.

Brethren of the Common Life. A group of mystics in Germany and the Low Countries during the 14th and 15th centuries. It was founded by Gerard Groote (1340–1389), a Dutchman. The Brethren lived together communally and through their schools assisted greatly in establishing reforms in education and religion. Erasmus and Martin Luther were at one time their pupils, and the Imitation of Christ was one of the products of the influence of the sect’s brand of mysticism.

Breton, André (1896–1966). French poet, novelist, and essayist. He was greatly influenced by his reading of Arthur Rimbaud’s poetry, his studies of Freudian theory, and his own work in psychiatry. His friendship (1916–1919) with Jacques Valsan (1895–1919), who committed suicide as a deliberate mark of his contempt for modern society, also made a deep impression. In 1919 Breton met Tristan Tzara and led a group of friends into the Dada movement. By 1921, however, he had rejected Tzara’s nihilistic use of the irrational as a mockery of reason in favor of a serious research into the subconscious as the autonomous source of truth and beauty. The results of his experiments in automatic writing were published as Les Champs magnétiques (1921), written with Philippe Soupault.

In 1924 he founded surrealism; his three manifestoes (1924, 1930, 1942) are the most important theoretical statements of the movement. Other critical essays in its defense include Les Pas perdus (1924), Légèrité Défense (1925), Le Surréalisme et la peinture (1928), and What Is Surrealism? (1934). A growing interest in the study of dreams and psychic states led to the novel Nadja and Les Vases communicants (1932), a study of dreams. Breton joined the Communist Party in 1927, but left it in 1935 after trying unsuccessfully to identify surrealism as the artistic representative of social revolution.

His poems exalting love include those in Le Revolver à Cheux Blancs (1932), L’Amour Fou (1937), Fata Morgana (1941), and Arcane 17 (1947).

Breton, Nicholas (1845–1866). English poet, author of numerous prose pamphlets, moral, religious, and lyric verse. He is known primarily as a pastoral poet, and the best examples of his verse can be found in England’s Helicon (1600). He is represented in Breton’s Bowr of Delights (1591) and The Arbor of Amorous Desires (1597); though both of these books were assigned to him by the printers, the work of other poets is also included.

Bréton de los Herreros, Manuel (1796–1873). Spanish playwright. The clarity of the work of this prominent social satirist makes up for the lack of bitter irony in his comedies of middle-class life. His classic, Marcela o ¿cuál de las tres? (Marcela, 1831), deals with the problems of a widow beset by three suitors: one arrogant, another loud, and the third melancholy. Among his best-known dramas are La escuela del matrimonio, A Madrid me vuelvo, and Muérete y vén.

Breton lais or lays. Rhymed stories popular in England in the 14th century. They usually deal with Celtic themes and often use Arthurian material. The origin of this literary form is unknown, but it was perfected in the 12th century by Marie de France who wrote, among others, the lai Sir Launfal.

The Franklin in Chaucer's The Canterbury Tales (1387) speaks of the old Bretons who rhymed these tales and sang them to the accompaniment of a musical instrument. Sir Orfeo is one of the best-known English Breton lais.

Breton's Bower of Delights. See Nicholas Brett.

Brett, Dorothy (1891- ). English painter and friend of D. H. Lawrence. She is the author of Lawrence and Brett (1933), a book of reminiscences.

Brian Boru, Boróimhe or Borunha (926-1014). Irish king (after 1002) and national hero. His victory over the Danes at Clontarf (1014) put a permanent end to their sovereignty over Ireland, but he was murdered in his tent after the battle.

Briareus (Briareos). In classic legend, a huge monster with 100 arms and 50 heads. With his brothers, Cottus and Gyges, he conquered the Titans by hurling at them 300 rocks at once. Thetis called him to the aid of Zeus when Hera, Athene, and Poseidon rebelled against him. He was also called Aigeon (Aigaion).

Bricklayer, the. A nickname for Ben Jonson, from his stepfather's trade.

Bricks Without Straw (1880). A novel by Albion W. Tourgée. This book, a sequel to the earlier A Fool's Errand, is one of the earliest to deal with racial problems in the postwar South. The novel has as its hero a New England schoolteacher in the South who sympathizes with the Negroes.

Bride Comes to Yellow Sky, The (1896). A short story by Stephen Crane. Published in the collection The Open Boat and Other Tales of Adventure, it deals with the conflict between Sheriff Jack Potter and Scratchy Wilson, one of the old frontier gunfighters. Potter brings his new wife to Yellow Sky and encounters Scratchy, who is looking for a fight. When Scratchy realizes that Potter has no gun, he realizes that the old days are gone forever.

Bridehead, Sue. See Jude the Obscure.

Bride of Abydos, The (1813). A poem by Lord Byron. The heroine is Zuleika, daughter of Giaffar, pasha of Abydos. She is the plighted bride of Selim; but Giaffar shoots him, and Zuleika dies of a broken heart.

Bride of Lammermoor, The (1819). A historical novel by Sir Walter Scott, set in the reign of William III. The titular heroine is Lucy Ashton, daughter of Sir William Ashton, an unscrupulous man who has made great gains in fortune and position by bringing the estate of Lord Ravenswood to ruin through legal trickery. Though he has sworn vengeance, Ravenwood's son Edgar falls in love with Lucy; the lovers plight their troth at the Mermaid's Fountain, but while Edgar is away, Lucy is forced by her parents to marry the unpleasant, dissolve Frank Hayston, laird of Bucklaw. Deranged with grief, Lucy stabs and critically wounds her bridegroom; she dies in convulsions the following day. Edgar, hearing of the marriage and taking it as Lucy's rejection of him, is on his way to a duel with her brother when he is lost in the quicksand of Kelpies Flow, fulfilling an ancient prophecy. The novel is based on historical incident.

In Donizetti's opera Lucia di Lammermoor (1835), which is based on the novel, Bucklaw dies of the wound inflicted by his bride and Edgar, heartbroken at Lucy's death, stabs himself. See Caleb Baldervo.

Bride of the Sea. Venice. The city was so called from the ancient ceremony of the wedding of the sea by the doge, who threw a ring into the Adriatic, saying, "We wed thee, O sea, in token of perpetual domination." This took place each year on Ascension Day, and was enjoined upon the Venetians in 1177 by Pope Alexander III, who gave the doge a gold ring from his own finger in token of the victory achieved by the Venetian fleet at Istria over Frederick Barbarossa, in defense of the pope's quarrel. See Bucintaur.

Brideshead Revisited (1945). A novel by Evelyn Waugh, subtitled The Sacred and Profane Memories of Captain Charles Ryder. As an undergraduate Ryder met Sebastian Marchmain and later visited him and his family at Brideshead, their home. Billeted there during World War II, Ryder recalls the members of this family and their individual responses to their Catholic faith.

Bridewell. An ancient London prison in Bridge Street, Blackfriars. It was built as a hospital on the site of a former royal palace over a holy well of medicinal water, called St. Bride's (Bridget's) Well.

Bridge, The (1930). A long poem by Hart Crane. In this, his most important work, Crane attempted to synthesize a picture of modern America by the use of symbols from its past and present, centered about Brooklyn Bridge as a chief symbol of man's aspiration and achievement. Written in several sections, the poem makes use of such figures from the American past as Columbus, Whitman, Poe, and Emily Dickinson; they themselves function as bridges, connecting and fusing the disparate elements of American life into an organic whole. Not only past and present, but time and eternity are fused, the latter bridge being furnished by the Mississippi River.

Bridge of San Luis Rey, The (1927). A novel by Thornton Wilder. The winner of a Pulitzer Prize, it tells of the collapse of a bridge in Peru in 1714. Five travelers on the bridge are killed, and the accident is witnessed by Brother Juniper, a Franciscan friar. The priest wonders whether it really was an accident or a deliberate plan of the Almighty, and it is his subsequent investigation into the lives of the five people that forms the core of the book.

Bridge of Sighs. An enclosed bridge in Venice, connecting the Doge's Palace with the state prisons. According to popular tradition, prisoners were conveyed across this bridge from the judgment hall to the place of execution.

Bridge on the Drina, The (Na Drini Cúprija; 1945). A chronicle by Ivo Andrić. This long narrative, which its author appropriately called a chronicle, relates in a series of episodes the history of a bridge near the Bosnian town of Vijegrad. That history covers three and a half centuries, through much of which the Bosnians lived under Turkish overlords. This is probably the most important of André's several novels about his native Bosnia.
Bridge Over the River Kwai, The

Bridge Over the River Kwai, The. See Pierre Boule.

Bridge, Perilous. See Faerie Queene, The.

Bridges, Robert (1844-1930). English poet, appointed British poet laureate in 1913. His poetry is classical in spirit and in diction (he advocated a return to the diction of the 18th century and was a co-founder of the Society for Pure English). His prosody is mildly experimental. He did important work in metrics, including a study of Milton's Prosody (1921). His Poetical Works was published in 1914, and The Testament of Beauty in 1929. A Passer-by is his finest lyric. He also wrote plays, chiefly on classical subjects, and critical essays. Bridges was a friend of Gerard Manley Hopkins, and published his poetry in 1918.

Bridie, James. Pen name of Osborne Henry Mavor (1888-1951). Scottish playwright. His plays are famous for their wit and fancy. The Anatomist (1930) and The Stepping Clergyman (1933) are dramatizations of well-known criminal cases. Storm in a Teacup (1936) is set in Scotland. One Way of Living (1939) is autobiographical.

Bridlegoose, Judge. An anglicism for Juge Bridoe, the judge in Rabelais' Gargantua and Pantagruel, who decides the cases brought before him by a throw of dice. He explains to Pantagruel that he had never made a mistake until his eyesight began to fail. The dice-throwing and Bridlegoose's insistence that volumes of documents are necessary to allow a case to mature properly are a lively satire on legal procedures.

Beaumarchais in the Marriage of Figaro (1784) named his judge "Bridoisen," but his magistrate, a slave to legal procedure, bears little resemblance to Rabelais' character.

Bridiole, Judge. See Judge Bridlegoose.

Bridois, See Judge Bridlegoose.

Brieux, Eugène (1858-1932). French dramatist. Brieux's early works—Ménages d'Artistes (1890) and Blanchette (1892)—were first produced at Antoine's Théâtre de Libre. In Les Trois Filles de M. Dupont (1899), Brieux, at heart a moral and social reformer, leveled violent criticism at parents who seek to manipulate the lives of their children. La Robe Rouge (1900) demands that criminal law be reformed: La Femme Seule (1913) staunchly defends women's rights. Although Brieux did not possess the depth necessary for excellent drama of ideas, he did possess a large fund of sympathy and a vigorous sense of protest.

Briffault, Robert Stephen (1876-1948). English anthropologist. He was the author of the once widely read study The Mothers (1927).

Briggs, Malte Laurids. See Notebooks of Malte Laurids Brigge, The.

Bright, John (1811-1889). English statesman and orator. A liberal, he was strongly opposed to the Corn Laws and the Crimean War and favored the North in the U.S. Civil War. He is the author of Speeches on Parliamentary Reform (1867), Speeches on Questions of Public Policy (1869), and Speeches on Public Affairs (1869).

Brighton Rock (1938). A novel by Graham Greene. Set in an English seaside resort, it is the story of Pinkie, a teen-age criminal gang leader and murderer. The novel has elements of a detective story, psychiatric case history, and essay on moral theology.

Brillat-Savarin, Anthelme (1755-1826). French politician and gourmet. His Physiologie du goût (1825) is a famous work on gastronomy.

Brimming Cup, The (1921). A novel by Dorothy Canfield Fisher. In this story set in Vermont, Mrs. Fisher tells how a man of the world, mature and selfish, seeks to win Marise Crittendon from her husband, Neale. The latter is too honorable to seek to hold her, but events convince her that she needs his integrity more than Vincent Marsh's passion. Rough-Hewn (1922) tells of Neale and Marise earlier in their lives.

Brinnin, John Malcolm (1916— ). American poet and editor. He was the editor of various avant-garde periodicals and later published several volumes of poetry, including The Garden Is Political (1942), The Lincoln Lyrics (1942), and The Sorrows of Cold Stone (1951). After inviting Dylan Thomas to give readings in the U.S., he wrote Dylan Thomas in America (1955) and edited A Casebook on Dylan Thomas (1960).

Brinton, [Clarence] Crane (1898— ). American historian, biographer, and educator. A teacher at Harvard since 1923, Brinton has written numerous books, among them The Political Ideas of the English Romanticists (1926), The Jacobins (1930), Nietzsche (1941), and The Shaping of the Modern Mind (1953).

Briscoe, Lily. A painter, a leading character in Virginia Woolf's novel To the Lighthouse.

Briséida. The beloved of Troilus in the Roman de Troie of BENOÎT DE SAINTE-MAURE. In later versions of the story she is known as Crisida or Cressida.

Briséis. The daughter of Brîseis. She was the subject of the quarrel in the Iliad between Agamemnon and Achilles; when the former robbed Achilles of her, Achilles refused any longer to go to battle, and the Greeks lost ground daily.

Brissot [de Warville], Jacques Pierre (1754-1793). French revolutionary and journalist. His antimonarchical pamphlets, inspired by the ideas of Rousseau, caused him to be exiled. He traveled in the Netherlands, Switzerland, England, and the U.S. Returning to France in 1789, he became editor of the newspaper Le Patriote français until his death; he was a leader of the Girondists, and the paper became their organ. Brissot's humanitarian interests led him to advocate penal reform in France, and later to found the society of the "Amis des noirs" in 1788, dedicated to the abolition of slavery. An admurer of the U.S., he founded the Gallo-American Society; he wrote Considerations on the Relative Situation of France and the United States (1788, in English) and The Commerce of America with Europe (1794, in English). When the Jacobins overthrew the Girondists, Brissot was guillotined.

Bristol Boy, the. An epithet for the poet Thomas Chatterton. He is so called because his chief poetic works deal with the imagined 15th century antiquities of the port city of Bristol.

Britannia. A personification of the British Empire. The first known representation of Britannia as a female figure sitting on a globe, leaning with one arm on a shield, and grasping a spear in the other hand, is on a Roman coin of Antoninus Pius, who died A.D. 161. The figure reappeared on the English copper coin in the reign of Charles II, 1665.

Britannicus. Original name, Claudius Tiberius Germanicus (c. A.D. 41-55). Son of Messalina and the emperor Claudius, heir apparent to the throne. Through the scheming of his stepmother, Agrippina, he was denied succession to the throne. It is believed that Nero, his half brother, poisoned Britannicus at a banquet. The name Britannicus was given to him by the senate because the conquest of Britain took place at about the time of his birth. He is the subject of a tragedy (1669) by Racine.

Britannicus (1669). A tragedy by Jean Racine. The material of the play is derived from Tacitus. Smitten with Junia, the beloved of his half brother Britannicus, the emperor Nero attempts to win her; unsuccessful, he causes Britannicus to be arrested and poison him. Junia escapes from the palace and becomes a Vestal Virgin. The play abounds in political subplot and marks Racine's first challenge of Corneille on the older playwright's homeground: political drama.

British Broadcasting Corporation. Called the BBC. The government-owned radio and television broadcasting body in Great Britain. The three radio networks are called the Light Programme, the Home Service, and the Third Programme. It is the last that is famous for its extremely erudite programming. The BBC was established in 1927.

Brittomart. In Spenser's Faerie Queene (Books III and IX), a lady knight, the personification of chastity.

Brittomartis. A Cretan goddess, later an attendant of Artemis. Loved by King Minos, she hid from him for nine months and finally flung herself into the sea to escape him. She was saved by being caught in, or hiding under, fishermen's nets.

Brittain, Vera. Pen name of Mrs. George Edward Gordon Catlin (1896- ). English essayist and novelist. She wrote Testament of Youth (1933), an autobiography, and Testament of Friendship (1940), a memorial to her friend Winifred Holtby. Testament of Experience (1957) is a companion piece to her earlier autobiography and covers the years from 1925 to 1950.

broadside ballads. Popular songs and poems, written in doggerel. They were printed in black letter on a single sheet of paper, decorated with woodcuts, with the name of the tune to which the ballads in question were to be sung, and sold for a penny or two on the street corners of England in the late 16th and early 17th centuries. Their subject matter was taken from political events, battles or wars, murders, strange happenings, executions, freakish births, domestic quarrels, and the like, and also included moral exhortations and religious propaganda.

Broadway. The main street of New York City, extending from near the lower tip of Manhattan northward through the length of Manhattan and the Bronx to beyond the city line. Though famous in its own right, the street is mainly known today for its association with the theater: since nearly all commercial drama originates in New York City, the term Broadway is practically synonymous with the American theater. Most of the major theaters in the city are not more than a block or two from Broadway. In a more general sense, Broadway denotes the gay night life of the American metropolis in a quasi-legendary conception.

In the 1950's, the term Off Broadway became prominent in referring to the growing number of small theaters in other parts of Manhattan which offered theater fare considered commercially unprofitable for Broadway. These theaters were often tiny, grubby, and impoverished, but some of them gave fine performances of experimental plays or classical revivals that could not otherwise have been seen. In time, the Off-Broadway theater became highly popular, and, with rising costs, was beset by many of the financial ills of Broadway. However, it also attracted first-class actors and even some outstanding playwrights, such as Tennessee Williams, who consented to have new works performed off Broadway.

Brobdinag. The country of giants 12 times the size of man in Jonathan Swift's satire Gulliver's Travels. Told by Gulliver of European customs and institutions, the king observes, "I cannot but conclude the bulk of your natives to be the most pernicious race of little vermin that nature ever suffered to crawl upon the earth." The inhuman nobility of this view contrasts with the meanness and pettiness of the people of Lilliput. See GLUMDAELCITCH.
Broch, Hermann (1886-1951). Austrian novelist. He is best known for his Der Tod des Vergil (The Death of Vergil, 1945) in which mythical and penetrating psychological elements are blended in an original and powerful manner that has excited comparisons with such writers as James Joyce and Thomas Mann. His most famous earlier work, more directly concerned with social and historical problems, is Die Schlaflwandler (The Sleepwalkers, 1931-1932), a trilogy of novels. Broch, whose widely varied background influenced his writing, studied philosophy and mathematics, was active in the textile industry, wrote numerous sociological and literary essays in addition to his novels, and died while engaged in research on mass psychology at Yale University. He had left his homeland after being imprisoned by the Nazis.

Brocken. The highest peak of the Harz range in Saxony. On the eve of May Day, i.e., the feast of Walburga (Walpurgis) or Walpurgis Night, the Brocken was the scene of a famous witches' Sabbath. It is also known for the spectacle of the Brockens, an optical illusion, first observed on the Brockens, in which shadows of the spectators, greatly magnified, are projected on the mists about the summit of the mountain opposite. In one of De Quincey's opium dreams there is a powerful description of the Brocken specter.

Brod, Max (1884-1978). Austrian writer. He is best known for his edition of the works of his friend Franz Kafka, who bequeathed him all his unfinished manuscripts. He also wrote a fine biography entitled Franz Kafka (1937) and several critical works on the same author. He now lives in Tel Aviv, and his own lyric and narrative writing deals largely with Jewish themes.

Brofelt, Johannes. See Juhani Arno.

Broken Heart, The (c. 1629). A tragedy by John Ford. The feud between the Spartan families of Crotolon and Thrasus was to have been ended by the marriage of the former's son Orgilus to the latter's daughter Penthea. However, Thrasus dies, and his son Ithocles gives Penthea to the jealous old merchant Bassanes. Meanwhile, Ithocles' friend Prophilus has fallen in love with Orgilus' sister Euphranea. He marries her, and the breach between the two families seems to have been healed. Orgilus even intercedes as an arbiter in Ithocles' suit for the hand of Calantha, the king's daughter. Soon her loveless marriage is too much for Penthea. She loses her mind and, shortly thereafter, dies. On a visit to her bier, Orgilus avenges himself by stabbing Ithocles to death. Apprehended, Orgilus is allowed to open a vein and bleed to death. Calantha dies of a broken heart.

Broken Jug, The (Der zerbrochene Krug; written 1803, pub. 1811). A one-act comedy by Heinrich von Kleist. The plot revolves around the figure of a Dutch village judge named Adam who, on the very day that his court is being observed by a government inspector, finds that he must hear a case in which he himself is the guilty party. By his swift inventiveness, he manages to keep the truth hidden for a while, but is finally discovered.

Brome, Alexander (1620-1666). English attorney and royalist poet. Noted for his drinking songs and satirical verse, he was the author of The Cuning Lovers (1654), a comedy, and Songs and Poems (1661).

Bronte, Richard (d. 1652). English dramatist known for his realistic and satirical comedies of life in London. His best plays are The Jovial Crew, The City Wit, or The Woman Wears the Breeches (c. 1628), The Weaver of Covent Garden (1632), and The Spaniard Carcaded (1635). He was a member of the comic dramatists of the Tudor-Stuart period.

Bromfield, Louis (1896-1956). American writer. Bromfield established his reputation with his early novels, the four books of a tetralogy called Escape: The Green Bay Tree, Possession (1925), Early Autumn (1926), and A Good Woman (1927). He also received praise for his factual and descriptive accounts of the 1,000-acre Ohio farm he purchased and turned into a productive showcase: Pleasant Valley (1945), Malabar Farm (1948), Out of the Earth (1950), and From My Experience (1955). One of his numerous other novels, The Rains Came (1937), is set in Malabar, the coastal region of India after which his farm was named.

bromide and sulphite. Words coined by Gelett Burgess in his humorous essay Are You a Bromide, or The Sulphite Theory (1907). In it he explains the terms bromide and sulphite as applied to psychological rather than chemical analysis. The bromide, according to Burgess, "does his thinking by syndicate. He follows the main-traveled roads, he goes with the crowd." The sulphite, on the other hand, is unconventional, original, everything that the bromide is not.

Bronnen, Arnolt (1895-1959). German dramatist in the movement of expressionism. His violently emotional works include Vatermord (Parricide, written 1915, performed 1922), and Katalaumische Schlacht (Catalanish Battle, 1924). Bronnen was a socialist and friend of Brecht until the two parted company when Bronnen turned to Nazism.

Bronstein, Lev Davidovich. See Leon Trotsky.

Brontë family. An English family, originally of Irish descent, that produced three 19th-century novelists: Charlotte, Emily, and Anne. On the death of his wife in 1821, the Reverend Patrick Brontë, a curate, sent for his sister-in-law to help him bring up his six children. A few years later all the girls except Anne were sent to board at the Clergy Daughters' School at Cowan Bridge; conditions at the school were dreadful, and worsened by the administration's belief that physical discomfort was spiritually edifying. The two eldest girls died at the school in 1825, and Charlotte and Emily were returned home. Lowood School in Jane Eyre was based on Charlotte's unhappy memories of Cowan Bridge. During much of their childhood, the four remaining Brontë children were free to roam and play in the Yorkshire moors, giving free reign to their imaginations. Charlotte, with the help of her brother Branwell, created Angria, a vast African empire, and wrote of the lives and adventures of its inhabitants. At the same time Emily kept a journal, the Gondal Chronicle, on the wars and intrigues of the Royalists and Republicans in a mysterious North country.

In 1831, Charlotte (1816-1855) was sent to Roe Head School, where she returned to teach from 1835-1838. She worked for a time as a governess and then, in 1842, went with Emily to Brussels to study at the school of Constantine Héger, where she taught the following year. Many of the scenes of Villette are based on Charlotte's experiences at the school and on her deep but frustrated emotional attachment to Héger. In 1845, Charlotte made the accidental discovery that Emily and Anne had been writing verse. She herself had composed many poems, and she collected them all into a volume (1846) of poetry signed by Currer (Charlotte), Ellis (Emily), and Acton (Anne) Bell, pseudonyms that they retained throughout their later work. The book, published at their expense, was unsuccessful, selling only two copies. Charlotte soon submitted her first novel, The Professor, to a number of publishers, and it was rejected so many times that she finally withdrew it. She nevertheless set to work to complete Jane Eyre, which was published and achieved spectacular success.

On the strength of her one novel, Wuthering Heights, and the best of her poems, Emily (1818–1848) is generally considered to be of greater genius than her sisters. Her mysticism is reflected in her work, especially in her extraordinary novel and in such poems as The Prisoner, Remembrance, The Old Stoic, and The Visionary. Some skeptics have maintained that Wuthering Heights was actually the work of her dissipated brother, Patrick Branwell (1817–1848), on the grounds that no woman, let alone one who led such a circumscribed life, could have written such a turbulent and passionate book. But Branwell, who was tubercular and addicted to alcohol and possibly to opium, had no literary talent. He died in 1848, and Emily, who caught cold at his funeral, died a few months later.

Anne (1820–1849), the least talented of the sisters, wrote two novels, Agnes Grey and The Tenant of Wildfell Hall. It is possible that neither of these books would be remembered today if she were not the sister of Charlotte and Emily.

After her sisters' death Charlotte devoted herself to the care of her father, who was going blind. She completed Shirley, which was well received, as was Villette, her last novel. These were years of social lionization, and in London and elsewhere she met Thackeray, Matthew Arnold, Mrs. Gaskell, Harriet Martineau, and others. She married Arthur Bell Nichols, her father's curate, in 1854 and died the following year. The Professor was published posthumously in 1857, and Emma, a fragment, appeared in 1860.

Bronze Horseman, The (Mednyi Vsadnik; 1833). A long poem by Aleksandr Pushkin. Its theme is the conflict between the desires of an ordinary individual, represented by the poor clerk Evgeni, and the demands of a powerful state, represented by Peter the Great. A flood inundates St. Petersburg, the capital city built on the Neva River at Peter's orders, and drowns Evgeni's fiancée. Dejected by his grief, Evgeni stands before the imposing statue of the emperor and curses Peter's inhuman willfulness, which he blames for his fiancée's death. In a hallucination, he imagines that Peter is chasing him through the streets of the city. After this, Evgeni is cured of his rebelliousness. Whenever he passes the statue of the emperor, his manner once again shows respect and fear.

The poem displays one aspect of Pushkin's attitude toward Peter the Great. Pushkin also recognized that, however much Peter's sometimes cruel power was to be deplored, the emperor had done Russia great service. In the long poem, Poltava (1828–1839), Pushkin extolled Peter for his service to the country.

Bronzino, Il. Real name, Agnolo di Cosimo Allori (1503–1572). Florentine portraitist. A pupil of the mannerist Pontormo, he was strongly influenced by Michelangelo's religious paintings. His best-known works include the Portrait of Ugolino Mantelli and the Portrait of Eleonora of Toledo with her Son.

Brooke, Dorothea. The idealistic heroine of George Eliot's Middlemarch. Her sister Celia and her uncle, Squire Brooke, with whom they live, are also prominent characters.

Brooke, Frances [Moore] (1724–1789). English-born Canadian novelist. The wife of a clergymen, Mrs. Brooke followed her husband to Canada, where he was chaplain to the garrison at Quebec. Her four-volume History of Emily Montague (1769) had a Canadian setting and is often considered the first Canadian novel. However, Mrs. Brooke's work was based on English models and had no perceptible effect on Canadian literature, though it does give a vivid picture of social life in 18th-century Quebec.

Brooke, Henry (1703–1783). Irish poet and novelist. His best known works are Universal Beauty (1735–1736), a philosophical poem dealing with physical and theological concepts; Gustavus Vasa (1739), a play; and The Fool of Quality, a novel.

Brooke, Rupert (1887–1915). English poet. He was widely known and admired for his war poetry, especially the series of sonnets called 1914; it expressed the patriotic idealism of the early years of World War I. He died in service during the war, of septicemia. He was a traditional, Georgian poet; Grantchester and The Great Lover are well-known examples of his early work. Later he was influenced, like T. S. Eliot, by his study of 17th-century poetry (he published a study of John Webster in 1911), and began to write such witty, original poems as Heaven and Dust. St. John Ervine is said to have drawn the hero of his novel Changing Winds from Rupert Brooke.

Brook Farm. A utopian community established in 1841 at West Roxbury, Mass. The members of the Brook Farm Institute of Agriculture and Education, led by George Ripley, shared equally in work, benefits, and remuneration; among those associated with the community were Theodore Parker, William Henry Channing, Nathaniel Hawthorne, Margaret Fuller, Charles A. Dana, G. W. Curtis, and Albert Brisbane. The group, later influenced by Fourierism, changed its name to the Brook Farm Phalanx; in 1846, when the "Central Phalanstery" burned down, it disbanded. Emerson viewed this experiment made by his fellow Transcendentalists with skepticism; he called Brook Farm "the Age of Reason in a patty-pan." Hawthorne, who came to West Roxbury in the hope of finding an economical way to live and write, soon found communal living unattractive. He modeled the community in The Blithedale Romance on Brook Farm.
Brook Kerith, The

Brook Kerith, The (1916). A novel by George Moore. A presentation of the life of Jesus, the author follows the customary account as far as the Crucifixion, but later Joseph of Arimathea finds Jesus still alive. For 30 years afterward he lives as a shepherd by the Brook Kerith. He has rejected his early belief in himself, which he considers blasphemy, and when he finally meets Paul the Apostle and hears his version of the story, he is horrified and plans to go to Jerusalem and reveal the truth. Paul, however, forces him to realize that his story would not be believed.

The ravens fed Elijah by this brook of Palestine, called Cherith in the Bible.

Brooks, Van Wyck (1886–1963). American critic and biographer. His early writings, such as The Wine of the Puritans (1908), were critical of the narrowness and insularity of the Puritan heritage and urged a broader, more unified cultural ideal for the nation. In the five volumes of the “Finders and Makers” series, Brooks created the first composite picture of American cultural and literary development. The best-known volumes of the series are The Flowering of New England, 1815–1865 (1936), which was awarded a Pulitzer Prize, and New England: Indian Summer, 1865–1915 (1940). Brooks also wrote America’s Coming of Age (1915), The Ordeal of Mark Twain (1920), The Pilgrimage of Henry James (1925), and The Life of Emerson (1932).

Broteas. In Greek mythology, an extremely ugly son of Tantalus and brother of Pelops who flung himself onto a pyre because of his ugliness or blindness. He was said to have carved a still existing statue of Rhea on the side of Mount Sipylos.

Brother Jonathan. The generic name for a New Englander, hence for Americans and America. One account of its origin tells how, when Washington was in want of ammunition, he called a council of officers, but no practical suggestion could be offered. “We must consult Brother Jonathan,” said the general, meaning His Excellency Jonathan Trumbull, governor of the state of Connecticut. This was done, and the difficulty was remedied. “To consult Brother Jonathan” then became a set phrase, and Brother Jonathan became a name for the typical shrewd Yankee. He appears as a character in The Contrast (1787), a play by Royall Tyler.

Brothers Karamazov, The (Brat’ya Karamazov; 1879–1880). A novel by Feodor Dostoevski. Considered his best work, it is one of the outstanding novels in literature. The main plot involves Feodor Pavlovich Karamazov and his four sons: Dmitri, Ivan, Alyosha, and the bastard Smerdyakov (see Karamazov). Feodor Pavlovich, a depraved buffoon, is Dmitri’s rival for the affections of the local siren, Grushenka. Violent quarrels over her and over Dmitri’s disputed inheritance ensue until Feodor Pavlovich is murdered. Dmitri is arrested and brought to trial for the crime. This basic line of action is complicated throughout the novel by a host of other factors masterfully linked to the main plot. The second son, Ivan, a tortured intellectual, gradually realizes that he has secretly wished for his father’s death and may have transmitted this wish to Smerdyakov, a grotesque caricature of the brilliant Ivan. Dmitri’s relations with his ex-fiancée, Katerina Ivanovna, also prove to have a bearing on his involvement in the crime and his unwillingness to defend himself against the charges. The youngest son, Alyosha, plays no direct part in the crime, but acts throughout the book as a religious foil to the depraved Feodor Pavlovich, the passionate Dmitri, and the rationalistic Ivan. By means of Alyosha, the elder Zosima, who expresses the author’s religious views, is introduced into the novel.

Balancing, or perhaps outweighing, Zosima’s religious message is the expression of unbelief enunciated by Ivan. His attitude is forcefully conveyed in the famous “Legend of the Grand Inquisitor,” a parable of his own invention which he relates to Alyosha. Essentially a pessimistic look at man’s religious possibilities, the Legend has been regarded by some critics as evidence of Dostoevski’s own religious doubts.

Besides being a story of crime and a novel of religious and ethical ideas, the book is, in part, a social document. The intellectual and political ideas current in 19th-century Russia are introduced by Ivan and the careerist Rakitin, while the Legend may be read as a critique of the socialist utopia as well as of religious orthodoxy. The judicial reforms of the later 19th century and the effects they had are revealed during the trial of Dmitri.

The literal, religious, social, and ethical levels of the novel are buttressed by the psychological probing for which Dostoevski is well known. The book abounds in instances of the author’s mastery in this area, from the portrayal of the corrupt yet shameful Feodor Pavlovich, to the mental disintegration of the brilliant Ivan, to the painful adolescence of Kolya Krasotkin.

Broun, Heywood [Campbell] (1888–1939). American journalist and novelist. Known for his liberal sympathies and opposition to social injustice, Broun wrote for several New York newspapers and magazines. He was equally well known and loved as a kindly, unassuming fellow whose huge bulk and untidy appearance led him to be called a “one-man slum.” The Newspaper Guild, which Broun helped found, has established an annual award for reporting done “in the spirit of Heywood Broun.” A Collected Edition of his writings appeared in 1941.
Brown, Charles Brockden (1771-1810). American novelist and editor. Regarded as the first American professional author, he introduced the Indian into U.S. fiction and was among the first Americans to win a hearing abroad. Brown anticipated the later deep interest in psychotic characters, foreshadowing Poe's interest in the horrifying. His fame rests on six Gothic romances: WIELAND, Ormond (1799), Arthur Mervyn, Edgar Huntly, Clara Howard (1801), and Jane Talbot (1801).

Brown, Ford Madox (1821-1893), English painter. He represented historical or social and moralizing subjects with accurate draftsmanship characterized by repeated areas of color. He was never a member of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, but there was a reciprocal influence between that group and himself.

Brown, John (1800-1859). American abolitionist. In the 1850's Brown, an abolitionist since his youth, became obsessed with the idea of freeing the slaves by force. In 1855 he and five sons went to Kansas, then a battleground between pro- and anti-slavery forces. The following year, with his approval, a small band, including four of his sons, murdered five settlers near Potawatomi Creek during an anti-slavery raid. Later he and 40 men resisted an attack on Osawatomie by proslavery men.

Now nationally known as "Old Brown of Osawatomie," he made plans to foment a slave insurrection in the South. On Oct. 16, 1859, he attacked Harper's Ferry, Va. (now West Va.) with 21 men and seized the U.S. arsenal and armory there. A detachment of marines under Col. Robert E. Lee defeated and captured Brown. During his trial for treason, he conducted himself with dignity, maintaining that he had been an instrument in the hands of God. He was convicted and hanged on Dec. 2, a martyr in the eyes of abolitionists.

Brown, John (1810-1882). Scottish physician and author. He is famous for his dog story Rab and His Friends and his essay on Marjorie Fleming (1863), the 10-year-old prodigy and pet of Sir Walter Scott.

Browne, Sir Thomas (1605-1682). English writer and scholar. Browne was a successful physician who, except for his years of schooling at Oxford and in Europe, spent his life in the town of Norwich. He was knighted in 1671 by Charles II as a steadfast Royalist, famous for his antiquarian scholarship. As Browne himself knew, he had a curiously mixed nature: by temperament melancholy, mystical, and credulous, he was by training a scientist and philosophical skeptic. He was also a lover of language and classical learning, and his sonorous, stiffly cadenced prose style, rich in exotic coinages and striking images, is one of the most remarkable accomplishments in English literature. He is most brilliant when he treats themes that allow the full display of his personality, such as religion in Religio Medici and morality and oblivion in Hydriotaphia or Urn Burial. His other works are Pseudodoxia Epidemica, also called VULGAR ERRORS; The Garden of Cyrus (1658); and Christian Morals, edited in 1756 by Samuel Johnson.

Browne, William (c. 1591-1643). English poet. The most influential member of the early 17th-century SPENSERIAN SCHOOL of pastoral poets, he was the author of Two Elegies (1613) on the death of Prince Henry, the elder son of James I, and of Britannia's Pastoral (1613, 1616). His poems were also published in The Shepherd's Pipe (1614), a book of eclogues in which George Wither and Sir John Davies, prominent Spenserians, were also represented. Britannia's Pastoral is said to have influenced Milton and Keats.

Brownie. The house spirit in Scottish superstition. At night he is supposed to busy himself in doing little jobs for the family over which he presides. Farms are his favorite abode. Brownies are brown or tawny spirits, in opposition to fairies, which are fair ones. In the U.S. the adventures of the brownies were popularized by a series of Brownie Books by Palmer Cox.

Browning, Elizabeth Barrett (1806-1861). English poet, wife of Robert BROWNING. In childhood she suffered a spinal injury and, until her meeting with Browning, seemed to be doomed to invalidism and seclusion from the world. The Brownings' courtship under the eyes of Elizabeth's jealous, tyrannical father, their elopement, and subsequent happy married life in Italy form one of the most celebrated of literary romances. Hawthorne described Mrs. Browning as "a pale, small person scarcely embodied at all," and this ethereality of her physical appearance is reflected by the palpitating fervor, the unworldly tenderness and purity of her work. Often, however, these qualities decline into stolidity, diffuseness, and confusion. Her themes were dictated by her broad humanitarian interests; a deep if unorthodox religious feeling; her affection for her adopted country, Italy; and, of course, her love for Browning. Her greatest work, Sonnets from the Portuguese, a sequence of love sonnets addressed to her husband, remains an extraordinary and living achievement. Her other works include Essay on Mind, With Other Poems (1826), a translation of Aeschylus' Prometheus Bound (1833), The Seraphim And Other Poems (1838), Poems (1844), Casa Guidi Windows, Aurora Leigh, Poems Before Congress (1860), and Last Poems (1862). See Cry of the Children, The; Lady Geraldine's Courtship.

Browning, Robert (1812-1889). English poet. The son of a bank clerk, Browning was long unsuccessful as a poet and financially dependent upon his family until he was well into adulthood. When in his teens, he discovered Shelley and adopted Shelleyan liberalism in opinion and confessionalism in poetry. Accordingly, his first poems—Pauline (1833), Paracelsus, Sorrello—were long, personal, and self-consciously poetic, though the latter two supposedly had as their subject actual historic personages. All three works were considered failures, and, from 1837 to 1846, Browning attempted to write verse drama for the stage, again unsuccessfully. In 1845 he met Elizabeth Barrett, then considered one of the outstanding poets of the day, and married her the following year. Partially because of her ill health and partially because of her father’s opposition to the marriage, Browning took his wife to Italy, and remained there until her death in 1861. The story of their love has been dramatized by Rudolf Besier in The Barrettts of Wimpole Street.

Pippa Passes, a dramatic poem included in the collection Bells and Pomegranates, was among Browning’s first significant works; Pippa, a little Italian girl, passes by singing, and unwittingly influences the lives of four groups of people. During the next 25 years Browning published many volumes of poetry, all of which sold badly: Dramatic Lyrics (1842), which contained Forphyria’s Lover, My Last Duchess, Soliloquy in a Spanish Cloister, and The Pied Piper of Hamelin; Dramatic Romances and Lyrics (1845), which included How They Brought the Good News from Ghent to Aix and The Bishop Orders His Tomb at St. Praxed’s Church; Christmas Eve and Easter Day (1850), a long poem; and Men and Women (1855), which contained many of his best-known poems: Fra Lippo Lippi, Andrea del Sarto, Bishop Blodgarm’s Apology, Two in the Campagna, and A Grammarian’s Funeral. In the collection Dramatis Personae (1864) were Rabei Ben Ezra and Prospect.

After 40 years of poetic obscurity, Browning abruptly came into his own with the publication of the massive The Ring and the Book. The story, which Browning found in an old manuscript, deals with a 17th-century murder case; in the poem, each of 12 characters presents his view of the action in a long dramatic monologue.

Though his philosophy is now considered less profound than it was at the height of his success, Browning is notable for his psychological insight into character and motivations, sometimes abrupt but forceful colloquial English, his perfection of the form of the dramatic monologue in which a speaker tells something of himself and reveals more than he intends or realizes, his learning, and his predilection for Italian Renaissance subjects. See Elizabeth Barrett Browning; BLOT ON THE ‘SCUTCHEON, A; LURIA; RETURN OF THE DRUSES.

Browning Version, The (1948). A one-act play by Terence Rattigan. It is set in an English boys’ school. An old teacher, universally disliked by the students, has his hard exterior cracked by a sympathetic and understanding boy. The Browning Version was made into a motion picture with a fine performance by Michael Redgrave as the teacher.

Brownism. The teachings of Robert Browne (1550–1633), an English divine. He first formulated the principles of Congregationalism.

Brownshirts. See S.A.

Brownson, Orestes Augustus (1803–1876). American writer on theology and philosophy. Brownson was a New Englander so thoroughly individualistic that he could not agree long with anybody—even with himself. Raised as a strict Puritan, he became successively a Presbyterian, a Universalist, and a Unitarian; in 1844 he was converted to Roman Catholicism but was severely criticized when he tried to promulgate his own American form of Catholicism. His political views were similarly varied; at first, he was a Utopian socialist, an admirer of Robert Owen; later, he helped to organize a Workingmen’s Party. He then became active in Democratic Party politics, until he lost faith in the intelligence and integrity of the common people.

To spread his beliefs, Brownson established the Boston Quarterly Review (January, 1838), which in 1842 was merged with the United States Democratic Review; in 1844 it became Brownson’s Quarterly Review, continued until 1865, was revived in 1872, and terminated in 1875. His writings include New Views of Christianity, Society, and the Church (1836); a semi-autobiographical novel, Charles Elwood, or The Infidel Converted (1840); and The Convert (1857), an autobiography.

Bruce, Robert. Called the Bruce (1274–1329). Scottish national hero, king of Scotland from 1306. Though at first he swore fealty to Edward I of England as king of Scotland (1296), Robert Bruce soon followed the popular leader Sir William Wallace and raised arms against Edward in a struggle to gain Scottish independence. In July, 1297, however, he signed the capitulation of Irvine whereby Scottish lords were pardoned in return for their allegiance. Bruce took no part in Wallace’s continued struggle and final downfall, but remained, to all outward appearances, loyal to the English. He was appointed co-regent of Scotland together with William Lamber ton and John Comyn; he entered into a secret agreement with Lamberton binding him to uphold the patriotic cause.

After the execution of Wallace, Bruce murdered (1306) Comyn, an enemy of long standing, and was thenceforth openly committed to the Scottish cause. He was crowned Robert I of Scotland at Scone in 1306; he then set about to win his kingdom. He suffered defeat at Methven, took refuge on the coast of Ireland, was outlawed, and was excommunicated by the pope. After the death of Edward I and Edward II’s accession to the throne, Bruce faced an easier opponent. He returned to Scotland and in a series of engagements, wrested most of Scotland from the English; his crusade finally culminated in the treaty (1327) by which Edward III recognized Scotland as independent and Bruce as her sovereign. Bruce died in 1329 of leprosy, barely enjoying the fruits of his own achievement. See Bruce, The; BRUCE AND THE SPIDER.

Bruce and the spider. It is said that when Robert Bruce was forced by the English to retreat to Ireland, he took heart from a spider: one day he watched the spider try six times to fix its web on a beam in the ceiling. "Now shall this spider," said Bruce, "teach me what I am to do, for I also have failed six times." The spider's seventh effort was successful, whereupon Bruce left Ireland, collected 300 followers, landed at Carrick, and at midnight, surprised the English garrison at Turnberry Castle. In Tales of a Grandfather, Sir Walter Scott tells us that in remembrance of this incident, it has always been deemed a foul crime in Scotland for any of the name of Bruce to harm a spider.

Brücke, die (The bridge). A group of German painters, formed in 1905 in Dresden. In rebellion against impressionism, they aimed to found a truly expressive school of German painting. Ernst Ludwig Kirchner and Eric Heckel were among the leaders of the group, whose members were influenced by the art of Africa and the South Seas and by primitive German religious art. Using color in an expressionistic manner, these artists painted dramatic landscapes and nudes, mystical and visionary compositions, and depicted the anguish and loneliness of the street, the circus, and the café dansant. Die Brücke was incorporated into the Blaue Reiter movement in 1912.

Bruckner, Anton (1824–1896). Austrian organist and composer of church and symphonic music. A friend of Richard Wagner, he taught theory and organ at the Vienna Conservatorium from 1868 to 1891. His style is a mixture of homely simplicity and Catholic mysticism. His works include nine symphonies, three masses, and numerous shorter works for the church.

Bruegel or Breughel or Breugel, Pieter (1525?–1569). Flemish painter. He painted scenes from peasant life, fantastic recreations of biblical subjects such as the tower of Babel, and landscapes composed of closely observed details combined to form an immense panorama in which small figures enact religious dramas and perform common tasks. His splendidly composed and brightly colored, realistic paintings are noted for their keen and often humorous observation of nature and mankind. Bruegel had two sons, Pieter the Younger (1564?–1637?), who often copied his father, and Jan (1568–1625), called "Velvet Bruegel," who painted landscapes, allegorical pictures, and still lifes.

Brueys, L'Abbé David-Augustin de. See Barthelin, La Face de Maistre Pierre.

Bruin, Sir. See Reynard the Fox.

Bruller, Jean. See Vercors.

Brumaire. The 2nd month in the French Revolutionary Calendar. It began Oct. 22, 23, or 24, depending on the year, and ended Nov. 21, 22, or 23. The name comes from brume (Fr., "fog"), and was used because this season was often marked by foggy weather. The celebrated 18th Brumaire (Nov. 9, 1799) was the day on which the Directory was overthrown and Napoleon established his supremacy.

Brunanburh, battle of (10th century). An Old English poem of 73 lines in alliterative verse, included in the Anglo-Saxon Chronicle. It celebrates the victory (937) of the English under King Aethelstan over the invading Vikings and Scots.

Brunelleschi, Filippo (1377–1466). Florentine architect and goldsmith. He used his knowledge of Gothic and Romanesque architecture in spanning the immense space covered by his dome for the cathedral of Florence, while in such buildings as the Pazzi Chapel, the Church of San Lorenzo, the Pitti Palace (1446), the Hospital of the Innocenti (1419), and the Church of the Santo Spirito (1435), he introduced the classical elements—columns, arches, ornamental details—that form such an integral part of Renaissance architecture. His classicism was spurred by a trip made to Rome in 1433 with his friend Donatello for the purpose of studying the Roman ruins. Along with Donatello and other Florentine artists, he shared the patronage of Cosimo de' Medici. He also invented linear perspective: the mathematical device for the construction of a rational space, with depth and interval, as seen from a single point of view.

Brunello. In the Orlando poems of Boiardo and Ariosto, a cunning dwarf and expert thief who steals Angelica's magic ring and then loses it to Bradamante, who needs it to free her beloved Ruggero from the enhancer Atlante.

Brunetière, Vincent de Paul Marie Ferdinand (1849–1906). French literary critic. Conservative and neoclassical in his tastes, Brunetière opposed the naturalistic school because he deplored its lack of moral purpose. Dogmatic in his beliefs, he applied the principles of Darwinian evolution to the development of literature. Among his most important works are: Le Roman Naturaliste (1883), Etudes critiques sur la littérature française (1880–1907), Evolution des genres (1890–1894), and Historie de la littérature française classique (1904–1907), which was begun in 1904 and left unfinished at the time of the author's death.

Brunetto Latini. See Brunetto Latini.

Brunhild. See Volsunga Saga; Nibelungenlied; Wagner's Ring des Nibelungen.

Bruni, Leonardo (1374–1444). Italian humanist and historian. Also known as Leonardo Aretino, from his birthplace at Arezzo, he was a chancellor of Florence, his adopted city and a papal secretary. One of the outstanding early Italian Renaissance Humanists, he wrote in Latin, Greek, and Italian, and did translations and other scholarly works. His History of Florence (Historiarum Florentinarum libri xii; 1610) is sometimes described as the first modern history because of its break with medieval methods of narrating past events.

Bruno, Giordano (1548–1600). Italian philosopher. Bruno is sometimes referred to as the Nolan from his birthplace at Nola, near Naples. After studying at the university of Naples and entering the Dominican order, he fled from his vows and his native land in 1576 in order to begin his career as an itinerant teacher of controversial philosophical subjects. In 1582, at Paris, he wrote his first literary work, the comedy Il Candelaio. While in England during the next few years, he met Sir Philip Sidney and Fulke-Greville, debated at Oxford, and produced several philosophical dialogues in Italian. La cena de le ceneri (Ash Wednesday Supper, 1584) defended the Copernican system and Bruno's notion of the infinite universe, while De la causa, principio e uno (On Cause, Principle, and Unity, 1584) and De l'infinite universo e mondi (On the Infinite Universe and Its Worlds, 1584) offered an anti-Aristotelian metaphysics grounded largely in mystical Neoplatonism and Pantheism. The Spaccio della bestia trionfante (Banishment of the Triumphant Beast, 1584), dedicated to Sidney, deals largely with ethics; the Cabala del papegairo (Cabala of the Pegasean Steed), also written during this period, is a satire against pretentious ignorance and obscurantism, in the form of an ironic praise of asininity that recalls a similar "praise of folly" by Erasmus. De gli heroici furori (1585), also dedicated to Sidney, deals with heroic enthusiasms, such as the aspirations of the intellectual mind and the inspirations of poetry. The discussion revolves about a group of poems by Bruno of himself and by Luigi Tansillo, who is an interlocutor in the dialogue.

Between 1585 and 1591, Bruno wandered through France, Switzerland, and Germany, everywhere encountering opposition to his unorthodox ideas and irascible personality. In 1591, at Frankfurt, he published a group of Latin works in which he continued to expound his philosophy. In scope these works range from mnemonics and monism to the atom and the monad, from the pre-Socratic philosophers to Nicholas of Cusa and Copernicus. The most important of the works is De immenso et innumerabilis seu de universo et mundis (On Immensity and Innumerability, or on the Universe and Its Worlds), consisting of verse, prose commentary, and diagrams. In 1592, he was betrayed to the Inquisition at Venice; a year later he was in a Roman prison, where he languished for seven years. His refusal to retract earned him condemnation as a heretic and execution at the stake on February 17, 1600.

Despite the difficulty of his style and the obscurity of his thought, Bruno influenced contemporaries such as Spenser. Among modern authors, his influence is present in Joyce's Finnegans Wake. In philosophy he anticipated Leibniz and other subsequent thinkers.

Brus, Katharine [Ingham] (1902–1952). American novelist, short-story writer, and columnist. She is known for her successful works of fiction appearing in Cosmopolitan and other magazines. An analyst of "the jazz age," she is the author of a number of novels, including Glitter (1926), Young Men of Manhattan (1930), and The Red-Headed Woman (1931). Collections of her short stories are Night Club (1929) and Other Women (1932).

Brut, The (c. 1205). A Middle English verse rendition by the English priest Layamon (fl. 1189–1207) of Wace's Norman French Roman de Brut. A mixture of alliteration and rhyme, it is the first long poem in Middle English with any claim to literary quality, and marks the first appearance of the story of King Arthur in English. It relates the mythical history of Britain from its founding by Brutus, a descendant of Aeneas, to the year 689. It contains versions of the stories of King Lear, Cymbeline, and other legendary kings of Britain. See Arthurian Legend.

Brute (Brutus). In Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the Kings of Britain, a mythical ancestor of the British. According to Geoffrey, he is the great-grandson of the Trojan Aeneas. After an adventurous life, he lands in England, which—says the writer—he calls Britain after his own name. His three sons are Albanact, Camber, and Locrine.

Brutus, Decius. In Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, a conspirator against Caesar. By flattering Caesar's pride, he persuades him to attend the Senate despite Calpurnia's pleas.

Brutus, Lucius Junius. Roman Consul. (509 B.C.) One of the first two consuls in Rome's history, he is known as "the founder of the Roman Republic." According to legend, he feigned idiocy in order to escape the fate of his father and brother who were killed by his uncle Tarquinius Superbus, king of Rome. When Sextus, son of Tarquinius Superbus, ravished Lucretia, Brutus, casting off his feigned simple-mindedness, swore vengeance; he led an insurrection which expelled the Tarquins from Rome and changed the magistracy of kings to that of consuls. Brutus and Tarquinius Collatinus, husband of Lucretia, were chosen consuls.

Brutus, Marcus Junius (c. 85–2 B.C.). Roman politician and general. He was known for his devotion to the ideals of the republic, and, in the civil struggle between Caesar and Pompey, he supported the latter, who had legality on his side. After the battle at Pharsalus (48 B.C.), which ended in the defeat of Pompey, Caesar pardoned Brutus and made him one of his companions. Caesar appointed him governor of Cisalpine Gaul (46) and praetor (44). His love for Caesar notwithstanding, Brutus was persuaded by Cassius to murder Caesar; he was deluded into thinking that this act would recall the ideals of the republic which had disintegrated under Caesar's dictatorship. Accordingly, Caesar was murdered on the Ides of March in 43 by a group of conspirators under Brutus and Cassius. Mark Antony turned public opinion against the conspirators in his oration at Caesar's public funeral, and Brutus and Cassius fled Rome. Both raised armies, and Antony and Octavius, Caesar's lawful heir (later Augustus), temporarily suspended their struggle for power and marched against them. In the first engagement at Philippi (42) Brutus was victorious over Octavius while Cassius, overwhelmed by Antony's forces, committed suicide. In the second engagement, Brutus' forces were surrounded by those of Octavius, and Brutus committed suicide. According to Plutarch, when Antony found Brutus' body, he wrapped it up in his own robe for burial and had the ashes sent to Servilia, Brutus' mother. Another story, however, says that Antony had Brutus' head cut off and flung it at the feet of a statue of Caesar. See Et tu, Brute.

In Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, Brutus is depicted as an idealist, "high in all the people's hearts," who joins the conspiracy out of love of country. Antony's eulogy is famous:

> This was the noblest Roman of them all;
> All the conspirators save only he > Did that they did in envy of great Caesar;
> He only, in a general good service,
> And common good to all, made one of them.

Bryan, William Jennings. Known as the Great Commoner and the Boy Orator of the Platte (1860–1925). American political leader and orator. Having been twice elected to Congress (1890, 1892), Bryan became editor of the Omaha World-Herald after an unsuccessful Senate bid in 1894. In 1896 he won the Democratic presidential nomination when, as an advocate of the free coinage of silver, he electrified the convention with the famous “Cross of Gold” speech that ended, “You shall not press down upon the brow of labor this crown of thorns, you shall not crucify mankind upon a cross of gold.” After a strenuous campaign, in which he won the support of Southern and Western agrarians, he lost to William McKinley by fewer than 600,000 votes. In 1901 he founded a weekly newspaper, the Commoner, which he edited until 1913. Again an unsuccessful presidential candidate in 1900 and 1908, he was named secretary of state by President Wilson, but he resigned in 1912 when he felt that the president’s policies might involve the U.S. in World War I. After the war his fundamentalist religious beliefs led him to take part in a movement to prevent the teaching of evolution in American schools; in 1925 he served as prosecutor in the celebrated Scopes Trial.

Bryan was one of the most popular lecturers on the Chautauqua circuit; best loved of all his talks was one on The Prince of Peace, which he repeated innumerable times until 1924. Vachel Lindsay paid tribute to Bryan in his poem Bryant, Bryan, Bryant: The Campaign of 1896, as Viewed at the Time by a 16-Year-Old (1919), but he was pilloried in H. L. Mencken’s In Memoriam: W. J. B. (Prejudices, 5th Series, 1926).

Bryant, William Cullen (1794–1878). American poet, critic, and editor. Bryant’s early beliefs were Calvinist; his politics were Federalist and his tastes, classical. During his life, he moved from these attitudes to almost opposite ones, finally achieving a balanced view.

After beginning at the law, he achieved early fame when his poems were published in 1817. In 1825, he went to New York from his native Massachusetts to work on the New York Evening Mirror. Later he became its editor, and a leading democrat; he supported Lincoln, encouraged liberal causes, and espoused a less severe religion. Throughout his life, he continued his early poetry, but rarely achieved the aquity of his earlier work, Transcendental, To a Waterfowl, and Inscription for the Entrance to a Wood. Bryant’s important works include early political satire in The Embargo (1808), collected Poems (1832), The Fountain (1842), and The Flood of Years (1876). He translated the Iliad (1870) and the Odyssey (1871).

Bryce, James. Viscount Bryce of Dechmont (1838–1922). English statesman and historian. Ambassador to the U.S. from 1907 to 1913, he was one of the founders of the League of Nations. His best-known writings are The Holy Roman Empire (1862) and The American Commonwealth (1888), both highly regarded studies in history and political science. He wrote a number of other books on travel, biography, jurisprudence, and political science.

Bryher. Pen name of Winfred Bryher (1894– ), English historical novelist. She authentically and poetically recreates Greece and Rome in Gate to the Sea (1958) and Roman Wall (1954). English historical scenes are portrayed in Ruan (1960), the Celts; The Fourteenth of October (1952), the battle of Hastings; and The Player’s Boy (1953), early seventeenth century. Heart to Artemis was published in 1962 and Coin of Carthage in 1963.

Brynhild. See Völunga Saga; Nibelungenlied; Wagner’s Ring des Nibelungen.

Bryusov, Valeri Yakovlevich (1873–1924). Russian poet. One of the founders of the symbolist movement, Bryusov established in 1904 a journal The Scales (Vesy), which became an important showcase for the symbolist work of the next five years. Bryusov was heavily influenced by the French symbolists and transmitted this influence into the Russian movement. His major collections of verse are Urbi et Orbi (1903) and Stephanos (1905). Bryusov accepted the Bolshevik regime, and as a consequence his work, while not as politically oriented as the Soviets would like, is at least accepted and reprinted in the Soviet Union.

Bubastis. The Greek name of Bast, or Pasht, the Artemis of Egyptian mythology. She was the daughter of Isis and sister of Horus, and her sacred animal was the cat.

Buber, Martin (1878– ). Jewish theologian, philosopher, and writer. He has contributed to the modern development of Hasidism and has devoted much of his life to winning recognition of the cultural value of Judaism. His writings include Moses, The Revelation and the Covenant (1946), The Prophetic Faith (1949), Two Types of Faith (1951), Eclipse of God (1957), and Tales of the Hasidim (1961).

bucentaur (Gr., bous, “ox”; centaurous, “centaur”). A gaily ornamented ship or barge, from the name of the Venetian state galley employed by the doge on Ascension Day when he went to wed the Adriatic (see Pride of the Sea). It was probably so called from the galley’s figurehead, a man’s head with an ox’s body.

Bucephalus (Gr., boukephalos, “bull-headed”). The favorite horse of the Great Philip II had determined to destroy the high-spirited horse no one could mount, but allowed his son to try his skill first. Observing that the horse was terrified by its own shadow, Alexander turned its eyes into the sun, and was able to mount. By taming him Alexander fulfilled an oracle concerning the succession to the throne of Macedon.

Buchan, Sir John. 1st Baron Tweedsmuir (1875–1940), Scottish writer and governor general of Canada. He wrote many romantic adventure stories with idyllic natural settings. His first successful book was Prester John (1910), a romance of South Africa. The Thirty-Nine Steps, Greenmantle (1916), and The Three Hostages (1924) are adventure and spy novels whose hero is Richard Hannay. Other stories, such as Huntingtower (1922), are about a group of Scottish slum boys called the Gorbals Die-Hards. John Macab (1925) is about poaching, hunting, and fishing in Scotland. Buchan’s biographies include a life of Cromwell (1934) and a life of Cromwell’s Scottish contemporary, Montrose (1928). Memory-Hold-the-Door (1940) is an autobiography.

Buchanan, Robert Williams (1841–1901). Scottish poet, dramatist, critic, and novelist. He is remembered for his cruel literary attack, entitled The Fleshly School of Poetry, which began a literary and personal quarrel that lasted several years. He was a prolific and successful dramatist, and his Poetical Works (1901) contains a number of poems of interest.

Biichner, Georg (1813–1837). German dramatist. He is known especially for the brilliant imagination and theatrical skill with which he treats social, human, and metaphysical problems in the plays Danton's Tod and Wozzeck. Inspired in his student days by the ideals of the French Revolution of 1789, he became a political radical and, in 1834, publicized a militant socialist program in his Der hessische Landbote (The Hessian Messenger), a tract which violently attacked the oppressive archduchy of Hesse. As a dramatist, he reinforced his socialist sympathies with a brutally stark, realistic style that caused him to be regarded as a forerunner of naturalism. But he was also a master of metaphysical symbolism, and his works contain passages of the highest poetic beauty. Other products of his short career are the comedy Leonce und Lena (written 1836) and the fragmentary novella Lenz (1879) about the life of the poet Reinhold Lenz.

Buck, Pearl [Sydenstricker] (1892– ). American novelist. The daughter of American missionaries, Mrs. Buck was raised in China and is best known for her books about Chinese life. Part of her purpose has been to make the East known to the West. She was awarded a Pulitzer Prize in 1932 for The Good Earth, the first novel in a trilogy called The House of Earth, finished in 1935. She received the Nobel Prize for Literature in 1938.

Mrs. Buck is the author of many other novels about the Far East, including Dragon Seed (1942), Pavilion of Women (1946), and The Living Reed (1963), and of two autobiographical works, My Several Worlds (1954) and A Bridge for Passing (1962). She also translated a Chinese classic under the title All Men Are Brothers (1933) and wrote several novels with an American setting under the pseudonym John Sedges.

Bucket, Mr. A shrewd detective in Charles Dickens' Bleak House. He discovers that Hortense, the French maid of Lady Dedlock, murdered Mr. Tulkington. Speaking of the detectives of fiction, Swinburne calls Bucket "that matchless master of them all."

Buckingham, 1st duke of. George Villiers (1592–1628). English nobleman, whose erratic political and military policies caused continual friction with Parliament and foreign powers. The profligate favorite of James I, he was known for his good looks, and his face at death was described as "the face of an angel." He was assassinated by John Felton. He was used as a character by Scott in The Fortunes of Nigel (1822) and by Dumas in The Three Musketeers (1844).

Buckingham, 2nd duke of. Henry Stafford (1454–1483). English nobleman, a staunch supporter of Richard III in the early part of his reign. He later rebelled against Richard and was captured and executed. In Shakespeare's Richard III, he is depicted as the crafty "second son" of the king, but he balks at Richard's demand that he kill the two sons of Edward IV.

Buckingham, 2nd duke of. George Villiers (1628–1687). English nobleman and writer. The son of the 1st duke of Buckingham and a favorite of Charles II, he was a member of the court clique known as the Cabal, his name furnishing the third letter of the famous acronym. With Samuel Butler, Thomas Sprat, and others, he wrote The Rehearsal (1671), a burlesque tragedy satirizing Dryden. He is a character in Scott's Peveril of the Peak (1822) and Woodstock (1825) and in Dryden's Absalom and Achitophel (1681).

Buckle, Henry Thomas (1821–1862). English historian. He is known chiefly for the first volume of his History of Civilization in England (1857), which caused a sensation in England and the U.S. because of its bold thinking. Buckle's special theory was that climate, soil, food, and other aspects of nature play a large role in the intellectual progress of mankind. A second volume of his History appeared in 1861, but was generally considered inferior to the first.

Bucolics (Bucolica). Also known as Eclogues (Elogiae). Ten pastoral poems by Vergil, written in the years 43–37 B.C. Though based on the idylls of Theocritus, the Bucolics are sophisticated tours de force and subtle allegories of contemporary events and persons. As Vergil's first notable achievement, they mark the beginning of his writing career and his entry into the literary circle of Augustus and Maceenas.

The first bucolic portrays the anguish of a shepherd forced to leave his ancestral lands. This is a reference to the threatened confiscation of Vergil's lands by Mark Antony in 43. The second is the love song of Corinna for the boy Alexis. An amoebic contest, i.e., a singing contest in which one shepherd sings an impromptu couplet to which the other must reply with a variation of tone and subject matter, composes the third poem. Interwoven into this rustic game of wits are references to Vergil's patrons and to the farm which, through their influence, was restored to the poet. The fourth poem is perhaps the most famous bucolic of all. In it, Vergil predicts a new age of peace for the world which will be ushered in by the birth of a child. Often called the Messianic Eclogue, this poem has been variously interpreted as a natal poem for an expected child (either that of Mark Antony and Octavia or of Octavius Caesar and Sibylla) and as an inspired prophecy of the birth of Christ. It was because of this poem that medieval Christians revered Vergil as a pagan prophet whom God had chosen to prepare the world for the coming of the Prince of Peace.

The fifth poem is an elegant exchange of songs by two shepherds; its subject is elegiac—the death of a young shepherd, Damon—but it actually refers to the death of Julius Caesar. The sixth is the "Song of Silenus," a capsule cosmogony which seems to show Vergil's acquaintance with Lucretius' De Rerum Natura. The seventh poem is another amoebean singing contest.

The eighth bucolic contains two love elegies, in both of which the singers use magical refinements. The poem is sometimes called Pharmacoeutria (sorcery). The ninth is a gracious exchange of songs between a young man and an old man in which there are many oblique references to the death of Caesar, the Roman civil wars, and the confiscations.

The final bucolic is dedicated to Gallus, a leading patron and writer of elegies who was an early protector of Vergil. This poem is in the form of a consolation sent to Gallus, who is brokenhearted over the infidelity of his mistress. Many authorities now claim that this artificial piece is a clever pastiche of Gallus' own love lyrics.

Vergil's Bucolics were the principal influence on pastoral tradition after the Renaissance, and it was their calm elegance that became the dominant tone of pastoral verse. The refrain "Sweete Themmes, runne softly, till I end my song" in Spenser's Prospero's is an echo of the recurrent refrain in the eighth Bucolic: Incipe Maenalios mecum, mea tibia, versus; and of the opening of Milton's Lycidas, "Yet once more, O ye laurels, and once more, /Ye myrtles brown... /I come to pluck" is an adaption of Et vos, o lauri, carpam te, proxima myrte. (Bucolic II).

Buddha (Sans., "the enlightened"). Real name, Siddhartha Gautama. Also known as Shakymuni. The founder of Buddhism. He is traditionally said to have died in 544 B.C.

Buddhism. The system of religion inaugurated by the Buddha in India in the 6th century B.C. The four sublime verities of Buddhism, the "Four Aryan or Noble Truths," are as follows:

1. Pain exists.
2. The cause of pain is "birth sin." The Buddhist supposes that man has passed through many previous existences, and all the sins accumulated in these previous states constitute man's "birth sin."
3. Pain is ended only by nirvana.
4. The way that leads to nirvana is the "Eight-fold Path": right faith, right judgment, right language, right purpose, right practice, right obedience, right memory, and right meditation.

The abstract nature of the religion, together with the overgrowth of its monastic system and the superior vitality and energy of Brahminism, caused it to decline in India itself; but it spread rapidly to the surrounding countries and took so permanent a hold that it has millions of adherents in India, Ceylon, Tibet, China, and Japan.

Early Indian Buddhism (Theravāda or Hinayāna) emphasized personal salvation; later Mahāyāna Buddhism developed, promising salvation for all. Mahāyāna Buddhism spread to Central Asia, China, and Japan and is the principal Buddhism in these countries. Hinayāna is still practiced in Ceylon. Numerous sects and variant teachings exist, ranging from highly academic and abstruse doctrines to simple salvationism.

Budé, Guillaume (1468-1540). French scholar and humanist. Secretary and librarian to Francis I, he translated Greek texts into Latin and published them with critical analyses of the works themselves, rather than of previous commentaries on the works as had been done previously. In correspondence with humanists like Erasmus, More, and Rabelais, he zealously advocated classical studies, not only to gain erudition, but to cultivate the mind and regain classical wisdom. Along with others close to Francis I, he was instrumental in the founding of the Collège de France (1530), where for the first time Greek and Hebrew were taught in addition to Latin.

Buffoon Bill. See William F. Cooy.

Buffon, Comte Georges Louis Leclerc de (1707-1788). French naturalist, curator of the Jardin du Roi from 1739. He is best known for his Histoire naturelle (36 vols., 1749-1788), continued in eight volumes by his assistants and published in 1804; his Epoques de la nature (1779); and Théorie de la Terre (1749). His works deal with the earth, minerals, animals, and man. He helped lay the foundations for 19th-century work in natural science, especially in zoology and comparative anatomy, and was the first to write a history of the earth in terms of a series of successive geologic stages. His theories (e.g., his development of geographic zoology) anticipated those of Lamarck and Darwin. The Discours sur le style, his inaugural address to the French Academy in 1753, reflects his concern with literary style: "Style is the man himself:" is a famous quotation from it. His writing is vivid, eloquent, and majestic.
Building of the Ship, The Building of the Ship, The (1849). A poem by Henry Wadsworth LONGFELLOW. Often considered his best ode, the poem describes the building of a ship, interweaving the details with those of the approaching marriage of the builder’s daughter and the owner’s son. The ship is used as a symbol for life itself, and at the end, for the Union.

Bukharin, Nikolai Ivanovich (1888-1939). Russian Communist leader and editor. He joined the Bolsheviks in 1906 and was a leader in the movement by 1912 when, with Lenin, he co-edited the party organ, Pravda. In 1916 he was the editor of the revolutionary paper Novy Mir (The New World) in New York. The head of the Third International (1926-1929), he was expelled from the party only to be reinstated. Suspected of being a supporter of Trotsky, he was arrested and executed in the purges of 1938.

Bulba, Taras. See TARAS BULBA.

Bulfinch, Thomas (1796-1867). American teacher and writer. Bulfinch held a business post throughout his life, devoting his leisure to writing. His Age of Fable (1855) is still used in American schools as an introduction to Greek, Roman, Scandinavian, and Celtic mythology. The Age of Chivalry (1858), another straightforward, expurgated popularization of mythology, has pleased many young readers.

Bulgakov, Mikhail Afanasevich (1891-1940). Russian dramatist. He is best known for his Days of the Turbins and for his dramatizations of Gogol’s Dead Souls (1932) and Cervantes’ Don Quixote (1940).

Bull, Qlaf Jacob Martin Luther (1883-1933). Norwegian poet, short-story writer, and playwright. Love for the bare beauty of sea and mountain and pine forest, characteristically Norwegian, finds expression in Bull’s poetry. In 1918 he spoke out violently against the destructive impact of German militarism on all fineness and beauty in life. A painstaking craftsman, Bull wrote intellectual, highly introspective verse. His collections include Digte (1909), Digte og Noveller (1916), Stjernerne (1924), Digte til Hanne Erland og Omn og Eros (1928), and Omn og Eros (1930).

Bull, The Sacred. See API.

Bulldog Drummond. The hero of stories by Sapper (pen name of H. C. McNeile). Drummond is a patriotic Englishman and a modern Robin Hood.

Bullitt, William C[hrisitan] (1891- ). American diplomat. He was ambassador to Russia (1933-1936), to France (1936-1941), and ambassador-at-large (1941-1942). He wrote one novel, It's Not Done (1926), in addition to such nonfiction as Report to the American People (1940) and The Great Globe Itself (1946).

Bull Run. A brook in Virginia and the site of two battles during the U.S. Civil War. In the first battle of Bull Run (July 21, 1861), Union forces, confident of an easy victory that would enable them to push on to Richmond, were initially successful. But the stand of the Confederate brigade led by Thomas Jackson, which won him the nickname “Stonewall,” and the arrival of reinforcements turned the apparent Union victory into rout. The second battle of Bull Run (Aug. 30, 1862) also ended in defeat for the Union. These battles are sometimes known as the battles of Manassas from nearby Manassas Junction.

Bulwer-Lytton, Edward George Earle Lytton. 1st Baron Lytton (1803-1873). English novelist and dramatist. A member of Parliament for 15 years, Bulwer-Lytton served as colonial secretary from 1838 to 1839 and was created a peer in 1866. Among his notable historical novels are Eugene Aram, The Last Days of Pompeii, Rienzi (1835), Leila (1839), The Last of the Barons, and Harold (1849). Scholarly in their historical detail and often heavy, but just as often thrilling in their narrative, these books held the interest of several generations of readers. In addition, Bulwer-Lytton wrote the supernatural tales Zanoni and A Strange Story (1862), the long poem King Arthur (1849), and numerous dramas, including Richelieu (1839) and Money (1840)—the latter reflecting his occasional attraction to social themes. See CAXTONS, THE.

Bumble, Mr. In Charles Dickens’ OLIVER TWIST, a minor official in the workhouse where Oliver is brought up. He is a cruel, fussy man with mighty ideas of his own importance. He has given to the language the word “bumbledom,” for the officious arrogance and conceit of the petty dignitary. After marriage to Mrs. Corney, the high and mighty Bumble is sadly henpecked.

Bumpoo, Natty. The central figure in The Leatherstocking Tales, a series of novels by James Fenimore COOPER. Called by many names in the novels, among them Leatherstocking, Hawkeye, Deerslayer, Pathfinder, and La Longue Carabine, Natty remains the uncorrupted natural man. Companioned by Chingachgook, a Mohican chief, Natty prefers the moral code of the Indian to the selfish exploitation of nature by white settlers. Superior to the Indians in woodcraft, he is loyal and courageous, a voluntary outcast who follows the wilderness westward.

Bunch, Mother. A noted London alewife of the late Elizabethan period, nominal source of many jests and anecdotes, and often mentioned in Elizabethan drama. The “Epistle to the Merrie Reader” in Pasquill’s Jests, mixed with Mother Bunches Merriments (1604) gives the following description of her:

She spent most of her time in telling tales, and when she laughed, she was heard from Aldgate to the Monuments at Westminster, and all Southwark stood in Amazement... She dwelt in Cornhill, near the Ex-change, and sold strong Ale... and lived an hundred, seventy and five years, two days and a quarter, and half a minute.

Other books were named after her, such as Mother Bunch’s Closet newly Broke Open (1609), “containing rare secrets of art and nature, tried and experienced by learned philosophers, and recommended to all ingenious young men and maids, teaching them how to get good wives and husbands.”

Bundren, Addie. The principal character in William Faulkner’s novel As I Lay DYING. Although she dies near the beginning of the story, much of the action of the characters is determined by their relationships with the dead woman.

Bungay or Bongay, Friar. A famous necromancer of the 15th century. His story is much overlaid with legend. It is said that he “raised mists and vapors which befriended Edward IV at the battle of Barnet.” In the old prose romance, The Famous History of Friar Bacon, and in Greene’s Honourable History of Friar Bacon and Friar Bungay (1591), he appears as the assistant to Roger Bacon (d. 1294) in his diabolical scientific experiments; he also appears in Bulwer-Lytton’s novel Last of the Barons (1843).

Bunin, Ivan Alekseyevich (1870–1953). Russian novelist, short-story writer, and poet. He was the first Russian to win the Nobel Prize for literature (1933). Bunin emigrated from Russia in 1918 and lived in France until his death. He is famous chiefly for his prose works, which had a closer kinship with the prose of the 19th-century masters than with the modernist experiments of his own period. His novels, Derevnya (The Village, 1909) and Sukhodol (Dry Valley, 1911), written in the restrained “classical” style of Turgenev, Goncharov, or Chekhov, depict the stagnation of life in provincial Russia. His short story, Gospodin iz San-Fran-tziiko (The Gentleman from San Francisco, 1915), is world famous. Bunin’s poetry is less highly esteemed than his prose, but he did a number of successful translations in Russian, notably of the works of Longfellow and Byron.

Bunker Hill, battle of (June 17, 1775). The first great battle of the American Revolution. To control the high ground overlooking Boston, American troops built a redoubt on nearby Breed’s Hill. Under General Howe, 2,400 British troops assaulted the hill but were repulsed twice with heavy losses. After the third assault, the Americans, their powder exhausted, retreated to Bunker Hill, where nearly a fourth of them were slain or wounded.

Bunin, H[enry] C[uylér] (1855–1896). American short-story writer, poet, novelist, and editor of Puck, a weekly humor magazine. Burner wrote such novels as The Midge (1886), a story about a bachelor and his orphan ward, but he is best remembered for his short short stories, especially Short Sixes: Stories to Be Read While the Candle Burns (1891). He also published Made in France: French Tales with a United States Twist (1893) and other books. The best of his vers de société appeared in Airs from Arcady and Elsewhere (1884).

Buntline, Ned. See E. Z. C. Judson.

Bunyan, John (1628–1688). English writer and preacher. The son of a Bedfordshire tinker, Bunyan adopted his father’s trade and served in the Parliamentary army from 1644 to 1646. In 1648 or 1649 he married a woman whose dowry included two devotional books which, he later said, first turned his thoughts to religion. After a period of intense spiritual struggle, he joined the Baptist church at Bedford and later became a lay preacher. His refusal to bow to royal edicts banning nonconformist preaching led to his imprisonment from 1660 to 1672. During these 12 years he devoted himself to study of the Bible and Foxe’s Book of Martyrs and wrote many of his books, including his autobiography, Grace Abounding to the Chief of Sinners. Upon his release he became minister of the nonconformist church at Bedford, a position which he held for the rest of his life. In 1675 he was again imprisoned for a few months, during which time he wrote his most celebrated work, Pilgrim’s Progress.

His other writings, all religious in character, most of them allegorical, include The Holy City, or the New Jerusalem (1665), A Confession of My Faith, and a Reason of My Practice (1672), The Life and Death of Mr. Badman, and The Holy War. An outstanding narrative genius, he wrote in a style that has been highly praised for its simplicity, vigor, and concreteness.

Bunyan, Paul. A legendary lumberjack of the American northwestern forests. A comic folk hero, he is frequently the subject of “tall tales,” in which each storyteller strives to surpass the others. It is said that the dragging of Bunyan’s pick cut out the Grand Canyon. When he builds a hotel, he has the “last seven stories put on hinges so’s they could be swung back for to let the moon go by.”

The legend of Paul Bunyan may have first appeared in Quebec, or northern Ontario; James Stevens traced him to a French-Canadian logger named Paul Bunyon, who won a reputation as a prodigious fighter in the Papineau Rebellion against England in 1837, and later became famous as the boss of a logging camp. Paul Bunyan’s first appearance in print seems to be in an advertising pamphlet, Paul Bunyan and His Big Blue Ox (1914), published by the Red River Lumber Company. Written and illustrated by W. E. Laughead, it immediately became popular and was reissued many times. Among those who have retold the Bunyan stories are Virginia Tunvey, Esther Shepard, James Stevens, Glen Rounds, Dell J. McCormick, and Azel Garland. Daniel Hoffman studied the legend in his book, Paul Bunyan: Last of the Frontier Demigods (1952).

Burbage, Cuthbert. See Richard Burbage.

Burbage, James (d. 1597). English actor and theater-builder. In 1576 Burbage leased land in Shoreditch and built on it the first theater in England specifically intended for stage performances. It was known simply as “The Theater.” In 1596 he acquired a house in Blackfriars which, being roofed over, was used for plays during the winter months. After Burbage’s death his sons tore down The Theater and re-erected it in Bankside, where it became the Globe Theater. See Richard Burbage.

Burbage, Richard (1567–1619). English actor, son of James Burbage. Richard and his brother Cuthbert Burbage inherited a share in their father’s two playhouses, The Theater and the Blackfriars. Because of difficulties about the lease of the site of The Theater, they transported the building to a location in Bankside, where it was reassembled as the Globe Theater. Richard, one of the chief actors of his day, acted every major part in the plays of Shakespeare, as well as in those of Ben Jonson and Beaumont and Fletcher, and was particularly celebrated for his roles in tragedy. He was also a painter of some note, and the Felton portrait of Shakespeare is sometimes ascribed to him.

Burbank, Luther (1849–1926). American plant breeder. Born in Massachusetts, Burbank took up the profession of market gardening at the age of 21.
Burchiello

There he produced his first new creation, the Burbank potato. Moving to California, he settled down in Santa Rosa in a nursery garden and greenhouse. His aim, the cultivation of "better fruits and fairer flowers," did not include theoretic formulation; in 1905, the Carnegie Institute persuaded him to accept a salary and allow them to gather the data his experimenting accumulated. The arrangement was unsuccessful, and soon ended. By importation of foreign plants, hybridization to eliminate undesirable characteristics, and selection, Burbank was able to create new varieties of plums, berries, lilies, roses, apples, peaches, quinces, nectarines, potatoes, tomatoes, corn, asparagus, and innumerable others. His acknowledged master and the source of his earliest inspiration, Burbank wrote, was Charles Darwin.

Burchiello, Real name Domenico di Giovanni (1404-1448). Florentine barber, author of humorous sonnets. He influenced Berni and other Renaissance satirical writers. One of the verses in his Sonetti (1757) is a debate between Poetry and his Razors, concerning the amount of time that the barber spends on each. He was called il Burchiello (i.e., "canal barge or wherry"), possibly because of a sign in his shop.

Burchhardt, Jakob Christoph (1818-1897). Swiss historian of art and culture. His best-known work is The Civilization of the Renaissance in Italy (Die Kultur der Renaissance in Italien; 1860), for many years the classic analysis of the Renaissance. According to Burchhardt, Italy's unique political organization, based on the city-state rather than feudalism, had fostered the individualism upon which the Renaissance spirit rested. Thus, Italy was the cradle of the Renaissance and of modern man.

Burd, Ellen. In Scotch legend, a sister of Childie Rowland. She is rescued by him from the fairies who had shot her up in a castle in Eliland.

Bürger, Gottfried August (1747-1794). German poet of the Sturm und Drang, close to the Göttinger Hain group. Under Herder's influence, he wrote ballads in folk style, the most famous of which is LENORE.

Burgess, [Frank] Gelett (1866-1951). American humorist and illustrator. He was the author of Goops and How to Be Them (1900), Are You a Bromide (1907), Look Eleven Years Younger (1937). He also wrote the famous nonsense quatrains beginning "I never saw a purple cow." See Bromide and Sulphite.

Burgess, Thornton Waldo (1874- ). American author of Bedtime Stories, a syndicated series of animal stories for children. Beginning in 1912, they appeared daily in numerous newspapers throughout the U.S. He also published a large number of his stories in book form.

Burghley or Burleigh, Baron. William Cecil (1520-1598). English statesman, the chief adviser to Elizabeth I.

Burgoyne, John (1722-1792). English army officer and dramatist. While commander-in-chief of the northern army, he was forced to surrender to the Americans at Saratoga in 1777. He later took part in the impeachment of Warren Hastings. Garrick produced his Maid of the Oaks (1775) and The Heiress (1786), which was enormously popular. He figures prominently in George Bernard Shaw's The Devil's Disciple (1900) and in Kenneth Roberts' A Rabble in Arms (1933).

Buried Alive (1908). A humorous novel by Arnold Bennett. Priam Farll, a famous but shy painter, allows his rascally valet, Henry Leck, to be buried in Westminster Abbey under his name. Farll attends his own funeral, posthumously marries the splendid, comfortable Alice Haliche, and is accused of forging his own paintings. The book contains much satire of the London art world.

Burke, Edmund (1729-1797). Irish-born English statesman and author, known for his orations in the House of Commons. He was sympathetic toward the American colonies and the Irish Catholics, and was a strong enemy of the French Revolution. Among his most famous speeches are On American Taxation, On Conciliation with the Colonies, and On the Nabob of Arcot's Private Debts (1785), in which Burke discusses the great prosecution of Warren Hastings and tries to make him the scapegoat for all the abuses connected with the regime of the East India Company. His published works include A Vindication of Natural Society (1757), and ironic attack on deism; A Philosophical Inquiry into the Origin of Our Ideas of the Sublime and Beautiful (1756), a pioneer study in the psychological basis of aesthetic enjoyment; Observations on the Present State of the Nation (1769); Thoughts on the Cause of the Present Discontents (1770), in which Burke declares that politics deals with men and nations in actuality, never in bloodless abstractions; Letter to the Sheriffs of Bristol (1777); Reflections on the French Revolution; and Letters on the Proposals for Peace with the Regicide Directory of France (1796-1797). He was associated with Samuel Johnson and Sir Joshua Reynolds in 1764 in forming the Literary Club. His influence on early 19th century German national economists is particularly pronounced.

Burke, Kenneth [Duva] (1897- ). American literary critic, philosopher, and translator. Burke's translations of the German authors Thomas Mann, Emil Ludwig, Oswald Spengler, and Hugo von Hofmannsthall contributed greatly to making them known in the U.S. Among Burke's own writings are Philosophy of Literary Form—Studies in Symbolic Action (1941), A Grammar of Motives (1945), and Rhetoric of Motives (1950).

Burke, Thomas (1886-1945). English novelist and essayist. He wrote romantic, melodramatic stories about the Limehouse slum district in London. They include Limehouse Nights (1916) and Abduction (1939).

Burlador de Sevilla y el convidado de piedra, El (The Libertein of Seville and the Stone Guest, published 1630). A play by Tirso de Molina. It gave to world literature one of its most enduring character types, Don Juan. Based on a 14th-century Sevillian chronicle, Tirso's play relates how Don Juan Tenorio, a dissolute young rake, kills Don Gonzalo Uloa, father of one of his lady loves, in a duel. Later Don Juan pulls the beard of a stone effigy of Don Gonzalo and invites the figure to dinner. The statue accepts and returns the hospitality by inviting Don Juan to an entertainment at his tomb, where he is strangled by the stone figure and his soul is carried off to hell.
Tirso's Don Juan, the first in a long line of successors, ignores the conventions of honor; he seeks only to secure his pleasure. At the same time he is profoundly religious and noble, exemplifying the conflict between the morality inherited from the Middle Ages and the libertinism fostered by the Renaissance. Among the most notable of later works in which Tirso's character appears are Byron's Don Juan, Mozart's Don Giovanni, Zorrilla's Don Juan Tenorio, and Shaw's Man and Superman.

Burlingame, [William] Roger (1889– ). American writer. After being associated with Charles Scriber's Sons from 1914 to 1926, he turned to writing as a full-time occupation. In addition to several novels, including You Too (1924), a satire on advertising, Burlingame has written a number of books showing his knowledge and interest in the history of technology in the U.S.

Burnand, Sir Francis Cowley (1836–1917). English playwright and editor of the periodical Punch (1880–1906). He wrote many burlesques including Cox and Box (1867), with music by Sir Arthur Sullivan. Happy Thoughts (1866), originally a series for Punch, has been widely read. He also wrote The Incompleat Angler (1887).

Burne-Jones, Sir Edward Coley (1833–1898). English painter. A member of the Pre-Raphaelite Brotherhood, he was accorded wide public adulation. He painted classical, religious, medieval, literary, and symbolic scenes, marked by mysticism, emotion, and erotic decoration.

Burnet, Gilbert (1643–1715). English historian and churchman, bishop of Salisbury. Deeply involved in the religious and political controversy of the times, a confidential adviser to William and Mary, Burnet found time to write two important histories: A History of the Reformation of the Church of England (1679–1714) and the History of His Own Time (1723–1734). These books, based on original documents or personal experience, are early models of scientific historical research.

Burnet, Thomas (1635–1715). English clergyman and author. He is known for his chief work Telluris Theoria Sacra (1681), translated as The Sacred Theory of the Earth, a prose exploration into the origin and development of the cosmos.

Burney, Frances (Madame de'Arblay) (1752–1840). English author. The daughter of a prominent musician and keeper of robes in the queen's household, she is chiefly known for her Diaries and Letters, 1778–1840 (1842–1848), Early Diary, 1768–1778 (1889), and her novels Evelina, or The History of a Young Lady's Entrance into the World; Cecilia, or Memoirs of an Heiress; Camilla; and The Wanderer, or, Female Disorders (1814). She was one of the first novelists to deal with the experiences of a young girl coming in contact with the social world, and may be regarded as a link between Samuel Richardson and Jane Austen in the history of the novel.

Burning Babe, The (written c. 1593, pub. 1605). A mystical religious poem by Robert Southwell in which the poet has a vision of the suffering infant Christ on Christmas day.

Burning Bush. In the Old Testament, a bush burning with fire and not consumed (Ex. 3:2). It was out of this bush that the voice of God spoke to Moses on Mount Horeb, telling him that the Children of Israel were to be delivered from the oppression of the Egyptians and brought, under the leadership of Moses, into the land of Canaan. Because of its scriptural connotation and in commemoration of its early history of persecution, the burning bush became an emblem of the Presbyterian Church.

burning ghat. A Hindu cremation place. One of the best known is at Kālighāt in Calcutta.

Burns, Robert (1756–1796). Scottish poet, generally considered the greatest of his nation. Self-educated, the son of a humble cotter and a farm laborer himself, Burns became a social as well as a literary sensation with the publication of his early poems in 1786. He is best known for his lyrics, written in the Scottish vernacular, on nature, love, patriotism, and peasant life. Among the most famous of these last are those addressed to a clergyman with whose theology he disagreed and against whom he had a personal grudge: The Holy Fair, Holy Willie's Prayer, Address to the Unco Guid, and Address to the Deil. He also wrote To a Mouse, To a Mountain Daisy, Sweet Afton, Ye Flowery Banks, A Red, Red Rose, Wha Has, John Anderson My Jo, Auld Lang Syns, and A Man's a Man for a' That, which expresses Burns's democratic opinions. His longer poems include The Cotter's Saturday Night, Tam O'Shanter, and The Jolly Beggars.

Like Chaucer and Byron, Burns was a master of the technique of using conversational rhythms in poetry. He almost always wrote to an old tune for which he sought appropriate words: "These old Scottish airs are so nobly sentimental that when one would compose for them, to south the tune, as our Scotch phrase is, over and over, is the readiest way to catch the inspiration, and raise the bard into that glorious enthusiasm so strongly characteristic of our old Scotch poetry." See Sylvander; Highland Mary; Mary Campbell.

Burnt Njal. The hero of one of the best known of the early Icelandic sagas, The Story of Burnt Njal. The plot concerns the grim blood feud between the families of two well-to-do landowners, Njal and Gunnar, who are personal friends. Hallgerda, the spiteful and selfish wife of Gunnar, is the instigator of the feud, which progresses with a regular alternation of murders between the two sides until it culminates in the burning of Njal's home and his death within.

Burnt Norton. See Four Quartets.

Burnt-Out Case, A (1960). A novel by Graham Greene. Set in a leper colony in the Congo, it is the story of a famous architect who is a spiritual leper and "burnt-out case."

Burn, Aaron (1756–1836). American politician. After distinguishing himself in the American Revolution, Burr served in the U.S. Senate (1791–1797) and organized a strong Democratic machine in New York through the previously nonpolitical Tammany Society. He was vice president (1801–1809) under Jefferson, whom he had tried in electoral votes in the election of 1800. Burr's long-standing enmity with Alexander Hamilton culminated in a duel (1804), in which Hamilton was killed and which ruined Burr personally and politically. In 1806 he became involved in a conspiracy in the Old Southwest, the nature of which has never been fully clarified, and was tried and acquitted of treason. Burr appears as a character in several novels, including H. B. Stowe's The Minister Wooning (1859), Gertrude Atherton's The Conqueror (1902), and Kenneth Roberts' Arundel (1930).

Burroughs, Edgar Rice. See Tarzan.

Burroughs, John (1837–1921). American naturalist, essayist, and poet. A farm boy who deeply loved nature, Burroughs was for a time a treasury clerk in Washington, D.C., where he met Walt Whitman. They became close friends, and Burroughs made the first biographical study of Whitman, Notes on Walt Whitman as Poet and Person (1867), a considerable portion of which was written by Whitman himself. Later the book was expanded into Walt Whitman: A Study (1896).

After working as a bank examiner (1873–1884), Burroughs settled at Riverby on the Hudson River, and the fame he acquired by his numerous essays on nature and his natural history collections attracted many visitors. He became a national figure, with his snowy white beard and his broad forehead and benign expression. He became a close friend of Theodore Roosevelt.

Reading Burroughs is for many people almost like actually seeing what he describes, so vivid, concrete, and pleasant is his writing. As he expressed it in The Summit of the Years (1915), "I go to books and nature as a bee goes to a flower, for a nectar that I can make into my own honey." His best-known collections include Wake-Robin (1871), Riverby (1894), Ways of Nature (1905), and Leaflet and Tendril (1908).

Burroughs, William S. See Beat Movement.

Burt, [Maxwell] Struthers (1882–1954). American novelist and short-story writer. Burt combined his personal knowledge of Philadelphia society and Wyoming ranches in his novel The Delectable Mountains (1918). He also wrote John O'May and Other Stories (1918), The Interpreter's House (1924), and several other volumes, including some poetry.

Burton, Sir Richard Francis (1821–1890). English explorer and writer of travel books. His First Footsteps in Eastern Africa (1856) is an account of his travels with John Speke (1827–1864). In 1858 the two went to East Africa again where Burton discovered Lake Tanganyika and Speke discovered Lake Victoria. As British consul, Burton traveled in West Africa, Brazil, Damascus, and Trieste. He published more than 30 narratives on his travels. He also made a literal translation of the Arabian Nights.

Burton, Robert (1577–1640). English churchman and prose writer. Burton entered Oxford as a student in 1593, later becoming vicar of St. Thomas, Oxford, and keeper of his college library. Thereafter he never left the little university town. He was a passionate scholar with a consuming curiosity about every phase of learning: medicine, history, literature, science, and theology. He possessed, moreover, an extraordinary memory, a great power of systematizing facts, and the gifts of eloquence, sympathy, and dry wit. Except for a few minor Latin pieces, he left only one work, The Anatomy of Melancholy, into which he poured a lifetime's hoard of classical and curious learning.

Burwell Papers. An account of Bacon's Rebellion, written around 1676 near Williamsburg, Va., by a planter named John Cotton. It was first printed in 1814 from an 18th-century copy owned by the Burwell family of Virginia. The lost original was the source for a verse history of the rebellion by Ebenezer Cook. The two epitaphs on Bacon contained in the Burwell Papers have been called the finest poems written in colonial America. See Bacon's Epitaph. The account is also known as The History of Bacon's and Ingram's Rebellion, the title of the 1866 edition.

Burry the Dead (1936). A one-act play by Irwin Shaw. A pacifist fantasy, it deals with six men, killed in World War I, who refuse to be buried and at last persuade their living fellow soldiers to join them in a revolt against war.

Busby. A tall headdress of fur worn in the British Army by hussars, artillerymen, and engineers. A bag of the same color as the facings of the regiment hangs from the top on the right.

Busch, Niven (1903– ). American writer. A successful writer of popular fiction, Busch uses backgrounds that range from the Old West to 20th-century Europe. Duel in the Sun (1944), a novel of the Southwest in the 1880's, is perhaps his best-known work. He is also the author of The Carrington Incident (1941), Day of the Conquerors (1946), The Furies (1948), The Hate Merchant (1953), The Actor (1955), and California Street (1959).

Busch, Wilhelm (1832–1908). German humorous poet and illustrator. His well known book of verses, Max und Moritz (1865), illustrated by himself, is a veiled but sometimes bitter satire of average bourgeois complacency. "Max und Moritz" is still a common phrase in German, used in reference to mischievous children in general.

Buscón, Vida del (1626). A picaresque novel by Francisco de Quevedo. Probably written about 1607, it is witty, cruel, and cynical, devoid of any feeling for humanity. Its full title is Historia de la vida del Buscón, llamado Don Pablos, ejemplo de vagamundos y espíritu de tacaño. It relates the career of Pablos, the son of a Segovian barber and a woman of loose morals, who enters the service of a young gentleman, Don Diego Coronel. They both lodge at a boarding house in Salamanca, whose keeper, the avaricious Licenciado Cabra, was probably the protototype of Dickens' Squeers. After numerous unsavory adventures, Pablos emigrates to America, where he hopes to improve his fortunes.

bushido (Japanese, "way of the warrior"). The code of ethics formerly adopted by the military leaders and feudal clan rulers of Japan. Not a written code, its provisions varied with the times, but the general emphasis was on loyalty and duty. Also involved was a certain aesthetic sensitivity and an attachment to Zen discipline.

Bisranse. See Faerie Queene, The.

Bisiris. A mythical king of Egypt, who, in order to avert a famine used to sacrifice to the gods all strangers who set foot on his shores. Hercules was seized by him; and would have fallen a victim, but he broke his chain, and slew the inhospitable king. He is the titular hero of a blood-and-thunder tragedy (1719) by Edward Young.

Busir. See Taniguchi Busir.

Bussy D'Ambois (c. 1604). A tragedy by George Chapman. Bussy, a poor countryman who has gained the patronage of Monsieur, the king's brother, finds favor at the court of Henri III, despite the enmity of the duke of Guise, whose wife Bussy has been courting. Soon, however, his attentions turn to Tamrya, countess of Montsurry, and he becomes Monsieur's rival for the lady's affections. Where Monsieur fails, Bussy succeeds and becomes Tamrya's lover. Eventually, Count Montsurry forces Tamrya, his wife, to write a letter to Bussy imploring him to come to her. Bussy falls into th trap and is killed by Montsurry.

Bussy-Rumbutin, Comte de Bussy. Roger de Rumbutin (1618–1693). French soldier and writer. His Histoire amoureuse des Gaules (Amorous History of the Gauls, 1665), a collection of anecdotes libeling ladies of the court and presenting a disagreeable portrait of his cousin Mme. de Sévigné, earned him 17 years' exile and brought his military career and royal favor to a dismal end. Not surprisingly, the book enjoyed a wild popularity. Bussy-Rumbutin was elected a member of the Académie française.

tion, The Analogy of Religion (1736). Unlike the optimistic deists, who found sufficient evidence of God's perfection and of His moral government in nature and in the heart of man, Butler stressed the imperfection of nature and of man. Accordingly, he argued that if nature, even with all its defects, furnished proof of Divine Creation, then the revealed religion of Scripture, with analogous defects, might also be considered the work of God.

Butler, Rhett. The rugged and free-living hero of Margaret Mitchell's historical novel, Gone with the Wind.

Butler, Samuel (1612–1680). English poet, most famous for Hombres, a mock-epic satirizing the Puritans. Butler's work is distinguished by its relentless exposure of cant, hypocrisy, and human absurdity, its arresting figures of speech, odd rhymes, and witty parade of learning. His Genuine Remains in Verse and Prose (1759) contains a set of Characters in the manner of Theophrastus and The Elephant in the Moon, a verse satire on the Royal Society.

Butler, Samuel (1835–1902). English satirist, Homeric scholar, and translator. Son of a clergyman and grandson of Bishop Samuel Butler, whose biography (1902) he wrote, Butler too was destined for the church; upon graduation from Cambridge, however, religious doubts caused him to abandon it and he emigrated to New Zealand (1859–1864) where he accumulated a small fortune in sheep farming.

A brilliant amateur biologist, Butler was immediately attracted to Darwin's theory of evolution, but, believing Darwin had excluded mind from the life process, he subsequently took exception to certain aspects of it in a series of criticisms which he elaborated throughout his life. His essay The Deadlock in Darwinism and his books on evolution—Life and Habit (1877), Evolution, Old and New (1879), Unconscious Memory (1880), and Luck or Cunnin? (1887)—are still very readable.

His satiric masterpiece, Erewhon, attacked contemporary attitudes in social morals, religion, and science. The Fair Heaven (1873) is a subtle, ironic attack on revealed religion presented in the guise of a convincing defense of the gospels, yet in fact undermining them. Erewhon Revisited is a continuation of his attack on revealed religions.

Butler also wrote The Authorcs of the Odyssey (1897), in which he seriously defends his conviction that the Odyssey was written by a woman; Shakespeare's Sonnets Reconsidered (1899); and The Way of All Flesh, a novel, and perhaps his best-known work. He was an extremely versatile, original, and brilliant writer, one of the most searching critics of his age.

Butor, Michel (1926– ). French novelist and essayist of the New Wave. A Change of Heart (La Modification, 1957; also translated as Second Thoughts and Passing Time L'Emploi du Temps; 1956) are experimental novels showing the effect of the passage of time on human relationships. His other novels, too, deal symbolically with psychological rather than objective time and memory: Passage de Milan (1954) and Degrees (1960). He explained his literary theories in Le Genie du Lieu (1958) and the autobiographical Repertoire (1960).

Buuzfuz, Serjeant. In Charles Dickens' Pickwick Papers, the plumed retained by Dodson and Fogg for the plaintiff in the celebrated case of Baddell v. Pickwick. Serjeant Buuzfuz is an able orator, who proves that Mr. Pickwick's innocent note about "chops and tomato sauce" is a declaration of love, and that his reminder "not to forget the warming-pan" is only a flimsy cover to express the ardor of his affection.

Byles, Mather (1707–1788). American clergyman and poet. The son of a Boston saddler, and nephew of Cotton Mather, Byles graduated from Harvard in 1725. His two chief collections were Poems on Several Occasions (1744) and The Conflagration (1755), verse greatly influenced by Alexander Pope with whom Byles corresponded. A sort of official greeter for New England, Byles was the most noted wit of 18th century America.

byliny. The epic poems of the Russian peasantry in song form. A number of specific heroes reappear throughout these songs. Their feats are fantastic and are often engagingly ingenuous. Many of the byliny are divided into cycles, such as the cycle of Kiev, the cycle of Novgorod, the cycle of Ivan the Terrible, and others. They range in time from the earliest mythological periods to the 18th century.

Byrd, William (1543–1623). English composer. Known in 16th-century Europe as the "Father of Music," he wrote much church music, chamber and instrumental music, and a number of songs and madrigals on texts by Sir Philip Sidney, Ovid, Ariosto, and other famous poets. He is considered to have originated the solo song with string accompaniment. Although he wrote music for the Anglican Church, Byrd remained a devout Catholic.

Byrd, William (1674–1744). American historian of the Virginia colony, scholar, explorer, and member of the Royal Society of London, one of the most cultivated men in colonial America. His best-known works are The History of the Dividing Line, concerning the dispute over the boundary between Virginia and North Carolina; A Journey to the Land of Eden; and A Progress to the Mines. They are included in a collection of his papers, known as The Westover Manuscripts, first published in 1841. Diaries which Byrd kept in shorthand as a hobby for several years were discovered nearly 200 years after his death and published as The Secret Diary of William Byrd of Westover (1941) and Another Secret Diary (1942).

Byrne, Donn. Original name, Brian Oswald Dom-Byrne (1889–1928). Irish-American novelist and short-story writer. Best known for his novel Messia Marco Polo, Donn Byrne always tried to hide the fact that he had been born in Brooklyn. A romantic imagination, the use of fantasy, and a graceful style mark his writing. Blind Writing (1924) is a novel about the Gaelic poet Anthony Raftery (1745–1835). His many stories were collected in The Changeling (1923), Rivers of Damascus (1931), and The Woman of the Shee (1932).

Byron, George Gordon [Noel]. 6th Baron Byron of Rochdale. Called Lord Byron (1788–1824). English poet. In both his works and his life he created the "Byronic hero"—a defiant, melancholy young man, brooding on some mysterious, unforgivable sin in his past. Whatever Byron's sin was, he never told, but neither did he deny the legends of wildness, evil, and debauchery that grew up about his name. The heroes of Byron's poems are generally swashbuckling brigands who perform heroic feats. Byron himself, however, was short, somewhat stout, and limped from a club foot.

His profligate father died when Byron was three years old, and he was raised in Scotland by his mother. He was educated at Harrow and at Trinity College, Cambridge, receiving an M.A. from the latter in 1808. In 1809 he took his seat in the House of Lords, having come into the family title and estates through the death of his great-uncle in 1798. His first published work, Hours of Idleness, a collection of poems, was given a devastating, although accurate, review by the Edinburgh Review. This review was answered by Byron in the virulent satire, English Bards and Scotch Reviewers. After a very short time in Parliament, Byron and his friend J. C. Hobhouse left England for a tour of the Mediterranean that took them from Spain to the Near East. The trip fired Byron's romantic nature with tantalizing views of the Orient and supplied material for many of his later works.

Following his return to England (1811), Byron published the first two cantos of Childe Harold's Pilgrimage, a fictionalized account of his trip. Childe Harold was an immediate success; as Byron put it, he woke up one morning to find himself famous. In the next two years he published The Giaour (1813), The Bride of Abysos, The Corsair, and Lara (1814).

Byron was much admired by women and had been involved in several intrigues before he married Anne Isabella Milbanke in 1815. However, his promiscuous behavior after the marriage completely destroyed his reputation. Shortly after the birth of their daughter (1815), Lady Byron separated from her husband. Byron later spoke bitterly of the marriage, referring to their honeymoon as a "treaclemoon," and once a deed of separation had been signed he left England, never to return.

He traveled to Switzerland, where he lived with the Shelleys at Lake Geneva. Byron began a liaison with Jane Clairmont, but moved restlessly on, arriving in Venice in November, 1816, in the company of his friend Hobhouse. He spent the next six years in Italy, always championing and often taking part in the Italian nationalist movement. In 1819, Byron met and fell in love with the 17-year-old countess Theresa Guiccioli, and critics have attributed much of the poet's enthusiasm for Italy to her influence. With Leigh Hunt, Byron edited The Liberal (1822), but after the collapse of the Carbonari movement they were left without a cause. The next year, following the death of Shelley, Byron outfitted a ship and sailed to Greece to take part in the battle for Greek independence. He died, fever-stricken, at Missolonghi in January, 1824. After being given full military honors in Greece, his body was shipped back to England for burial at Newstead Abbey, his baronial seat.

Byron's poetic output was never slowed down by his political and personal adventures. While in Italy he finished Childe Harold (1816, 1817) and wrote The Siege of Corinth, Parina, and The Prisoner of Chillon, all poetic narratives. In 1817 he wrote his first poetic drama, Manfred, which was followed by * Marino Faliero, Cain, a Mystery* (1821), Heaven and Earth (1822), Werner, and The Deformed Transformed. Among Byron's most accomplished works are his satires, such as Beppe, *The Vision of Judgement, in which he answers the attack on him by the poet Robert Southey; The Age of Bronze (1823); and his masterpiece, Don Juan. Don Juan, begun in 1819, was still unfinished when Byron died. This 16,000 line poem in 16 cantos was continually added to by the poet, and as such it can be read as a contemporaneous account of the author's moods and feelings. Byron used Don Juan as a platform to express many of his sardonic opinions of people and events. The protagonist is, of course, Byron himself, only thinly disguised as the famous Spanish rake.

As a poet and especially as one of the English romantics, Byron has found less favor than Keats or Shelley; he is looked on as the embodiment of romanticism rather than its spokesman. The bizarre aspects of Byron's life have somewhat overshadowed his technical virtuosity as a poet: the man has been more closely examined than his work. However, at its best Byron's poetry shows an extraordinary rhyming ability combined with a free-flowing, dynamic style. His work rarely has the profundity found in that of Shelley or Keats, but his opus as a whole is a forceful expression of the majesty and desolation of history, the vanity of pomp, and the fleeting quality of fame. His work has always been more popular in Europe, especially Germany, than in England and the U.S. See Destruction of Sennacherib, The.

Byron, Harriet. See Sir Charles Grandison.

Byrsa. The citadel of Carthage. It was built, according to legend, by Dido, who was told by the local ruler that she might purchase as much land as could be enclosed within a bull's hide. By cutting the hide into narrow strips, she obtained a sizable piece of land. The hide (Gr., byrsa) supposedly gave the place its name; historically, the name comes from a Phoenician word meaning citadel.

Byzantine Empire. The eastern or Greek division of the Roman Empire, sometimes called the Later or Eastern Roman Empire. For the purposes of administration, Diocletian (c. 284-305) divided the rule of the empire among four emperors, an experiment that led to 20 years of civil strife after his abdication. The empire was reunited in 324 when Constantine the Great, defeating all his rivals, became sole ruler of the whole empire.

The Byzantine Empire may be dated from Constantine's creation of a second capital, modeled on Rome, at Byzantium which he renamed Constantinople (now Istanbul). From the establishment of this city as a second Rome the division of east from west was formalized, and the east soon emerged as the dominant half. More important, unlike Rome with its pagan history, Constantinople was, from the very first Christian, and it was Greek, thus dividing east from west still further. As Rome declined and finally fell (476), the Byzantine Empire flourished; it was a major, if not the major, power in Europe up to the mid-11th century. Politically, it played the highly significant role of protecting Europe, through the Middle Ages, against invasions from western Asia. The absolute monarchy, with the monarch elected by God, instituted by Constantine the Great remained largely unchanged throughout the long life of the empire, which fell at the hands of the Turks in 1453. See Justinian.

The iconography of the Byzantine Empire developed out of Christian symbolism. Its chief features are the circle, dome, and round arch; its chief symbols are the lily, cross, vesica, and nimbus. Saint Sophia at Constantinople and Saint Mark's at Venice are fine exemplars of Byzantine architecture and decoration.

Byzantium. A city on the European shore at the mouth of the Thracian Bosporus. It was first established by Megarian colonists (c. 657 B.C.). In the sixth century B.C. it came under Persian rule and then alternately under Spartan and Athenian rule in the fifth and fourth centuries. After its revolt from the second Athenian League (357), it was independent and became an ally of Rome at the time of the Third Macedonian War. It subsequently came under Roman rule and was chosen by Constantine the Great for his new capital; he renamed it Constantinople, and it is now called Istanbul, a major city in Turkey.

Byzantium appears as a central symbol in the poetry of William Butler Yeats. It occurs in Sailing to Byzantium and Byzantium, where it represents the richness of an artistic civilization and the triumph of art over time and death.
Caaba or al Caaba. See KAABA.

Cabal. In English history, an influential clique of ministers at the court of Charles II from 1667 to 1674. The group derived its name from the initials of its members (Clifford, Ashley, Buckingham, Arlington, and Lauderdale), who were notorious for their intrigues and corruption. The word cabal, which is now used to signify a body of political intriguers, was probably popularized by the activities of the English Cabal, but it had long been associated with secrecy and magic. See CABALA.

cabala or kabbalah. The oral traditions of the Jews, said to have been delivered by Moses to the rabbis and handed down through the centuries by word of mouth. The word comes from qabbalah, the Hebrew word for "tradition," and in the Middle Ages was a popular term for the Jewish theosophy describing the World of Souls. The rabbis, or cabalists, who were the guardians of the cabala were feared as possessing secrets of magical powers.

Caballero, Fernán. Pen name of Cecilia Boeing de Faber (1796–1877). Spanish novelist. Of Spanish descent, Fernán Caballero was born in Switzerland but emigrated to Spain in 1813. The appearance of her first novel, La Gaviota (The Seagull, 1849) marked the beginning of the regional school in Spanish literature. The tale relates the progress of a low-born singer who marries a German surgeon, becomes a well-known opera star, has an affair with a bull-fighter, and after marrying again, returns to her native province. Set in Andalusia, the novel is noted for its colorful descriptions of life in that province. She also wrote Clemencia (1852) and La familia de Alvedra (1856).

Cabbages and Kings (1904). A volume of 19 connected stories by O. Henry. The stories are set in a fictional country called Corallo in Central America. The title, from the ballad of the Walrus and the Carpenter in Lewis Carroll's Alice in Wonderland, announces the intention "to talk of many things." The picture of life presented is one of mingled romance and realism.

Cabell, James Branch (1879-1958). American novelist and essayist. Cabell belonged to an old Virginian family, and some of his most laborious writings are concerned with the genealogies of his own and other families. His first book, The Eagle's Shadow, appeared in 1904. While writing his second book, Gallantry (1907), Cabell became irritated by having to describe a scene he had never visited. As a result, he created his own mythical country, the medieval French province of Poities, the name of which is probably a compound of Poitiers and Angoulême. In a long series of symbolic and satirical novels, he traced the history of the imaginary province from 1234 to 1750, describing in great detail its laws, easy sexual morality, courtly manners, legends, and habits. (See Dom MANUEL).

It was not until the publication of JURGEN in 1919 that Cabell received any popular success, and his acceptance was due largely to the attempt to suppress the book on the grounds of immorality. In the 18-volume Storiende Edition (1927-1930), Cabell arranged the Poitisme novels in sequence of action rather than in the order in which they were published. Among the books in the series are Beyond Life (1919), The Soul of Melicent (1913; revised as Dommei, 1920), Chivalry (1909), Jurgen, Gallantry (1907), The Cream of the Jest, The Silver Stallion (1926), and Something about Eve (1927). Cabell also wrote numerous books of poetry and non-fiction.

When asked how to pronounce his name, Cabell rhymed, "Tell the rabble my name is Cabell."

Cabeza de Vaca, Alvar Núñez (c. 1490–c. 1557), Spanish explorer and governor. Cabeza de Vaca saw military action in Italy and Spain before joining an ill-fated expedition (1528) to Florida under Pánfilo da Narváez, during which he and a few companions were marooned on Galveston Island near Texas. After spending six years as a merchant among Indian tribes in the area, Cabeza de Vaca began his long journey back to civilization. During a period of captivity among the natives, he met two other Spaniards and a Negro slave, also survivors of the Narváez expedition; the four of them managed to escape and headed for Mexico, winning the favor of Indians along the way by healing the sick. They reached Culiacán on the Pacific coast of Mexico in 1536. Cabeza de Vaca himself described his adventures in Naufragios (1542).

In 1540 he was appointed governor of the province of La Plata in South America. After an unsuccessful attempt to reach the legendary city of Manoa, he was deposed by a revolt in Asunción, supposedly because he was usurping royal authority, but probably because he insisted on decent treatment for the Indians.

Cable, George Washington (1844–1925). American short-story writer and novelist. He is known for his tales dealing with the Creoles of New Orleans; Cable was part of the local color movement of the late 19th century, and a master of the various dialects of his native city. His first literary success was Old Creole Days, a collection of stories to which Madame Delphine (1881) was added in later editions. The Grandissimes, a complex novel of social forces and his most widely read work today, showed Cable to be an important writer whose treatment of race relations and violence was to foreshadow such later Southern writers as William Faulkner and Robert Penn Warren. Dr. Sevier (1884) attacked the corruption of New Orleans in the period before the Civil War.

An enemy of slavery and a reformer, Cable published The Silent South in 1885. This argument for better treatment of Negroes and for prison reform increased the animosity of the Creoles toward Cable, forcing him to move to Massachusetts, where he continued to write on social problems in The Negro Question (1888) and The Southern Struggle for Pure Government (1890). Cable's later fiction is thought to be inferior to his earlier work. It includes Strong Hearts (1889), "Poison Jote" and Père Raphael (1909), and Gideon's Band (1914).

Cabet, John (1450–1498) and Sebastian (c. 1476–1557). Outstanding Italian navigators and explorers. The senior Cabet traveled to the Orient in 1480 in hope of improving the spice trade. While there he became impressed with the need for a northwest passage to Cathay: this was to become the ruling passion of his career and that of his son. Cabet traveled to England, settling in Bristol, where he received a patent of discovery from Henry VII and set sail in 1497 accompanied by his son on a voyage of discovery. He reached Baffin Land and cruised along the Newfoundland coast, which he thought to be Asia; a second voyage in 1498 carried him to the Delaware Capes and Hatteras. He is generally credited with the discovery of the North American continent.

His son Sebastian, an expert cartographer as well as explorer, made an unsuccessful attempt to locate the Northwest Passage in 1509. He was then commissioned by the Spanish to explore the possibility of a southwest passage to the Pacific and from 1526 to 1529, he was in South America, following the River Plate. In 1533 he became the governor of a joint stock Company of Merchant Adventurers whose aim was to find a northeast passage to China; their expedition reached Russia and opened trade possibilities instead. Sebastian died wealthy and famous, but he never realized his elusive goal.

caccia. A poem in free verse, employing mainly short lines. Popular during the Italian Renaissance, caccia are generally used to portray hunting scenes or any outdoor experience, serving to provide the necessary shouts, exclamations, and conversational examples that form the body of the poem. The literal meaning of the word caccia is the hunt or chase. Many poems cast in this form appeared, usually anonymously, between 1350 and 1450; these were set to music but few have survived.

Caccini, Giulio (1546–1618). Italian musician and composer. Caccini was a member of the Florentine Camerata, a group of theorists and composers, including V. Galleli, Peri, Rinuccini, and Montevedi, who created the first operas. He wrote the music, not extant, for Chiabrera's Rapimento di Cefalo, performed in 1600.

Cacus. In Roman mythology, a famous robber son of Vulcan. He is represented as three-headed, and vomiting flames; he lived in Italy, and was strangled by Hercules. It is thought that, with his sister Caca, Cacus was actually a primitive god of the hearthfire.

Cadalso y Vázquez, José (1741–1782). Spanish poet, essayist, and soldier. Once described as a man who wrote classicism and lived romanticism, Cadalso is best known for such satirical works as Los eruditos a la violeta (1772), directed against superficial learning, and Cartas marruecas (1789), essays notable for their acute analysis of Spanish decadence. Noches lúgubres (1792) are prose dialogues in which he described an attempt to disinter the body of his dead mistress. His best poetry appears in Ocio de mi juventud (1772).

Cade, Jack [originally John] (d. 1450). Irish-born English rebel who assumed the name of Mortimer and claimed York kinship. He led an insurrection, usually called "Cade's Rebellion," of about 30,000 heavily armed Kentishmen protesting oppressive taxation and unjust administration of the government under King Henry VI. They defeated a royal army and occupied London (July, 1450) for two days, executing two of the king's ministers. On the third day, however, their plundering turned the citizenry against them. Cade tried to make a stand, but a promise of pardon dispersed most of his army, and he was pursued into Sussex and slain. He appears in Shakespeare's Henry VI: Part II, and in R. T. Coriad's tragedy Jack Cade (1835), rewritten as Aylmere (1852) and very popular in 19th-century America.

Cadessus. One of Swift's many pseudonyms, an anagram of decanus (Lat., "dean"). It appears in Cadessus and Vanessa (1713, pub. 1726), one of Swift's best poems, which gives an account of his relationship with Esther Vanhomrigh and was written to dispel her passion for him. The poem also reflects Swift's zeal for improving the minds of young ladies, which had begun with his tutorship of Esther Johnson. At the request of Esther Vanhomrigh, Cadessus and Vanessa was published after her death.

Cade's Rebellion. See Jack Cade.

Cadignan, Diane de. The Duchess of Maufri-agneuse, afterwards Princess of Cadignan. One of Balzac's most heartless and brilliant women, the Princess is the mistress of many of the men who appear in the novels of La Comédie humaine. She is the heroine of Les Secrets de la Princesse de Cadignan.

Cadmus (Kadmós). In Greek mythology, a son of Agenor and Telephassa. Sent from their Phoeni- can home to seek their sister Europe, he and his brothers were told not to return without her. The Delphic oracle advised him to give up the search and to found a city where a cow with a moon-shaped mark lay down to rest. This he did at Thebes in Boeotia. Killing a dragon sacred to Ares, he sowed its teeth and armed men sprang up from the ground (see also Sparti). When he flung a stone among them, they killed each other, except for five who became his allies.

At a wedding attended by the gods Cadmus married Harmonia, daughter of Ares and Aphrodite; she bore him a son, Polydorus, and four daughters, Autonoë, Ino, Agave, and Semele. He fortified the Theban acropolis, the Cadmeia. In his old age he resigned the throne to his grandson Pentheus, after whose early death Cadmus and Harmonia migrated. to Illyria and ultimately became serpents. Through Polydorus, Cadmus fathered the ill-fated dynasty that ended with Oedipus' grandsons. He appears in Euripides' tragedy The Bacchae as a follower of Semele's son Dionysus. (See Bacchae, The.)

Cadou, René Guy (1920–1951). French poet. The best of his deceptively simple and sentimental poetry is collected in Poèmes Choisis (1950) and Héliéne; ou, le règne végétal (1952).

Caduceus. An ancient Greek herald's wand (kerkyōn) entwined with snakes or ribbons. Perhaps originally associated in Greek religion with fertility daimones (see daemon) it became especially identified with Hermes, the herald of the gods, and Asclepius (Aesculapius), the demigod of healing. Through the latter, it became a symbol of the physician's profession, as it is today.

Caedmon (d. 680?). Old English religious poet. According to Bede he was an illiterate herdsmen who received divine inspiration in a dream to write religious poetry. He entered a monastery and made narrative poetry in alliterative verse of the scriptural histories told to him. Actually, there is only one hymn which he certainly composed; the rest of the "Caedmonian manuscript" is the work of several different authors. The first "book" has adaptations of Genesis, Exodus, and Daniel. The second, called Christ and Satan, is of much later date, perhaps even ninth century (see Cynewulf).

Caerlon (Welsh, "city of legions"). A place name prominent in Arthurian legend as the seat of King Arthur's court. The most noted early references to Caerlon in connection with Arthurian literature occur in the writings of the Welsh historians. From Geoffrey of Monmouth (12th century), for example, we learn that Caerlon was situated on the river Usk, that it was founded by Belinus, and that it became the archbishopric for Cambria (Wales). See Camelot; Carduel.

Caesar, [Caius] Julius (100–44 B.C.). Roman general and statesman. After a brilliant early career in politics, where he distinguished himself in oratory, and in generalship which he displayed in Spain (61–60 B.C.), Caesar was elected consul in 59. In the same year he joined with Pompey and Crassus in the First Triumvirate. After his consulate, as was customary, he was allotted the governorship of a province: his choice was Gaul. For nine years (58–49) he pushed back the boundaries of Roman Gaul until he had conquered all of central Europe from the Rhine to the Pyrenees. In 49, Pompey and the leaders of the Senate, fearing the prestige of Caesar and the strength of his fanatically loyal legions, ordered him to resign his command and return to Rome without his army. This he refused to do; "The die is cast," he is reported to have said as he led his army across the Rubicon into Italy. Pompey fled together with many members of the senatorial party, including Cicero and Cato the Younger. Following his opponents to Thessaly in northern Greece, Caesar defeated them in the battle of Pharsalus (48). In subsequent campaigns, he secured his firm hold on the empire in several ways: he placed Cleopatra on the throne of Egypt (47); he defeated the king of Pontus at the Battle of Zela (47); he crushed the remainder of the senatorial army at Thapsus in North Africa (46). His return to Rome in the spring of 46 was marked by lavish public festivals. He was hailed as a demigod; the name of the fifth month (Quintilis) in the Roman calendar was changed to Julius (July) in his honor. During the year that followed, Caesar made many reforms in the senatorial system and in the general management of the empire. His most durable reform, however, was his revision of the calendar. With the help of an Alexandrian astronomer, he established the Julian calendar which, with minor changes, is the one we use today. It went into effect on January 1, 45 B.C.

Opposition to Caesar on the part of the aristocratic party was still seething beneath the surface of Roman politics. On March 15, 44 (the Ides of March, a group led by Caesus Longinus and Marcus Junius Brutus assassinated Caesar, thus bringing to a sudden end uncompleted plans for the reorganization of Rome and the empire.

Caesar was one of the foremost orators of his age; only Cicero was esteemed the more persuasive of the two speakers. He also found time to record some of the history that he himself helped to make. His Commentaries on the Gallic War (51) and his Commentaries on the Civil War (45), which was unfinished, show him as a clear and vigorous prose stylist.

Even in his lifetime, the name Caesar represented the Roman Imperium. By the time of Christ—75 years later—it was used to connote civil government.
When Diocletian, at the end of the third century, split the empire into East and West, he appointed two Caesars as vice-regents. Through the Middle Ages to the present day, Caesar's name has survived as Kaiser and Czar. (See JULIAN EMPERORS.)

Caesar appears in many historical dramas, notably in Shakespeare's JULIUS CAESAR and George Bernard Shaw's CAESAR AND CLEOPATRA. In JULIUS CAESAR, Brutus is actually the main interest of the play while Caesar is drawn as a weakling and a braggart. This characterization has often been criticized as untrue to history.

Caesar's famous dispatch "Veni, vidi, vici" (I came, I saw, I conquered) was written to the senate to announce his overthrow of Parnaces, king of Pontus.

Caesar's wife must be above suspicion. When Pompeia's name became linked with Clodius', Caesar divorced her, not because he believed her to be guilty, but because the wife of Caesar must not even be suspected of crime. See CALPURNIA.

CAESAR AND CLEOPATRA (1906). A play by George Bernard Shaw. A wise, unsentimental Caesar is the center of a loose plot about political intrigue in ancient Egypt. Shaw gives unfamiliar personalities to both Caesar and Cleopatra. Not Shakespeare's "serpent of the old Nile," this Cleopatra is a giddy teenager, convinced the Romans are monsters. Under Caesar's tutelage she loses her charm and becomes a precocious adult. Caesar, balding and practical, is amused by Cleopatra, history, and himself. Shaw's plot is taken directly from Plutarch's Parallel Lives.

cæsura. In prosody, a break or pause in the flow of a line of poetry for rhetorical effect. The cæsura is as related to meaning as to verse technique, since it must be occasioned by a sense pause such as the end of one sentence and the beginning of another. Formerly subject to the strict rules of classical prosody, the cæsura is now used freely and naturally to vary the music of the line and thus of the entire poem.

Caffè, II (Ital., "The Coffeehouse"). An Italian literary gazette (1764-1766). Although carrying some articles of a purely literary nature, it was mainly concerned with promoting economic, social, and political reform on the basis of ideas formulated by the luminaries of the French Enlightenment. The review's founders and chief contributors were the economist Pietro Verri (1728-1797), his brother Alessandro, and the penologist Cesare Beccaria. Voltaire and d'Alembert praised its efforts to familiarize the Italian public with French rationalist thought.

CAGLIOSTRO, Count Alessandro di. Real name: GIUSEPPE BALSAMO (1743-1795). Italian charlatan. He traveled throughout Europe with his wife, posing as a man of rank and duping the credulous with his feats of magic and alchemy. Later the couple founded a secret masonic sect which gained many adherents. Implicated in the DIAMOND NECKLACE AFFAIR in 1785, he was imprisoned in the Bastille. In Rome he was condemned to death by the Inquisition for heresy, but the sentence was commuted to life imprisonment.

Cahan, Abraham (1860-1951). Russian-born American novelist and editor. Cahan came to America in 1882, joined the staff of Yiddish journals in New York City, and became a founder and editor-in-chief of the Jewish Daily Forward. His best-known novel is THE RISE OF DAVID LEVINSKY, dealing with the archetypal immigrant experience. Other works include Yekl, A Tale of the New York Ghetto (1896) and The Imported Bridesgroom and Other Stories of the New York Ghetto (1898).

Cahiers de la quinzaine. See Charles Péguy.

Calaphas. In the New Testament, a high priest before whom Jesus was brought to trial. He was a member of the Sanhedrin.

Cain. In the Old Testament, the son of Adam and Eve and murderer of his brother Abel. Cain killed his brother out of jealousy when Abel's sacrifice of the firstlings of his flock proved more acceptable to Jehovah than his own sacrifice of the firstling of the ground. Then Jehovah, to signify his disapproval cast his curse upon him and made Cain "a fugitive and a vagabond in the earth." The rivalry of a shepherd for the approval of a deity is as old as Sumerian literature (see DUMUZI).

According to Muslim tradition, Cain refused to follow his father's desire that he marry Abel's twin sister, Jumella, and instead married his own twin sister Aclima. God rejected Cain's sacrifice to signify his disapproval of this marriage.

Byron wrote a dramatic poem Cain, a Mystery (1821) based on the Bible narrative. Coleridge's prose poem The Wanderings of Cain (1798) is on the same subject.

Cain, James M[allahah] (1892- ). American novelist. Cain established a reputation as a writer of hard-boiled fiction with his first novel, The Postman Always Rings Twice (1934). It is the story of a young hobo who has a love affair with the wife of the owner of a roadside stand and plots with her to murder her husband and collect his insurance. Later novels include Serenade (1957), Mildred Pierce (1941), Fast All Dishonor (1946), and Mignon (1955).

Caine, [Sir Thomas Henry] Hall (1853-1931). English novelist. His books were phenomenally successful and earned him a fortune. Among the best known are The Manxman (1894), The Eternal City (1901), and The Prodigal Son (1904). As a young man he served as secretary to D. G. Rossetti, and published his Recollections of the poet in 1882.

Caine Mutiny, The (1951). A novel by Herman Wouk. It takes place aboard the Caine, a World War II mine sweeper, whose officers rebel against the cowardly and inefficient Captain Queeg. A book of sustained and gripping narrative power, it had a tremendous impact on the American reading public. A section of it was later equally effectively dramatized by the author as The Caine Mutiny Court Martial (1953).

Çâ Êra (Fr. "it will go"). Name and refrain of a popular patriotic song (1790) of the French Revolution. The rallying cry was borrowed from Benjamin Franklin, who used to say in reference to the American revolution, "Aï, çâ Êra" ("We'll succeed!").

Caïus, Dr. An irascible French physician in Shakespeare's Merry Wives of Windsor. His courtship of Anne Page has the backing of her mother, Mrs. Page.

Cakes and Ale (1930). A novel by W. Somerset Maugham. It is a satire of English literary life in which Ashenden and Keir (a popular novelist based on Hugh Walpole) re-examine the life of the great

Cakes and Ale (1930)
Victorian writer Driffield. Driffield was said to be based on Thomas Hardy, but Maugham vigorously denied it. The central character is Rosie, Driffield's first wife, an exuberant, promiscuous barmaid.

Calais (Kalais). See ARGONAUTS.

Calamity Jane. The nickname of Martha Jane Burke (1852–1903). Born in a Montana mining community, she was a well-known frontier character, pony-express rider, and scout. She became the heroine of Deadwood Dick on Deck, or Calamity Jane the Heroine of Whoop Up, one of a series of dime novels by Edward L. Wheeler that began in 1884. The name has come to be a synonym for one who is always predicting misfortune, one who puts the worst possible interpretation on any turn of events.

Calamus (1860). A group of poems in Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass. Intended as a complementary section to Children of Adam, the poems celebrate "the manly love of comrades." Calamus is a hardy and aromatic kind of grass or rush, often called sweet flag.

Calandrino and the Heliotrope. A tale from Giovanni Boccaccio's The Decameron. It tells of the simplicon Calandrino and his belief that there is a stone called the heliotrope that can make him invisible. Imagining he has found it, he eludes his friends Bruno and Buffalmacco and returns home. When his wife scolds him for bringing home so many stones, he beats her, convinced that she has destroyed the virtues of his find. Only when his friends confess the jest, is he persuaded not to beat her again. Calandrino appears in several of the Decameron stories.

Calderón de la Barca [y Henao], Pedro (1600–1681). Spanish dramatist, one of his country's great literary figures. Born in Madrid of a prosperous family of the lower aristocracy, Calderón was educated at the Jesuit college there and attended the university at Salamanca. Beginning his literary career about 1620, he was a soldier as well as a successful playwright. In 1651 he became a priest. After his ordination he wrote only autos sacramentales and command plays for the court theater.

Calderón brought to the theater a fine power of reasoning, an intellectual outlook, a keen dramatic instinct, and a delicate imagination. He was a typical writer of the Baroque period, frequently given to metaphors and artificially imposed symbols. His philosophy was influenced by such stoics as Epictetus and Seneca and by St. Augustine and St. Thomas Aquinas. His pessimism can be traced to a biblical origin in the Book of Job and Ecclesiastes. Most of the comedias and autos written at the end of his life proclaim the vanity of life and the emptiness of human existence.

Calderón wrote more than 120 plays and some 70 autos; there are, in addition, about 20 short pieces, such as entretemes and zarzuelas. Among the best-known works of Calderón's early period, in which he gave vent to his rebellious and restless personality, are El alcalde de Zalamea, considered one of his finest plays; La devoción de la cruz (Devotion to the Cross), which shows how devotion to the cross can negate even the most heinous crimes; El cisma de Inglaterra, dealing with Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn; La niña de Gómera Arias; and Luis Pérez el Gallego.

Like other dramatists of Spain's Golden Age, Calderón wrote several dramas based on padronor, or the point of honor, a theme with which he is often associated. The concept in this case is limited to conjugal honor. According to the code, apparently condoned by Calderón, the barest rumor of a wife's infidelity gave her husband the right to take her life. Plays in this vein include El médico de su honra, A secreto agravió, secreta venganza, and El pintor de su deshonra.

Calderón also wrote intricate, ingenious comedias de capa y espada, or cloak-and-sword comedies, filled with duels, secret hiding places, and veiled women. Among the best of these are Hombre pobre todo es traza, El astrólogo fingido, and La dama duende. In the more philosophical epoch of Calderón's career, the following plays are noteworthy: La vida es sueño, often considered his masterpiece; El mágico prodigioso; En esta vida todo es verdad y todo es mentira; and Saber del bien y del mal.

Calderón is regarded as the outstanding writer of autos sacramentales, a genre which he perfected. His autos include El gran teatro del mundo, La cena de Báltazar, and El divino Orfeo.

Caldwell, Erskine [Preston] (1903— ). American novelist and short-story writer. A native of the Deep South, Caldwell is noted for his vivid studies, earthy or starkly tragic, of life among Southern sharecroppers and Negroes in Georgia's back country. In spite of its implied plea for social justice, Caldwell's work has often been attacked on the grounds of immorality. TOBACCO ROAD is his best-known novel, though God's LITTLE ACRE has also been tremendously popular.

Caldwell began his career with some powerful short stories, notably Country Full of Sweats (1933). He collaborated with Margaret Bourke-White, his former wife, on three picture-and-comment documentaries, including You Have Seen Their Faces (1937). During World War II, they were in Russia as war correspondents, an experience which produced his All Out on the Road to Smolensk (1942) and other works. Call It Experience (1951) is a literary autobiography. Other works of fiction include Trouble in July (1940); two volumes of short stories, Jackpot (1940) and The Sure Hand of God (1947); A Place Called Esteville (1949); another volume of stories, The Courting of Susie Brown (1952); and Claudelle Inglish (1959).

Caldwell, [Janet Miriam] Taylor (1900— ). English-born American novelist. Miss Caldwell's career, during which she produced a long succession of best sellers, began with Dyson of Death (1938), a story of two families who control a huge munitions trust. This story was continued in The Eagles Gather (1940) and The Final Hour (1944). The Earth Is the Lord's (1941) is a romance about Genghis Khan, and The Turnbults (1943) describes the life of an English cotton industrialist. She again dealt with families of wealth and power in This Side of Innocence (1946). Other books include Dear and Glorious Physician (1959) and Your Sins and Mine (1961). Miss Caldwell has occasionally used the pseudonym Max Reiner.
Caliban. In the Old Testament, a Hebrew leader at the time of the conquest of Canaan. He was one of the 12 spies sent by the Israelites to appraise the strength of Canaan and to judge whether the Israelites were strong enough to invade it. Because he and Joshua were the only ones who reported favorably, they were the only ones of their generation permitted to enter the Promised Land.

Caleb Williams, The Adventures of, or Things as They Are (1794). A novel by William Godwin. Highly suspenseful, it anticipates, in some respects, detective fiction, and is social commentary on the relative positions of the privileged and lower classes.

Caleb Williams is a young man in the service of Falkland, an aristocrat who values his good name above everything else. Quite accidentally, Caleb discovers that Falkland has committed a murder for which an innocent person has been executed. Although Caleb would never reveal his master’s crime, Falkland has him imprisoned on false charges. Caleb then escapes from prison, but is relentlessly tracked down by the suspicious Falkland. As a last resort, Caleb tells the truth and Falkland is forced to confess. Caleb suffers terrible self-reproach at having caused his master’s ruin. This novel was dramatized by George Colman, the younger, under the title of The Iron Chest.

Caledonia. Scotland; the ancient Roman name, now used only in poetry and in a few special connections.

calendar (from Persian galandar). A member of a begging order of dervishes, founded in the 13th century by Qalandar Yusuf al-Andalusi, a native of Spain, who obliged its members to be perpetual wanderers. This feature has made the calenders prominent in Eastern romance. The story of the Three Calenders in the Arabian Nights is well known; they are three royal princes, disguised as begging dervishes, each of whom has lost his right eye.

Tale of the First Calender. No names are given. This calender was the son of a king, and nephew of another king. While on a visit to his uncle, his father died and the vizier usurped the throne. When the prince returned, he was seized and his right eye pulled out. The uncle died and the usurping vizier made himself master of this kingdom also. The hapless young prince assumed the garb of a calender, wandered to Baghdad, and being received into the house of “the three sisters,” tells his tale in the hearing of the Caliph Haroun-al-Raschid.

Tale of the Second Calender. No names given. This calender, like the first, was the son of a king. On his way to India he was attacked by robbers, and though he contrived to escape, lost all his possessions. In his flight, he came to a large city where he encountered a tailor who gave him food and lodging. In order to earn a living, he became a woodman and accidentally discovered an underground palace in which a beautiful lady was kept confined by an evil genius. Intent on liberating her, he kicked down the talisman; the genius killed the lady and turned the prince into an ape. As an ape he was taken on board ship and transported to a large commercial city where he was made vizier to the sultan. The sultan’s daughter undertook to disenchant him, but to accomplish this she had to fight with the malignant genius. She succeeded in killing the genius and restoring the enchanted prince, but received such severe injuries in the struggle that she died, and a spark of fire that flew into the right eye of the prince destroyed it. The sultan was so heartbroken at the death of his only child that he insisted on the prince’s quitting the kingdom without delay. He assumed the garb of a calender and being received into the hospitable house of the three sisters, tells his tale before Caliph Haroun-al-Raschid.

Tale of the Third Calender. This calender, King Agib, was wrecked on the loadstone mountain which drew all the nails and iron bolts from his ship; but he overthrew the bronze statue on the mountaintop, thus causing the mischief. Agib then visited ten young men, each of whom had lost his right eye, and was carried by a roc to the palace of 40 princesses, with whom he stayed a year. The princesses were then obliged to leave for 40 days, but entrusted him with the keys of the palace, with free permission to enter every room but one. On the 40th day, curiosity finally induced him to open this room, where he saw a horse which carried him through the air to Baghdad. The horse then deposited him, and knocked out his right eye with a whisk of its tail, as it had done to the 10 young men whom it had previously met.

calends. The first day of the Roman month. See IDES; NONES.

Calhoun, John C[aldwell] (1782–1850). American statesman. A native of South Carolina, Calhoun was elected to Congress in 1810 and became one of the “war hawks” who advocated war with Great Britain. He was secretary of war (1817–1825) and vice president under J. Q. Adams and Andrew Jackson. After the passage of the protectionist “Tariff of Abominations,” Calhoun wrote his South Carolina Exposition (1828), defending state sovereignty and the right of nullification, a doctrine he elaborated in a letter (1832) to Governor Hamilton of South Carolina. Breaking with Jackson over nullification and other issues, Calhoun resigned the vice presidency in 1832 and was elected to the U.S. Senate the same year. Except for a brief term as secretary of state, he sat in the Senate until his death, the leading spokesman for the minority interests of the South.

A political theorist of considerable originality, some of whose ideas anticipated those of Karl Marx, he was austerely intellectual; it is said that on one occasion he tried to write a poem, produced the single word “Whereas,” and never repeated the attempt.

Caliban. In Shakespeare's The Tempest, the deformed, half-human slave of Prospero. The son of the witch Sycorax and a devil, Caliban symbolizes mankind's primitive urges.

Robert Browning's poem, Caliban upon Setebos, or Natural Theology in the Island, is an attempt to express for such a creature as Caliban his crude philosophy of God and the universe. Percy MacKaye wrote a poetic drama, Caliban (1916), showing the regeneration of Caliban through love for Miranda.

Caliban by the Yellow Sands (1916). A masque by Percy MacKaye. In this poetic drama, drawn in part from Shakespeare's Tempest, Caliban is seen as “that passionate child-curios part of us all," who is regenerated through Prospero's wisdom and his own love for Miranda.

Calidore, Sir. See Fafrie Queene, The.

Caligariante. In the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, a huge sea monster defeated by Astolfo with his magic horn, given to him by the good witch Logistilla. Astolfo ties the monster in its own net and goes from city to city, dragging the monster behind him in order to display the great victory he has achieved.

Caligula. Original name, Caius Caesar (A.D. 12-41). Roman emperor (37-41). Son of Agrippina and Germanicus Caesar, he was brought up among the legions in Germany where the soldiers gave him his nickname, Caligula, because he wore the soldier's boot (caliga). He was held high in the emperor Tiberius' favor, and on Tiberius' death, which was either caused or helped along by Caligula, he succeeded to the throne. Caligula was at first revered by the people as the son of Germanicus, but after a serious illness, he appeared very much changed and behaved like a madman. His wild extravagance led him to extortion and plunder. He was finally murdered and was succeeded by his uncle Claudius. He is the main character in the play Caligula by Albert Camus.

Caligula (Caligule; 1944). A play by Albert Camus. The author makes the emperor a sensitive man horrified by what Camus calls elsewhere the absurd condition of human life. Caligula adds to the senselessness by arbitrary acts of violence, obeying the mistaken logic that he can escape the condition of man by severing all his ties with humanity and thus by asserting his own freedom achieve the impossible. His seemingly mad complicity in his own assassination symbolizes his failure.

Calisto y Melibea, La tragicomedia de. See Celestina, La.

Callaghan, Morley [Edward] (1903- ). Canadian novelist and short-story writer. After meeting Ernest Hemingway in Toronto in the 1920's, Callaghan went to Paris, where he became acquainted with the American expatriates there and contributed to This Quarter, transition, and similar periodicals. His novels, which are noted for their "hard-boiled" realism, include Strange Fugitive (1928), The Loved and the Lost (1951), The Many Colored Coat (1960), and A Passion in Rome (1962). Now That April's Here (1936) and Stories (1959) are collections of short stories. His years in Paris are recounted in Summer in Paris (1963).

Callimachus (Kallimachos; born c. 310 B.C.). Greek poet, born in Cyrene. According to tradition he was the head of the Alexandrian Library, and was highly regarded in his own time, and thereafter, for his short poems. He is said to have engaged in a literary feud with Apollonius of Rhodes.

Calliope (Kalliopéa). The Muse of epic poetry, and chief of the Muses. She was the mother of Orpheus by Apollo or King Oceaus.

Callirhoe (Kallirrhoé). See Alcmaron.

Callirhoe (Kallirrhoé). The lady-love of Chae- reas, in Clarion's Greek romance, the Loves of Chares and Callirhoe. It was probably written in the 6th century A.D.

Callisto and Arcas (Kallisto, Arkas). Callisto was an Arcadian nymph metamorphosed into a she-bear by Artemis for not remaining a virgin like her other attendants. Her son Arcas, having met her in the chase, would have killed her, but Zeus converted him into a he-bear, and placed them both in the heavens, where they are recognized as the Great and Little Bear. Arcas was the eponymous ancestor of the Arcadians.

Call of the Wild, The (1903). A novel by Jack London. This famous story tells how the dog Buck is stolen from his comfortable home and pressed into service as a sled dog in the Klondike. At first he is abused by both men and dogs, but he learns to fight ruthlessly and finally finds in John Thornton a master whom he can respect and love. When Thornton is murdered, Buck breaks away to the wilds and becomes the leader of a pack of wolves. See White Fang.

Calpe. See Pillars of Hercules.

Calpurnia. Third wife of Julius Caesar. They were married in 59 B.C. On the night before he was assassinated she dreamed that a templelike gable, dedicated in his honor, smashed to the ground and that Caesar lay dying in her arms. She is a character in Shakespeare's Julius Caesar; she begs Caesar not to attend the Senate. Caesar's first two wives were Cornelia and Pompeia.

Calvary or Golgotha (Lat., calvaria, Aram., gil- gûtha, "skull"). The place outside the wall of Jerusalem where Jesus was crucified. Its exact location is unknown; tradition ascribes it to the present site of the Church of the Holy Sepulcher.

Calverley, Charles Stuart (1831-1884). English poet and parodist. He wrote light verse, parodies, and translations, including Verses and Translations (1862); Theocritus Translated into English Verse (1869); and Fly Leaves (1872).

Calvin had an early background of humanism, being a student of Latin and Greek and familiar with the writings of Plato, Seneca, and St. Augustine. Because of the radical Protestant views expressed in a public speech he wrote in 1533 to be delivered at an inaugural ceremony at the University of Paris, Calvin was forced to flee the capital and soon France as well. He established himself in Geneva, where eventually he became an absolute dictator, strictly enforcing his theological doctrines and rules of conduct. His greatest work is Institutes of the Christian Religion.

Calvinism as a religious system recognized only the Bible as a source of knowledge and authority in questions of belief. Its chief principles were (1) the total depravity of man as a result of Adam's fall; (2) the absolute power of the will of God; (3) the superiority of faith to good works, since man has no will of his own; (4) salvation by grace from God rather than by any act of the will of man; and (5) the divine predestination of those to be saved, or the Elect, although, since no one can tell whether he is a member of the Elect, all must lead holy and pious lives, acknowledging God's supreme power and obeying His commands.

Calydonian boar. A creature of Greek legend.
Oeneus, king of Calydon, in Aetolia, having neglected to sacrifice to Artemis, was punished by the goddess' sending a ferocious boar to ravage his lands. A band of heroes collected to hunt the boar, which was eventually slain by Meleager after he had been first wounded by Atalanta. A dispute over the boar's head led to a war between the neighboring tribes of Cretes and the Calydonians. This was one of the most famous sagas of Greece, but is not recorded in any outstanding single work.

(Calypso or Kalypso) In Homer's Odyssey, the nymph of the island of Ogygia. She retains the shipwrecked Odysseus there seven years. Loyal to Penelope, she refuses her offer of immortality if he stays, and at last, at Zeus' command, she helps him to continue on his way toward Ithaca.

Cama. See Kama.

Cambel. See Faerie Queene, The.

Camb. In Geoffrey of Monmouth's History of the Kings of Britain, a son of Brute, and the person after whom Wales (Cambria) was said to be named.

Cambina. See Faerie Queene, The.

Cambray, League of. A league formed in 1508 by the Papacy, France, Spain, and the Holy Roman Empire against Venice. The War of the League of Cambray (1508-1510) resulted in the defeat of the Venetians.

Cambridge, Richard Owen (1717-1802). English man of letters who wrote the famous mock-epic Scribleriad (1751). He was an intimate of Samuel Johnson.

Cambridge critics. A group of influential 20th-century English critics. They were centered at the University of Cambridge. They rejected the traditional method of studying literature in the light of its historical period, the author's biography, and other external influences. They preferred to make a detailed, quasi-scientific analysis of the work itself. This method had its best results when applied to complex poetry, and these critics praised symbolistic, metaphysical, witty, and modern poetry at the expense of more traditional verse. I. A. Richards and William Empson were pioneers in the study of exact meanings in poetry. See LOGICAL POSITIVISM; F. R. LEAVIS; SCRUTINY; NEW CRITICISM.

Cambridge Platonists. A group of English liberal philosophico-religious thinkers of the latter half of the 17th century, whose general aim was to effect a reconciliation between reason and mystical religiosity. Their mode of thought and terminology were taken chiefly from Plato and the Neoplatonists. They were vehemently opposed to Hobbes' materialism, their most important doctrine being the absolute existence of right and wrong. The outstanding members of the group were Ralph Cudworth (1617-1688), Nathaniel Culverwel (1616-1651), Joseph Glanvill, Henry More, Benjamin Whichcote (1609-1683), and John Smith (1616-1652). Their thought may be summarized in Smith's words: "To follow reason is to follow God."

Cambusan or Cambyusan. See Squire's Tale.

Cambyses II (d. 522 B.C.). A Persian ruler. He succeeded his father Cyrus the Great, reigning from 529 to 522 B.C. Reputed to be tyrannical, he conquered Egypt and made that country part of the Persian Empire. His throne was assumed by an impostor, and he died while returning to Persia to defend it.

Camelot. A place name prominent in Arthurian literature, one of the spots where King Arthur held court. In many of the legends, we find both Camelot and Caerleon as court capitals, each being appropriate, apparently, to certain times of the year. For example, Caerleon is sometimes found to be the place where King Arthur and his court celebrated Pentecost and Camelot the place where the court went for the celebration of Christmas. See CAMEL. Camilla. In Vergil's Aeneid, a warrior maiden who fought fearlessly against the Trojans in their war with Turnus, and was killed in battle. She was so speedy, says Vergil, that she could run across a field of corn without bending a single blade or cross the sea without even wetting her feet.

Camille. See DAME AUX CAMÉLIAS, LA.

Camille. In Pierre Corneille's tragedy Horace, the sister of Horace and the fiancée of Curiae, Horace's opponent in combat. When Horace kills Curiae, Camille curses Rome, and her infuriated brother slays her.

Camillo. An honorable and faithful councillor to Leontes, king of Sicilia, in Shakespeare's Winter's Tale. Commanded by Leontes to poison Polixenes, he leaves his beloved country rather than commit the crime. When he at last returns, he marries the bold and courageous Paulina.

Camino Galicia, León Felipe. See León FELIPE.

Camisards. The Calvinists of Cevennes who in 1703 rebelled against Louis XIV after his revocation of the Edict of Nantes. Their leader, Jean Cavalier (1680-1740), escaped to England and became governor of Jersey. The word camisard refers to the insurgents' white shirts.

Camlan, Battle of. See ANNALES CAMERIÆ.

Camões or Camoens, Luis Vaz de (1524-1580). Portuguese poet. After being banished from court because of his romance with Caterina de Atalde (the "Natercia" of his poems), a lady-in-waiting to the queen, Camões served in North Africa, where he lost his right eye in an engagement with the Moors. In 1552 he was imprisoned for wounding a court official in a street brawl. Sailing to India in 1553 as a common soldier, he was later named official trustee for the property of the dead and absent in Macao and was briefly imprisoned for allegedly embezzling government funds. After numerous hardships, he managed to return to Lisbon in 1570.

Camões' best-known work is his epic poem, Os Lusiadas, notable for its synthesis of national, religious, and humanistic themes. He is also regarded as one of Portugal's greatest lyric poets, largely because of his sonnets and canções. His other works include three plays: Os amantíssimos, which was inspired by Plautus' Amphitruo; El-Rey Seleuco, based on an episode in Plutarch; and Philomelos.

Campaña de Roma. Territory of Old Latium surrounding Rome, about 30 by 100 miles in extent. It is usually simply called the Campagna and is not to be confused with ancient Campania, the territory directly south of Latium.

Campanella, Tommaso (1568-1639). Italian philosopher. Born in Calabria, he spent most of his life in the prisons of Naples, Padua, and Rome because of his interest in astrology, naturalistic philosophy, and radical political schemes. After his final imprisonment in Rome, he fled to France in 1634, where he died. A prolific writer, he produced many Italian lyrics, a critical treatise on poetry, and his masterpiece, La città del sole (Civitas Solis or City of the Sun, 1623). Written in 1602 during his imprisonment, and based on Plato and Thomas More, it describes his utopia, a society organized communistically and ruled by a priest-philosopher. His Latin works, dealing largely with metaphysics and theology, also include a treatise on the Spanish monarchy and an apology for Galileo.

Campaspe. Also called Pancaste. A beautiful woman, the favorite concubine of Alexander the Great. Apelles, it is said, modeled his Aphrodite Anadyomene from her. According to Pliny, Alexander gave her up to Apelles, who had fallen in love with her while painting her likeness. John Lyly produced, in 1583, a drama, Alexander and Campaspe.

Campbell, Joseph (1879-1944). Irish poet. He published some of his work under his Gaelic name, Seosamh MacCathmhaoil. His works include Rushlight (1906), and Irishty (1913).

Campbell, Mary. One of the women loved by Robert Burns. She died of fever in 1788, and the poem To Mary in Heaven (1789) was written on the first anniversary of her death. See HIGHLAND MARY.

Campbell, Mrs. Patrick, born Beatrice Stella Tanner (1865-1940). English actress who played important roles beginning with the title role in Pinero's The Second Mrs. Tanqueray. She originated the part of Eliza Doolittle in Shaw's Pygmalion, written expressly for her.

Campbell, Roy (1902-1957). South African poet. A neofascist and disciple of Wyndham Lewis, he wrote satires and poems of colorful nature description. He was converted to Catholicism in about 1935. He fought on the fascist side on the Spanish Civil War; Flowering Rifle (1939) is a long satiric poem celebrating Franco's victory. Among his collections of poems are The Flaming Terrapin (1924), Adamaaster (1930), and Talking Bronco (1946). He has done translations of the poems of St. John of the Cross, and written two autobiographies: Broken Record (1934) and Light on a Dark Horse (1952).

Campbell, Thomas (1777-1844). Scottish poet, best known for his literary ballad Lord Ullin's Daughter. He also produced some notable martial lyrics, including Ye Mariners of England (1800); Hohenlinden (1802); and The Battle of the Baltic (1809). Of his longer narrative works only Gertrude of Wyoming retains interest. Campbell was an editor (The New Monthly Magazine) and anthologist of some influence in his day. See LOCHIEL.

Campbell, Walter Stanley. Pen name, Stanley Vestal (1887- ). American writer. An authority on the Old West, under his own name he has edited documents and books relating to Indians and explorations. Under his pen name he has written such books as Fandango, Ballads of the Old West (1927), Kit Carson (1932), Mountain Men (1937), Dodge City (1952), and Joe Meech (1952).

Campbell, [William] Wilfred (1858-1918). Canadian poet and novelist. After studying at the Episcopal Divinity School in Cambridge, Mass, Campbell was ordained in 1885 and was given a parish in West Claremont, Mass. In 1891 he resigned from his church offices, feeling that their formality and dogmas restricted him. His books of poetry include Snowflakes and Sunbeams (1888), Lake Lyrics (1889), and Beyond the Hills of Dream (1899). He also wrote historical novels, notably Iam of the Orcades (1906) and A Beautiful Rebel (1909).

Campbell, William Edward March. See William March.

Campbells Are Coming, The. A famous song composed in 1715. The earl of Mar raised the standard for the Stuarts against George I. John Campbell was commander-in-chief of His Majesty's forces and the rebellion was quashed.

Campion, Thomas (1567-1620). English poet and musician. He is famous for his songs written to music of his own composition, collected in such volumes as A Book of Airs (1601), Two Books of Airs (c. 1613), and The Third and Fourth Books of Airs (c. 1617). His lyrics possess rare charm and freshness, as well as a melodiousness and metrical variety that reflect their musical origin. He was also the author of Observation in the Art of English Poesy (1602), an argument for the use of classical, quantitative meters in English verse, which prompted Samuel Daniel's Defence of Ryme (1602).

Campistron, Jean Galbert de (1656-1723). French soldier and playwright. An admirer and imitator of Racine, he wrote several tragedies characterized by their melancholy treatment of classical subjects, among them Arminius (1684) and Andronic (1685). His greatest successes were the tragedy Tiritate (1691), which depicted the denobling power of passion, and the comedy Le Jaloux désabusé (The Jealous Man Undeceived, 1709).

Campo, Estanislao del. See GAUCHO LITERATURE.

Campoman, Ramón de (1817-1901). Spanish poet. His best-known work may be sampled in the volumes Doloras (1846), Humoradas (1872), and Pequeños Poemas (1872-1874). These are filled with poems in the style favored by Campoman: philosophical epigrams expressing a humorous point of view.

Campus Esquelinus. The burial place for the lowest classes, just outside the Servian Wall of Rome.

Campus Martius. The field of Mars. A grassy plain along the east bank of the Tiber in ancient Rome, used for elections, martial exercises, public games, and the like.

Camus, Albert (1913-1960). Algerian-born French philosopher, novelist, dramatist, journalist. After studying philosophy at Algiers, Camus organized (1935) the Théâtre de l'Equipe, a young avant-garde dramatic group, and worked with it until 1938. Then, until the beginning of World War II, he worked both in North Africa and in Paris as a journalist. It was between 1937 and 1941 that he wrote the works that made him famous upon their publication during the war: the novel The Stranger, the essay The Myth of Sisyphus, and the play Caligula. He also sketched The Misunderstanding, which he finished in 1943. All four present the feeling of the absurd, the plight of man's need for clarity and rationality in confrontation with the unreasonable silence of the universe, and various tragedies of man's failure to assume proper consciousness of his condition, or, if he does, to find the human values by which he can shape his life.

After the occupation of France by the Germans in 1941, Camus became one of the intellectual leaders of the Resistance movement. He helped found the underground newspaper Combat in 1943, was its chief editor during the war, and continued to write for it until 1946, when it began open publication after the liberation of France. Camus was a close associate of Jean-Paul Sartre and his circle; although they cooperated in Resistance activities, however, the differences between their philosophical positions became more and more apparent. Camus has sometimes been classified among the existentialists, but he himself refuted their position in many of his writings (see Existentialism).

His refusal to take solace in a concept of divine or cosmic meaning for human life did not conflict with Camus' humanistic attitude that man is capable of certain degree of dignity in honestly facing his solitary condition and trying to find and assert the human values, such as the maximum possible individual freedom, intercommunication, and even love, within the limitations of that condition. His commitment to this humanistic attitude, and consequently to humanitarian causes, is reflected in the novel The Plague, about men doing the futile best they can in the face of disaster. The short novel The Fall more bitterly comments on the difficulty of finding a mode of active life compatible with total consciousness both of the absurd and of one's inescapable solidarity with other human beings.

During the late 1950's, Camus renewed his active interest in the theater, writing and directing stage adaptations of William Faulkner's Requiem for a Nun and Dostoevski's The Possessed. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1957. The Rebel gives a book-length statement of his philosophical attitudes. In Actualites LIII (1950, 1953, 1958) are essays on political, social, and literary questions collected from Combat and elsewhere; Resistance, Rebellion, and Death (1961) is an English selection from these. Other works include the early essays L'Envers et l'endroit (1937) and Noces (1939), mostly sympathetic sketches of North Africa; Letters to a German Friend (Lettres à un ami allemand; 1945), written during the war; the plays State of Siege (Etat de Siège; 1948) and The Just Assassins (Les Justes; 1950); and the six short stories in The Exile and the Kingdom (L'Exil et le Royaume; 1957).

Canaan. An ancient region of vague boundaries. It lay roughly between the Jordan River and the Mediterranean Sea. This "Promised Land" of the Israelites was actually rather infertile. A mixture of Semitic and Indo-European lived there until the Israelites conquered much of the area. The Semites, worshipers of Baalim (see BAAL), had a fairly rich culture, many evidences of which have been uncovered in the 20th century at Ugarit and elsewhere. Most of them were under the domination of Egypt or, for a time, of the Hittites. The civilization of Phoenicia was to a considerable extent a continuation of that of Canaan.

The rabbinical tradition that Canaan, a son of Ham, was the first of the seven sinners who made idols for the heathens, reflects the regrettable history of Israelite backsliding into the baal-worship of their Canaanite neighbors. For Canaanite literature see the Poem of Baal and the Poem of Aqhat.

Canace. See Faerie Queene, The.

Canacce. See Squire's Tale.

Canalletto or Canale, Antonio (1697-1768). Venetian painter, known for his broad views of Venice. He rendered architectural detail with great precision and flawless perspective, and bathed his scenes in a clear light of sharp contrasts. Bernardo Bellotto (1724-1780), his nephew and pupil, is also sometimes called Canalletto.

Canby, Henry Seidel (1878-1961). American literary critic, biographer, editor, and teacher. Canby served as literary editor of the New York Post, helped to found and edit the Saturday Review of Literature (1924), and acted as chairman of the Book-of-the-Month Club (1926-1954). He taught at Yale University for more than 20 years. Among his many volumes are The Short Story (1902), Thoreau: A Biography (1939), Walt Whitman: An American (1943), and Turn West, Turn East: Mark Twain and Henry James (1951). American Memoir (1947) is an autobiography.

Cancer. One of the twelve signs of the zodiac (the Crab, June 21st to July 23rd). It appears when the sun has reached its highest northern limit, and begins to go backward toward the south; but, like a crab, the return is sideways.

According to fable, Hera sent Cancer against Hercules when he combated the Hydra of Lerna. It hit the hero's foot, but Hercules killed the creature, and Hera set it in the sky.

Cancionero de Baena. An anthology of 576 poems compiled in 1445 by Juan Alfonso de Baena (1406-1454) for John II of Castile. The poems, lyrics of the courtly, aristocratic school, show the development of Spanish poetry in the 14th and 15th centuries. The works of over 50 authors are included, notably Alfonso Alvarez de Villasandino, a representative of the Galician-Portuguese school, and Micer Francisco Imperial, who was influenced by Dante.

Candida (1903). A play by George Bernard Shaw. This is one of Shaw's most theatrically successful works; its subject is marriage. Candida Morell's husband is a hearty, popular Christian Socialist clergyman. Eugene Marchbanks is an 18-year-old rhapsodic, visionary poet who is in love with Candida. Forced to choose between them she remains with her husband when she realizes that he needs her, being the weaker of the two men. The plot of Candida shows the influence of Ibsen's A Doll's House. Shaw, however, has reversed the roles of puppet and master: Morell's seeming strength wholly rests on Candida's dignity and character.

Candide, ou L'Optimisme (1759). Voltaire's most popular philosophical novel. It satirizes the optimistic creed of Leibniz: "All is for the best in this best of all possible worlds." Dr. Pangloss, tutor to the hero, Candide, is the embodiment of this theory, maintaining it through thick and thin, despite the most blatant evidence to the contrary. Misadventures begin when young Candide is kicked out of the castle of Thunder-ten-tronckh for making love to the Candlemas Day

Candlemas Day. The popular name for the Feast of the Purification of the Virgin Mary, February 2. On this day Christ was presented by her in the Temple. The feast is so called from the custom of blessing on this day all the candles which will be used in a church throughout the year. They symbolize Christ as "the light of the world" and "a light to lighten the Gentiles," phrases spoken of Jesus at the time of his Presentation by the aged Simeon. There is also a weather legend associated with the day. See GROUNDHOG DAY.

Canfield, Dorothy. See Dorothy Canfield Fisher.

Canidias. A Neapolitan, beloved by the poet Horace. When she deserted him, he held her up to contempt in certain of his epodes and satires as an old sorceress who could by magic spell unshere the moon.

Canidius. In Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra, the lieutenant general of Antony's land forces. Canidius vainly advises Antony against engaging Octavius Caesar in naval battle and later defects to the enemy.

Cannae. The battlefield in southeast Italy where Hannibal defeated the Romans under Varro and L. cremutus Paulus with great slaughter in 216 B.C. Any fatal battle in that decisive year of a great general's prosperity may be called his Cannae. Thus, Moscow was the Cannae of Napoleon.

Cannery Row (1945). A novel by John Steinbeck. In this episodic work, Steinbeck returns to the style of Tortilla Flat to produce a rambling account of the adventures and misadventures of workers in a California cannery and their friends. One character, Doc, was reportedly modeled on the marine biologist Edward F. Ricketts (1896-1948), with whom Steinbeck collaborated on The Sea of Cortez (1941).

Canonization, The (1633). A poem by John Donne in which he claims that the reciprocal love between him and his mistress is so deep and unworldly as to make the earth an unmeaning dream. It is a fine example of the vehemently colloquial and ingeniously concocted style typical of Donne.

Canon's Yeoman's Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer. In the Prologue a Canon and his Yeoman overtake the pilgrims. The Host asks if the Canon can tell a story, and the Yeoman begins to reveal his master's craftiness as a fraudulent alchemist. The Canon bids him be silent, but he has decided to leave the alchemist's service, so he continues his vituperative report, and the Canon rides off to avoid shame. The Yeoman bitterly describes the apparatus and processes of the "cursed craft" of alchemy, and all the money and labor lost in searching for the elixir to turn base metals into gold. Then he tells a tale about a canon, not his ex-master, who pretends to take a priest into his confidence and let him help in the conversion of quicksilver and copper to silver. The canon effects the exchange by sleight of hand, but the duped priest believes in the actual transmutation of the metal and asks to buy the formula. The canon accepts forty pounds, making him think it a bargain price, and can never be found by the priest again.

Canossa, Count Ludovico of (1476-1532). Italian courtier and prelate. He is noted for his diplomatic missions and his participation in the dialogues of The Courtier by his kinsman Castiglione.

Cantari. See CANTASTORIE.

cantastorie. Tuscan minstrels, or singers of tales, of the 14th century who composed and performed, usually in the public places of Italian towns and villages, cantari, long narrative poems in ottava rima. Although the preferred subject was the Carolingian legends, especially the loves and battles of Orlando (Roland), Christian and classical material also helped to form the repertoire of the cantastorie. Though many of their works died with the anonymous singers, some survived to influence the later Renaissance romanzo (romantic epic) of Pulci, Ariosto, and Boiardo.

Cantatrice Chauve, La. See BALD SOPRANO, THE.

Canterbury Tales, The (c. 1387-1400). Poetic work by Geoffrey Chaucer. Although unfinished, it is his longest and his finest work, written in decasyllabic couplets except as noted in the entries for individual tales. The General Prologue establishes the framework for the stories: the poet has joined with 30 others (although the Prologue says 29) to make the usual April pilgrimage to Becket's shrine at Canterbury; he describes each of his companions, who are of widely varying characters and occupations. Their host at the Tabard Inn, Harry Bailly, proposes to come with them and serve as judge in a story-telling contest to occupy the long hours of the journey;

Cantha, Minna (1844-1897). Finnish playwright and novelist. In Finland she was the pioneer of the new naturalism, depicting drab lives and indicting the upper classes with passionate fervor for their neglect of such misery. In the plays Työmien Vaimo (The Laborer's Wife, 1885) and Pappi Perhe (The Parson's Family, 1891) she speaks against restriction and limitation of the human being, whether by unjust social laws or by the narrow prejudices of the older generation.

Cantos. An incomplete epic poem by Ezra Pound. It was published in separate sections: Cantos I-XVII (1925), A Draft of XXX Cantos (1930), Eleven New Cantos, XXXI-XLI (1934), Fifth Decad of Cantos (1937), Cantos LII-LXII (1940), Cantos (1948), Pisan Cantos, Section: Rock Drill 85-95 de los Cantares, Thrones: 96-109 de los Cantares (1959). The earliest of the Cantos were published in magazine form as early as 1917. One of the most important 20th-century works of poetry, the Cantos have a loose musical structure and were once described by Pound himself as a ragbag. Central to their conception is the use of Odysseus as a man in search of a culture and of Ovid's Metamorphoses as a touchstone of individual and cultural transformation. Pound quotes widely from the literary and historical documents of the ancient Greeks, the medieval Provençal poets, writers of the Italian Renaissance, and American statesmen of the Jeffersonian period. His economic beliefs, especially regarding usury, play an important part throughout the work; they appear particularly in large sections devoted to American politics and to the Chinese.

Canty, Tom. The beggar boy in Mark Twain's Prince and the Pauper. He changes places with Prince Edward VI.

Canute or Knut (c. 944-1035). Danish king who finally became King of England (after 1016) as well, taking an English wife and maintaining peace and security. A 12th-century legend describes how he rebuked his flatterers by commanding the waves to stand still—in vain, of course—to show the limits of his power. The Song of Canute is an early 12th-century lyric in Middle English, supposedly composed by Canute while rowing past the abbey of Ely and hearing the music of the services.

canzone. Italian lyric form of verse, popular during the Middle Ages and the Renaissance. Derived from the Provençal camo, it normally consisted of from five to seven stanzas, each echoing the first in number of lines and in rhyme scheme. A final short stanza (the congedo, or commiato) follows the pattern of the Provençal tornada or the French envoy in addressing the poem itself or in directing it on a mission to some personage. The subject matter is usually amatory, but might also be political, satiric, or humorous. Canzoni were written at the Sicilian court of Emperor Frederick II in the 13th-century and later by Dante, Petrarch, Boccaccio, and the leading poets of the Renaissance. In English, an example of the canzone form is Spenser's marriage hymn, the Epithalamium.

Capaneus (Kapanes). In Greek mythology, one of the Seven Against Thebes. He was struck dead by a thunderbolt for declaring that not Zeus himself should prevent his scaling the city walls. Evadne, his wife, threw herself into the flames while his body was burning.

Capell, Karel (1890-1938). Czech dramatist, novelist, and essayist. Capek's early scientific training enabled him to devise convincing backgrounds for his plays and novels dealing with the scientific and fantastic. An ardent defender of and worker for the short-lived Czech republic, he was simultaneously founder and director of the Vinohradsky Art Theater, an editor on a Prague newspaper, and a creative writer. In his essays he reveals himself politically as an idealist and optimist, while in his fiction and stage works he emerges a highly imaginative moralist and ironist. His best known play is R.U.R. (q.v.); other plays include The Life of the Insects (1922); The Makropulos Secret (1925), dealing with the scientific prolongation of life; Power and Glory (1938); and The Mother (1939). Money and Other Stories (1929) is a collection of short stories; War with the Neusts (1937) and The Cheat (1941) are novels. His essays include President Masaryk Tells His Story (1934) and The First Rescue Party (1939).

Capetians. The third dynasty of the kings of France (reigned 987-1328). Their feudal domain was Île de France; its central location facilitated their consolidation of power and administration. The succeeding Valois and Bourbon dynasties were branches of the Capet family.

Capital (Das Kapital; 1867-1894). A systematic critical study of capitalist economy by Karl Marx, based on the ideas which he formulated, with Friedrich Engels, in The Communist Manifesto. Volume one appeared in 1867; volumes two and three were completed by Engels from Marx's notes (1885-1894).

capitoline geese. Sacred geese kept on the Capitoline Hill of Rome. According to tradition, when the Gauls invaded Rome, a detachment in single file clambered up the hill of the capitol so silently that the foremost man reached the top without being challenged. When he was striding over the rampart, some geese, disturbed by the noise, began to cackle, and awoke the garrison. Marcus Manlius rushed to the wall and hurled the fellow over the precipice. To commemorate this event (390 B.C.) the Romans carried a golden goose to the capitol every year.

Capitoline Hill. Of the seven hills on which ancient Rome was built, the one which held the capitol.

capitolo. The Italian word means, literally, chapter, but its literary usage refers to any lengthy poem in terza rima. During the Renaissance, it was predominantly the vehicle for satirical verse of the kind written by Francesco Berni, although capitoli were also composed on sacred subjects and sometimes used as the form for verse epistles.

cap of liberty. See Liberty Cap.

Caporetto. A town in Yugoslavia, formerly belonging to Italy. It was the scene of a disastrous defeat (1917) sustained by Italian forces under General Cadorna during World War I. The subsequent Italian retreat is vividly described in Hemingway's Farewell to Arms.

Capote, Truman (1924— ). American novelist and short-story writer. Although he was born in New Orleans, Capote does not consider himself primarily a Southern writer. His concern with the Gothic romance, however, does provide a link with the Southern literary tradition. His special mark is the exploration of the dividing-line between dream and reality.

Capote's first novel was Other Voices, Other Rooms. The Grass Harp (1951) deals with a young orphan who goes to live with two aunts, Dolly and Verena Talbo, who respectively represent an imaginative view of life and a grasping sense of reality. Breakfast at Tiffany's (1958) is the story of Holly Golightly's search for identity in New York. Capote's other works include Local Color (1950), a book of essays and travel sketches, and A Tree of Night (1956), a collection of short stories.

Capri. An island off the coast of Italy not far from Naples. During the last years of Tiberius' reign, the emperor spent most of his time there. It is now a popular tourist resort, known especially for its Blue Grotto, with phosphorescent waters.

Captain Bonneville, The Adventures of (1837). A narrative prepared by Washington Irving from the documents of Captain Benjamin L. E. de Bonneville (1796-1878). Bonneville explored the Northwest during his career in the army, and met Irving while the latter was at work on Astoria. Irving agreed to do Bonneville's story as a sequel. Irving, sympathetic to the Indians, condemns the treatment they received at the hands of the white trappers.

Captain Brassbound's Conversion (1900). A play by George Bernard Shaw. Lady Cecily Waynflete talks Brassbound out of his plan for revenge on his uncle. Set in Morocco, using the U.S. Navy as a deus ex machina, and written in a variety of dialects, this is one of Shaw's less dramatically successful plays. It was written for the actress Ellen Terry, who said it was "more fitted for the closet than the stage."

Captain Craig (1902). The title poem of a book of verse by Edwin Arlington Robinson. One of the author's long and characteristic narratives, it describes a picturesque and talkative old vagabond, Captain Craig, who preaches the doctrine that “God's humor is the music of the spheres” and that one must “laugh with God.”

Captain of Köpenick, The (Der Hauptmann von Köpenick; 1931). A satirical comedy by Carl Zuckmayer. It caricatures the narrowness of Prussian militarism and bureaucracy. Wilhelm Voigt, a penniless cobbler who, because he is an ex-convict, can obtain neither a work permit nor a passport to leave the country, gets possession of an army captain’s uniform. By taking advantage of people’s slavish respect for the military, he arrests the mayor of Köpenick and robs the town hall. What he really wants is a passport, but all he finds is money. In the end, when he gives himself up, the authorities refuse to believe that as silly-looking a character as he could have been the impostor.

Captain’s Doll, The (1923). A short story by D. H. Lawrence. In it he puts forward some of his ideas about marriage. A German countess makes and sells a puppet of her lover, who is a captain in a Scottish regiment. He says that romantic love always makes a doll of its object, and that their marriage must be based instead on her vows to “honor and obey” him.

Captain Singleton (1720). The hero and shortened title of The Life, Adventures and Piracies of the famous Captain Singleton, a first-person narrative of piracy and buccaneer raids on the African coast written by Daniel Defoe.

Captive, The. See Remembrance of Things Past.

Capuana, Luigi (1839–1915). Italian novelist and critic. The champion of Zolaesque realism in Italy, he began his literary career as drama critic for the noted Florentine newspaper La Nazione. A member of the Scapigliatura group of writers, Capuana was a fervent admirer of the psychological novels then popular in France, England, and Russia. They influenced his later novels and short stories in which a detailed investigation into the psychological behavior of exceptional, pathological individuals is joined by a scrupulous regard for realistic descriptions and a precise, unadorned style. Capuana’s theorization of Zolaesque realism laid the foundation for verismo, its Italian counterpart.

Capuana’s first novel, Giacinta (1879), is perhaps the best example of his “pseudo-scientific” technique. The plot is in itself unimportant for it only serves to give an insight into the protagonist’s peculiar behavior. Giacinta takes a lover on the day of her marriage to a man whom she despises yet whom she wanted as her husband. The lover’s eventual feeling of repugnance for her causes her to commit suicide. The author explains her behavior in terms that reflect a psychoanalysis of her personality and suggest Freudianism avant la lettre: Giacinta inherited a sexually promiscuous appetite from her mother and was traumatically affected by being raped at the age of 14.

Il Marchese di Roccaverdina (1901) traces the life of the marquis of Roccaverdina from the time he murders his mistress’ husband to his own suicide, brought about by feelings of guilt although he is never suspected by his mistress or by the police.

The novel Profumo (1890) describes the unreasoning hysteria of a woman whose nervous condition causes her body to emanate an odor of orange blossoms.

Among Capuana’s many works are collections of short stories, depicting the customs and landscape of Sicily, and critical essays: Le Novelle Appassionate (1893), Le Novelle Paesane (1894), Fausto Bragia (1897), Lo Spinge (1897), Il Decameroncino (1901), Costeuse (1905), and La Voluntà di Creare (1906).

Capulet and Montague. The English names of the Capellietti and the Montecchi, two noble families of legends of 14th-century Verona. The feud between the two houses has been immortalized by Shakespeare’s Romeo and Juliet.

Old Capulet, Juliet’s father, is an irascible, unimaginative man who loves his daughter but is incensed when she refuses to marry Paris, the husband he has chosen for her. Upon hearing of the death of the two lovers, he is reconciled with Lord Montague, Romeo’s father, who vows to erect a golden statue to the “true and faithful Juliet.”

Caracalla. Full Latin name, Marcus Aurelius Antonius (a.d. 188–217). Roman emperor (211–217). He was nicknamed Caracalla after the long, hooded tunic worn by the Gauls, which he wore after he became emperor. He and his brother Geta succeeded to the throne after their father’s death, but Caracalla had his brother assassinated, along with several of the most distinguished statesmen in the country. His reign was marked by cruelty and treachery. He was murdered by the praetorian prefect.

Caractacus or Caradoc. A legendary king of the Silures in Britain. He withstood the Roman armies for nine years; but he was finally betrayed by Carthamandus, queen of the Brigantes, and led captive to Rome in a.d. 51. He is a prominent figure in the Welsh Triads and in Michael Drayton’s Polyolbion (1622).

Caravaggio, Michelangelo Merisi da (1569–1609). Italian painter. Reacting against mannerism and idealism, he introduced a powerful realism into his paintings of biblical scenes by employing crude peasant types and dramatizing them by means of harsh light and violent contrasts. His naturalistic method earned him much opposition in his day, but his influence was important for such later painters as George de la Tour, Velasquez, and Rubens. Typical of his best work is the masterpiece Christ at Emmaus.

Carbonari (ital., “charcoal burners”). The name given to a secret political association that flourished in Italy and France early in the 19th century. The group first came into being during the reign (1808–1815) of Joachim Murat in Naples. The movement originally sought to free Italy from foreign domination, but democratic and republican sentiments later arose as well. After the failure of several uprisings, the Carbonari were absorbed by Massini’s Young Italy society. The movement gained prominence in France after 1820.

Carco, Francis. Pen name of François Marie Alexandre Carcopino-Tusoli (1886–1958). French poet, novelist, and critic. He is a recorder of the charms of Montmartre in such poetry as La Bohème.
Card, The

et mon coeur (1912) and Poèmes en prose (1948). Carco's argot-filled novels of bohemian life and morals include Perverseité (1925, translated by Ford Maddox Ford), Rue Pigalle (1927), and The Hounded Man (L'Homme traqué; 1921, also translated as The Noose of Sin). He is also known for his memoirs The Last Bohemia (De Montmartre au Quartier Latin; 1927), and for his biographies of Villon (1927) and Verlaine (1939).

Card, The (1911). A humorous novel by Arnold Bennett. The card is a good-humored, comic, smart young man called Denny. He earns a living by playing ruthless, remunerative tricks on Five Towns citizens.

Cardano, Girolamo (1501–1576). Italian philosopher. Skilled in medicine and mathematics, Cardano was familiar with many of the intellectual centers of the Italian Renaissance. His Ars magna (Great Art, 1545) was an important and influential mathematical treatise embodying many of his achievements.

Cardinal, The (1641). A tragedy by James Shirley. Duchess Rosaura, a rich young widow, is betrothed to the heroic Don Gulio, nephew of the mighty cardinal, despite her preference for the Count d'Alvarez. While Gulio is away at war, she breaks the engagement and prepares to marry Alvarez. Gulio, after winning a great victory, returns and kills Alvarez. Rosaura then promises to marry Colonel Hernando, an officer who hates Gulio, if she will avenge her. When Gulio is killed, suspicion falls on Hernando, and the cardinal cleverly arranges to become Rosaura's guardian. He plans to rape and poison her, but Hernando, returning just in time, stabs first the cardinal and then himself. The cardinal confesses his crimes, pretends to have poisoned Rosaura, and offers her an antidote, which is actually poison. Thus, the dying cardinal has his revenge.

Cardozo, Benjamin Nathan (1870–1938). American jurist and associate justice of the U.S. Supreme Court (1932–1938). A liberal who believed that law should reflect social change, Cardozo wrote five important books: The Nature of the Judicial Process (1921), The Growth of the Law (1924), The Paradoxes of Legal Science (1928), The Law and Literature (1931), and Law Is Justice (1938). For both style and content his legal opinions are regarded as classics.

Carducci, Giuseppe (1835–1907). Italian poet and literary critic. Self-proclaimed antiromantic classicist, patriot, liberal, and freemason, he was professor of Italian literature at the University of Bologna from 1860 to 1904. The aims and struggles of the Risorgimento are reflected in such works as Memorie di Calatafimi (1876), La Vittoria (1877), Gli anni (1879), and Il Mezzogiorno (1887), while Odi Barbare (1889) and Rime e Rime (1898) reveal his predilection for classical motifs and meters and archaic language; throughout, there is a positive endorsement of liberal ideology. The Hymn to Satan (L'Inno a Satana, 1863; pub. 1870) is a vigorous manifesto of rebellion in which the asceticism and asceticism of traditional religion are denounced while human achievement in material progress is praised. Awarded the Nobel Prize for literature (1906), he is considered the national poet of modern Italy.

Carduel. In the Breton lai Sir Launfal by Marie de France, the place in which King Arthur holds his court at Pentecost. See Camelot; Caerleon.

Carêmepran. See King Lent.

Carew, Thomas (c. 1595–c. 1639). English poet. One of the sons of Ben, he was the first and probably best of the Cavalier poets. A courtier of Charles I, Carew was a sensualist and libertine who, it is said, repented on his deathbed. His work shows the influence of Donne as well as of Jonson: not only are there phrases, cadences, and themes reminiscent of Donne, but Carew's poetry has a richness of conceit and a play of intellect rare in Cavalier verse. In their essential spirit, however—their melody, grace, and polish—his poems reflect the art of Jonson. Carew wrote numerous songs and light love lyrics, such as the song Ask Me No More Where Love Bestows and Mediciot in Love Rejected, and a number of more serious pieces distinguished by their perspicacity, tact, and feeling, such as the lovely epitaph on Maria Wentworth. His collected poetry appeared in the posthumous volume Poems (1640), and he was also the author of a masque Coelum Britannicum (1633).

Carey, Henry (1687?–1743). English poet and composer. He wrote farces, burlesques, songs, and often accompanying music for the stage. His best-known ballad is SALLY IN OUR ALLEY (1729). His other works include Namby Pambly (1725), a poem, the title of which he also gave as a nickname to Ambrose Phillips; Chrononomotthologos (1734), a burlesque tragedy; The Dragon of Wantley (1737), a burlesque opera relating the tale of the slaying of a dragon; and The Honest Yorkshire Man (1735), a ballad-farce. There was a rumor that Carey was also the author of God Save the King.

Carey, Matthew (1760–1839). Irish-born American editor and author. He founded the American Museum (1787–1792), one of the first successful American literary periodicals, which printed works by Francis Hopkinson, Benjamin Franklin, and the Hartford Wits. For a time Carey also edited the Columbian Magazine. As a writer he is best known for The Porcupiniah (1796), an attack on William Cobbett for the latter's criticism of America, and The Olive Branch (1814), a plea for Anglo-American reconciliation after the War of 1812.

Cariteo or Chariteo. Benedito Garcia (c. 1450–1514). Italian poet. Born in Barcelona, Cariteo spent most of his life at Naples in the service of the house of Aragon and as a member of the Neapolitan literary academy. His fellow academicians, noting the resemblance between his Catalan name and the Greek Charites (the Graces), addressed him with the Latinized form, Chariteus; the Italian equivalent, Cariteo, or Chariteo, then became standard. His lyrics, to which he gave the title Endimione (Endymion) because in them the object of his love is called Luna (the Moon), were published in 1506. These are essentially Petrarchan in style, but more exuberant and daring in the choice of metaphors (see concerto), and were influential in establishing a style that contrasted with the purer Petrarchism championed by Bembo. His imitators were and are sometimes called Chariteans.

Carker, James. In Charles Dickens' DOMBEY AND SON, the business manager of the firm of Dom-bey. He not only brings the firm to bankruptcy, but he elopes with Dombey's second wife Edith. Edith leaves him at Dijon, and Carker, returning to England, is accidentally killed by a railway train.

Carlo Magno. The Italian form of Charlemagne and the name used to designate him in the three great Italian poems on the Carolingian material: the Morgante of Pulci and the Orlando poems of Boiardo and Ariosto.

Carlos, Don (1545-1568). Spanish prince. The son of Philip II by his first wife, Mary of Portugal, Don Carlos was mentally and physically unsound and was subject to fits of maniacal rage. He was betrothed to Elizabeth of Valois, but Philip married her himself. Later he conceived a bitter hatred for his father, hindering his policies whenever possible. When he laid plans to leave Spain secretly, he was imprisoned at Philip's orders and died a few months later. Although he probably died of natural causes, it was widely rumored that he had been murdered at his father's instigation. The unlucky prince was the subject of Schiller's tragedy Don Carlos and of dramas by Thomas Otway and Vittorio Alfieri. Verdi based one of his finest operas, Don Carlos or Don Carlos (1867) on Schiller's play.

Carlota or Charlotte (1840-1927). Belgian-born empress of Mexico. The daughter of King Leopold I of Belgium, she was the wife of the ill-fated Maximilian, whom she urged to accept the Mexican crown offered by Napoleon III of France. In 1866, when Maximilian's empire seemed on the verge of collapse, she went to France in a futile attempt to persuade Napoleon not to withdraw his troops from Mexico. During a visit to the Vatican, she lost her mind and never fully regained her sanity.

Carlovingians. See CARLOVINIANS.

Carlyle, Thomas (1795-1881). Scottish-born English prose writer. He is remembered for his explosive attacks on sham, hypocrisy, and excessive materialism; his distrust of democracy and the mob; and his highly romantic belief in the power of the individual, especially the strong, heroic leader. During much of his own life he struggled courageously, though hardly quietly, with poverty and "dyspepsia" (probably painful gastric ulcers). He was influenced in his early career by German literature, which he helped to popularize in England, being a particular admirer of Schiller and Goethe.

Carlyle's best-known book is the The French Revolution. Of his public lectures, the famous Heroes, Hero-worship, and the Heroic in History (1841) best expresses his cult of the leader. His hatred of laissez faire policies, fears of the destruction of personality by the machines of industrialism, and his distrust of social legislators are to be found in the essays Charism (1839), Past and Present (1843), and Latter Day Pamphlets (1850). Among his biographies are Life of Schiller (1823-1824), Cromwell (1843), The Life of Sterling (1851), and History of Frederick II of Prussia, Called Frederick the Great (1859-1865). SARTOR REMAIRUS called a spiritual biography, is one of his most characteristic works and a vivid protest when published. Carlyle's style is savage and apocalyptic; it is marked by unusual words and figures of speech, agitated and mounting rhythms, and expressions influenced by the German language. See JANE WELSH; CRAIGENPUTTOCK.

Carneáticas, Count of Francisco Busone (1330-1432). The famous Italian condottiere who fought for the Visconti of Milan and the republic of Venice until the latter, fearing his successes, had him killed.

carmagnole. (1) Costume of French Revolutionists: wide-collared jacket, wide, black pantaloons, red cap (see BONNET ROUGE), and scarlet or tricolored waistcoat. The jacket was adopted from that worn in the south of France by the Piedmontese workmen of Carmagnola.

(2) A Red Republican song and dance of the time of the French Revolution, with the refrain:

Danons la Carmagnole,—Vive le son, vive le son—
Danons la Carmagnole,—Vive le son du canon!

Carman, [William] Bliss (1861-1929). Canadian poet, essayist, and lecturer. He is best known for his collaboration with Richard Hovey on Songs from Vagabondia (1894) and its sequels. In 1928, Carman was made Poet Laureate of Canada. Among his other volumes are Low Tide on Grand Pré (1893), Behind the Arras (1895), and The Rough Riders and Other Poems (1909).

Carmelites. An order of mendicant friars. It was founded at Mt. Carmel by the Crusader Berthold in the 12th century. Expelled from the Holy Land by the Saracens in the 13th century, they came to Europe. The order of Carmelites nuns dates from 15th century, the greatest being the Spanish mystic Saint Teresa of Avila, who organized the austere branch of the discalced (shoeless) Carmelites in contrast to the traditional Carmelites of the mitigated rule.

Carmen (1875). An opera by Georges Bizet based on Merimee's novel of the same name. Carmen, a gypsy, flirts with the young Spanish officer Don José, and he lets her escape arrest for stabbing another girl. She persuades him to desert and cast in his lot with a band of gypsy smugglers. Soon, however, she forgets José in her interest in the torero Escamillo. When she refuses to return to him, José stabs her.

Camer, Carl [Lamson] (1893--). American writer. While teaching at the University of Alabama, Camer composed the popular Stars Fell on Alabama (1934), a volume of Alabama folklore. He has also written a similar volume in the folklore of New York, his native state, Listen to a Lonesome Drum (1936). His other books include The Hudson (1939); Genesee Fever (1941), a novel; Windfall Fiddle (1950), a distinguished juvenile; and The Susquehanna (1955).

Carmiñae. A legendary phantom ship of the Baltic. The captain of this ship swore he would double the Cape, whether God willed it or not. For this impious vow he was doomed to abide for ever and ever captain in the same vessel, which always appears near the Cape, but never doubles it. The kohold of the phantom ship, named Klaboterman, helps sailors at their work, but beats those who are idle. When a vessel is doomed, the kohold appears smoking a short pipe, dressed in yellow, and wearing a nightcap. See also FLYING DUTCHMAN.

Carmina Burana. See GOLIARDIC VERSE.

Carné, Marcel (1906--). French film director and producer. Representative of the early portion of Marcel Carné's career are Quai de Brumes (1938) and Le Jour se Lève (1939), realistic studies of tragic lives with an emphasis on character and milieu. His later work is characteristic of the French cinema during the five years of German occupation. Like Cocteau, he took refuge in the romantic allegory touched with fantasy and mysticism. His most renowned works of this period, produced in collaboration with Jacques Prévert, are Les Visiteurs du Soir (1942) and Les Enfants de Paradis (1945).

Carnegie, Andrew (1835–1919). Scottish-born American industrialist and philanthropist. Starting as a bobbin boy in Pennsylvania at $1.20 a week, Carnegie achieved a commanding position in the steel industry through his organizing ability and acumen as a judge of men. After selling his steel interests to the U.S. Steel Corp. for $250 million in 1901, he devoted himself to philanthropy, providing funds for numerous public libraries and for such institutions as the Carnegie Endowment for International Peace. His philanthropy was inspired by his conviction that men who amassed great wealth were morally obligated to use it for the public good. He first expressed this doctrine, known as "the gospel of wealth," in an article, Wealth, in 1889. His other writings include Triumphant Democracy (1886), The Gospel of Wealth and Other Timely Essays (1900), and an Autobiography (1920).

Caro, Annibale (1507–1566). Italian diplomat and humanist. He wrote Petrarchan verse, comedies, and letters. His most famous work was his verse translation (1563–1566) of Vergil's Aeneid and his prose version of Longus’ Daphnis and Chloe.

Carolingsians or Carlovingians. Second dynasty of Frankish kings. They held the office of "mayor of the palace" under the weak later Merovingian kings, but they were the virtual rulers, particularly Charles Martel and his son Pepin the Short (c. 714–768), who finally deposed the nominal ruler in 751 and was anointed king of the Franks by the Pope in 754. His two sons jointly inherited the crown, but when Carloman (751–771) died, Charlemagne became sole king. His battles greatly enlarged his territory to include most of France, Germany, and northern Italy, and in 800 Pope Leo III crowned him Emperor of the Holy Roman Empire, thus identifying his temporal power with the interests of Christianity. He was an effective administrator, especially known for his attempt to revive learning and culture, sometimes known as the Carolingian Renaissance. To re-educate the clergy, he established schools and imported scholars from abroad, including Alcuin of York. After his death, however, internal divisions weakened the empire, and the reign of his successors ended in Germany in 911 and in France in 987.

The Carolingian legends are the romances of medieval and Renaissance Europe dealing with the supposed adventures of Charlemagne’s paladins. See especially those associated with Roland.

Caron, Pierre Augustin. See Beaumarchais.

Carpaccio, Vittore (c. 1456–1526). Venetian painter. A student of the Bellini brothers, he is noted for his ceremonial and narrative pictures, which abound in colorful detail. His masterpiece is the series of canvases that relate the Story of St. Ursula. His most important student and disciple was Veronese.

Carpenter, Edward (1844–1929). English poet and writer. Originally a clergyman, Carpenter’s socialist views caused him to leave the church and earn his living as lecturer, farmer, and sandal-maker. A disciple of Walt Whitman, whose poetry his own verse closely resembles, he was also a partisan of democracy and apologist for homosexual love. His best-known prose works are England’s Ideal (1887), Civilization: Its Cause and Cure (1889), and Love’s Coming of Age (1896). Collections of his poetry include Narcissus (1873), Toward Democracy (1883–1905), and Sketches from Life in Town and Country (1908).

carpet, magic. In Eastern wonder tales and romances, a stock device for transporting a character to any place he wished to go. It is sometimes termed Prince Housain’s carpet because of the role it plays in the well-known story of Prince Ahmed in the Arabian Nights. The most popular magic carpet, however, was that of King Solomon which, according to the Islamic legend related in the Koran, was of green silk. When he traveled, his throne was placed on it, and it was large enough for all his forces to stand upon; in order to screen his party from the sun, the birds formed a canopy over them with their wings.

carpetbagger. In U.S. history, a derisive epithet applied to Northerners who went south to take part in Reconstruction governments. To disgruntled Southerners, the carpetbags these men carried were indicative of their transience and lack of property interests in the South.

Carr, John Dickson. Pen names, Carter Dickson, Carr Dickson (1906– ). American writer of detective and mystery stories. Many of Carr’s books are set in England, where he lived for many years, and feature the astute sleuthing of the corpulent Dr. Gideon Fell. Carr emphasizes the puzzle element in the solutions of his mysteries, occasionally adding a touch of the macabre, and often using authentic historical backgrounds. Among his many books are The Bride of Newgate (1950), Behind the Crimson Blind (1952), Cut-Throat (1955), The Dead Man’s Knock (1958), and The Men Who Explained Miracles (1963).

Carracci, Annibale (1560–1609). Italian painter. With his brother Agostino (1555–1602) and his cousin Lodovico (1555–1619), he founded an academy in Bologna, in 1582, where artists followed a course of study that served as a model for later academies. Based on the principle of eclecticism, it combined elements from the art of the Venetian school and that of Correggio, Raphael, and Michelangelo in an effort to achieve classical beauty. Annibale Carracci’s religious pictures and large decorative schemes, notably his frescoes in the Farnese Gallery in Rome, reveal that he was the most talented member of this artistic family. His leading disciples were Domenichino and Guido Reni.

Carranza, Venustiano (1859–1920). Mexican political leader. An associate of Francisco Madero in the revolutionary movement of 1910, Carranza became provisional president in 1915 and was elected president in 1917. His administration saw the promulgation of the nationalistic Constitution of 1917, still in force today, but he ignored its provisions for social and economic reform. Despite U.S. recognition of the Carranza government in 1915, the border raids of Pancho Villa and American agitation against "godless and socialist Mexico" brought the two countries to the verge of war. When it became apparent that Carranza planned to name his own successor, revolt broke out; attempting to flee with a trainload of loot, Carranza was murdered at the hands of his own men.

Carrillo y Sotomayor, Luis (1583?-1610). Spanish poet and soldier. Considered a forerunner of Góngora, he wrote difficult, latinate verse, such as Fábula de Actis y Galatea. In his Libro de la erudição poética, he argued that Spanish should be latinized and that poets should be cultivated only by the learned. His works were first published in 1611.

Carroll, Lewis. Pen name of Charles Lutwidge Dodgson (1832-1898). English author, mathematician, and photographer. A lecturer in mathematics at Christ Church, Oxford, Carroll was shy and stammering, reputedly a boring lecturer, whose mathematical writings include An Elementary Treatise on Determinants (1867), Euclid and His Modern Rivals (1879), Curiosa Mathematica (1888), and Symbolic Logic (1896). He was ordained as a deacon but never preached, and was a talented portrait photographer. His principal enthusiasm, however, was for little girls, for whom he created many amusing games and puzzles and for one of whom, Alice Liddell, he wrote his famous Alice's Adventures in Wonderland and Through the Looking-Glass. These became highly popular among adult readers; theorists of surrealism in the 20th century seriously interpreted Carroll's works as early embodiment of their own principles; and Freudians have made much of the symbolism of the Alice books. Carroll's other works of fantasy and nonsense include The Hunting of the Snark, An Agony in Eight Fits (verses, 1876), Sylvie and Bruno (1889), and Sylvie and Bruno concluded (1893). Through these works run veins of satire, parody, masterfully inverted logic, and extremely suggestive symbolism. See Sir John Tenniel.

Carryl, Charles Edward (1842-1920). A New York financier and writer of children's books of a type reminiscent of those of Lewis Carroll, as Davy and the Goblin (1886); The Admiral's Caravan (1892). They contain some brilliant nonsense verse.

Carson, Christopher. Known as Kit Carson (1809-1868). American trapper and guide. Carson crossed the Mohave Desert in 1830 and served as a guide for Frémont's first western expedition (1842). He took an important part in the conquest of California during the Mexican War and fought in New Mexico during the Civil War, rising to the rank of brigadier general. Joaquin Miller's poem Kit Carson's Ride (1871) tells how Carson rescued his Indian bride from a prairie fire on their wedding day. Carson also appears in numerous dime novels and folk legends.

Carson, Rachel L[ouise] (1907-1964). American writer and scientist. Miss Carson's The Sea Around Us (1951) and The Edge of the Sea (1956) are known as works of literary as well as scientific merit. She maintained her impeccable style and aroused far more discussion and controversy with The Silent Spring (1962), in which she contended that the indiscriminate use of weed killers and insectsides constitutes a hazard to wildlife and to human beings.

Carstone, Richard. See Bleak House.

Carswell, Mrs. Catherine (1879-1946). English novelist and critic. Her biography of D. H. Lawrence, a close friend, was suppressed as libelous.

Cartaphilus or Cartaphilos. The doorkeeper of the Judgment Hall under Pontius Pilate in the variant of the Wandering Jew legend told by the historians of St. Albans, Roger of Wendover (d. 1236) and Matthew Paris. They reported that an Armenian archbishop, visiting St. Albans in 1228, said that he had recently dined with a man named Joseph who as Cartaphilus had been rude to Christ and had consequently become the Wandering Jew. The Flemish chronicler Philip Mousquet (13th century) wrote a similar version about 1243.

Carte de tendre. See Clélie, Histoire Romaine.

Carter, Nick. A fictional American detective who has appeared in over 1,000 stories. He was apparently invented by John R. Coryell (1849-1924), who worked in a writing team with Thomas Chalmers Harbaugh (1849-1924) and Frederick Van Rensselaer Dey (1861-1922); Nick made his first appearance in The Old Detective's Pupil (1886). The Nick Carter dime novels were extremely popular, and other writers continued the series in stories, movies, and radio plays.

Carteret, Philip (1639-1682). English colonial governor of New Jersey (1664-1676) and, after division of the colony, of East New Jersey (1676-1682). He came into conflict with Sir Edmund Andros, governor of New York, who challenged his right to collect duties on goods entering Jersey ports.

Carthage. Ancient city and state in North Africa. Founded in the ninth century B.C. by Phoenicians from the kingdom of Tyre, it was located on a peninsula near the site of modern Tunis. According to Roman legend, it was founded by Dido. It became dominant among Phoenician cities in North Africa, founded several colonies in Africa, and held sway over the native agricultural population of a large region. Carthage carried on considerable trading activities along the coasts of the Mediterranean and founded colonies in Spain, Sardinia, and Sicily. There existed between Rome and Carthage a number of treaties restricting Rome from interfering with Carthaginian trade. These treaties governed the relations between Rome and Carthage until the Punic Wars. Carthage was ultimately burned to the ground by the Romans in the Third Punic War (149-146 B.C.).

Carthago delenda est. (Lat., "Carthage must be destroyed.") This is the phrase with which Cato the Elder ended all his speeches in the senate.

Carthians (from Chartreusse, near Grenoble in France). An order of monks. It was founded in 1084 by St. Bruno. They were sworn to perpetual silence, continuous wearing of hair shirts, and eating of only one meal a day.

Cartier, Jacques (1491-1557). French navigator. During the second of his three voyages to America, he sailed up the St. Lawrence River, which he discovered, to an Indian village called Hochelaga, the site of modern Montreal, and named it Mount Royal.

Carton, Sydney. The hero of Charles Dickens' A Tale of Two Cities. He is a dissipated young man whose temperament is contrasted with that of Charles Darnay; the great physical resemblance of the two is an important factor in the plot. Carton loves Lucie Manette, but, knowing of her attachment to Darnay, never attempts to win her. His love for her, however, brings out his nobler qualities, and ultimately brings him to die on the guillotine in place of Darnay. His last thoughts are the famous lines, "It is a far, far better thing that I do, than I have ever done; it is a far, far better rest, that I go to, than I have ever known." See Bully Stryver.

Cartwright, William (1611–1643). English preacher, dramatist, and poet. Highly regarded by his contemporaries, Cartwright was one of the sons of Ben, or poets influenced by Ben Jonson. His best-known plays are The Ordinary (1634) and The Royal Slave (1636), which were first presented at Oxford University.

Caruso, Enrico (1873–1921). Italian dramatic tenor of worldwide popularity. The tremendous power and brilliance of his voice combined with an impassioned delivery and dynamic personality caused him many admirers, but also partially caused his death from overwork and strain. He was especially famous in the lead roles in Pagliacci, Aïda, La Bohème, and Tosca.

Carvajal, Micael or Miguel de (c. 1480–c. 1560). Spanish dramatist. He is best known for his Tragedia Josefinæ (c. 1555), a tragedy in four acts about Joseph and his brethren.

Carver, John (c. 1576–1621). Ist governor of the Plymouth Colony. He also hired and outfitted the Mayflower, and helped obtain financial backing for the voyage.

Cary, Joyce (1888–1957). Anglo-Irish novelist. He is the author of two trilogies, the first consisting of Herself Surprised (1941), To Be a Pilgrim (1942), and The Horse's Mouth, and the second of Prisoner of Grace, Except the Lord (1953), and Not Honour More (1955). The semi-autobiographical A House of Children (1941) gives an impression of his Irish childhood. Trained as an artist, he brought his knowledge of a painter's problems to his best-known novel, The Horse's Mouth. From 1913 to 1920 Cary worked for the Nigerian political service. All his first novels are set in Africa and are about Africans, inter racial problems, and the duties of government and law. His African novels are Atis Saaved (1932), An American Visitor (1933), The African Witch (1936), and Mister Johnson. Cary's later books are Dickensian in their humor and wealth of characters, and are concerned with English social history. In this group are Charlie Is My Darling (1940), The Moonlight (1946), A Fearful Joy (1949), The Captive and the Free (1959), and the trilogies. A cele brant of the power of the creative imagination, Cary presents it in many forms—in an African clerk (Mister Johnson), an artist (The Horse's Mouth), and a politician (the Prisoner of Grace series).

Casabianca. A poem by Felicia Hemans celebrating the heroic death of Giacomo Jocante Casabianca, the little son of a French naval captain. The boy was set by his father on watch. The ship caught fire, and his father was burnt to death. As the flames spread, the boy called to his father, but stood by his post until the ship blew up.

Casa de Bernarda Alba, La. See Federico García Lorca.

Casa Guidi Windows (1851). A long poem by Elizabeth Barrett Browning, written on behalf of the national aspirations of the Florentines.

Casals, Pablo or Pau (1876– ). Spanish cellist and conductor. His mastery of interpretation and technique on the cello is now legendary; he has extended his profound musical insight to his teaching and conducting. Since the defeat of the Spanish Loyalists in 1939, Casals has chosen voluntary exile: first in Prades, France, where he established an annual music festival, later in Puerto Rico, where the festivals continued. Conversations with Casals (1956), by J. M. Corredor, surveys Casals' life and thought.

Casanova [de Seingalt], Giovanni Jacopo (1725–1798). Italian adventurer. After his expulsion from a Venetian seminary for scandalous misconduct, Casanova commenced a lively career as charlatan, gambler, and lover that took him to all the capitals of Europe. His fortunes fluctuated widely: in 1755, for example, he was imprisoned in Venice for impiety and magic, but after making a daring escape, he turned up in Paris, where he enjoyed temporary affluence as director of the state lottery and came in contact with such luminaries as Louis XV and Mme. de Pompadour. In 1785 he was made librarian at Count Waldstein's castle of Dux in Bohemia, where he remained until his death. His famous Mémoires (12 vols., 1826–1838) are no doubt unreliable as to his own career but are of great interest historically.

Casaubon, Rev. Mr. See Middlemarch.

Casca. In Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, a conspirator against Caesar. He is known for his blunt, unadorned language.

Casey Jones. American ballad about a train wreck. It is probably based on the wreck in 1900 of the "Cannonball Express," whose driver, John Luther Jones (1864–1900), was born in Cayce, Kentucky, hence the nickname "Casey." Two railroad men, T. Lawrence Seibert and Eddie Newton, published the song in 1909 and may have been the authors.

Casket letters, the. Eight letters and a series of poems supposedly written by Mary, Queen of Scots to James, Earl of Bothwell. At least one of these was held to prove her complicity with Both well in the murder of her husband, Henry, Lord Darnley. The letters were found in a casket that fell into the hands of the Earl of Morton in 1557, four months after Darnley's death and a few days after Mary's surrender to the rebelling Scottish lords. The following year the letters were used as evidence in the investigation of the charges brought against Mary by the rebels. All trace of the original letters disappeared after 1584, and their authenticity is still a matter of dispute.

Casona, Alejandro. Pen name of Alejandro Rodriguez Alvarez (1903– ). Spanish playwright. Spanish audiences received his La Sirena Varada (1934) and Nuestra Natacha (1936) with great acclaim. Since 1939, Casona has resided in Argentina where his La Dama del Alba (1944) and Los Arboles Mueren de Pie (1949) have been similarly well received.

Casperl. See Gaspar.

Cassandra (Kassandra). In Greek mythology, a daughter of Priam and Hecuba. She was gifted by Apollo with the power of prophecy. However, when she refused the god’s advances he ordained that no one would believe her predictions, although they were invariably correct. She was carried off to Argos by Agamemnon and was killed with him by Clytemnestra and Aegisthus. She appears prominently in Euripides’ The Trojan Women and Aeschylus’ Agamemnon, as well as in Shakespeare’s Troilus and Cressida. Her name has become synonymous with all prophets of doom.

Cassatt, Mary (1845–1926). American painter and print maker. She resided most of her life in France, where she was associated with Edgar Degas and the impressionists. She treated the theme of maternity with objectivity and an interest in simple everyday gestures, but she derived her style of clear lines, flat colors, and unusual composition from Japanese art.

Cassim Baba. See Ali Baba and the Forty Thieves.

Cassio, Michael. In Shakespeare’s Othello, the handsome young Florentine whom Othello appoints as his lieutenant. Iago, jealous of the preference shown to Cassio, encourages his weakness for drink and involves him in a brawl, causing his dismissal.
Iago then convinces Othello that Cassio is Desde-mona’s lover. When Iago’s plot is uncovered, Othello reinstates Cassio and asks his pardon before commit-ing suicide.

Cassiopeia (Kassiopeia). In Greek mythology, the wife of Cepheus, king of Ethiopia, and mother of Andromeda. In consequence of her boasting of the beauty of her daughter, she was sent to the heavens as the constellation Cassiopeia, the chief stars of which form the outline of a lady seated in a chair and holding up both arms in supplication.

Cassius. Full Latin name, Caio Cassio Longi-inus (d. 45 B.C.). Roman general and politician.
During the civil war between Caesar and Pompey, Cassius allied himself with Pompey. After Pompey’s defeat at Pharsalus (48 B.C.), Caesar pardoned Cassius and made him praetor (44). Unlike Brutus, however, Cassius never ceased to be Caesar’s enemy, in spite of the favor shown him. It was Cassius who conceived the plot against the dictator’s life, and he who persuaded Brutus to join the conspiracy.
After Caesar’s murder, public opinion turned against the conspirators, and they fled from Rome. Cassius and Brutus met the forces of Octavius and Antony at Philippi (42), and during the first engagement Cassius, overwhelmed by Antony’s forces, precipi-tately committed suicide, not knowing that Brutus had driven Octavius from the field. Brutus’ forces were defeated some days later.

In Shakespeare’s Julius Caesar, Cassius is depicted as the instigator of the plot to assassinate Caesar.
Grasping and ambitious, he urges the reluctant Brutus to join the conspiracy, pointing out, in a famous speech, that each man controls his own destiny:

The fault, dear Brutus, is not in our stars,
But in ourselves, that we are underlings.

Cassius says of himself:

Yet Cassius has a lean and hungry look;
He thinks too much: such men are dangerous.

At Philippi, rashly assuming that Brutus has been defeated, Cassius commits suicide and thus helps turn Brutus’ initial victory into overwhelming defeat.

Cassola, Carlo (1917– ). Italian novelist. Inspired by Italy’s fascist experience, his novels include Fausto and Anna (Fausto e Anna; 1952), I Vecchi
Compagni (1953), La Casa di Via Valadier (1956), Un Matrimonio del Dopoguerra (1958), Bebo’s Girl
(La Ragazza di Babè; 1960), and Un Cuore Arido (1961), which depicts the love life of a Tuscan seamstress in prewar Italy.

Interested in sociopolitical problems of postwar Italy, Cassola has written a notable polemical study about the conditions of Tuscan miners, I Minatori della Maremma (1956).

Castalia. A fountain of Parnassus sacred to the Muses. Its waters had the power of inspiring with the gift of poetry those who drank of them.

Castaway, The (1803). A tragic poem, his last, by William Cowper. It was based on an incident described in A Voyage Round the World (1748), by Admiral George Anson (1697–1762), a celebrated seaman of the eighteenth century. It tells of a lonely death at sea and compares this with the poet’s own in a mood of despairing prophecy.

caste (Port. casta, race). One of the hereditary classes of society in India. The four great Hindu castes are the Brahmin (the priestly and meditative order), the Shatriya or Kshatriya (soldiers and rulers), Vaisyha (husbandmen and merchants), and Sudra (peasants and laborers). The untouchables or outcastes form a fifth group, to whom the religious books are sealed; they are held cursed in this world, and without hope. Mahatma Gandhi and the present Indian government have done much to improve the position of this last group.

Castelar, Emilio (1832–1899). Spanish statesman and orator. A professor of history at Madrid university, he became president of the first Spanish republic in 1873. His speeches, which may be studied in his Discursos (1871), raised him to the position of Spain’s greatest orator and exerted an influence upon European affairs. He is also the author of Fra Filippo Lippi (1877) and an account of his travels in Italy, Recuerdos de Italia (1872).

Castelo Branco, Camilo (1825–1890). Portuguese novelist. Castelo Branco was a prolific writer whose works reflect his own turbulent existence.
Born out of wedlock, he had numerous love affairs, briefly contemplated entering the priesthood, and in 1861 was imprisoned for adultery. During his incarceration he wrote his best-known novel, Amor de Perdição (1862), a semi-autobiographical tale of thwarted passion. Considered an outstanding prose stylist, he later turned toward realism, particularly in Novelas do Minho (1875), studies of rural life, and A Brasileira de Prazins (1882). He also wrote
Onde Está a Felicidade? (1856), Um Homem de Brios (1857), and Eutêbio Maddion (1879), a parody of Zolaesque realism.

Castelvetro, Lodovico (1505–1571). Italian Renaissance literary critic. He is noted for his comments (1570) on Aristotle’s Poetics; its influence was felt in Europe through the 18th century.

Castiglione, Baldassare (1478–1529). Italian diplomat, writer, and courtier. One of the most important and influential authors in Europe during the Renaissance, he was born at Mantua, where he served the Gonzaga family, then moved to Urbino and the service of its duke, Guidobaldo da Montefeltro. In 1506, he was in England to receive the Order of the Garter for his master from Henry VII. In 1524, he went to Spain as papal envoy and died there in 1529, universally mourned. Although he wrote poetry in various genres, his chief work is Il Libro del Cortegiano (The Book of the Courtier), known simply as Il Cortegiano (The Courtier). Finished in 1518, the book sets forth in a series of dialogues the author’s conception of the ideal courtier and the norms of courtesy in a cultured society. Castiglione’s portrait, done by his friend Raphael, is one of the masterpieces of the Louvre museum.

Castillejo, Cristóbal de (1490–1550). Spanish poet. A Cistercian monk, he spent most of his life in the service of Archduke Ferdinand, later king of the Romans. His poems, which were published in 1573, include Sermón de Amores; Díálogo de la Vida de Corte, a satire on court life; and Contra los que Dejan los Metros Castellanos, a диатріб on poets who adopted Italian meters.

Castillo y Solórzano, Alonso de (1584–c. 1649). Spanish novelist and dramatist. He is best known for his numerous picaresque novels, notably Las Harpas en Madrid (1631), Aventuras del Bachiller Trapaza (1637), and La Garduñá de Sevilla (1642).

Castle, Egerton (1858–1920). English novelist. In collaboration with his wife Agnes (d. 1922), he wrote a series of popular romantic novels including The Pride of Jennico (1888), The Bath Comedy (1900), and The Secret Orchard (1901). Several of his books were dramatized.

Castle, Joyous. See FAERIE QUEENE, THE.

Castle, The (Das Schloss; 1926). An unfinished novel by Franz Kafka, published posthumously. In its bare essentials, it is the story of a man against a bureaucracy and in this is similar to The Trial. The hero, a land surveyor known only as K., is constantly frustrated in his efforts to gain entrance into a mysterious castle, which is administered by an extraordinarily complicated and inaccessible bureaucratic hierarchy. The book invites allegorical interpretation; K.’s striving has been seen as the human quest for comprehension of the ways of an incomprehensible God and his frustration has been seen as symbolic of the actual human condition. But apart from any exact interpretation, the novel clearly reflects Kafka’s convictions about the problematic nature of human existence, as well as his stylicist mastery and frequent ironic humor.

Castle Dangerous (1832). A novel by Sir Walter Scott. Castle Dangerous, or the Perilous Castle of James Douglas was so called because it was taken from the English three times between 1306 and 1307. In the novel Black Douglas promises to release his prisoner, Lady Augusta, if the castle is surrendered to him. Sir John de Walton consents, gives up the castle, and marries the lady.

Castle Garden. A large circular building at the Battery, New York City. It was built as a fort in 1807. It became a concert hall where Jenny Lind gave a famous concert. Later an immigrant station, then an aquarium, it has been restored to its original form and is a federal monument.

Castle of Indolence (1748). A poem in Spenserian stanzas by James Thomson. The castle of the poem is situated in the land of Drowsiness, where every sense is steeped in enervating delights. The owner is an enchanter who deprives all who enter his domains of their energy and free will. In Canto II, Selvaggio, the Knight of Arts and Industry, breaks the spell cast by the wizard Indolence. It is considered Thomson’s best work by many critics.

Castle of Otranto, The (1764). A Gothic novel, the first of that genre in English, by Horace Walpole. The villain, Manfred, prince of Otranto, inhabits the castle of Otranto and rules the realm unlawfully; his grandfather had poisoned Alfonso, the rightful ruler, and it had been cryptically prophesied that the usurpers would prevail so long as the castle was big enough to hold the rightful ruler. Manfred plans to marry his son Conrad to Isabella, daughter of the marquis of Vicenza, but in one of many supernatural events, Conrad is crushed to death by a gigantic helmet in the courtyard. Manfred then determines to marry Isabella himself in the hope that she will present him with another heir, whom he needs in order to maintain control of the realm. Isabella, terrified of Manfred, is aided by the handsome young peasant Theodore in her escape. In fulfillment of the prophecy, Alfonso’s ghost, grown too large for the castle, tears it down and rises from the ruin, proclaiming Theodore, future husband of Isabella, the true heir to Otranto.

Castle Rackrent (1800). A novel by Maria Edgeworth depicting the dissolute life of Irish landlords of the 18th century. A succession of irresponsible members of the Rackrent family, watched by their ineffectual tenantry, dissipate their fortunes until they reach the verge of destitution.

Castor (Kastor) and Polydeuces (Polydeukes, Pollux). In Greek mythology, sons of Leda and Tyndareus or Zeus, called the Dioscuri. Beginning with their births, their lives and adventures are told in many versions. Both may have been the mortal sons of Tyndareus, or both immortal sons of Zeus; but the commonest tale makes Castor mortal. They sailed with the Argonauts, and it was Polydeuces, a great boxer, who killed Amycus, the brutal Bebrycian king, in a boxing match. Later, they quarreled with another pair of twins, Lynceus and Idas, and in the ensuing fight, all but Polydeuces were killed. Polydeuces begged his father Zeus to let him share his immortality with his brother. This wish being granted, they either spend one day together in heaven, the next in Hades, or they alternate in spending a day in each.

Castor and Polydeuces became patron gods of mariners, appearing in St. Elmo’s fire. In late myth they were identified as the constellation Gemini. Their cult became highly popular in Rome, where Polydeuces was known as Pollux.

Castorp, Hans. The central figure in Thomas Mann’s novel The Magic Mountain. He is a young marine engineer of middling talents, the son of a Hamburg merchant family. He is described early in the book as an “unwritten sheet of paper,” by which Mann means that his personality has yet to take shape. He is essentially passive and reflects the characters and events about him, more than he acts upon them.

Castro, Inés de (c. 1310–1355). Spanish noblewoman. She was the mistress of Dom Pedro, eldest son and heir of King Alfonso IV of Portugal. Pedro married her after the death of his first wife, and Alfonso, fearful that she and her powerful family constituted a threat to the dynasty, had her put to death. Upon his accession to the throne in 1357, Pedro had her body exhumed and placed upon a throne, forcing his courtiers to render her the homage denied her in life. Her remains were later taken to Alcoaça, where a magnificent mausoleum was built. Many writers have retold her tragic story, notably Camões in Os Lusíadas and Luís Vélez de Guevara in Reinar Después de Morir.

Castro Alves, Antonio de (1847-1871). Brazilian poet. The chief representative of the condoreira school of poets, so called because their poetic flights resembled those of the Andean condor, Castro Alves was strongly influenced by Victor Hugo, whom he acclaimed as “master of the world.” A handsome, dashing youth, he was “discovered” by José de Alencar and Machado de Assis, who were impressed by his Gonzaga (1867), a prose drama about an abortive revolution in 18th-century Minas Gerais. After a shooting accident resulted in the loss of a foot, Castro Alves was stricken by tuberculosis, which caused his death at the age of 24. He spent his last months in the preparation of Espumas Fluctuantes (1870), his best-known collection. Effectively combining the ideals of romanticism with social criticism, his poetry is characterized by great verbal opulence and emotional force, though critics point out that it is often overwrought and bombastic. He is affectionately remembered by his countrymen as “the poet of the slaves,” because of the ardent abolitionist sentiments he expressed in such poems as Vozes d’Africa and O Nario Negreiro, both included in the 1921 edition of Os Escravos, the first to follow the author’s plan.

Castro y Bellvis, Guillén de (1569-1631). Spanish dramatist. A soldier turned writer, Castro was a disciple of Lope de Vega. His fame rests largely on Mucedades del Cid and its sequel, Hazahñas del Cid, which were derived almost entirely from popular ballads about the medieval hero. These plays were the direct source of Corneille’s Le Cid (1636).

Casuarina Tree, The (1926). A collection of short stories by W. Somerset Maugham. Maugham successfully dramatized the title story as The Letter in 1927; it is the story of a white woman in Malaya who shoots her lover when he confesses that he is now in love with a Chinese woman.

cat. A domesticated feline to which many curious beliefs have adhered. It was called a “familiar,” from the medieval superstition that Satan’s favorite form was a black cat. Hence witches were said to have cats as their familiars.

In ancient Rome the cat was a symbol of liberty. The goddess of Liberty was represented as holding a cup in one hand, a broken scepter in the other, with a cat lying at her feet. No animal is more an enemy to all constraint than a cat.

In Egypt the cat was sacred to Isis, or the moon. It was held in great veneration and was worshiped with great ceremony as a symbol of the moon not only because it is more active after sunset but from the dilation and contraction of its pupils, symbolic of waxing and waning. The goddess Bast (Bubastis), representative of the life-giving solar heat, was portrayed as having the head of a cat, probably because that animal likes to bask in the sun. Diodorus tells us that whoever killed a cat, even by accident, was by the Egyptians punished by death, and according to Egyptian tradition, Artemis assumed the form of a cat, and thus excited the fury of the giants.

Catachresis. (1) The wrong use of one word for another, as in “his action was most affective” instead of “effective.”

(2) The use of an especially far-fetched figure of speech such as one involving literal impossibility or paradox, as in a mixed metaphor.

Collider, in physics, refers to a high-energy particle accelerator used to collide opposing beams of protons or other particles with the aim of studying the fundamental nature of matter and the forces that govern it. The collision results in the creation of new particles, which can then be examined to understand the interactions at the subatomic level.

Catcher in the Rye, The (1951). A novel by J. D. Salinger. It deals with two days in the life of Holden Caulfield, who has run away from his prep school just before the start of the Christmas vacation; unwilling to go home, he drifts about in New York, getting himself into a series of wryly humorous adventures. The sophistication and amazing but credible articulateness of this slightly unbalanced adolescent uniquely convey contemporary youth’s dissatisfaction with adult society.

Catchpoles. An Anglicism for the Chicanous Rabelais’ Gargantua and Pantagruel, who live on the Isle of Procuration. They make their living by offering to be beaten for a fee. Through these strange creatures Rabelais satirized the legal officials whose unpleasant task it was to deliver court summons.

Cather, Willa [Sibert] (1876-1947). American novelist. As a child, Willa Cather, who was born in Virginia, was taken to Nebraska, which later provided her with the setting for much of her finest work. After working as a newspaperwoman in Pittsburgh and as a teacher in Allegheny, Pa., she joined the staff of McClure’s Magazine in New York City. Miss Cather’s first novel was Alexander’s Bridge (1912), the story of an engineer, Bartley Alexander, torn between love for his wife and an actress he had known in his youth. She then wrote three excellent novels dealing with the life of the immigrant settlers in the Middle West: O Pioneers!, The Song of the Lark, and My Antonia. Two later novels, One of Ours and A Lost Lady, are concerned with the Midwest and their characters’ relation to its pioneer past. With The Professor’s House and Death Comes for the Archbishop, Miss Cather turned to the Southwest. Her interest in Roman Catholicism shown in the latter book was continued in Shadows on the Rock, a novel about 18th-century Quebec. Other novels by Miss Cather are My Mortal Enemy (1926), Lucy Gayheart (1935), and Sapphiria and the Slave Girl (1940). Her short stories and novellas were collected in The Troll Garden (1905), Youth and the Bright Medusa, Obscure Destinies (1932), and The Old Beauty and Others (1948).

In time Miss Cather’s high regard for the courage and industry of the pioneers seemed to become a deep hatred for the modern world. She was, according to Maxwell Geisman, “an aristocrat in an egalitarian order, an agrarian writer in an industrial order, a defender of the spiritual graces in the midst of an increasingly materialistic culture.”
Catherine of the Great or Catherine II (Ekaterina Aleksyevna; 1729–1796). Empress of Russia (1762–1796). Her reign was marked by increased contact with the West. At that time, French culture was predominant in Europe and the empress herself took part in the intellectual life of the continent, corresponding regularly with Voltaire, Baron von Grimm, and Diderot. The beginning of Catherine's reign promised a liberalization of the regime in Russia. She intended to reform the legal code of the country, for this purpose composing a Nahiray (Instruction) on which the reforms were to be based. Much of the material in the Nahiray came from such liberal thinkers as Montesquieu and Beccarria. Catherine's liberal attitude changed as a result of the peasant uprising (1773–1774) led by Emelyan Puga-chev and the French Revolution in 1789. The change in attitude led to the banning of satirical journals in Russia, which the empress had encouraged for a time. The primary target of the ban was Nikolai Ivanovich Novikov, whose criticism of Russian society was becoming too sharp for Catherine's taste. Novikov was imprisoned in 1791 and was freed after her death. Another victim of the empress's conservatism was Aleksandr Nikolayevich Radishchev, who published his now famous Puteshestviye iz Petersburga v Moskву (A Journey from Petersburg to Moscow) in 1792. Radishchev's criticisms of Russian life incensed Catherine and the author was exiled to Siberia.

Catherine's chief political achievements were the acquisition of land in the Ukraine that had been long held by Poland and the establishment of Russia's frontier on the coast of the Black Sea. Her dream of conquering Constantinople from the Turks was unfulfilled and was later taken up by other nationalist political thinkers.

Cathleen Ni Houlihan (1904). A one-act play by William Butler Yeats. It concerns a young Irish peasant who leaves his home and fiancée in order to follow a poor old woman. She is Cathleen Ni Houlihan, symbol of Ireland, who promises fame to those who help her recover her land from the strangers (the English) who have taken it. The part was written for Maud Gonne.

Cathos. One of the 2 ridiculous snobs in Molière's comedy Les Précieuses Ridicules.

Cattolò, Full Latin name, Lucius Sergius Catiliina (d. 62 B.C.). Roman conspirator. An able but unscrupulous patrician, Catiline organized a conspiracy of similarly desperate men to overthrow the Roman government by force. The plot was discovered by Cicero, who exposed it in his four eloquent orations: In Catilinam. Driven from Rome by Cicero's first speech, Catiline later fell in battle against the Roman army. He is the subject of a tragedy (1611) by Ben Jonson.

Cattolò, George (1796–1872). American artist. He lived with Indians in the Middle West and in Central and South America, taking notes, gathering material, and picturing their life. His collection was placed in the National Museum in Washington and proved of great documentary value. He is the author of several books, including Life Amongst the Indians (1861).

Cato, Marcus Porcius. Known as Cato the Elder (234–149 B.C.). Roman statesman. His long public career was a constant struggle against enemies of the state abroad and moral laxity at home. As censor, Cato became the stern arbiter of Roman manners and did his utmost to suppress all innovations in thought and behavior. All that did not fit his severe code of moral rectitude he labeled "un-Roman." Despite the decisive defeat of Carthage in 202 B.C., he still regarded it as Rome's persistent enemy, and he would end each of his speeches in the Senate with the phrase Carthago delenda est ("Carthage must be destroyed"). In 146, Cato, at the age of 85, had his wish granted: Carthage was evacuated and burnt, and its rubble was leveled with ploughs and oxen.

Except for his treatise De Re Rustica (also known as De Agri Cultura), Cato's writings, including his great work on Roman history Origines, are now lost. His prose style was admired for its vigor and terseness.

Cato, Marcus Porcius. Known as Cato the Younger (95–46 B.C.). Roman statesman. The great-grandson of Cato the Elder, he is often considered the last of the Romans of the old school. Unwilling to win an election by bribing the populace, he lost it but gained the admiration of the Roman nobility. In Caesar's conflict with Pompey, Cato backed the latter and, after Pompey's defeat at Pharsalus, went with him into exile. When Caesar's legions defeated the army of the nobility in North Africa, Cato—then at Utica—took his own life. The conservative Senatorial Party went on to revere him as a saint and renamed him Cato Uticensis ("Cato of Utica") for his last stoic act of defiance. Of him, Lucan wrote: Victrix causa dies placuit, sed victa Cato ("The gods were pleased with the cause that won—Cato with the cause that lost!"). His death is described in Addison's tragedy Cato (1713).

Cat on a Hot Tin Roof (1955). A play by Tennessee Williams. It deals with the neurotic Pollitt family living in the Mississippi Delta. "Big Daddy" Pollitt is dying of cancer; Gooper, the oldest son, and his wife plot to gain the father's property. Brick, the younger son, an alcoholic ex-football star, and his wife, Maggie ("the cat"), are driven apart when Brick accuses Maggie of being responsible for his friend's death. In a confrontation with his father, Brick admits his failings and Maggie untruthfully announces that she is pregnant in an attempt to help her husband gain his inheritance. At the end of the play, the audience is left with a hope of reconciliation between Brick and Maggie. The play was awarded a Pulitzer Prize.

Cattle-Raid of Cooley, The. In Gaelic literature, a 12th-century epic tale from the Ulster CYCLE. It is perhaps the most important of the early Irish sagas. Queen Medb brings war against the Ulstermen, and Cú Chulainn alone defends the territory against her army for a long period. The most poignant moment in the tale is the combat between Cú Chulainn and his own foster brother, Ferdias, whom he ultimately kills. This tale had considerable influence on the writers involved in the 19th-century Irish Renaissance.

Catton, Bruce (1899– ). American historian and journalist. After working for various newspapers in Cleveland, Boston, and Washington, Catton entered government service in 1942 and later served as director of information for the War Production Board. From this experience came The War Lords of Washington (1948). He became deeply interested in the American Civil War, but it was not until 1952 that he began devoting his full time to writing Civil War history. His works in this field include Mr. Lincoln's Army (1951), dealing with the early years of the war; Glory Road (1952), relating the campaigns of 1862–1863; A Stillness at Appomattox (1953), which won a Pulitzer Prize; and Grant Moves South (1959). The Coming Fury (1961) and Terrible Swift Sword (1963), the first two volumes of his centennial history of the war, cover events from the Democratic convention at Charleston in April, 1860, to the fall of 1862.

Catullus, Gaius Valerius (87–754 B.C.). Roman lyric poet. Born in Verona, he went to Rome as a young man. Through his charm and precocious brilliance he gained easy admittance to the refined and prodigal society of the day; through his ardent susceptibility he fell disastrously in love with a young Roman matron who became the "Lesbia" of his poems. She was the beautiful, gifted, and unscrupulous Clodia, sister of the notorious Clodius Pulcher (see Cicero). She became the dark muse of his poetry, and her life and personality are closely interwoven with the life and lyrics of Catullus.

At 30, Catullus found himself bankrupt, emotionally as well as financially, and in 57 B.C., after his final break with Clodia, he traveled to Asia with his friend Gaius Memmius, who was taking the post of propraetor of Bithynia. On his way back to Rome, a year later, he passed his brother's grave near Troy. Here he probably wrote the famous ode which ends Prater, ave atque vale (Brother, hail and farewell). He died himself not long afterwards, at the age of 30, but 35 at the most.

Of his poems, 116 composed in a number of lyric meters are extant. Among them are such celebrated love lyrics as Vivamus, mea Lesbia, atque amenus and Odì et amò; the mock threnody on the death of Lesbia's parrot; the Lament of Athasis; the miniature epic on the marriage of Peleus and Thetis; and a host of stinging epigrammatic attacks on his personal enemies.

Catullus brought many Greek rhythms into Latin literature, and was the first Roman poet to exploit fully the classical lyric meters. He exerted wide influence on subsequent poets, such as Tibullus, Propertius, Ovid, and Horace and Martial. In English literature his influence can be traced in the Elizabethan wedding odes and in the Caroline lyrics.

Caucasian Chalk Circle, The (Der kausakische Kreidekreis; 1944–1945). A play by Bertolt Brecht. Based on a Chinese fable (see The CIRCLE OF Chalk), it concerns the conflict between a rich, powerful woman who has abandoned her baby son and a peasant girl who has brought him up. Both women claim the child, and the judge before whom the case is brought instructs each of them to take one of the child's hands and attempt to pull him out of a circle chalked on the floor, to show the strength of their love. The rich woman yanks with all her might and succeeds, because the peasant girl, afraid of hurting the boy, lets go. The judge, however, awards the child to the peasant girl, for he recognizes that she has shown the greater love.

Caudine Forks. A narrow pass in the mountains near Capua, now called the valley of Arpaia. It was here that the Roman army, under the consuls T. Veturius Calvinus and Sp. Postumius, fell into the hands of the Samnites (321 B.C.) and was made to pass under a yoke made up of three spears, two stuck into the ground parallel to each other and the third placed above them. The army was then allowed to depart in ignominy.

Caudwell, Christopher. Pen name of Christopher St. John Sprigg (1907–1937). English literary critic and writer of detective stories. His Marxist literary criticism was influential during the leftist 1930's, Illusion and Reality (1937). He was killed fighting with the International Brigade in the Spanish Civil War.

Cautionary Tales (1907). Verses for children by Hilaire Belloc. They are mock-moral anecdotes about the fearful fates of children who Chew String, Tell Lies, or Bang Doors.

Cauvin, Jean. See John CALVIN.

Cavafy, Constantine P. Pen name of C. P. Kavafis (1863–1933). Greek poet. Though Greek culture and the Greek past is the subject of much of his finest verse, Cavafy lived most of his life in Alexandria, where he was born. During his lifetime he published only one small book of poems, which he later revised. Most of his poems were distributed only among his personal friends. They were scarcely known to readers of English until some of them were translated in 1952. Esteemed by critics as one of the finest modern Greek poets, Cavafy's work was brought to wider notice by the admiration they expressed.

There are two main classes of Cavafy's poems: narrative poems of events in the Greek past, and personal lyrics often concerned with homosexual love. In both the author's remarkable capacity for objectivity shows itself. The first, far from being heroic, are ironic in tone; the second are straightforward and unsentimental. The style and tone of Cavafy's work, expressed in simple, almost dry language, is peculiarly his own.
Cavalcade. See Noel Coward.

Cavalcanti, Guido (1250–1300). Italian poet. He was one of the stilnovisti group and a close friend of Dante. Most of his "love songs," the Canzone d'amore, were addressed to a French lady named Mandetta. They were translated by Dante Gabriel Rossetti (1861) and by Ezra Pound (1911).

Cavaller, Jean. See Camisard.

Cavalleri of the Rose, The. See Rosenkavalier, Der.

Cavalleri Rusticana (Rustic Chivalry). An opera by Pietro Mascagni (1890) based on a novella by Giovanni Verga.

Cavender's House (1929). A narrative poem by Edwin Arlington Robinson. It tells how Cavender, who pushed his wife off a cliff because he suspected her of infidelity, is still uncertain of her guilt 12 years later.

Cavendish, Margaret. Duchess of Newcastle (1624–1674). English noblewoman, one of the outstanding writers of her sex in the 17th century, known for her eccentricity of dress and behavior. She wrote prolifically, producing 13 printed books. Her best-known work is her Sociable Letters (1664), presenting a vivid picture of her times. She also wrote The Life of William Cavendish (1667), a biography of her husband, the duke of Newcastle, who had been a devoted follower of both Charles I and Charles II.

Caves du Vatican, Les. See Lascario's Adventures.

Cavour, Conte Camillo Benso di (1810–1861). Italian statesman. Named prime minister of Sardinia in 1852, he devoted himself to the cause of Italian unification. His efforts saw fruition in 1861 when Victor Emmanuel II of Sardinia became king of all Italy excepting Rome and Venetia.

Cawdor, and Other Poems (1928). A collection of poems by Robinson Jeffers. Cawdor, the title poem, is based on the story of Phaedra and Hippolytus; it deals with the desire of Fera Cawdor for her stepson, Hood, who rejects her advances. Cawdor, suspecting the boy has seduced Fera, kills him. Later Cawdor learns that Hood was innocent, and suffers from his inability to expiate his guilt.

Cawein, Madison [Julius] (1865–1914). American poet. He is best known for his Kentucky Poems (1902), a selection published in England with a laudatory introduction by Edmund Gosse. He wrote more than 30 books, including Blooms of the Berry (1887) and The Cup of Comus (1915).

Caxton, William (c. 1422–1491). The first English printer, also an important translator. He moved to Bruges, where he established himself as a dealer in textiles, remaining active in commerce until about 1470, even serving as governor (1465–1469) of the English Association of Merchant Adventurers in the Low Countries. Between 1469 and 1471 he translated a French romance about the Trojan War, then, to meet the great demand for the book, set about learning the new art of printing, probably with Colard Mansion at a press in Bruges. In 1474 or 1475 his Recuyell of the Historyes of Troye became the first book ever printed in English. The second was The Game and Playe of the Chesse (1475), which he had also translated from the French.

Caxton established a printing press in Westminster when he moved to England in 1476, and thereafter printed nearly 80 books, including the Mirroure of the World (1481), The Golden Legend (1483), Malory's Morte d'Arthur (1485), and the works of Boethius, Geoffrey Chaucer, and John Gower. Many of the books were his own translations from the French, including a great many of the Carolingian and Arthurian romances. What Caxton chose to print naturally became the staple reading matter for the English reading public of his time. His assistant Wynkyn de Worde became his successor after his death, reprinting many of Caxton's most popular titles.

Caxtons, The (1849). A novel by Edward Bulwer-Lytton. Along with its sequels, My Novel (1853) and What Will He Do with It (1858), it narrates the history of an upper middle-class English family. The story is supposed to be written by Caxton's advertisement, which he printed in 1477. It is thought to be the earliest English broadside.

Suplício GET OR BULA Pisistratus Caxton. His father, Austin Caxton, is an impractical philosopher and scholar, lost in vague dreams and plans for his proposed masterpiece on The History of Human Error. The launching of this magnus opus is finally made possible by the money that Pisistratus brings back from Australia. Others of the Caxton family are the gay, irresponsible Uncle Jack, who is an inveterate and not too lucky promoter; the fine old soldier, Captain Roland, and an uncle of Pisistratus; and Roland's son Herbert,
a wild young man with gypsy blood in his veins,
who dies a heroic death in India.

Cayrol, Jean (1911– ). French poet and novelist. His 4-volume trilogy Le vivrai l'amour des autres (1947–1950) depicts a Lazarus figure, a wundering beggar who assumes the miseries of the world. This theme is continued in the essay Lazare parmi nous (1950) and in many of his poems, such as Pour tous les temps (1955). Other works include Poèmes de la Nuit et du Brouillard (1945) and Passetemps de l'homme et des oiseaux (1947).

Cecchi, Giovanni Maria or Giammaria (1518–1587). Fiorentine notary and wool merchant who was also one of the first professional Italian playwrights. He wrote some 50 comedies, farces, and religious plays, his best being the comedy L'Assiolo
(The Horned Owl).

Cech, Svatopluk (1846–1908). A Czech epic poet and satirist. He celebrated Slavic traits and dem-cratic ideals in his epic poems, though his novels were mildly satirical. Perhaps his best work, however, was in his lyrics.

Cecil, Lord [Edward Christian] David [Gas-coyne] (1902– ). English literary critic and biog-ographer. Among his urban studies are Early Victorian Novelists (1934); The Young Melbourne (1939); Lord M. (1954), the second part of his biography of Melbourne; and The Fine Art of Reading (1957).

Cecil, William. See William Cecil BURGLEY.

Cecilia, St. A Roman lady who underwent martyrdom in the 3rd century. She is the patron saint of the blind, being herself blind; also patroness of musicians, and inventor of the organ. According to tradition an angel fell in love with her for her musical skill, and used nightly to visit her. Her husbond saw the heavenly visitant, who thereupon gave to both a crown of martyrdom, which he brought from Paradise. Dryden and Pope have written odes in her honor, and both speak of her charming an angel by her musical powers. See Second Nun's Talk.

Cecilia, or Memoirs of an Heiress (1728). A novel by Fanny BURNEY. In order to keep her fortune, Cecilia Beverly, an heiress of somewhat inferior birth, must marry a man who will adopt her name. Mortimer Delvile loves her, but his family is proud of its antiquity and only he can perpetuate its name. Their love is thwarted by this and other obstacles, particularly the schemes and prejudices of those who wish to make use of Cecilia for their own ends. The two finally marry secretly, but further misunderstanding separates them until Delvile lo-cates her by placing an advertisement in the "agony column" of the daily newspaper.

Cecrops (Kekrops). The traditional founder of Athens and first king of Attica. Supposed to have sprung from the ground, he was represented as half man, half serpent.

Cela, Camilo José (1916– ). Spanish novelist. La familia de Pascual Duarte (1942), his first novel, was a huge success both in Spain and abroad.
The tale, an example of the tremendismo technique, presents the self-narrated account of the life of a murderer awaiting execution. Cela is also known for his social satire La colmena (The Hive, 1951) and is considered one of the most able of contemporary Spanish writers.

Celebrated Jumping Frog of Calaveras County, The (1865). A story by Mark TWAIN. It is based on an actual event reported in the California newspapers. Jim Smiley, a miner, bets that his frog, Dan'l Webster, can outjump any other. A stranger accepts the dare; while Jim is distracted, he pours quail shot into Dan'l. The story, reprinted many times, appeared in Clemens' first book, a collection of tales called The Celebrated Jumping Frog (1867).

Celestial City. See PILGRIM'S PROGRESS.

Celestina, La (1499). The popular title of La tragicomedia de Calisto y Melibea, a Spanish novel in dialogue by an anonymous author. The oldest known edition, dating from 1499, contains 16 acts which were increased to 21 in a 1502 edition. There is some doubt as to the author of the first act and of the 1502 additions, but it is generally agreed that Acts 2–16 were written by Fernando de Rojas, a lawyer and converted Jew from Toledo who served as alcalde mayor, or chief magistrate, of Talavera.

The plot deals with the noble young Calisto and his love for Melibea. When she proves cold to his advances, he enlists the aid of Celestina, an unscrupu-ulous, self-seeking crone, who persuades Melibea to relent. Just when the romance is progressing smoothly, Calisto is killed by a fall from a ladder.
In despair, Melibea flings herself from a tower to her death.

Most of the interest in the novel centers about the demonic figure of the go-between Celestina. Although the young lovers move in a world of idealized passion, Celestina and the servants, prostitutes, and other low-life characters who surround her give a crude but vivid picture of the common people of 15th-century Spain.

Unsuitable for the stage because of its length, the Celestina strongly influenced Spanish writers, notably Lope de Vega. It was widely translated, the English version (1631) by James Mabbe being especially well known. See Juan RUIZ.

Celeus (Keleos). In Greek legend, a king of Eleusis, husband of Metanira. He sheltered DEMETER when she was wandering in search of her daughter.
In return, Demeter wished to give his son Demophon immortality. When Metanira objected to her placing the infant in the fire to immortalize him, Demeter angrily revealed herself as a goddess. She instituted the famous ELEUSINIAN MYSTERIES and bestowed on Celeus' other son TRIPPOLEMUS the honor of being mankind's teacher in the use of the plough.

Celia. The very virtuous, naïve young wife of Corvino in Jonson's comedy Volpone, or the FOX.
Inexperienced in the ways of the world, she is victimized by the lecherous Volpone, by the jealous Lady Politick Would-Be, and above all by her own greedy husband.
Celia. Rosalind’s cousin, daughter of Duke Frederick, in Shakespeare’s As You Like It. She is a merry young lady who cheerfully follows her cousin into banishment for the sake of their friendship and eventually weds Oliver.

Celimène. In Molière’s comedy Le Misanthrope, a coquette courted by Alceste, the misanthrophist. Hence, the name has become a synonym for any flagrant coquette.

Céline, Louis-Ferdinand. Pen name of the doctor Louis-Ferdinand Destouches (1894-1961). French novelist. Céline is known for the misanthropic invective of Journey to the End of the Night (1932) and Death on the Installment Plan (Mort à crédit; 1936), which expose almost everything as either evil or insane. He looked to communism, but after a trip to Russia renounced it in Maé Capu (1937). He turned to fascism with the violently anti-Semitic diaries Bagatelles pour un massacre (1937) and the attention on the “degenerate” French in École des cadavres (1938). When he returned from his exile in Germany, he wrote D’un château l’autre (1957) and Nord (1960).

Cellini, Benvenuto (1500-1571). Florentine goldsmith, sculptor, and author of one of the world’s great autobiographies. First published in 1750, the work was actually begun in 1558, when Cellini started dictating his memoirs to an apprentice. It tells of his adventures in Italy and France, his relations with popes and kings and with fellow artists, his production of works like the Perseus statue. A fairly complete picture of the times emerges from the work, though exaggerated by the author’s distortion of his own role in events. Its realism, vivid descriptions, racy style, and, above all, its portrait of a genuine personality have exerted a strong influence on historians of the Renaissance, as Burckhardt, who sees it as confirming the view that the key to the period is the emergence of modern individualism. Goethe’s translation and Berlioz’ musical interpretation are examples of its continuing impact on other artists.

Cement (Tzement; 1925). A novel by Fedor Vasilievich Gladkov. The book was one of the first to deal with the problems of reconstruction and industrialization in Russia after the civil war. It is now ranked as one of the early Soviet classics.

Cénacle. In 19th-century France, the name of a literary and political group meeting in the salon of Charles Nodier and, later, the name of a similar group led by Victor Hugo. Honoré de Balzac made use of this designation in some of the novels of his La Comédie Humaine; among the most active members of this fictional cénacle were Daniel d’Arthez, Henri de Maray, and Horace Blancan.

Cena de Baltazar, La (Belshazzar’s Feast). An auto sacramental by Pedro Calderón de la Barca. Heedless of the prophet Daniel’s call to repentance, Belshazzar, king of Babylon, revels with his wives Vanity and Idolatry and his jester, Thought. He is finally struck down by Death.

Cenci, Beatrice (1577-1599). A historical personage. She is known as the Beautiful Parricide, from a famous portrait in Rome’s Barberini palace attributed to Guido Reni. She was the daughter of Francesco Cenci (1549-1598), a choleric, cruel, and vice-laden Roman nobleman. With her mother and two brothers, Beatrice successfully plotted the death of her father at the hands of hired braves. It is possible, however, that the immediate provocation of the murder was Francesco’s discovery of his daughter’s intimacy with one of the family’s stewards.

The plot was revealed by one of the braves, and the conspirators were brought to trial. Great sympathy was aroused by the plight of the young, beautiful Beatrice, and her attorney attempted to play upon this by falsely claiming that Francesco had tried to commit incest with her. However, Pope Clement VIII refused the sought-for pardon and on September 11, 1599 Beatrice was beheaded. Her story has been a favorite theme of poetry and art, the most famous use being Shelley’s tragedy The Cenci (1819), in which she is treated sympathetically.

Cendrars, Blaise (1887-1961). French poet and novelist. An innovator in his verse forms, he was lyrical even in his prose, especially in the autobiographical L’Homme fouroyé (1945). His novels of adventure include Le Panama ou les Aventures de mes sept oncles (Panama, or, The Adventures of my Seven Uncles, 1919), L’Or (Suter’s Gold, 1925), Moscavide (1926), Rhum (1930), and Bourlinguer (1948).

censor. In ancient Rome, a magistrate of high rank. His duty was to take the census, see that Senate vacancies were filled, take inventory on government finances, allow government contracts for public works, and investigate and, if necessary, correct the state of public morality. Originally, two censors were elected for a five-year period, called a lustrum; in 433 B.C., the term of office was shortened to 18 months. As a distinct office, the censorship disappeared in the reign of Domitian (84 A.D.).

Centauters (Kentauroi). In classic mythology, beings who were half horse and half man. They fought with the Lapiths at the marriage feast of Pirithous, were expelled from their country, and took refuge on Mount Pindus. Centaur was the most famous of the centaurs. Both Lapiths and Centaurs are thought to have been actual Thessalian tribes.

Centlivre, Mrs. Susannah (1667-1723). English dramatist and actress. She wrote a number of comedies of intrigues such as The Busy Body (1709), The Wonder, a Woman Keeps a Secret (1714), and A Bold Stroke for a Wife (1718).

Cent nouvelles nouvelles, Les (1462). A collection of prose tales by an unknown member of the court of Philip of Burgundy. Modeled on Boccaccio’s Decameron (1353) and Poggio’s Facetiae (early 15th century), the stories are comic, often licentious, anecdotally purportedly told by the members of the court.

cento (Lat., a patchwork). A literary composition, especially a poem, of lines or parts from the writings of established authors, and with a meaning and message different from the original. Centos were freely produced during the decadent period of Greece and Rome; Ausonius (c. 310-395), who put together the scandalous Cento Nuptialis with lines taken from Vergil, enunciated rules concerning their composition. Among well-known examples are the Homerocentones, taken by Byzantine compilers from Homer, the Cento Vergiliani by Proba Falconia (4th century), which used Vergil to relate Biblical history, and the Christian hymns devised by the monk Metellus (12th century) from the works of Vergil and Horace.

Central Powers. In World War I, Germany and her allies: Austria-Hungary, Bulgaria, Turkey.

Century of Louis the Great, The. See Charles Perrault.

Cephalus (Kephalos) and Procris. In classic legend, Cephalus was Procris' husband. She deserted him, out of jealousy. Searching for her, he rested a while under a tree. Procris, knowing of his whereabouts, crept through some bushes to ascertain if a rival was with him; and he, hearing the noise and thinking it to have been made by some wild beast, hurled his javelin into the bushes and slew her. When the unhappy man discovered what he had done, he slew himself in anguish of spirit with the same javelin.

Cerberus (Kerberos). In Greek mythology, the three-headed dog, keeper of the entrance of the infernal regions. Heracles dragged the monster to earth to show him to Eurystheus, and then took him back. The Sibyl who conducted Aeneas through the lower world threw the dog into a profound sleep with a cake seasoned with poppies and honey (Aeneid vi, 417-425). The phrase give a sop to Cerberus therefore means to give a bribe, to quiet a troublesome person.

Ceres. An Italian goddess of fertility, later identified with the Greek Demeter.

Cerf, Bennett [Alfred] (1898– ). American publisher and editor. In 1925, with Donald S. Klopfer, Cerf bought the Modern Library series of inexpensive reprints of the classics from Boni and Liveright. He made the series a tremendous success and added many new titles over the years. In 1927 he and Klopfer founded Random House, which merged with Harrison Smith and Robert Haas in 1936 and has published many noted writers. Cerf has compiled and edited a number of books, many of them anthologies of humor.

Cervantes, Miguel de (1547–1616). Spanish novelist, dramatist, and poet. Born in Alcalá de Henares, Cervantes came from a good though impoverished family. Little is known of his education except that in 1568 he was a student of the Madrider humanist Juan López de Hoyos, who edited an elegiac volume on the death of Queen Isabel de Valois to which Cervantes contributed some verses. In 1569 he went to Italy, became a soldier, and fought in the battle of Lepanto (1571), in which he acquitted himself with distinction and lost the use of his left hand; he was extremely proud of his role in the famous victory and of the nickname he had earned, el manco de Lepanto. As Cervantes was returning to Spain with his brother on the galley El Sol in 1575, the ship was captured by Barbary pirates, and the two brothers were taken to Algiers as slaves. Miguel remained in captivity for five years, during which he made several romantic if futile efforts to escape. His ransom of 500 ducats was finally paid by the Trinitarian friars.

Having returned to Spain, Cervantes married Catalina de Salazar y Palacios in 1584, fathered an illegitimate daughter, and in 1587 secured employment as a purchasing agent for the navy. In this capacity he traveled throughout the country, often becoming involved in disputes with communities reluctant to part with their crops; on one occasion he was excommunicated for seizing grain that belonged to the church. Twice he was imprisoned for debt.

In 1605 Cervantes and his family, who were then living in Valladolid, were accused of complicity in the death of a young nobleman. They were later absolved, but the records of the case give evidence of the poverty and wretchedness of Cervantes' mode of existence at the time. His position improved considerably, however, after the publication of the first part of Don Quixote in the same year. Although Cervantes' previous literary efforts had met with little success, Don Quixote immediately caught the fancy of the reading public. Moving to Madrid, he devoted his last years to writing.

Cervantes' reputation as one of the greatest writers in history rests almost entirely on Don Quixote and on the 12 short stories known as the Novelas ejemplares. His literary production, however, was considerable. La Galatea (1585), a pastoral romance, was his first long work; similar in form and content to other novels of this type, it received little contemporary notice and is remembered largely because of its authorship. Cervantes repeatedly promised to write a continuation, but it never appeared.

He next turned his attention to the stage and wrote between 20 and 30 plays in the years immediately following 1585. Two extant dramas of this period are El trato de Argel and La Numancia, both of which were first printed in 1784. The former, dealing with the life of Christian slaves in Algiers, is of interest only because of its autobiographical details. The latter, which recounts the siege and capture of Numantia by the Romans under Scipio Africanus, has won wider approval, partly because of some powerful scenes and partly because of its expressions of patriotism. In 1615 Cervantes published his Ocho comedias, y ocho entremeses nuevos. Only one of the full-length plays, Pedro de Urdesmais, has met with critical favor, but the entremeses, or interludes, are highly regarded for their sprightly and realistic pictures of Bohemian life.

Cervantes himself realized that he was deficient in poetical gifts, a judgment confirmed by later generations. Aside from his plays, his most ambitious work in verse is the Viaje del Parnaso (1614), an allegory which consists largely of a rather tedious though good-natured review of contemporary poets. Los trabajos de Persiles y Sigismunda (1617) is a verse romance in the manner of Heliodorus, which Cervantes thought would be either the worst or the best book in the Spanish language. Though some critics have boggled at the fantastic geography of its early scenes and the incredible adventures of its characters, others have praised its polished style.

Regardless of its merits, the Persiles will be remembered, if only for its dedication and prologue. Addressed to the conde de Lemos, the dedication was signed on April 19, 1616, just four days before Cervantes died.
vantes' death. Quoting an old ballad, Puesto ya el pié en el estribo ("One foot already in the stirrup"), Cervantes takes leave of his patron and of the world with the same gallantry and grace that characterized both his life and his work.

César Birotteau, Histoire de la grandeur et de la décadence de (1837). A novel by Honoré de Balzac. The title character is a perfume dealer who is admitted to the Legion of Honor. Dazzled by the honor, he gives a lavish ball to celebrate the event. This necessitates the complete remodeling of his home, and as a result of all this expense and of several unwise investments, he is completely ruined. Within three years he is able to pay his debts, but, ironically, he dies soon afterward. The novel, which forms part of La Comédie Humaine, is said to reflect Balzac's own unhappy experiences in business.

Cesbron, Gilbert (1913— ). French novelist, essayist, and dramatist. His novels usually have moral and social themes. Saints in Hell (Les Saints vont en enfer; 1952) concerns the struggles of worker-priests in Paris, and Lost Children of Paris (Chiens perdus sans collier; 1954) is about juvenile delinquency. Other works include the novels The Innocents of Paris (1944), La Tradicion Fontquerien (1947), Avoir Été (1960), and the play No Plaster Saint (Briser la statue; 1952).

Céspedes, Alba de (1911— ). Italian writer. Her novels sympathetically explore the position of the modern Italian woman. Her best-known novel, Il Quaderno Proibito (The Secret, 1954), concerns the gradual deterioration of a marriage; it is written in the form of a diary kept secretly by the wife.

cestus (kestos). (1) The girdle of Aphrodite, made by her husband Hephaestus. It was reputed to possess magical power to move to ardent love. By a poetical fiction, all women of irresistible attraction are supposed to be wearers of Aphrodite's girdle, or the cestus. It is introduced by Spenser in The Faerie Queene as the girdle of Flamel. It gave to those who could wear it "the virtue of chaste love and wifehood true," but if any woman not chaste and faithfully put it on, it "loosed or tore asunder." (2) The cestus in Roman games was a covering for the hands of boxers, made of leather bands and often loaded with lead or iron.

Cézanne, Paul (1839-1906). French painter. The great master of postimpressionism and perhaps the greatest figure in modern French painting, Cézanne was born in Aix-au-Provence, the son of a banker. His early works were low in key and heavy in medium, but after 1870 he began to paint out of doors and allied himself with the impressionists. By 1876 he had already begun to accentuate mass, rather than light, in an effort to achieve a better illusion of volume. Cézanne's statement that "Nature must be treated through the cylinder, the sphere, the cone," summarizes his desire "to make of impressionism something as solid and durable as the painting in the museums." This search led him to displace visual planes, to raise the horizon, to construct his paintings in such a way that each departure from nature would increase the impression of form and depth. He retained the pure colors of impressionism, but used them to build up volume through the contrast of tones. He spent much of his life as a recluse in Provence, painting the famous still lifes, landscapes, and portraits, that were then unknown except to a few of his contemporaries. It was not until the last decade of the century that his reputation began to grow. Cézanne is said to have been in the mind of Emile Zola, his former schoolmate and friend, during the composition of L’Oeuvre (1886); Zola represents his hero as a restless painter and failure.

Chadaïev, Piotr Yakovlevich (1794–1856). Russian philosophical thinker. He is famous for his Philosophical Letters which unfavorably compared Russia's past and present condition to that of the Western nations. The publication of the first letter in 1836 brought down a storm of abuse and police persecution on Chadaïev, who was officially declared insane and put under house arrest for a time.

Chadband, Rev. Mr. In Charles Dickens' Bleak House, a typical, canting hypocrite "in the ministry.

Chagall, Marc (1889— ). Russian-born French painter. From his earliest paintings, scenes of Russian village life, he developed an individualistic style of great poetry, fantasy, and brightness, typified by his pair of lovers floating over, or nesting in, large bouquets of flowers. With World War II, he introduced social and religious elements in his art, painting numerous crucifixions. He designed theatrical scenery and stained-glass windows, and illustrated Nikolai Gogol's Dead Souls (1948) and the Fables of La Fontaine (1952).

Chairs, The (Les Chaises; 1951). A tragic farce by Eugène Ionesco. It presents a Kafka-like image of modern man. An old lighthouse keeper, preparing to die, invites a group of guests to a gathering where his final words of wisdom will be delivered. In a scene that is both a dramatic and a symbolic tour de force, he and his wife rush desperately about to seat an enormous crowd of imaginary guests. The bare, empty stage juxtaposed with the frenzied human effort offer an absurd image of modern man, isolated, frustrated, and unable to order the chaos of life. A final irony, ludicrous and bitter, is the audience's discovery that the orator can neither read nor write.

Chakravakas. Sanskrit for red geese or sheldrake, favorite symbols with classical Indian writers. In legend, these birds were supposed to be ideally happy during the daytime, but at night a curse separated them and they bewailed each other's absence from the opposite banks of a river.

Chalicope (Chalkiope). See Golden Fleece, The.

Chalcandyles, Demetrius (d. 1511). Greek editor of classical texts. He prepared early and influential editions of Homer (1488) and Euripides (1493). Also a scholar and teacher at Padova, Florence, and Milan, he numbered among his students Castiglione, Reuchlin, Trissino, and the future Pope Leo X.

Chaliapin, Feodor Ivanovitch (1873–1938). Russian basso, famed for his acting as well as his singing, especially in the title role of Boris Godunov. He wrote two volumes of memoirs, Pamirs from My Life (1925) and Man and Mask (1932).

Challenger, Professor. An adventurous, iconoclastic, rather opinionated scientist of imposing girth who appears in Conan Doyle's The Lost World (1912). Doyle regarded him as his most amusing character.
Chambered Nautilus, The (1858). A poem by Oliver Wendell Holmes. The sea creature that enlarges its shell as it grows is an example to the human being:

Build thee more stately mansions, O my soul,
Leaving thee outgrown shell by life’s unresting sea!

Chamberlain, Houston Stewart (1855-1927). British-born political philosopher who became a German citizen in 1916. His Foundations of the Nineteenth Century (Die Grundlagen des neunzehnten Jahrhunderts; 1899), a historical defense of the superiority of the Germanic race, contains anti-Semitic theories that were later developed by the Nazis. See ARYAN RACE.

Chamberlain, Neville (1869-1940). Conservative prime minister of England from 1937 to 1940. He is remembered chiefly for his role in the Munich meeting with Hitler in September, 1938, in which he pursued a policy of appeasement. For a time, his name became synonymous with betrayal in the writing of Marxists and liberals, who considered that he had delivered Czechoslovakia into the hands of the Nazis. He was succeeded in office by Winston Churchill.

Chamber Music (1907). A volume of poems, mainly love lyrics, by James Joyce. They show the influence of the Elizabethan poets and of the early William Butler Yeats and his circle.

Chambers, Sir Edward (1866-1954). English literary scholar. His books on The Medieval Stage (1903), The Elizabethan Stage (1923), and William Shakespeare (1930) are among the standard works on the subjects.

Chamisso, Adalbert von (1781-1838). German poet and botanist. He is famous for his ballads and the story, Peter Schlemihls Wundersame Geschichte. He was one of the first poets to turn away from the unswerving idealism of earlier German ROMANTICISM, and to write with a genuine love for the common people; for example, he wrote poems about beggars and washerwomen. He was appointed botanist to a Russian ship and published a diary of his expedition around the world. He was custodian of the botanical gardens in Berlin.

Champion, or British Mercury, The (1739-1741). A tri-weekly periodical edited by Henry Fielding under the pseudonym of Captain Hercules Vinegar. Modeled on Richard Steele’s Tatler, it was predominantly a vehicle of opposition to the government of Sir Robert Walpole.

Champlain, Samuel de (1657-1655). French explorer. He discovered and explored Lake Champlain and in 1608 founded the colony of Quebec.

Champion, Jean François (1790-1832). Famous French Egyptologist. As a result of his study of the Rosetta Stone, he obtained a clue for deciphering Egyptian hieroglyphics.

Chanson, André (1900- ). French novelist and essayist. At first a regional writer of the Protestant Cévennes area—he has written poems in Provençal—he became famous for his novels Roux le Bandit (1925), Les Hommes de la route (1927), and Le Crime des Justes (1928), all translated by Van Wyck Brooks. As a result of his widening interest in ethical and political problems he wrote La Galère (1939); Le Puits des miracles (1945), an account of life during the German Occupation; L’Homme qui marchait devant moi (1948); La Neige et la fleur (1952); and Le Chiffre de nos jours (1954).

Chap, Charlie. A shrewd Chinese detective living in Hawaii who appears in several stories by Earl Derr Biggers (1884-1933). Given to wise, philosophical reflections, Chap acts on the assumption that if he can understand a man’s character, he can predict his actions in any given circumstance. He first appeared in The House Without a Key (1925). Later Chan stories include: The Chinese Parrot (1926); Behind That Curtain (1929); Charlie Chan Carries On (1930); Keeper of the Keys (1932).

Chanaky (3rd century a.c.). Author of the Sanskrit Chanakya-niti or The Laws of Chanakya and the well-known Artha-shastra, an elaborate explanation of the science of national economics and statecraft. He was the minister of Emperor Chandragupta Maurya and is sometimes called Vishnugupta or Kautilya.

Ch'an Buddhism. Japanese Zen. The Meditation School in China. Meditation was widely used in all forms of Buddhism in India and China, but Ch'an was the first to put almost exclusive emphasis on it. Traditionally Bodhidharma (fifth century) is given as the founder in China, and the sixth patriarch, Hui-neng (d. 713), is honored as the developer of the sect as a religion. The actual history is unclear, but by the T'ang Dynasty (618-906) Ch'an had gained great popularity and there were numerous teachers throughout China. Ch'an advocates “direct seeing into one's own mind” and realizing Buddhahood in oneself. It emphasizes the teacher-disciple relationship and transmission from mind to mind rather than through written words. After the persecutions of Buddhists (845) it became the dominant school in China. By the Sung period (960-1279) it had split into various sects and an organized church had been developed. It was the Ch'an of this time that was transmitted to Japan, together with the elaborate Koan system. The two principal branches are Lin-chi (Japanese Rinzai) and Ts'ao-tung (Japanese Sôtô), both of which flourish in Japan today. By the Ming period (1368-1644) Ch'an had lost its vitality and became mixed with the Pure Land School, or Amidaism.

Chance (1914). A novel by Joseph Conrad. Flora de Barral marries Captain Roderick Anthony, and she and her father put to sea with him on the Ferndale. Flora fears that her husband has married her only out of pity, because her father is a broken man, a financier just out of prison for fraud. She is a tortured soul, suffering from an obsessional relationship with her father. Finally De Barral's attempt to poison Anthony, discovered and thwarted by mere "chance," clarifies the situation. Most of the story is told by Marlow.

Chance Acquaintance, A (1873). A novel by William Dean Howells. Kitty Ellison falls in love with Miles Arbuton, a young Bostonian, while they travel on the St. Lawrence River. They become engaged, but Miles, meeting some fashionable and snobbish friends, ignores Kitty. She breaks the engagement, knowing she cannot be happy with a Boston Brahmin.

Chancellor, Olive. See BOSTONIANS, THE.

Chancellorsville, battle of (May 2–4, 1863). In U.S. history, a Civil War battle near Fredericksburg, Va., in which the Union army under Gen. Joseph Hooker was defeated by Confederate forces under Gen. Robert E. Lee. Thomas ("Stonewall") Jackson, the Confederate general, was accidentally shot by his own men during the battle and died of pneumonia on May 10. This battle is said to have furnished the background for Stephen Crane's Red Badge of Courage (1895). Cf. Roland, Prem. Pen name of Nawab Rai (1880–1936). Greatest short-story writer and novelist in Hindi. His early work was written in the Urdu language, but lack of a sufficiently large audience made him write his best novels in Hindi. Seva-Sadan (1907) describes the predicament of an innocent wife forced into prostitution. Premashran (1922) depicts the conflicting interests of tenant and landlord. Nimrada (1923) deplores the evils of the dowry system. Ranga-bhumi (1924) attacks the depredations of capitalists. Karma-bhumi (1925) is a strong indictment of British colonial rule in India. Prem Chand's work, loaded with social content, finds its best expression in his last novel, Godan (The Cow-Gift; 1936), a harrowing tale of the difficulties of the life of the Indian peasant. To critics who complained of the propagandistic "realism" in his writings, he explained that he wrote with "a touch of humanity, a poetic nuance. These make a story. All else fails."

Chandala (Sans., outcaste). In India the child of a Sudra father and a Brahmin mother. See caste.

Changeling, The (c. 1623). A tragedy by Thomas Middleton and William Rowley. Beatrice Joanna, a young noblewoman betrothed to Alonzo De Piraquio, falls in love with Alsemero, a Venetian gentleman. After postponing the wedding she calls in Deflores, the ugly servant of her father whom she has always despised, and enlists his aid in killing Alonzo. After Deflores, who adores Beatrice Joanna, has dispatched Alonzo, he claims her person as his reward. Horrified, she refuses, but Deflores, a desperate man, swears to tell all unless she becomes his mistress. Trapped, she agrees. She marries Alsemero but, fearful of exposure, substitutes her virginal servant Diaphanta in the bridal bed. When Diaphanta lingers too long, Deflores sets fire to the house and kills the girl in her burning chamber. But by this time, Beatrice Joanna and Deflores have been found out. Confronted by Alsemero, they confess, and Deflores kills both Beatrice and himself.

Channing, Edward Tyrrell (1790–1856). American editor and teacher. One of the famous Channings of New England, Edward Tyrrell Channing practiced law and helped to found and edit the North American Review (1815), one of the most important American review magazines. As Boylston Professor of Rhetoric at Harvard, he had great influence on literature; among those he guided were Emerson, Thoreau, Holmes, Lowell, Edward Everett Hale, and R. H. Dana, Jr. Dana edited Channing's Lectures (1856). These reveal that he taught his students to dispense with ornament in style.

Channing, William Ellery (1780–1842). American clergyman. An ordained Congregational minister, he came to reject Calvinism, especially its emphasis on the depravity of mankind. At the ordination of Jared Sparks in 1819, he delivered a sermon that led to the formal emergence of Unitarianism, and he became the apostle of the movement. An advocate of abolition and other social reforms, he was one of the leading propagandists of the era. His ideas are believed to have contributed to the development of Transcendentalism.

cha-no-yu. Japanese tea ceremony. It arose during the Muromachi period (1333–1600) and was brought to its highest refinement by Sen no Rikyū (1521–1591), a Zen priest. There are many schools of tea ceremony, and during the Tokugawa period (1600–1868) it was greatly refined and elaborated. It consists of the drinking of thick green tea served in tea bowls, often of great artistic merit, under an elaborate ceremonial etiquette supervised by a tea master. Simplicity, harmony, and quietude form its basic spirit.

chansons de geste (Fr., songs of deeds). The medieval French metrical romances celebrating the heroic deeds of historical and legendary knights. The epic of the 11th and early 12th centuries were divided into lays (Fr., lais) or stanzas of irregular length, usually with 10-syllable lines united by assonance or a single rhyme. They glorified the code of chivalric honor in battle and gave little place to women. By the 13th and 14th centuries the role of women and romantic love became more important, regular rhyme schemes were introduced, and the alexandrine (12-syllable line), which later became the standard for French classical verse, became popular.

Most of the chansons de geste were written by trouvères about the paladins of Charlemagne or the knights who were his enemies, and arranged in cycles according to the ancestor of each group of heroes. They were sung by jongleurs and court minstrels.

One of the earliest and best was the Chanson de Roland. Other groups center on Charlemagne's childhood, his wars in Spain, his pilgrimage to Jerusalem. There is an important cycle about Garin de Monglane and his descendants, including the chanson Girard de Viane, which describes Roland's meeting with Olivier. Another is the Geste de Doon de Mayance, grouping the traitors and the families at war with Charlemagne.

Chanticleer. See under NUN'S PRIEST'S TALE.

chanties. See shanties.

chant royal. An elaboration of the ballade form. The chant royal was developed in medieval France and used for serious and stately themes. It was not introduced in England until the latter part of the 19th century during the revival of interest in French forms. It is a 60-line poem having 5 stanzas.
of 11 lines and an envoi of 5 lines, each ending with the refrain, as in the ballade.

Chaos. In Greek mythology, the original void. Out of Chaos, according to Hesiod, came Earth, Tartarus, Eros (Love), Erebus (Darkness), and Nyx (Night). The Orphics (see Orphism) claimed that Chaos, Night, and Darkness coexisted, and Love came from an egg laid by Night; Eros parthenogenetically produced the first generation of gods.

Chapayev. See Dmitri Furmanov.

Chapbook. Originally one of the books carried about for sale by chapmen (tradesmen, chap meaning purchase or bargain). Hence, any book of a similar nature, a tract, small collection of ballads, or the like.

Chapelain, Jean (1595–1674). French critic and man of letters. For 20 years he labored at an epic poem, La Pucelle (the first part was published in 1656), generally reckoned to be a failure. He was a regular visitor at the Hôtel de Rambouillet, where his advocacy of classical forms in literature and especially of the three unities in drama had considerable influence. Conservative and a founding member of the Académie française, he conceived the plan of the Académie's dictionary, and at Richelieu's request he drafted that institution's censure of Corneille: Sentiments de l'Académie sur Le Cid (1638).

Chapelle, Claude Emmanuel Luillier (1626–1686). French poet. An intimate of Boileau, Molière and Racine, Chapelle was coauthor with François de Baulmont of the entertaining Voyage en Provence et Languedoc (1656) and an enthusiastic admirer and exponent of the philosophy of Pierre Gassendi.

Chaplin, Charlie. Real name, Charles Spencer Chaplin (1889– ), English-born motion-picture actor, director, writer, producer, and composer. He is internationally famous as the creator of the inimitable tramp character Charlie. The tramp wears baggy pants, oversized shoes, and a derby hat; he carries a bamboo cane and has an awkward walk. His naïve approach invariably involves him in dangerous situations from which he extricates himself effortlessly by sheer good will. The tramp has enormous trust and affection for all men, and the ludicrous predicaments into which these lead him are resolved as if by divine grace. Chaplin made his screen debut with Mack Sennett's Keystone Company in 1914. In the next few years he appeared in Tillie's Punctured Romance, The Count, Easy Street, and The Cure. In 1918 he became an independent producer with his own company, First National Films, and in 1923 he was one of the founders of United Artists. Among his most notable films are The Kid (1919), The Gold Rush (1926), City Lights (1931), Modern Times (1936), The Great Dictator (1940), Monsieur Verdoux (1947), and Limelight (1952). He has made his home in Switzerland since 1952.

Chapman, George (1559?–1634). English poet, scholar, and playwright. Chapman is best remembered today for his translation of the works of Homer, which began with his Seven Books of the Iliad in 1598. In 1611 he published the entire Iliad, in 1615 the Odyssey, and in 1616 The Whole Works of Homer. The translation, in rhymed couplets, often departs from and expands upon the original, but it is a notable poetic achievement in its own right. It was praised by Lamb and Coleridge, and most memorably by Keats in his sonnet On First Looking into Chapman's Homer. Among Chapman's poems are The Shadow of Night (1594) and Ovid's Banquet of Sense (1595). He completed Christopher Marlowe's unfinished Hero and Leander (1598), and wrote a number of plays, of which the best known are the tragedies Bussy D'Ambois (c. 1604) and its sequel, The Revenge of Bussy D'Ambois (c. 1610). However, some scholars feel his best plays were his romantic comedies, such as All Fools (c. 1599) and May Day (c. 1602). His other plays include The Blind Beggar of Alexandria (1596); An Humorous Day's Mirth (1597); The Gentleman Usher (c. 1602); Monsieur D'Olive (1604); and Charles, Duke of Byron, I & II (1607–1608).

Chapman, John. See Johnny Appleseed.

Chaque Homme dans sa nuit (Each in His Darkness, 1960). A novel by Julian Green. The hero Wilfred Ingram, a Catholic, moves in a sordid, carnal world. He is not able to deny his faith, however, but suffers in his knowledge of his own sin. When he is dying, Ingram's face is transformed by an expression of joy and peace: his faith, in spite of sin, has transcended death. Characteristically, Green's vision remains hopeful, although he probes the depths of human evil and misery.

Char, René (1907– ). French poet of the Midi region. The poems he wrote while associated with the surrealist movement are collected in Le Morteau sans maître (1934). Like his poetry of the Resistance, Seuls Dememurents (1945) and Feuillet's d'Hypnos (1946), included in the English Hypnos Waking: Poetry and prose (1956), Char's later poetry tends to be brief and hermetic. It reveals a close communion with nature and seeks a humanistic exaltation of man.

Character writers. A school of English prose writers in the first half of the 17th century. They wrote sketches of men and women—either as individuals or types—in descriptive, analytical, or satirical form as observed in the life of their time. Many of them were influenced by the work of Theophrastus, the Athenian Peripatetic philosopher, who wrote studies of 30 types of personality, such as the Flat- terer and the Grumbler, under the title of Characters. The best-known English character writers are Joseph Hall, Owen Felltham, Sir Thomas Overbury, and John Earle.

Chardin, Jean (1643–1713). French writer and traveler. He is the author of Voyage en Perse et aux Indes Orientales (Journey to Persia and to the East Indies, 1711).

Chardin, Jean Baptiste Siméon (1699–1779). French painter. He is known for his calm still lifes, domestic scenes, and portraits. His paintings of kitchen utensils, game, and fruit are painted with great subtlety and richness of color, animated by bright flashes of light, and unified by reflections of tone. Chardin's sure sense of form and harmonious composition has made his work become a source of study for later artists, notably Edouard Manet and Georges Braque.

Other novels include L'Epithalame (1921), Eva (1930), and Chimériques (1948).

Charge of the Light Brigade, The. A poem by Alfred TENNYSON celebrating the famous "death charge of the 600" at Balaklava in the Crimea, Sept. 20, 1854. A British brigade, knowing the folly of their orders, charged the Russian line and was virtually annihilated:

Their's not to make reply,
Their's not to reason why,
Their's but to do and die.
Into the valley of Death
Rode the six hundred.

Chariclea (Charicleia). The lady-love of Theagenes. She appears in the exquisite erotic Greek romance called ETHIOPEA, the story of Theagenes and Chariclea, by Heliodorus.

Charis. According to Homer, one of the Graces and wife of Hephaestus. In later times the name was applied to any of the three Graces (Charities).

Charites, the. See GRACES, THE.

Charlemagne or Charles the Great (742–814). Frankish king, crowned Holy Roman Emperor in 800. See his history under CAROLINGIANS. He and the knights said to be his paladins became the center of a number of chansons de geste, or medieval epic romances, most having very little basis in fact except for the defeat of the rear guard at Roncesvalles. Famous versions of these legends include the French Chanson de Roland and in Italian Pulci’s Morgante Maggiore, Boiardo’s Orlando Innamorato, and Ariosto’s Orlando Furioso.

Charles. In Shakespeare’s As You Like It, a wrestler in Duke Frederick’s court, whom Orlando challenges and defeats.

Charles I (1600–1649). Stuart king of England (1625–1649) and 2nd son of James I. The first years of his reign were marked by disputes with Parliament over matters of finance, religion, and foreign policy. In 1629 he dissolved Parliament and ruled alone for 11 years, but in 1640 he was compelled to recall Parliament to deal with the problems of the Scottish rebellion and a growing lack of money. From this point on, the conflict between King and Commons became more intense; the former’s stubbornness and duplicity and the latter’s insistence on its rights and its generally anti-Anglican (Puritan) character led to the Civil War and Charles’s beheading in 1649. In his private personality, Charles was a virtuous, deeply pious, and courageous man, as his deportment at his trial and execution revealed; but his public character was marred by double-dealing, obstinacy, ingratitude to friends, and a lack of political intelligence. Charles is a prominent character in Dumas’ Twenty Years After (Vingt Ans Après, 1845). See EIKON BASILEI: PETITION OF RIGHT.

Charles II (1630–1685). Stuart king of England (1660–1685). He was proclaimed king in Scotland after the death of his father Charles I, but it was only after 11 years of exile, struggle, and disappointment that he assumed the throne of England. This restoration was brought about by compromise and Parliament’s invitation, not by force of arms, and throughout Charles’s reign, he was obliged to intrigue and maneuver for parliamentary support. A brother of the openly Catholic James, he was anxious to obtain a wider measure of religious tolerance in England and also to strengthen the monarchy and ensure the succession of James. He failed in his first goal and attained only a very partial and transient success with the latter. His reign was disturbed by shifting alliances, several wars, numerous actual and fictitious conspiracies, the Great Plague (1665), and the Fire of London (1666), but was productive of much in literature, science, and architecture. Charles II was an easygoing, intelligent, pleasure-loving, witty man, notorious for the number of his amours and illegitimate offspring. He is an important character in Scott’s Peveril of the Peak (1823) and Woodstock (1826). See NELL Gwynn.

Charles VII (of France). See DAUPHIN.

Charles, Duc d’Orléans (1391–1465). French poet, son of Louis d’Orléans (brother of King Charles VI) and father of King Louis XII. In 1455 he was taken captive to England, where he wrote most of his graceful ballades and rondels. After his ransom in 1460 he established a miniature court at Blois as a patron of the arts, entertaining François Villon and others.

Charles V. Also known as Charles I of Spain (1500–1558). Holy Roman Emperor. The son of Philip the Fair of Flanders and Joanna the Mad of Spain, Charles inherited Burgundy and Flanders upon his father’s death (1506) and, because of his mother’s insanity, acceded to the throne of Spain after the demise of his grandfather, Ferdinand II, in 1516. Spanish resentment against the Flemish-born youth was heightened when he secured election as Holy Roman Emperor in 1519 at great expense and without consulting the cortes, or parliaments, of Spain. During Charles’s absence in Germany, this resentment erupted in the revolt of the comuneros, or townsfolk, in which nobles and commoners were at first arrayed against the monarchy but later turned into a class struggle. Other rebellions broke out in Valencia and among the Moriscos, or converted Moors, of Spain.

After the suppression of these revolts, Spain enjoyed internal peace and prosperity while Charles devoted himself to foreign affairs. There were several wars with France, whose ruler, François I, feared Hapsburg domination of Europe. (See PAVIA.) Challenging Turkish designs in the Mediterranean and in central Europe, Charles captured Tunis in 1535 but failed to take Algiers in 1541. He also attempted to suppress Lutheranism in Germany.

Disillusioned by the frustration of his hopes for religious and political peace in Europe and burdened by debt, Charles decided to give up his many crowns, assigning the imperial title to his brother Ferdinand and his hereditary possessions to his son Philip. In 1556 he retired to the Hieronymite convent of Yuste in Estremadura, where he lived in seclusion until his death.

Charles, Nick. A detective created by Dashiell HAMMETT. He first appeared in The Thin Man (1932). A witty and debonair man, he was a striking contrast to Hammett’s other famous detective, Sam Spade.

Charles Martel or Charles the Hammer (689–741). Frankish ruler, grandfather of Charlemagne. See CAROLINGIANS. He is famous for his victory over the Moors near Tours in 732.
Charles's Wain, Charles' Wain. An old popular name for the Great Bear. The constellation forms the rough outline of a wheelbarrow or rustic wagon, and the "Charles" stands for Charlemagne. One possible etymology suggests that King Arthur (Lat., Arturus) became identified with Arcturus, a bright star in Boötes, the constellation which seems to be directing the wagon. Confusion between the legendary cycles of romance connected with Arthur and Charlemagne established the name Charles's Wain in the popular mind.

Charles the Great. See Charlemagne.

Charleston School. A group of American men of letters. They supported the Southern position in the years before the Civil War. The group, including Paul Hamilton Hayne, William Gilmore Simms, and Henry Timrod, had its headquarters in Charleston, South Carolina.

Charlotte, Andrée Eugène Maurice (1882–1956). British theatrical manager and producer. He was born in Paris and was well known for Charlotte's Revue.

Charlotte Temple (pub. in England, 1791; U.S., 1794). An early American novel by Susannah Haswell Rowson. Originally entitled Charlotte, a Tale of Truth, it has run through more than 100 editions and is still occasionally read. The heroine is lured from her English home and deserted in New York by a British officer named Montraville, who later repents. Mrs. Rowson wrote a sequel Charlotte's Daughter, better known as Lucy Temple, published posthumously in 1828.

Charlus, Baron Palamède [Méme] de. An important aristocrat in Marcel Proust's Remembrance of Things Past. One of the Guermantes, he cultivates his reputation as a virile woman-chaser, but is secretly a homosexual.

Charman. In Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra and Dryden's All for Love, a gay, kind-hearted attendant on Cleopatra. After the queen's death, she kills herself by applying one of the asps to her own arm.

Charon. In classic myth, the ferryman of the Styx. Charon's toll was a coin, about equal to a penny, placed in the mouth or hand of the dead by the ancient Greeks to pay Charon for ferrying the spirit across the river Styx to Elysium.

Charpentier, Gustave (1860–1956). French composer. He is mainly known for his opera Louise (1900), which had a striking success at the time of its premiere. Its realistic libretto deals with the lives and loves of working-class Parisians.

Charpentier, Marc Antoine (1634–1704). Most important French-born composer of the 17th century. Charpentier is known principally for his church music and his oratorios. He was unable to write for the Opéra until after Lully's death, for that composer enjoyed a monopoly of the musical stage, but his one opera, Médée, was finally produced in 1693. Because of Lully's quarrel with Molière, Charpentier wrote the elaborate musical score for Molière's last play, Le Malade Imaginaire.

Charrière, Isabelle de. See Zélide.

Charterhouse of Parma, The (La Chartreuse de Parme; 1839). An historical novel by Stendhal. In essence the tale is a chronicle of the adventures of its young hero, Fabrizio delongo. Set in the post-Napoleonic era, this remarkable analysis of romanticism leads us through the battle of Waterloo, life and intrigue in a small Italian court, romantic love, imprisonment, the priesthood, and finally terminates in a Carthusian monastery.

Charteris, Leslie (1907– ). English novelist. The son of a Chinese surgeon and an Englishwoman, he was originally named Leslie Charles Bowyer Lin. A naturalized American citizen, Charteris is known for his very popular stories about a gentleman burglar nicknamed the Saint.

Chartier, Alain (c. 1390–c. 1435). French poet, prose writer, and diplomat under Charles VII. In his first poem, the Livre des quatre dames (1415), four ladies lament the death of their lovers in the French defeat by Henry V at Agincourt. He described the confused condition of France in the years that followed in his best-known prose work, the Quadrilogue In victi (1422). His prose style, modeled on that of the Latin orators, marked the revival of classicism in French literary style. The title and theme of his popular poem La Belle Dame sans merci (1424) were used by John Keats. Other works include the poem Breviare des nobles (c. 1424) and the prose Traité de l'espérance (c. 1428).

Chartier, Emille. See Alain.

Chartism (1838–1849). The political movement and program of the group of English reformers known as Chartists. Their main target of criticism was the Reform Bill of 1832, which had failed to extend the vote to the workingman. Their principal demands, published in "the People's Charter," were for universal manhood suffrage and for the annual election of parliament, abolition of property qualifications and payment to its members, vote by ballot, and equal representation in electoral districts. Members of the group were mostly industrial workers led by radical intellectuals. Chartism disappeared from the political scene after 1849, but all the Chartists' aims, with the exception of annual parliaments, were ultimately realized. The Chartist Clergyman. Charles Kingsley, so called because of his sympathy with the Chartists and other working-class movements.

Charybdis. See Scylla and Charybdis.

Chase, James Hadley. Pen name of Raymond Rene (1906– ). English author of crime and adventure fiction. His most widely read novel was No Orchids for Miss Blandish (1939).

Chase, Mary C[oyle] (1907– ). American playwright. She is best known for her Pulitzer Prize–winning play Harvey. Her earlier plays had achieved little success, but two later plays were well received: Mrs. McThing (1952) and Bernadine (1952). Midgie Purvis was introduced on Broadway in 1942.

Chase, Mary Ellen (1887– ). American novelist and teacher. Miss Chase is noted for her regional novels dealing with the Maine seacoast, her native setting. Of these, Mary Peters (1934) and Silas Crockett (1935) are perhaps her best. The latter, chronicling the fortunes of a Yankee family through four generations, has as its theme the hardships inflicted on the old clipper sailors by the introduction of steamships. Other novels are The Plum Tree (1949) and The Edge of Darkness (1957). For many years, professor of English literature at Smith College, Miss Chase has also written stories for young people, including Mary Christmas (1926) and Gay Highway (1933), and several volumes of nonfiction, most notably The Golden Ass; and Other Essays (1929), This England (1936), and Psalms for the Common Reader (1962). Her autobiography, A Goodly Heritage (1932), and its sequel, A Goodly Fellowship (1939), deal with her experiences as a teacher.

Chase, Stuart (1888— ). American economist and semanticist. Under the influence of Henry George, Chase became interested in social problems, especially those relating to conservation, consumer education, semantics, and labor. Among his books are The Tragedy of Waste (1925), Your Money's Worth (in collaboration with F. L. Schlink, 1927), A New Deal (1932), The Tyranny of Words (1938), and Live and Let Live (1960).

Chastelard (1865). A tragedy by Algernon Charles Swinburne, the first of a trilogy on Mary Queen of Scots. It is based on the life of Pierre de Boscobel de Chastelard, a French poet who was executed for his love for Mary. The other dramas in the trilogy are Bothwell and Mary Stuart.

Chastellain, Georges. See RHÉTORIQUES, LES GRANDS.

Chateaubriand, Vicomte François René de (1768–1848). French writer, forerunner of the romantic movement. The work of Chateaubriand is characterized by egotistical melancholy, impassioned emotion, and a love of untamed nature. His interest in Roman Catholicism and the Middle Ages, in exotic countries and primitive tribes, foreshadows typically romantic concerns (see ROMANTICISM). Chateaubriand is famous for his fictional portrayal of America. His novels Atala, René, and Les Natchez all deal with North America and the North American Indians. Les Martyrs (1809) and L'itinéraire de Paris à Jérusalem et de Jérusalem à Paris (1811) are concerned with Greece, the Holy Land, and the Near East. Other works include Le Géne du christianisme and Mémoires d'Outre-Tombe. Chateaubriand's political career was a stormy one. He favored the Bourbon monarchy and served it as ambassador to England, Italy, and Germany, and as minister of foreign affairs.

Chatelet, Marquise du. Gabrielle Emilie Le Tonnelier de Breteuil (1706–1749). French mathematician and physicist. Mistress of VOLTAIRE, she lived with him at Montjeu and at her château at Cirey (in Lorraine). The liaison lasted 14 years until her death. The marquise had an intense interest in the theories of Leibniz and Newton and propagated the latter's ideas in France. She wrote Traité sur le bonheur (1749) and Traduction des principes de Newton (1756). See EMILIE.

Chatterley, Lady. See LADY CHAETTERLEY'S LOVER.

Chatterton, Thomas (1752–1770). English poet. His literary productions are distinguished by their poetical genius. While still a mere boy, living in Bristol, he wrote a number of poems couched in elaborately archaic spelling that he declared to be the work of one Thomas Rowley, a nonexistent monk, poet, and antiquarian of the 15th century. In this way, Chatterton evolved a romance of Bristol centering around William Canynges, a merchant who became lord mayor. Notable poems in this series are: Bristowe Tragedie; or, the Deth of Syr Charles Bawdin (1772) and An Excellente Balade of Charity (1777). His deception was successful for a while, although it was exposed in 1777–1778 by Thomas Tyrwhitt and Thomas Warton. Chatterton also wrote Apostate Will (1764), a satire, and The Revenge (1770), a successful burlesque opera. In despair at his poverty, after moving to London, he killed himself at the age of 17 by taking poison. A volume of his collected works was published in 1803. Chatterton was a favorite figure of the English Romantic poets, becoming for them the prototype of the neglected genius. See MARVELLOUS BOY; BRISTOL BOY, THE. attendants and the sister of Katherine Swynford, later John of Gaunt's mistress, then wife, Philippa apparently gave him two sons, "little Lewis" (see Treatise on the Astrolabe) and Thomas, highly successful in public service in the 15th century. There may have been one daughter, or perhaps two, but the evidence is uncertain.

In 1367 Chaucer was given a life pension by the King, and apparently remained in the royal service thereafter, going abroad on a number of more or less secret diplomatic missions between 1368 and 1378, mostly to France. The two trips into Italy (1372–1373 and 1378) proved extremely important in his literary development because of his discovery of the works of Dante, Boccaccio, and Petrarch, which greatly influenced his own; it is probable that he read all their major works except Boccaccio's Decameron, and he knew many of those tales through Petrarch and French translations.

In 1374 he was given a house of his own and made Controller of Customs on wools, skins, and hides; in 1382 he was also given control of Petty Custom on wines and other goods. About 1385 he established his residence in Kent, where he was elected justice of the peace and briefly (1386) a member of Parliament. After his wife died in 1387, his financial fortunes worsened, possibly through political retaliation for his opposition to the Gloucester cause in the years of Richard II's minority following Edward's death in 1377. At any rate, soon after Richard came of age, he appointed Chaucer Clerk of the King's Works (1389), in charge of the maintenance and repair of public buildings, parks, bridges, etc. Chaucer resigned this position in 1391, and was appointed deputy forester of a royal forest in Somerset. He retained his residence at Kent and his activities in London, however. In 1394 Richard awarded him another life pension, Chaucer having resigned the first one in 1388. He seems to have been in attendance (1395–1396) on Henry Bolingbroke, John of Gaunt's son, who deposed Richard in 1399, and as Henry IV increased Chaucer's annuity.

Chaucer's early work is heavily influenced by the French tradition of the poetry of love. It includes the Book of the Duchess and the Romaunt of the Rose (probably c. 1370; a translation, of which only the beginning is now extant, of the French Romance of the Rose), both in octosyllabic couplets. Saint Cecilia, later used as the second Nun's Tale, was probably written about 1373, most of the tragedies incorporated into the Monk's Tale about 1374.

The House of Fame and Anelida and Arcticle, written about six years later, are considered transitional works, for they begin to show the influence of Italian literature, although still essentially in the French tradition. Soon afterward Chaucer translated as Boece the Consolation of Philosophy by Boethius. About the same period he wrote the Parliament of Fowls and within a few years Palamon and Arcite, later adapted as the Knight's Tale, as well as Troilus and Criseyde and the Legend of Good Women. This is called his period of Italian influence.

His period of maturity is considered to begin in 1387 with the writing of the General Prologue to the unfinished Canterbury Tales. He certainly worked on them through 1394, and probably until his death. In addition, he revised some of his earlier work and wrote the Treatise on the Astrolabe. There are also 16 short poems, written at various periods in his career in different stanzaic forms, and 5 poems of doubtful authorship.

In the early 1370's Chaucer began to abandon the octosyllabic couplets of his early works—although he used the form once more in the House of Fame, largely in favor of rhyme royal, although he also tried eight- and nine-line stanza forms. In the mid-1380's he first began to use the decasyllabic couplet, probably in Palamon and Arcticle (although it was possibly first written in stanzaic form and then adapted for the Knight's Tale) and certainly in the Legend of Good Women. This is the first known English use of the decasyllabic couplet, which Chaucer then used for most of the Canterbury Tales, and which evolved into the heroic couplet.

Chaucerian roundel. A variation of the French rondel form, first written by Chaucer. The Chaucerian roundel is characterized by the repetition of the first as a refrain at the end of the second and third stanzas. It has 10 lines, and its rhyme scheme is: A.b-a-b, a-b-a-b A (being the refrain).

Chaucat, Chaucia. In Thomas Mann's novel The Magic Mountain, a Russian tubercular patient with whom Hans Castorp falls in love and whose presence is a major cause of his remaining at Haus Berghof. Her finger-nail-biting, careless dress, and door-slapping reflect the lax and decadent way of life she represents.

Chauncey, Charles (1705–1787). American clergyman. He is best known for his opposition to the revivals and conversions of the "Great Awakening," which he attacked in such works as Seasonable Thoughts on the State of Religion (1743), a reply to Jonathan Edwards' Some Thoughts Concerning the Present Revival of Religion (1742). Chauncey's Salvation of All Men, published anonymously in 1782, marked the beginning of Universalism in New England. An ardent patriot before and during the Revolution, he also wrote a number of political tracts.

Chautenteeler. See under NUN'S PRIEST'S TALE.

Chauvinism. Blind and pugnacious patriotism of an exaggerated kind; unreasonable jingoism. Nicholas Chauvin, a soldier of the French Republic and Empire, was madly devoted to Napoleon and his cause. He was introduced as a type of exaggerated bellicose patriotism into a number of plays, including Scribe's Le Soldat laboureur, Cogniard's La Cocardie tricoire, Bayard and Dumanoir's Les Aides de camps, and Charet's Concert Chauvin. The term chauvinism spread quickly into a great number of languages.

Chávez, Carlos (1899– ). Outstanding Mexican composer and conductor of the century. He was director of the National Conservatory in Mexico City, and conductor of the Orquesta Sinfónica de México from 1928 to 1952. His music, principally orchestral, makes considerable use of elements from Mexican Indian folk music.

Cheapside. A London street running east from St. Paul's Churchyard. Formerly it was noted for its shops. Before the Great Fire of 1666, it was an open square, called The Cheaps, where markets and fairs were held.

Cheeryble brothers. In Charles Dickens' novel Nicholas Nickleby, two brothers, Ned and Charles.
Wealthy, self-made London merchants, they are ever ready to help those struggling against the buffets of fortune.

Cheever, John (1912–). American short-story writer and novelist. Subtle, ironic attacks on suburban characterize most of Cheever's writing. His stories, many of which originally appeared in The New Yorker, have been collected in such books as The Enormous Radio and Other Stories (1953), The Housebreaker of Shady Hill and Other Stories (1958), and Some People, Places and Things That Will Not Appear in My Next Novel (1961). The Wapshot Chronicle (1957) was a best-selling novel. Its sequel The Wapshot Scandal appeared in 1964.

Cheka. In early Soviet Russian history, the secret police body established in 1917 to guard against counterrevolutionary activity. The name is an abbreviation for “Extraordinary Commission for the Combat of Counterrevolution, Sabotage and Breach of Duty by Officials.” In 1922 it was replaced by the GPU, or Gay-Pay-Or (State Political Administration), which shortly thereafter became the OGPU (United State Political Administration). In 1934 secret police duties were taken over by the NKVD (People's Commissionariat of Internal Affairs). In 1946 this body was changed to the MVD (Ministry of Internal Affairs). After 1946, the Soviet security service was placed in the hands of the KGB (Committee of State Security), which employed less terror than its predecessors.

Chekhov, Anton Pavlovich (1860–1904). Russian short-story writer and playwright. Noted for his masterful short stories and lyrical dramas, Chekhov was born in Taganrog in the south of Russia, the third of six children. He was the son of a merchant and the grandson of an ex-serf who had purchased his freedom. Chekhov attended secondary school in Taganrog, and in 1879 enrolled in the School of Medicine at the University of Moscow. He graduated in 1884. While at the university, Chekhov had to earn money to help support the large family. Following the example of his older brother, Aleksandr, he began contributing short sketches, stories, and jokes to humorous journals and papers. Many of these early stories were published under such pen names as Antosha Chekhonte, Anton Ch., and The Doctor Without Patients. Skazki Mel'pomeiny (Tales of Melpomene, 1884), was the first volume of Chekhov's stories published. Other early collections of tales were Piostrye raskHzavy (Motley Tales, 1886) and V surnerkh (In the Twilight, 1887).

Chekhov's work attracted the attention of the writer Dmitri Grigorovich, who encouraged the young author to continue writing and introduced him to Alexei Susorin, publisher of Novuye Vremya, a leading St. Petersburg daily. The more secure financial position offered by this connection enabled Chekhov to pay more attention to improving the quality of his stories. The number of stories written each year fell steadily, but the artistic quality of the work improved, and Chekhov's reputation grew.

In 1890, Chekhov made a trip to the prison island of Sakhalin in the Far East. His observations and experiences were related in Ostrov sakhalina (Sakhalin Island, 1893). The trip was made despite Chekhov's weakened condition from the tuberculosis that had appeared while he was still a student at the university. The whole of Chekhov's short life was a constant struggle against the steady advance of the disease. After his return to Russia, Chekhov took part in relief work during the 1892 famine. He then bought a small estate at Melikhovo, not far from Moscow, and moved there with his family. While living at Melikhovo, Chekhov created some of his best-known works, including the tales Ward No. 6, Uchitel' slovestnosti (The Teacher of Literature, 1894), My Life, and Peasants. During this period he also produced two of his major plays, The Sea Gull and Uncle Vanya. The Sea Gull was first performed in St. Petersburg in 1896. It was so badly received that Chekhov vowed to give up playwriting. Two years later, however, the drama was put on with great success by the newly formed Moscow Art Theatre. Chekhov's play was so important in establishing the reputation of the new repertory theater that the directors made a gull the company's emblem.

His failing health forced Chekhov to move in 1899 to the milder southern climate of Yalta in the Crimea. Here he often met with the writers Maksim Gorki and Count Leo Tolstoi. From this time until the end of his life, Chekhov's creative activity was concerned mainly with drama. The few major stories of these later years were Dama s sobachkoi (The Lady with the Dog, 1898), In the Ravine, Arkhiyerei (The Bishop, 1902), and Nevesta (Betrothed, 1903).

In 1901, Chekhov married Olga Knipper, a Moscow Art Theatre actress. The couple lived apart much of the time, because Chekhov's ill health forced him to remain in the warmer climate at Yalta. During this period Chekhov wrote for the Art Theatre his two famous plays, The Cherry Orchard and The Three Sisters.

Chekhov's failing health induced his doctors to send him to the health resort at Badenweiler, Germany, in 1904. He died there in July.

The main theme of Chekhov's prose fiction is life's pathos, caused by the inability of human beings to respond to or even to communicate with one another and the pervading mood of sadness and hopelessness arising from this situation. This all-pervading theme is clearly seen in A Dreary Story, which is usually regarded as the first work of Chekhov's mature period, that is, after his comic and satirical stories. Chekhov was equally adept at creating a lyrical atmosphere, engendered by man's response to nature and untouched by the pain of relations as they exist between people. His most successful story of this type is Step' (The Steppe, 1888), describing a long trip across the plains as experienced by a young boy on his way to school in a distant town.

Chekhov is famed as a master of the short story. Even though some of his best prose pieces are almost novel-length, these stories, as well as his better-known short works, achieve their effect with the minimum of artistic means. All of his best work is an illustration of Chekhov's dictum: "Conciseness is the sister of talent."

Chekhov's plays deal with the passing of the vitality of the Russian landed gentry. His characters, helpless before the changes taking place in 19th-century Russia, take refuge in elaborate, improbable dreams of renewed prosperity. His plots are simple, mere outlines for the creation of atmosphere and delineation of character at which he excels. The result is a group of plays, combining comedy, pathos, anti-climax, and digression in a wholly natural effect that seems to disguise the careful workmanship of the dramatist. Ivanov (1887) and the four major plays already mentioned are among the finest in the modern repertoire. His shorter plays include Medved' (The Bear, 1888), Tragik ponevole (A Tragedian in Spite of Himself, 1889), Svadba (The Wedding, 1889), Na bolshikh doroge (On the High Road, 1884); Zhubilei (The Jubilee, 1891), Predlozheniye (The Proposal, 1888), and Lbedinaya pesnya (1887).

Chekins de la liberté, Les. See ROADS TO FREEDOM.

Chénier, André Marie de (1762–1794). French poet, often considered the greatest of 18th-century French. His Bucoliques and, to a lesser extent, his Elégies reflect his early love and remarkable understanding of Greek antiquity. At first sympathetic with the French Revolution, he was later horrified at the excesses of the Jacobins and wrote denunciatory pamphlets. He was arrested by order of Robespierre, whom he had attacked. During his imprisonment and before he was guillotined, he wrote, on bits of smuggled paper, his satiric and bitter lambes against his persecutors, and his last, most famous ode La Jeune captive, inspired by a fellow victim. His philosophical poetry (e.g., L'Invention) gives poetic expression to the scientific ideas of his age. Most of his works were published posthumously in 1819. His life inspired Giordano's opera Andrea Chénier (1896).

Chernyshevski, Nikolai Gavrilovich (1828–1889). Russian critic and editor. For three years after graduation from the university at St. Petersburg, Chernyshevski was a schoolteacher in his native Saratov. In 1853 he returned to St. Petersburg and began his journalistic career on the Sovremennik (The Contemporary), which he turned into the period's leading radical publication. Chernyshevski became the chief spokesman for the radical wing in literature; he and his younger colleague Dobrolyubov in their critical writings gave further emphasis to the social aspect of literature, which the renowned critic Belinski had brought to light. Chernyshevski supplied an example of the literature he praised in his didactic novel, Chto Delat'? (What Is To Be Done?; 1863). In the novel, he expounded his ideas of how the true revolution should think and behave. Though the work is more of an ideological tract than a novel, it suited the mood of the times and attained wide popularity. It is now regarded in the Soviet Union as a revolutionary classic. Chernyshevski was arrested in 1862 for revolutionary activities; he was sentenced to 7 years at hard labor with 20 years of exile in Siberia. In 1883, he was permitted to leave Siberia because of his health; he returned to Russia and lived out his life in Saratov.

Cherry Orchard, The (Vishnovyi sad; 1904). A play by Anton Chekhov. Its four acts portray the declining fortunes of the Ranevskis, a landowning family, who are about to lose their estate and beloved cherry orchard. Poor management, neglect, and impracticality have brought the family to the point of bankruptcy, but no one is able to act to head off the disaster. The suggestion of the practical businessman Lopakhin that the family chop down the orchard and build houses on the land is met with horror. For the Ranevskis, the orchard represents the pleasant past, before the mysterious forces of the changing times threatened their idyllic existence. The estate is finally sold from under the hapless family. Lopakhin buys the land and proceeds to carry out his plan to destroy the orchard and erect houses. As the family sadly prepares to depart, the sound of an ax chopping down a cherry tree is heard off stage.

The play, regarded as one of Chekhov's finest dramatic works, is both a penetrating study of the changing way of life in Russia at the end of the 19th century and a vivid depiction of what the change means to the people involved. The stage portraits of the Ranevskis, with their inability to do anything to save themselves, and of Lopakhin, the representative of a new rising class in society, are masterpieces of dramatic creation.

Cherubini, Don. See BACHELIER DE SALAMANQUE, Le.

Cherubini, [Mario] Luigi [Carlo Zenobio Salvatore] (1760–1842). Italian composer. He settled in Paris in 1788. His principal works are his operas, of which he wrote 24. Medée (1787) has recently been revived with great success. He was the favorite composer of Napoleon, and was much admired by Beethoven.

Cheshire cat. In Lewis Carroll's Alice's Adventures in Wonderland, a creature that has the ability to vanish at will, its grin being the last thing to go.

Chester, George Randolph. See GET-RICH-QUICK WALLINGFORD.

Chester Cycle. A series of 24 medieval English MYSTERY PLAYS performed by the guilds of Chester at Whitsuntide (13th to 16th centuries).

Chesterfield, 4th earl of. Philip Dormer Stanhope (1694–1773). Statesman and man of letters. A friend of Alexander Pope and an important patron of letters, Lord Chesterfield was unsuccessful in his belated attempt to patronize Samuel Johnson's Dictionary of the English Language after it had been completed. Johnson's rebuke is famous:

Is not a patron, My Lord, one who looks with unconcern on a Man struggling in the water and when he has reached ground encumbers him with help?

Johnson's comment on Chesterfield's Letters to his natural son Philip Stanhope is equally well known: "They teach the morals of a whore, and the manners of a dancing master." The judgment is too severe. Written between 1737 and 1768, Lord Chesterfield's Letters to his Son (1774) form one of the classic portraits of an ideal 18th-century gentleman.

Chesterton, Gilbert Keith (1874–1936). English journalist, essayist, novelist, and poet; author of biography, history, literary criticism, and polemical works. Like his friend, Hilaire Belloc, he was a propagandist of his Catholicism and his conservative political views (the two were referred to as Chester belloc). Chesterton became a Catholic in 1922, but had always been a traditionalist, admiring the Victorians, romanticizing the Middle Ages, and attacking H. G. Wells and Bernard Shaw. He is best remembered for his essays, such as On running after one's hat (1908), which are gay and witty, and for such poems as Lepanto (1911), which are full of gusto. Sometimes he conveyed his serious ideas in fantastic novels, as in The NAPOLEON of NOTTING Hill. The Man Who Was Thursday, and a series of detective novels, beginning with The Innocence of Father Brown (1911), in which the priest Father Brown is sleuth. Chesterton wrote a good history of The Victorian Age in Literature (1913). Among his polemical works are Heretics (1905), Orthodoxy (1908), What's Wrong with the World? (1910), and
The Everlasting Man (1925), an outline of history.

Chevalier à la mode, Le (1687). A comedy of manners by Florent DANCOURT. It recounts the explotts of an impudent and imprudent chevalier who almost succeeds in his simultaneous courtship of two rich widows and the niece of one of them. The play gives a lighthearted but not inaccurate picture of the French society of Dancourt's day.

Chevallier, Gabriel (1895- ). French novelist whose Clochemerle (1934) is a grotesquely comic caricature of village life. His other novels include Saints-Colin e (1937) and The Effe Inheritance (1945).

Chevy Chase. One of the oldest ballads in English. There is some evidence that it may have grown out of the Battle of Otterborne, and a Scottish version exists earlier than 1549. It is included in Percy's Reliques (1765).

Cheyney, Peter (1896–1951). English writer of tough, adventurous crime fiction. He wrote Dames Don't Care (1937) and numerous other novels.

Chiabrera, Gabriello (1552–1638). Italian lyric poet and satirist. He is noted for his numerous canzonette; 30 satirical Sermoni; the pastoral poem Alcippo (1604); and odes in imitation of Horace, Pindar, and Anacreon. Wordsworth admired him greatly and translated several of his epitaphs.

Chiang Kai-shek (1887- ). Chinese statesman and general. An early follower of SUN YAT-SEN, he studied in Russia and on Sun's death in 1925 became leader of the Nationalist movement. In 1927 he broke with the Russian communists in China.
After several years of civil war between the communists and the Nationalists, a truce was reached in 1936 so that a united China led by Chiang might face the threat of Japanese aggression. Upon the out-brake of war with Japan in 1937, Chiang became commander of China's forces and was named provisional president in 1943. Elected president in 1948, he was forced to abandon the mainland of China in the face of communist military successes and in 1949 settled on the island of Taiwan (Formosa), which he maintained, with extensive American aid, as the last stronghold of the republic of China. He was reelected president in 1954 and in 1960.

Chiang Mei-ling (1898– ). American-educated, Christian Chinese wife of CHIANG KAI-SHEK.
She became known throughout the world for her activities in the administration of the national affairs of her country, for her influence on the policies of her husband, and for her importation of Western ideas and methods into China. China Fights for Her Life (1938), China in Peace and War (1940), and This Is Our China (1940) are books by Mrs. Chiang written in English.

Chicago Group or Chicago Renaissance.
A group of American writers. From about 1912 to about 1925, Chicago seemed well on its way to becoming the literary capital of the U.S. Although many of the writers dealt with Middle Western subjects, the literary activity also had a cosmopolitan scope, especially through such literary magazines as Harriet Monroe's POETRY: A MAGAZINE of VERSE and Margaret Anderson's Little Review. The term is variously used to include such writers as H. B. FULLER, Theodore DREISER, Ben HECHT, Sherwood ANDERSON, Edgar Lee MASTERS, and Carl SANDBURG.

Chicanous. See CATCHPOLES.

Chichen-Itza. An ancient city of Yucatán, Mexico, with well-preserved ruins of the Mayan civilization.

Chichikov, Pavel Ivanovich. The central character of Nikolai Gogol's DEAD SOULS. Plump and prosperous-looking, appearing as respectable as he claims to be, Chichikov is actually an unctuous swindler. A totally mediocre man, whose only abilities are a knowledge of social form and a talent for flattery, he almost succeeds in his dishonest scheme because he allows the people he is swindling to believe they are swindling him.

Ch'ien-lung. Name of Chinese era (1736–1795).
A period of great literary and academic ferment.

Chikamatsu Monzaemon (1653–1725). Japanese dramatist. Composer of puppet plays (joruri) and kabuki drama. He is famous for both his historical spectacles (jidaimono) and domestic plays (sewamono) many of which are still performed today. Cf. Major plays of Chikamatsu (1961) by Donald Keene.

Child, Francis James (1825–1896). American philologist. Professor of Middle English at Harvard, he was an authority on Chaucer and his contemporaries. For many years Child occupied himself with the collection in eight volumes of English and Scottish Popular Ballads (1857–1858). It was revised from 1883 to 1898, and issued in 10 volumes. This most authoritative work in its field printed 305 distinct English and Scottish ballads, as many as possible from manuscript sources, with varying versions and exhaustive critical comment and notes.

Childé. A medieval title of honor. In times of chivalry, noble youths who were on probation as candidates for knighthood were called infantes, valets, dames, filles, and childés.

Childé Harold's Pilgrimage (Cantos I & II published 1812; Canto III, 1816; Canto IV, 1818). A long narrative poem in Spenserian stanzas by Lord BYRON. The romantically melancholy hero, Childé
Harold, disillusioned with a life devoted to the pursuit of pleasure, embarks on a solitary pilgrimage through Portugal, Spain, the Ionian Islands, Albania, Greece, Belgium, the Rhine valley, the Alps, and the Jura. The poet evokes the events and people associated with each place: Rousseau and Julie, Napoleon, the battles of Waterloo and Spain, the bondage of Greece. In the fourth canto Byron drops the device of the hero to speak directly to the reader, describing the great men and historical associations of the Italian cities. The poem satisfied the popular craving for descriptive travel literature of Byron's day and did much to establish the poet's fame.

Childe Rowland (sometimes spelled Roland). Younger brother of "the fair Burd Ellen" in the old Scottish ballad. Guided by the enchantress Merlin, he undertakes to bring back his sister from Elfland, whither the fairies have carried her, and succeeds in his perilous exploit. See Burd Ellen.

Childers, Erskine (1870-1922). Anglo-Irish writer, soldier, and politician. He is best known for his novel The Riddle of the Sands (1900), which describes an imaginary German plot to invade Britain. He devoted himself to Irish republicanism and was captured and executed in its cause.

Childhood (Detstvo; 1913-1914). 1 volume of an autobiographical trilogy by Maksim Gorki. The other two volumes are In the World (V lyadakh; 1916) and My Universities (Moi universитеты; 1923). Of the three volumes, Childhood is the richest in insight and incident, chiefly because of the memorable portrait in it of Gorki's grandmother, Akulina Ivanovna Kashirina.

Childhood, Boys' (Detstvo, Yunost'; 1852, 1854, 1857). An autobiographical trilogy by Count Leo Tolstoi. Childhood was the first of Tolstoi's works to receive wide attention. The descriptions of life on a provincial estate are among the best depictions of nature in Russian literature.

Children of Adam (1860–1867). A group of poems in Walt Whitman's Leaves of Grass. The poems praise physical love and procreation; Whitman claims that Adam's children have lost the Garden of Eden through the degradation of their senses. Body and soul are not separate, but one. "Lusty, phallic," Whitman is the unashamed "chanter of Adamic songs."

Children of Hercules, The (Heracleidae; 427 B.C.) A tragedy by Euripides. Eurytheus, the cruel king of Argos who had forced Hercules to perform the 12 labors, has continued to persecute the hero's children after his death. Led by old Iolaus, Hercules' trusted friend, they win the protection of Demophon, king of Athens. Iolaus, made young again for one day, fights with the Athenians against the Argives. Eurytheus is captured and put to death.

Written at the height of the Peloponnesian War, the play praises Athens as a champion of freedom and points out that Sparta, now her enemy, should be grateful to the city that had defended the children of Hercules, from whom the Spartans claimed descent.

Children of the Ghetto (1892). A novel by Israel Zangwill. It consists of a number of episodes in the lives of the poor, striving people in London's Jewish community. Zangwill paints vivid portraits of his characters.

Children's Hour, The (1860). A poem by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. It is devoted to his three daughters, whose mother was Mary Potter, the poet's first wife.

Child's, Marquis W[illiam] (1903– ). American journalist and writer. Childs writes a syndicated political column and is the author of a number of books of nonfiction, including Sweden: The Middle Way (1936) and Eisenhower, Captive Hero (1958). The Cabin (1944) and The Peace-makers (1962) are novels.

Child's Garden of Verses, A (1885). A small collection of verses by Robert Louis Stevenson. Written expressly for children and from a child's point of view, they have nevertheless delighted adults as much as children since they were written. Among the favorite titles are My Shadow and The Lamplighter.

Chillingworth, William (1602–1644). English writer. Although he was at one time a Roman Catholic, he is best known for his Religion of the Protestants a Safe Way to Salvation (1638).

Chillingworth, Roger. The vengeful husband of Hester Prynne in Hawthorne's The Scarlet Letter.

Chillen. See Prisoner of Chillen, The.

Chimaera (Chimaira). One of the monstrous offspring of Typhon and Echidna. It is generally represented as having the head of a lion, the body of a goat, and the tail of a serpent. It was killed by Bellerophon, mounted (in most versions) on the winged horse Pegasus.

Ch'in. The first Chinese empire (221–207 B.C.). It saw the country unified for the first time. A canal system and the Great Wall were constructed, and the various writing styles reduced to one. The thought of the Legalist School prevailed during this brief but important dynasty.

Chinatown. The Chinese quarter of a city, especially of New York or San Francisco in the U.S. Until recently, the Chinatowns in these two cities were famous for their gambling dens, vice, and opium trade. These illegal activities were under the control of the tongs, and were the cause of murderous tong wars and feuds. Once the power of the tongs was broken, Chinatowns began a new prosperity in the tourist trade. As a result of the trade embargo on Communist Chinese goods, most souvenirs now for sale in Chinatowns are of Japanese origin. The Chinese quarter of London is called Limehouse.

Chinese literature. Two varying literary streams may be found in the first historical records (11th-3d centuries B.C.) left by the Chinese: the shamanistic, represented by the divination inscriptions on oracle bones used in scapularmancy, and the official, found in the inscriptions on bronzes, which generally contain information concerning the king's relationships with his ministers. Both of these types of inscriptions are written in an archaic form of writing, whose stylization attests to a long period of development. Among ancient texts, the Book of Documents, which represents the official tradition, contains speeches and proclamations of a historical nature, and the elegies of Ch'ü, although of dubious authenticity, contains material relating to shamanism, as does the first poetry collection, the Book of Odes. After the eighth century B.C. a period of incessant warfare among rival feudal principalities disrupted the nation and there arose from the sixth century on a variety of philosophical systems that sought to propound solutions to the political and ethical problems of the times. Confucius, an unsuccessful would-be advisor to the government of his state, spread his moral and political teachings; they were later elaborated upon by his disciples and further developed by Mencius and other philosophers. The passive, yielding doctrines of Taoism found much favor, and came into conflict with Confucianism. For a brief period during the Ch'in Dynasty (221-207 B.C.) the Legist School of ruthless and practical expediency gained the upper hand, and a vast number of books were destroyed by governmental order. By the second century B.C., however, the scattered texts had been reassembled (although not without many accretions and much tampering with the originals) and Confucianism had established itself as a political and ethical system which was to endure, with modifications, until the 20th century. The Han Dynasty (202 B.C.-A.D. 220) found the writing of history established as a major literary form. Ssu-ma Ch'ien's Shih chi, covering the whole span of Chinese history, set the pattern for the later Dynastic Histories, 24 in number, which detailed the events of each dynasty as viewed by the regime that replaced it. As governmental compilations they reflect the official Confucian doctrine. The third to sixth centuries A.D. saw the introduction of Buddhism from India and Central Asia. Missionaries and later Chinese priests undertook the translation of Buddhist texts, frequently using Taoist terminology to approximate the meaning of newly introduced philosophical concepts. All forms of Indian Buddhism were imported indiscriminately, and a number of highly complex philosophical systems developed, each based on Indian texts or interpretations of them. There was a gradual sinicization of this new religion with many purely Chinese works being added to the canon; although Confucianism continued its hold, many emperors and high officials became zealous converts to Buddhism. During the T'ang Dynasty (618-906) Ch'an (Zen) Buddhism gained wide acceptance; the vast temple complexes and land holdings of the other sects placed a severe economic burden on the nation, leading to the persecution of 845, from which Ch'an emerged as the dominant Buddhist sect. The revival of Confucianism in the 12th century and the gradual introduction of Amidist beliefs into Ch'an accounted for the decline in importance of this type of Buddhism from the 14th century on. The T'ang Dynasty was noted for a great revival of poetry as a popular literary form. Poetry, philosophical works and their commentaries, essays, and histories had always been the principal forms of Chinese literary expression: with the writings of Po Chü-ä, Li Po, Wang Wei, Tu Fu and others, poetry gained heights hitherto unattained. The origins of Chinese fiction can be traced to the Han Dynasty. Ch'in after the approval of such literature worked against its preservation. Some early works of fiction from the T'ang Dynasty have been found among the documents unearthed at Tun-huang. Written in colloquial language, they are tales of the supernatural, Buddhist stories, and prose romances, many deriving from the oral tradition. Hsi Yu Ch'ing, stemming from this tradition, reached its final form in the 16th century and details the fantastic adventures of the priest Hsüan-tsaing and his companions. The Shur Hu Ch'uan and the Chin Ping Mei are major novels whose popularity continues unabated. The Hung Lou Meng, characterized by a sensitivity and depth of character development not found in other works, has been described as the greatest Chinese novel. Novels have frequently been the subject of suppression and censorship, particularly during the Ch'ing Dynasty (1644-1912), when officials found them too critical of existing conditions. The Ch'ing period saw great literary activity, with enormous collectanea, encyclopedias, and works in all fields of scholastic and scientific endeavor being compiled. In the 20th century much fiction, notably short stories, has been produced, the writings of Lu Hsun being of particular importance. See Circle of Chalk.

Ch'ing or Manchu Chinese dynasty (1644-1912). An alien dynasty. It replaced the Ming, and became gradually sinicized. Ineffectual in the face of the Western nations, the Ch'ing dynasty was eventually destroyed by the Chinese themselves with the establishment of the Republic in 1912.

Ch'ing-t'U Buddhism. See Amidism.

Chin Ping Mei. Chinese novel of the Ming Dynasty (1368-1644). It details the history of Hsi Men and his six wives. Highly satirical, it is set in the declining years of the dynasty and has been frequently banned and censored for its sexual detail. See Chin Ping Mei, The Golden Lotus (1940), Introduction by Arthur Waley.

Chios. One of the seven cities claiming to be the birthplace of Homer. Two different lists of these cities exist in Greek epigram: Smyrna, Chios, Colophon, Salamis, Rhodes, Argos, Athena; or, Smyrna, Chios, Colophon, Ithaca, Pylos, Argos, Athena.

Chirico, Giorgio di (1888- ). Italian painter. His important work, from 1911 to 1920, greatly influenced surrealism. He is known for enigmatic landscapes in which solitary figures and elements of classical architecture create a feeling of premonition by means of exaggerated perspective, lengthened shadows, and lonely sense of space. During the 1920's, when he was associated with surrealism, he painted faceless figures suggestive of dummies, but later reverted to academicism.

Chiron (Cheiron). A learned centaur. He taught music, medicine, and hunting to Achilles, Hercules, Asklepios, Jason, and many other heroes. A son of Cronos and Philyra, he is often spoken of as a king or leader of the Thessalian centaurs. Accidentally wounded by one of Heracles' poisoned arrows, Chiron gave up his immortality to Prometheus in order to find relief from the unbearable pain in death.

chivalry. The system of customs and conventions connected with knighthood in the Middle Ages. Derived from the French word chevalier, meaning horseman, it was originally associated with the business of recruiting knights for the purpose of making war. It came to include the curriculum of training the young knight to fight, to hunted, to serve his lord, to govern his own vassals, and ultimately it evolved into that courtly ideal in which the true knight was not only courageous and skillful in war but also generous, pious, and courteous. When the championing of the weak began to be emphasized as part of the ideal, chivalry became as important in peace as in war, and, among other things, the tournament flourished. Another component of the chivalric code was the ideal of courtly love, an element that further refined the knight by requiring that he be poet and musician and that he be dedicated to some lady of his choice.

Chivers, Thomas Holley (1809–1858). American poet and physician. The son of a wealthy landowner, Chivers preferred writing verse and joining the cults of his day to practicing medicine systematically. He published several volumes of verse, including The Lost Pleiad and Other Poems (1845), Eonchs of Ruby, A Gift of Love (1851), Memoriala (1853), and Virginalia (1853). Sometimes his extraordinary combinations of words resulted in exquisite melody; at other times, they became sheer nonsense.

A friendly rival of Edgar Allan Poe, Chivers offered his less fortunate friend a permanent haven on his estate. After Poe's death, he charged that Poe had plagiarized from him. Chivers' influence has also been traced in the work of Rossetti and Swinburne.

Chloe. The shepherdess beloved by Daphnis in the pastoral romance of Longus, entitled Daphnis and Chloe. Hence Chloe has become a generic name among romance writers and pastoral poets for a rustic maiden, not always of the artless variety.

Chloe. See Strophon.

Chocano, José Santos (1875–1943). Peruvian poet. Considered the outstanding exponent of modernism in Peru, Chocano led a colorful life as revolutionary and political agitator; he was murdered while riding a streetcar in Chile. He early revealed his concern with American themes in La epopeya del morro (1899), written when he was 20, which describes the suicide of a group of Peruvian soldiers who threw themselves into the sea rather than surrender during the so-called War of the Pacific (1879–1883). His subsequent poetry glorified the Indian, the tropical landscape, and the legacy of Spain. In La epopeya del Pacifico, which appears in his best-known collection, Alma América (1906), he expressed his misgivings about the power of the U.S. Although he could be simple and spontaneous, his style tended to be florid and, at times, grandiloquent.

Chopin, Frédéric [Français] (1810–1849). Composer and pianist. Born near Warsaw of a French father and Polish mother, he was resident in France for most of his career. He was the outstanding pianist and composer for the piano in the Romantic era. Nearly all his compositions are for piano: preludes, scherzos, sonatas, waltzes, ballades, études, polonaises, mazurkas, nocturnes, etc. Chopin was a close friend of the painter Delacroix and was admired by the composer Schumann. For several years he was associated with George Sand, the novelist, in an unhappy affair which ended in a quarrel and estrangement. Chopin died of tuberculosis of the larynx, a disease that had caused him much weakness and suffering.

Chopin, Kate [O'Flaherty] (1851–1904). American short-story writer and novelist. She is known for her portrayal of Creole life in Louisiana. Her best works were included in two collections of short stories: Bayou Folk (1894) and A Night in Acadie (1897). Her novel, The Awakening (1899), a tale of extramarital love and miscegenation, created a storm of criticism when it was first published.

Choquette, Robert (1905– ). U.S.-born Canadian poet. Although Choquette wrote a long radio series, Métopole, and some rural novels, his greatest achievement is his poetry. In his first book of poems, A Travers les Vents (1925), he showed a passionate feeling for the north country, more lyrical and less morbid than much Canadian writing about that region. The poems in his second book, Metropolitan Museum (1931), contrast the serene art in the museum with the frantic life of the city around it. His other works include Poésies Nouvelles (1933) and Suite Marine (1953).

choragos. An earlier term in Greek classical drama, for the leader of the chorus. See Coryphaeus.

Chou. The second Chinese dynasty (c. 1027–256 B.C.). The classic age of Chinese civilization, which saw the development of a feudal state and society. The Book of Odes is a product of this age, as well as the thought of Confucius, the Taoist religious system, and other important philosophical concepts. The Chou kings held actual power only briefly, and the period was marked by almost incessant warfare among rival principalities.

Chouans, Les (1829). A historical novel by Honoré de Balzac. His first literary success, it now forms part of La Comédie Humaine. The heroine is the beautiful spy Marie de Verneuil, and the hero is the marquis de Montauran, a Royalist leader. The Chouans themselves were French peasant insurgents, supporters of the royalist cause at the time of the Revolution. Jean Cottereau, their first leader, was nicknamed Chouan—a corruption of the French chatuant (a screech owl)—because of his secret call in times of danger.

Chou En-lai (1898– ). Premier of Communist China. Educated in Japan and France, he was one of the founders of the Communist party in China. Joined Sun Yat-sen (1924); became active in the Red Army (1931); founded Chinese Soviet Republic (1931); began all-out military operations against Chiang Kai-shek (1947). Premier of Communist China (1949– ).

Chou Shu-jen. See Lu Hsun.

Chrétien de Troyes (fl., 1160–1190). French poet at the court of Marie de Champagne and Philip of Flanders. He wrote some of the earliest Arthurian romances including Erec et Enide, Cligés, and Yvain, ou le chevalier au lion*. Two of his most important works are Lancelot, ou le chevalier de la charrette* (Lancelot, or the Knight of the Cart) and Perceval, ou le conte du Graal (Perceval, or the Story of the Grail), which were left incomplete at his death. Lancelot deals with the adventures of the Arthurian Lancelot, and Perceval (see Perceval) is the earliest literary version of the Grail legend. Guillaume d'Angleterre, a version of the life of St. Eustace, has been attributed to him by some scholars.

Christabel (1816). A fragmentary poem by Samuel Taylor Coleridge. It is known for its interesting metrical form and its distinctive effects of the supernatural, which are often compared with The Rime of the Ancient Mariner. Christabel’s purity and innocence are threatened by the wicked enchantress, Lady Geraldine.

Christian. (1) A follower of Christ. The first use of the word occurred at Antioch (Acts 11:26).

(2) The pilgrim hero of Bunyan’s PILGRIM’S PROGRESS. His journey from the City of Destruction to the Celestial City forms the substance of Part I.

Christian Hero, The (1701). A pamphlet by Richard Steele, written when the author was in the British army, and perhaps occasioned by a duel in which Steele was wounded. It is an attack on duel-ling and the code of honor.

Christian Science. A religious movement whose teaching is that healing is done by spiritual means rather than by surgery or medicine. It preaches spiritual confidence in the face of disaster, and by an understanding of God as the impersonal, infinite Mind. Christian Science, founded by Mary Baker Eddy in 1866, has spread throughout the U.S., the British Empire, Germany, and the rest of Europe. The First Church of Christ, Scientist, in Boston, Mass., has more than 3,000 branches. Mrs. Eddy’s book, Science and Health with Key to the Scriptures (1875) contains the teachings of the religion. Mark Twain wrote a savage attack on the cult in Christian Science (1907).

Christian Socialism. A religious political movement founded in England in the 1840’s under the leadership of Frederick Denison MAURICE. Its aim was to remedy the condition of the laboring class by a program of education and legislative reform, and by encouraging the propertied class to practice Christian ethics in their dealings with the poor. The movement opposed the heartless individualism and competi-tiveness of 19th-century capitalism. Aside from Maurice, one of the chief adherents of the movement was Charles KINOSLEY. The movement was influenced by the work of William Godwin and Thomas Carlyle.

Christie, Agatha (1890– ). English detective-story writer and playwright. She is the prolific author of consistent best sellers. Her detective hero is usually Hercule Poirot, a Belgian. The Murder of Roger Ackroyd (1926) is generally considered to be her most ingenious book. In addition to her many mystery stories, she has written “straight” novels under the pen name of Mary Westmacott. Among her numerous books are The Pale Horse (1962), a mystery story with a supernatural theme, and Double Sin and Other Stories (1961), a collection of short pieces. Her mystery play, Witness for the Prosecution (1953), was successful in both London and New York.

Christie Johnstone (1855). A novel by Charles Reade. It is primarily the story of the titular character, a Scottish fishergirl, and her artist lover, Charles Gatty. Gatty’s mother opposes the match, but when Christie saves Charles’ life Mrs. Gatty relents. The subplot concerns the Viscount Ipsden, whose health has been impaired by his cousin Barbara Sinclair’s refusal to marry him. He meets Christie while fol-low ing his doctor’s prescription to mingle with humble folk and “relieve one fellow creature a day.” Eventually Barbara marries the viscount.

Christina (1626–1689). A queen of Sweden, daughter of Gustavus Adolphus (1594–1632). She was given the education of a man and made her court a center of intellectual activity to which she in-vited distinguished foreign scholars, artists, and philoso phers. The French philosopher Descartes died while in Christina’s employ as tutor. Before she came of age, the affairs of state, troubled by the Thirty Years’ War, were conducted by John Oxen-stierna. She herself reigned for ten years (1644–1654) and abdicated in favor of her cousin Charles X. She embraced Roman Catholicism (1655) and died in poverty in Rome.

Christina de Pisan (c. 1364–c. 1430). Italian-born French poet and scholar. She turned to writing at 25 when she was left a widow with three children, and was probably the first woman since antiquity to earn her livelihood as an author. Her poetry includes love lyrics, a patriotic glorification of Joan of Arc, and three longer philosophical poems. Her prose works include La Cité des dames (The City of Ladies), largely adapted from Boccaccio’s De Claris Mulieribus, treatises on education and history; and two defenses of women (1399, 1400) against the satirical accusations in Jean de Meung’s Roman de la Rose (see ROMANCE OF THE ROSE).

Christmas, Joe. The protagonist of William Faulkner’s Light in August. The illegitimate child of Milly Hines and a man supposedly Mexican, Joe is placed in an orphanage by his fanatically religious grandfather, who believes him to be part-Negro. He is adopted by a strict Calvinist couple, who know nothing of his origins. After wandering over the Southwest for several years, Joe arrives in Jefferson, Miss., where he has an affair with a white woman, kills her, and becomes the object of a manhunt. At home in neither the world of the whites nor that of the Negroes, Joe continually alienates himself from both worlds and rushes to castration and death at the hands of a mob.

Christmas Carol, A (1843). A Christmas story by Charles DICKENS. The subject is the conversion of Scrooge, “a grasping old sinner,” by a series of visions of Christmases past, present, and to come. Scrooge has glimpses of his life as a schoolboy, apprentice, and young lover; of the joyous home of Bob CRATCHIT, his underpaid clerk; of what his lot would be if he were to die now, heartless and despised. These visions wholly change his nature, and he becomes benevolent and cheerful, loving all and by all beloved. Although Dickens wrote the story partly for the income it would bring, he said afterwards that he laughed and cried over it as he did over no other story.

Christmas Day. The popular English name for the Feast of the Nativity of Jesus Christ, December 25. This date was first set in 336, by the Roman Church, the Eastern Churches having earlier settled on the date of January 6 as the Feast of the Epiphany. December 25 was observed in pagan Rome as the festival Natalis Invicti Solis (Birth of the Unconquered Sun), sacred to the sun god Mithras. Christ-mas became a great popular festival in the Middle Ages, which led to objections by some of the Reformers. The observance was forbidden in England under the Commonwealth (1644-1660), and in Calvinist New England.

Christopher, Henri (1767-1820). Negro king of Haiti. Christophe served as lieutenant to Toussaint L'Ouverture in the revolution against the French (1791). He succeeded Dessalines as head of the government under the title Henri I. In 1820 a rebellion of his subjects caused him to commit suicide, with a legendary silver bullet.

Christopher, St. A saint of the Greek and Latin churches. Legend relates that St. Christopher was a giant who one day carried a child over a brook, and said, "Child, thou hast put me in great peril. I can bear no greater burden." To this the child answered, "Marvel thou nothing, for thou hast borne all the world upon thee, and its sins likewise." As Christopher sank beneath his load, the child told the giant he was Christ, and Christopher resolved to serve Christ and Him only. He died three days afterward and was canonized. The Greek and Latin churches look on him as the protecting saint against floods, fire, and earthquake.

Christopher Robin. The son of A. A. Milne, for whom he wrote the Pooh books. Christopher Robin is the only human character in a world of small animals.

Christ Stopped at Eboli (Cristo Si E Fermato a Eboli; 1945). An autobiographical work by Carlo Levi. It is an eloquent and moving description of the life the author shared for a year with the peasants of a remote area of Italy, where he was exiled for his political views during the fascist regime.

Christy Minstrels. A troupe of Negro minstrels organized in New York (c. 1860) by Edwin P. Christy (1815-1862). Some of Stephen C. Foster's music was written for them.

Chronicle, The Anglo-Saxon. See ANGLO-SAXON CHRONICLE.

Chronicle of the Kings of England. See GESTA REGUM ANGLORUM.

Chronicle play. A play employing—sometimes very loosely—historical events as the basis of its action. The earliest example in English is John Bale's Kyng Johan (c. 1548). The finest examples are Shakespeare's Richard II and Henry IV plays (1594-1598) and Christopher Marlowe's Edward II (1592).

Chronicles, I and II. Two Old Testament canonical books, originally one book in Hebrew, which follow II Kings. The author, known only as "the chronicler," parallels the epochs described in II Samuel and II Kings. He stresses certain aspects to present a colorful picture of the traditions and attitudes of the time.

Chronicles of England, Scotland, and Ireland (1578). A history by Raphael Holinshed. The Chronicles was the source of much of the material used in Shakespeare's Macbeth, King Lear, and Cymbeline. The section concerning the history of Scotland is said to be chiefly a translation of Scotoram Historiae (1527) by Hector Boece. In 1587 a second and expanded edition was published, but parts of it did not please Queen Elizabeth, and she tried to have it suppressed.

Chromonotithologos (1734). A burlesque of contemporary drama by Henry Carey, subtitled "the Most Tragical Tragedy that was ever Tragedized by any company of Tragedians." The title is the name of the King of Queerumania, the pompous main character, and is used for any bombastic person who delivers inflated address. The play is noted for its frank criticism of the theater of its day.

Chryseis. In Homer's Iliad, daughter of Chryses, a priest of Apollo. She was famed for her beauty. During the Trojan War, Chryses was taken captive and allotted to Agamemnon, king of Argos. When he refused to accept ransom, Chryses evoked a plague and Agamemnon was forced to let her go.

Chrysippus (Chrysippos). See PELOPS.

Chrysoloras, Manuel (d. 1415). Greek scholar. He was invited to Florence to teach in 1396, the first of many who came to Italy to foster the revival of classical studies during the Renaissance. His teaching and scholarly activities did not prevent him from traveling widely in Italy and throughout Europe, as well as his native Constantinople.
Chrysostom, John (c. 345–407). One of the Fathers of the Greek Church, elected archbishop (patriarch) of Constantinople in 398. He stressed asceticism and knowledge of the Scriptures in religion, as well as charity, social justice, and reform within the Church; he established the basis of the present liturgy of the Orthodox Eastern Church. Many of his sermons and addresses have been preserved, including On Priesthood, On the Statues, and a great deal of Biblical exegesis.

Chuang Tzu. A Chinese Taoist text attributed to Chuang Chou (369–286 B.C.). The first Chinese work to deal solely with spiritual subjects, it advocates the transcendence of the physical world and calls for a union with the Tao, the mysterious and indescribable first principle of the universe. Witty and imaginative, it is a work of exceptional literary distinction. See H. A. Giles, Chuang Tzu (1926). See Taoism.

Chubb, Thomas Caldecot (1899– ). American poet and biographer. In addition to such volumes of verse as Ships and Lovers (1933), Cliff Pace and Other Poems (1936), and Cornucopia (1953), Chubb's work includes a biography of Boccaccio (1930) and one of Aretino (1940). The Months of the Year (1960) contains translations of Italian poems.

Chu Hsi (1130–1200). Chinese Confucian scholar, largely responsible for the Confucian revival (Neo-Confucianism) in the Sung Dynasty. He synthesized, reorganized, and interpreted the teachings, adopting elements from Buddhism and Taoism, to form a new Confucian system that became the orthodox philosophy until the establishment of the Republic in 1912. His teachings were of considerable importance in Japan, particularly during the Tokugawa period, when they were adopted as the official state philosophy. See also Confucianism.

Chu-chen. See Spring and Autumn Annals.

Chung-yung. See Mean, The.

Church, Benjamin (1639–1718). American soldier known as one of the outstanding guerilla fighters in the wars between the New England colonists and the Indians. From his notes his son Thomas Church (1673–1748) wrote Entertaining Passages Relating to Philip's War (1716), an account of the elder Church's experiences.

Church, Richard [Thomas] (1893– ). English poet, novelist, and literary critic. His books of poetry include Collected Poems (1948), The Inheritors (1957), and North of Rome (1960). Among his prose works are Over the Bridge (1955) and Calm October (1961).

Church, Thomas. See Benjamin Church.

Churchill, Charles (1731–1764). English poet and clergyman, known for his biting satiric verse. His major works are The Rosciad (1761), an attack on London actors and acting which is often ranked with Pope's Dunciad; The Ghost (1763), an account of the notorious Cock Lane Ghost episode ridiculing Samuel Johnson for his interest in it; The Prophecy of Famine, a Scots Pastoral, a satire voicing English distrust of Scotland; The Dictlist (1764), a poem defending the political position of John Wilkes and attacking all his detractors, particularly Smollett; Gotham (1764), a verse epistle setting forth the "idea of a patriot king" (see Henry Sr. John); and The Candidate (1764), a poetic attack on the conservative political policies of Cambridge University.

Churchill, John. See 1st duke of Marborough.

Churchill, Sarah (1914– ). English actress. The daughter of Sir Winston Churchill, she married Vic Oliver (Viktor Samek) in 1936 (divorced 1945) and Anthony Beauchamp in 1949. She has appeared on the American stage in Gramercy Ghost (1951) and on television.

Churchill, Winston (1871–1947). American novelist. He is noted for his enormously successful historical romances. Although his first novel, The Celebrity (1898), supposedly a satire on Richard Harding Davis, was moderately popular, it was with his second, Richard Carvel, that he established his literary reputation. The Crisis, The Crossing, Conti- ston, and Mr. Crewe's Career (1908), a story about the control of state politics by railroad interests, followed. Churchill was interested in social questions and religion, and his later books reflect these preoccupations. The Inside of the Cup (1913) deals with the relations of religion and modern society. Other books are A Far Country (1915), a story of a modern prodigal son; The Dwelling Place of Light (1917), an account of a New England factory strike; and The Uncharted Way: The Psychology of the Gospel Doctrine (1940).

Churchill, Sir Winston [Leonard Spencer] (1874– ). English statesman and author. A political Conservative, he held many important governmental offices between 1911 and 1955. He is best remembered, however, as Prime Minister during World War II. He became popular both in England and in the U.S. because of his personality and his confidence in the capacity of Britain to survive against odds. He was noted for the eloquence of his speeches and his capacity for making memorable phrases. He has written many books, including a history of World War II, in six volumes, and A History of the English-Speaking Peoples, in four volumes. He was awarded the Nobel Prize for Literature (1953).

Churchyard, Thomas (1520?–1604). English poet and soldier. Churchyard is best remembered for the verse accounts of Cardinal Wolsey and Jane Shore in The Mirror for Magistrates. Shore's Wife is considered his best work. Some of his poems and ballads appeared in broadsheets or in popular Elizabethan miscellanies. His works, primarily autobiographical, appeared as Churchyard's Chips (1579), Churchyard's Choice (1579), Churchyard's Charge (1580); Churchyard's Challenge (1593); etc.

Chūshingura. Japanese ioruri and kabuki play by Takeda Izumo (1691–1756). Known in English as the League of the Loyal Ronin, it concerns the revenge taken by 47 loyal retainers whose master was forced to take his life. After attaining their objective, all 47 likewise commit harakiri. It is based on a historical incident.

Chute, La. See Fall, The.

Chu T'zu. See Elegies of Chu'Tu.

Ciappelletto, Ser. The hero of a tale from Giovanni Boccaccio's The Decameron. He makes a false confession about his wicked life before his death and soon becomes a legendary paragon of virtue, St. Ciap- pelletto.
Cicero, Marcus Tullius

Cibber, Colley (1671–1757). English dramatist, poet, and actor. He is best known for the sentimental comedy The Careless Husband (1704), and such others as Love’s Last Shift (1696), She Would and She Would Not (1702) and The Provoked Husband (1728), an adaptation of Molière’s Tartuffe. He also wrote a famous description of the Restoration and early 18th-century theater, Apology for the Life of Mr. Colley Cibber, Comedian (1740). Cibber was poet laureate for 27 years from 1730, was generally considered one of the worst poets to hold the office, and even admitted that he was granted the post for being a good Whig.

Cicero, Marcus Tullius (106–43 B.C.). Roman orator, statesman, and man of letters. After carefully preparing himself for a career in law, Cicero made his oratorical debut under the dictatorship of Sulla, his first public success occurring in 80 B.C. The next two years he spent in Greece and Rhodes, where he continued his study of philosophy and rhetoric. After his return to Rome, he was elected quaestor (76) and aedile (70). In the year of his aedilship he was asked by the Sicilians to be their attorney against their former governor Verres. Even though his opponent was Hortensius, the most famous orator of the day, Cicero was able to amass such a convincing array of evidence of the dishonesty and cruelty of Verres that the defendant took the first chance to slip into voluntary exile. In 67 Cicero was overwhelmingly elected praetor, and as such came out in favor of the Manilian Law, the proposal that would confer on Pompey complete command in his war with Mithradates. Thus, in his first purely political oration, Cicero registered himself on the side of Pompey and the aristocratic party.

Cicero himself, however, was of equestrian rank; he was a parvenu, or novus homo, whose family had never been distinguished by holding public office. Although he was a member of the aristocratic party, he was looked down upon by many members of his own faction. Nevertheless, in 64 he succeeded in being elected consul of Rome. It was this year of his consulate (63) that marked his greatest success: the almost singlehanded foiling of the conspiracy of Catiline. His four brilliant orations against Catiline (In Catilinam) show that Cicero was not only a master of Roman art of pleading but also a master of the equally Roman art of politics; he emerges as a belaeguered patriot protecting himself from paid assassins, a shrewd chief of state gathering the means to overcome a civil criminal, and a clever propagandist presenting himself to the people as one greater than Romulus, for Romulus merely founded Rome while Cicero was its savior. Catiline and his army were defeated, and the principal conspirators were summarily executed.

Soon afterward, however, Cicero’s influence waned. His enemies became more outspoken. Finally, in 58, Clodius Pulcher had a bill passed which declared that anyone who had executed a Roman citizen without trial should be declared an outlaw. In the face of growing popular indignation, Cicero voluntarily retired to Greece. The sentence of banishment was pronounced in absentia, his properties destroyed or confiscated, and his wife and daughter harassed.

Through the influence of his friends, he was, within a year and a half, recalled from exile and entirely restored to his former rank within the commonwealth, but he found himself obliged to spend the next six years defending these same friends from their political enemies. His orations in defense of Sestius, Plancius, and Milo date from this period. In the 50’s he also found time for study and for writing. He returned to the two great enthusiasms of his youth: philosophy and the art of rhetoric.

Between the years 54–51 he wrote De Re Publica, a six-book work on political philosophy of which about one third is extant. In 55 he wrote his great treatise on oratory, De Oratore. Written in the form of a dialogue, this treatise deals with the proper training for an orator, the style and treatment appropriate to particular themes, and the manner of delivery most apt to sway an audience.

But there was no longer a place for oratory in the Roman world. The senate was dwarfed by the figures of Julius Caesar and Pompey, and these two giants called for war. In 49, after long hesitation, Cicero left Italy and pledged his life and fortune to the cause of Pompey. In the next year, when Caesar crushed Pompey in the battle of Pharsalus, Cicero realized that the cherished traditions of republican Rome were crumbling. Even though the victorious Caesar pardoned him and welcomed him back to Rome, Cicero, shaken and disillusioned, remained aloof from politics. He retired to his villa in the mountains of Tuscany and sought out what he called otium cum dignitate (leisure with dignity). Between the years 47 and 44, he wrote the five books of the Tusculanae Disputationes, on the subject of happiness; his works on theology and augury, De Natura Deorum and De Divinatione; his two dialogues on old age and friendship, De Senectute and De Amicitia; and his handbook on Stoic morality, De Officiis.

In 44, with the death of Caesar, Cicero, then in his 63rd year, saw his chance to re-enter politics and to save Rome from demagoguery and chaos. He hoped to play the role of the elder statesman and to serve as guardian to the young Octavius. Accordingly, he attacked Mark Antony in 14 orations known as Philippics. But Octavius turned against his would-be ally and, joining Antony and Lepidus in the Second Triumvirate, decided Cicero an outlaw. He tried to escape to Greece but was overtaken by a mob of bounty hunters; his head and right hand were presented to his enemy Antony, who had them placed on the rostrum in the Forum, where the orator had first won his glory.

Cicero was not only Rome’s greatest orator; he was perhaps its most articulate philosopher. Through his philosophical treatises, he helped to make Latin a strong, yet surprisingly flexible, vehicle for logical speculation. Through his mastery of Latin prose, he transformed Latin from a blunt utilitarian language—one most fit for merchants, generals, and lawyers—to a rich chromatic language that rivaled Greek in its capacity to convey at the same time the gamut of feelings and the fine distinction of ideas.

Cicero's prose style is rhetorical, in the best sense of the word; it is intended to persuade. It has always been contrasted with the style of Tacitus and Sallust, who both preferred a tight, tersely emphatic prose to the symphonies of sonorities of Cicero. These two stylistic schools continued in conflict into the 16th and 17th centuries when in England the Tacitean style of Francis Bacon was contrasted with the Ciceronian style of Jeremy Taylor. See ATTICS; CICERONIAN AGE.

Ciceronian age. In its intellectual aspects, the last years of republican Rome are often referred to as the Ciceronian age, or the age of Cicero, dating from the emergence of Cicero (80 B.C.) to the empire under Augustus (27 B.C.). The prose—as well as the politics—of the late republic was dominated by Marcus Tullius Cicero. Like Cato the Elder, Cicero was a versatile writer-statesman, but where Cato was representative of the sharp, straightforward, vernacular Latin style, Cicero was the creator and pre-eminent representative of the smooth and rhetorically powerful Hellenized style. A master of oratory, Cicero was also a thoughtful and thorough student of literary criticism, a foremost authority on Stoic philosophy, and a brilliant letter writer. Other prose writers of the period include the historians Julius CAESAR and SALLUST, both of whom set a high standard of excellence for all subsequent Roman historians, and Terentius VARRO, reputedly the most learned and productive scholar of his time.

Although the Ciceronian age is conspicuously an age of prose, it also embraces Lucretius and Catullus, two of the most significant poets in Latin literature. Lucretius wielded the dactylic hexameter of Ennius in his long and passionate poem on Epicurean science, De Rerum Natura. Catullus was the first truly successful writer of Latin lyric poems. These lie modeled on the literary forms of the Alexandrine school of Hellenistic Greek literature.

With the murder of Cicero (43), the last great voice of Roman republicanism was stilled. The transition to the imperial period had begun and its dominant figure was to be the young Octavius Caesar, later Augustus. In his struggle with Mark Antony, from the death of Julius Caesar (44) to its culmination at Actium (31), Rome leaves behind her old republican ideals to become an empire, and the Ciceronian age gives way to the Augustan age.

Cid, Le (The Cid, 1637). A tragedy by Pierre CORNEILLE. One of Corneille's most powerful tragedies, Le Cid is considered by many critics to mark the beginning of modern French drama. The playwright borrowed from Guillem de Castro's treatment of the subject, but compressed the material into a swiftly moving play.

Cid, Poema del or Cantar de mio. An epic poem in Spanish, written about 1140 by an unknown Castilian bard. The poem has survived only in a single manuscript copy from which several pages are missing, made in 1307 by one Per Abbat. It was first published in 1779 by Tomás Antonio Sánchez.

The poem is based on the exploits of Rodrigo or Ruy Diaz de Bivar (c. 1043-1089), who was known as El Cid (from Arabic Sidi, "lord"). Born near Burgos, he was named chief marshal, or alférez, of the royal army by Sancho II of Castile and later served under Sancho's brother and successor, Alfonso VI, who banished him because of personal differences. The Cid fought both for and against the Moorish rulers who at that time controlled much of the Iberian peninsula. A highlight of his career was his conquest of Valencia (1094), which halted Almoravid expansion in Spain. In 1074 he married Doña Jimena Díaz, a niece of Alfonso. He was also known as El Campeador ("the Champion"). Consisting of 3735 lines, the poem is divided into three parts, or cantares. The first deals with the Cid's exile and concludes with his defeat of the count of Barcelona. A famous episode describes his entry into Burgos, where no one will speak to him until a little girl explains that King Alfonso has warned the people to refuse him lodging. In the second part, the Cid captures Valencia, is reconciled with the king, and marries his two daughters, Doña Elvira and Doña Sol, to two nobles, the infantes, or heirs, of Carrión. The third part recounts the outrageous conduct of Rodrigo's sons-in-law, who beat and abandon their wives. The Cid avenges himself by defeating them in a trial by combat and then arranges the marriage of his daughters to the princes of Navarre and Aragon.

Similar in form to the Chanson de Roland, the poem is notable for its simplicity and directness and for its exact, picturesque detail. Despite the inclusion of much legendary material, the figure of the Cid, who is depicted as the model Castillian warrior, is no longer idealized to an extravagant degree.

The Cid appeared in many other medieval poems, among them the epic Cantar de Rodrigo, which was written about 1400 and is based almost entirely on legend. Later authors also made use of this theme, notably Juan de la Cueva, Lope de Vega, Guílén de Castro, and Juan Eugenio Hartzenbuch. Castro's Mocedades del Cid was the direct source of Corneille's Le Cid. Present knowledge about the historical character and the Poema de mio Cid is derived largely from the exhaustive investigations of Ramón Menéndez Pidal, who published a three-volume critical edition (1908-1911).

Cimabue, Giovanni. Real name, Cenni di Pepo (c. 1240-c. 1302). Florentine painter. Tradition celebrates him as "the father of Italian painting" and the teacher of Giotto. He was himself taught by Byzantine artists, so that several iconlike Madonnas and Crucifixions have been attributed to him, but there are no extant works that can be positively established as his. His renown among his contemporaries is attested to by Dante, who describes him in the Purgatorio, as having "held the field" until surpassed by Giotto.

Cimber, Metellus. In Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, a conspirator against Caesar. After he unsuccessfully appeals to Caesar to revoke an edict banishing his brother from Rome, he and the other conspirators fall on Caesar and stab him to death.
Cimetièr marin, Le (The Graveyard by the Sea, 1920). A poem by Paul Valéry. Written in decasyllabic six-line stanzas, it describes the dazzling noon of the Mediterranean coast, where Valéry spent his boyhood. The narrator ironically contrasts the attractive clarity of timeless intellectuality with the inevitable decay of all that lives in reality. He concludes, however, that for a mortal being, "It is necessary to try to live."

Cimmerians (Kimmerioi). A legendary tribe. Homer placed them beyond Oceanus, in a land of never-ending gloom. Immediately beyond was Hades. Pliny placed Cimmeria near the Lake Avernus, in Italy, where "the sun never penetrates." The phrase "Cimmerian darkness" signifies intense darkness.

Historically, the name Cimmerians is given to a nomad tribe from the Crimean region who, under pressure from the Sarmatians and Scythians, overran Asia Minor in 635 B.C.

Cimosco. In the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, the King of the Frisians. His son Arbante is supposed to wed the unwilling Olimpia. When the latter causes the death of Arbante, Cimosco plans to take revenge on her lover, Bireno. But while in captivity, Bireno falls in love with Cimosco's daughter and deserts Olimpia for her.

Cincinnatus, Lucius Quinctius. An early Roman hero. According to tradition, he was appointed dictator in 458 B.C. and sent to rescue a Roman army besieged by the Aequians on Mount Algidus. Cincinnatus routed the Aequians and, after a dictatorship of 16 days, renounced public life and returned to his farms.

Cinderella. The heroine of an ancient fairy tale. Her name (Fr., Cendrillon; Ger., Aschenbrödel) means literally the little cinder girl. The story, probably of Eastern origin, was mentioned in 16th century German literature and was popularized in Perrault's Contes de ma mère l'oye (1697). Cinderella is the drudge of a household while her elder sisters go to balls. At length, a fairy godmother enables Cinderella to go to the Prince's ball. The Prince, of course, falls in love with her, and she is later rediscovered by him in a glass slipper that she has dropped, and that will fit no foot but her own. The details of the complete story, not found in most children's books, are somewhat gruesome. Rossini's delightful opera La Cenerentola (1817) is based on a considerably modified version of the story.

Cinna. In Shakespeare's Julius Caesar, a young poet. After Caesar's murder, he is mistaken for Cinna the conspirator by the irate Roman citizens.

Cinna (1640). A tragedy by Pierre Corneille. It is based on an episode in Roman history recounted in Seneca's De Clemencia. Though trusted by the emperor Augustus, Cinna leads a conspiracy to overthrow him, encouraged by his beloved Amélie who desires to avenge the death of her father. Maxime, a fellow conspirator also in love with Amélie, betrays the plot, hoping to cause Cinna's arrest. The last act focuses on Augustus' struggle to choose between mercy and revenge. Ultimately, he pardons the lovers as well as the treacherous Maxime. The play reflects Corneille's interest in political subjects.

cinq auteurs (Fr., "five authors"). The French playwrights BOISROBERT, COLLETET, CORNELLE, L'ESTOILE, and ROTrou, who were hired by Cardinal Richelieu to write plays under his supervision conforming to his strong views on the drama. A man with literary ambitions of his own, Richelieu occasionally chose the subject matter with which his authors were to deal, but more frequently merely dictated the treatment. Few of the plays he commissioned are remembered, though several were performed for the king.

cinquain. In prosody, a quintet or five-line stanza. The term is also used to designate the five-line poem of two, four, six, eight, and two syllables respectively; this form was invented by Adelaide Crapsey who was greatly influenced by the Japanese haiku and tanka.

Just now,
Out of the strange
Still dusky—as strange, as still—
A white moth flew. Why am I grown
So cold?

Adelaide Crapsey, The Warning

cinquecento (It., the five hundreds). Italian designation of the 16th century. This is the age of the high Renaissance—of Ariosto and Castiglione, Machiavelli and Artino. In art history, the age of Raphael, Leonardo da Vinci and Michaelangelo, and of the advent of Mannerism and the proto-Baroque.

Cipolla, Brother. A friar in one of the tales from Giovanni Boccaccio's The Decameron. He specializes in duping villagers with fake relics. Planning to display a feather from the wings of the archangel Gabriel, he discovers that some coals have been substituted for it, quickly, he recovers his poise and announces that they are from the brazier on which Saint Lawrence met his death.

Circe (Kirke). A sorceress of Greek mythology. She lived in the island of Aeaea. When Odysseus landed there, Circe turned his companions into swine, but he resisted this metamorphosis by virtue of a herb called moly, given him by Hermes. Circe was Aetes' sister and the aunt of Medea. She purified Jason and Medea for the murder of Abyrtus and gave them advice on their homeward journey.

Circle of Chalk, The. A Chinese classical play of the Yuan dynasty (1259–1368), sometimes attributed to Li Hsing-Tao. The lovely Chang-hi-tang is sold to a teashop by her destitute family and is bought by Mr. Ma, the tax collector, to whom she bears a son. Jealous for her position as head wife and heir, Mrs. Ma poisons her husband's tea and bribes witnesses to prove that Chang-hi-tang has murdered him and that the concubine's child is really her own. The new emperor, who has ordered all cases involving the death penalty retried before him, listens to the evidence; he then places the child in a chalk circle and directs Mrs. Ma and Chang-hi-tang each to take hold of one of the baby's arms and, thus, gain the child by pulling him out of the circle. When Mrs. Ma wins this contest, for Chang-hi-tang is unwilling to hurt the child by pulling at all, the emperor decides that the concubine is the rightful mother and Mrs. Ma the murderer, and he leaves it to Chang-hi-tang to pronounce justice. She orders Mrs. Ma to make herself a cup of tea and to let her conscience decide what sort of tea it ought to be. In later adaptations additional symbolic chalk circles and a love affair between the emperor and Chang-hi-tang were added. Bertolt Brecht used the play as the basis of his Caucasian Chalk Circle, in which the stagecraft is purportedly modeled on the classical Chinese convention and moralistic and socio-economic didacticisms replace the sublety and beautifully lyric verse that distinguish the original.

A very similar story is told in the Bible of a wise judgment of Solomon.

circumloaction (literally, talking around). A deliberately roundabout and wordy way of saying something. Frequently it represents an evasion of a plain but perhaps unpalatable truth.

Circumlocution Office. A term applied in ridicule by Charles Dickens in Little Dorrit to public offices in England, because each person tries to shuffle off every task onto someone else. Hence, routine formality and the red tape of bureaucracy.

Ciriaco [Pizzicolli] D’Ancona (1391-1455). Italian archaologist and scholar. One of the genuine enthusiasts for antiquity in the Italian Renaissance, he roamed widely in search of inscriptions, monuments, and ruins. He is reported to have said of his journeys, “I go to awake the dead!”

Cithaeron (Kithairon). A mountain range between Attica and Boeotia. Near to both Thebes and Athens, it was the scene of many events of Greek mythology. Perhaps most notable of these was the death of Pentheus at the hands of his mother Agave and her Bacchantes, and the exposing of both the infant Oedipus and the twins Amphion and Zethus.

Cities of the Plain. See Remembrance of Things Past.

Citizen of the World, The (1762). An epistolary novel by Oliver Goldsmith. In almost colloquial prose, it is supposedly written by a Chinese philosopher, Lien Chi Atyang, who visits England and reports on it to his friends in the East. The letters were published with the subtitle Letters from a Chinese Philosopher Residing in London to his Friends in the East. In these “Chinese Letters,” Goldsmith is typical of his day in his praise of simplicity. Here the main catchword is Nature’s “simple plan.” The philosopher’s observations are supplemented by those of his friend, the Man in Black, by Beau Tibbs, and by Lady Betty Tempest. The letters are linked by a subplot, in which the philosopher’s son rescues the Man in Black’s daughter from captivity in Persia, brings her to England, and marries her. The novel first appeared as a series of essays in Newbury’s Public Ledger (1760-1761) under the title, The Chinese Letters. This device of the Oriental traveler was perfected in Montesquieu’s Letters Persanes (1721).

City, The (La Ville; 1890). A poetic drama, revised in 1897, by Paul Claudel. It presents in allegorical form the building, the destruction, and the salvation of the City of Men.

City in the Sea, The (1831). A poem by Edgar Allan Poe. The poet evokes a grim landscape in melodic lines. His description of the shrine includes the well-known lines:

Whose wreathed friezes intertwine
The viol, the violet and the vine.

City of Destruction. In Bunyan’s Pilgrim’s Progress, the world of the unconverted. Bunyan makes Christian flee from it and journey to the Celestial City, thereby showing the “walk of a Christian” from conversion to death.

City of Dreadful Night, The (1874). A long poem by the Victorian poet James Thomson, published in The City of Dreadful Night, And Other Poems. It describes an imaginary city of misery and horror created out of the author’s own sense of despair as, afflicted with insomnia, he walked at night through the streets of London.

City of God, The (De Civitate Dei; 22 vols., 413-426). A long treatise by St. Augustine. It is an apology for Christianity against the accusation that the Church was responsible for the decline of the Roman Empire. It interprets human history as a conflict between the City of God (Civitas Dei), which includes the body of Christians belonging to the Church, and the Earthly City (Civitas Terrae), composed of pagans and heretical Christians. Augustine foresees that through the will of God the people of the City of God will eventually win immortality, those in the Earthly City destruction.

city of refuge. A sacred area. Moses, at the command of God, set apart three cities on the east of Jordan, and Joshua added three others on the west, whither any person might flee for refuge who had killed a human creature inadvertently. The three on the east of Jordan were Bezer, Ramoth, and Golan; the three on the west were Hebron, Shechem, and Kedesh (Deut. 4:43; Josh. 20:1-8).

Medina, in Arabia, where Muhammad took refuge when driven by conspirators from Mecca, is known as the city of refuge. He received a warm welcome when he entered Medina in A.D. 622.

Civil Disobedience (1849). An essay by Henry David Thoreau. Its major premise is “that government is best which governs least.” Thoreau asserts that a man’s first loyalty is to his own nature; true to himself, he may then be true to a government. The essay influenced Gandhi’s doctrine of passive resistance.

Civil War, American. See American Civil War.

Civil War, English, or Great Rebellion. A civil war brought on by conflict between Charles I and the Long Parliament over economic, political, and religious issues. The war had two phases. The first (1642-1646) was fought between the Royalist party, which included most of the nobles and gentry and adherents of the Church of England, and the Parliamentary party, which was supported by Presbyterians and other dissenters and the middle classes in general. In 1643 the Scottish Covenanters joined the Parliamentary cause. After initial Royalist successes, this phase ended with Parliamentary victories at Marston Moor and Naseby.

The second phase, which lasted from about 1648 to 1652, followed the acquisition of power by the Parliamentary army and more radical dissenters, or Independents, led by Oliver Cromwell. The struggle was now between this group and the king, who was executed in 1649, conservative members of Parliament, Irish Royalists, and the Scots, now allied with Charles II. In the Preston campaign (1648), the Irish War (1649-1650), and the battles of Dunbar (1650) and Worcester (1651), Cromwell emerged victorious. See Grand Remonstrance; John Hampden; New Model Army; Pride’s Purge; and John Pym.
Clair, René (1898- ). French film director and producer. From his first effort in 1923, Paris qui dort, René Clair revealed a unique sense of the absurd, especially as embodied in the French bourgeois. His talent culminated during the silent era in the Italian Straw Hat (1927), a witty film version of Eugène Labiche’s famous 19th-century farce of the same name. With the introduction of sound, Clair began new experimentation. His famous trilogy, Sous les toits de Paris (1929), Le Million (1931), and A nous la liberté (1931), is characterized by an ingenious mingling of music and dialogue with silent film techniques. In 1934 he went to work for the British and American film industry, later returning to France.

Clairmont, Clara Mary Jane. Known as Claire (1798-1879). Stepdaughter of William Godwin and mother of Lord Byron’s daughter Allegra. She was a friend of the Shelleys.

Clan-na-Gael. An Irish secret organization. It was founded in Philadelphia in 1881, and was successor to the Fenian brotherhood (1856). Its avowed object was to secure “the complete and absolute independence of Ireland from Great Britain, and the complete severance of all political connection between the two countries, to be effected by unceasing preparation for armed insurrection in Ireland.” See Fenians.

Clare, Ada. See Eliak House.

Clare, Angel. See Tess of the D’Urbervilles.

Clare, John (1793-1864). English poet. Clare was born into a barely literate, impoverished Northamptonshire peasant family, had little formal education, and long supported himself as a farm laborer. After the appearance of his first book (Poems Descriptive of Rural Life and Scenery, 1820), he became famous as a peasant poet, the curiosity of one London Season. Thereafter, however, he was plagued by ill-health, neglect, poverty, and finally, madness. In 1837 he was committed to a mental asylum and died in confinement. Much of Clare’s voluminous verse lacks distinction, but his best poems possess a startling originality and directness of vision, ranking high among English nature poetry. Aside from his first volume, his works include The Village Minstrel (1821); The Shepherd’s Calendar (1827); and The Rural Muse (1837). The recent edition of Selected Poems of John Clare (1950) by Geoffrey Grigson includes many poems written in madness.

Clarel: A Poem and a Pilgrimage in the Holy Land (1876). A long poem by Herman Melville. Clarel, a young theological student, oscillates between faith and doubt. In love with Ruth, a Jewish girl, he leaves her to join a group of pilgrims traveling from Jerusalem to Gethsemane, the Dead Sea, and Bethlehem. The pilgrims, conversing with Clarel, represent almost every persuasion. They are: Nehemiah, a sly old man who knows the time of the Second Coming; Vine, a self-revealing poet who is part of Melville’s friend, Nathaniel Hawthorne; Derwent, an Emersonian optimist; Mortmain and Ungar, cynical pessimists; Margoth, a materialist; a Dominican friar, and many others. When Clarel returns, he finds that Ruth has died; he is left alone to face reality, the possessor of new wisdom. Melville asks if civilization can survive, after science has caused a loss of faith. His poem, though technically weak, has considerable intellectual strength.

Clarence, 3rd duke of. George (1449-1478). English noble, son of Richard Plantagenet, duke of York. He originally took up arms against his brothers Edward (IV) and Richard (III), but was later reconciled with them. Convinced that Clarence was plotting against him, Edward had him imprisoned, and it is said that he was drowned in a butt of malmsey wine. In Shakespeare’s Richard III, he is depicted as the victim of Richard’s machinations and is arrested when Richard revives an old prophecy that “G of Edward’s heirs the murderer shall be.” He also appears in Shakespeare’s Henry VI: Part III.

Clarendon, 1st earl of. Edward Hyde (1609-1674). English historian and statesman. An influential adviser to Charles I and lord chancellor under Charles II, he was falsely accused of treason and banished in 1667. In France he wrote his Life (1759) and completed his chief work, The History of the Rebellion and Civil Wars in England (1702-1704). The History is best known for Clarendon’s perceptive and tolerant character sketches of the leading personages of the time. His daughter Anne married the duke of York, later James II, and bore two daughters who became Queen Mary and Queen Anne.

Clarendon Press. A printing establishment connected with Oxford University, England. It was founded partly with the profits from the 1st earl of Clarendon, Edward Hyde’s History of the Rebellion.

Clares. Poor. See Poor Clares.

Claretie, Jules (1840-1913). French journalist and writer. Claretie served as director of the Confédération Française in 1885. His 20-volume work La Vie à Paris (1881-1911) is a piece of facile, clever writing.

Clarissa Harlowe (1747-1748). An epistolary novel by Samuel Richardson, generally considered to be his masterpiece. Its original title is Clarissa, or, The History of a Young Lady. It is the longest novel in the English language, totaling about one million words. It is noted for its subtle and penetrating psychological treatment of character. Clarissa has been coldly commanded by her tyrannical family to marry Mr. Solmes, a man she despises. She refuses, even though it pains her to defy her parents. Locked in her room, isolated from family and friends, Clarissa corresponds secretly with Robert Lovelace, a suitor disapproved of by her family; she finally throws herself upon his protection and flees with him. It soon becomes clear to her, however, that Lovelace’s sole aim is to seduce her. Her virtue is so great that Lovelace becomes obsessively absorbed in breaking it down; convinced finally that she will never yield to him, he becomes desperate, drugs and rapes her. He then proposes marriage, but Clarissa refuses, retires to a solitary dwelling, and dies of grief and shame. Lovelace, whose heart the reader never really knows, is killed in a duel with Colonel Morden, Clarissa’s cousin. Rousseau was greatly influenced by Clarissa Harlowe in his novel, Julie, ou La Nouvelle Héloïse. See John Morden; Anna Howe; Clarisse. See Anne Lenclos.

Clark, George Rogers (1792-1818). American Revolutionary frontier leader. His victories over the British at Kaskaskia and Vincennes (1778-1779) assured American control of the Old Northwest.

Clark, Walter van Tilburg (1909- ). American novelist and short-story writer. Although he was born in Maine, Clark lived most of his life in the Far West, and it is with this region that his talents are almost entirely identified. He is best known for The Ox-Bow Incident (1940), his forceful first novel that tells of the lynching of three supposed cattle rustlers just as word arrives that they are innocent. He is also the author of two other novels: City of Trembling Leaves (1945) and The Track of the Cat (1949). The Watchful Gods (1950) is a collection of short stories.

Classical. (1) Usually, a term referring to the classics, or to the period of greatest power among the Greeks and Romans, especially their culture.

(2) In literature and art in general, a term used to express, with reference to a single work as well as to an entire age, dominance of form over content; technical precision over emotional expressiveness; clarity, restraint, and rationality over ambiguity, extravagance, and free play of the imagination. It is opposed to Romanticism. See Neoclassicism.

(3) In music, the term is applied to work that accepts certain basic conventions of form and structure as the natural framework for the expression of ideas, as distinguished from music that is more concerned with the expression of individual emotions than with the achievement of formal unity. The term is usually restricted to music from 1750 to 1830, the period marked by the rise of the symphony and the composers Haydn and Mozart. Beethoven stands as a transitional figure to the Romantic era. The term is also used commonly to denote all serious or art music, as distinguished from all popular and folk music.

Classics. The Romans were divided by Servius into five classes. Any citizen who belonged to the highest class was called classicus; the rest were said to be infra classem, that is, beneath the class. Accordingly, authors of the best or first class were termed classici auctores (classic authors). The term has come to describe any work or body of works of the first or highest order; thus we have English classics, French classics, and so on.

Claudel, Paul [Louis Charles Marie] (1868-1955). French dramatist, poet, and diplomat. After spending his boyhood in a small village, Claudel came with his family to Paris. He believed he had lost the conventional Catholic faith of his parents, but at 18 he discovered in the prose poems of Arthur Rimbaud's Les Illuminations and Une Saison en Enfer the revelation of the supernatural; that Christmas Eve during a service at Notre Dame Cathedral he suddenly felt himself permanently converted to fervent faith. He spent four years discovering the literature which was to influence him most, including the Bible, Aeschylus, Vergil, and Dante, and attending Mallarmé's salons.

In 1890 he published Tête d'Or and wrote The City, both showing much symbolist influence. In 1893 he began his career as a foreign diplomat and came as a consul to Boston and New York; he wrote The Exchange (L'Échange; 1893), a play set on the east coast of the United States, and translated the Agamemnon of Aeschylus into French. In 1895 he went to China, which he describes in the prose poems of The East I Know (Connaissance de l'Est; 1900). Thereafter he traveled widely, serving in the Far East, Germany, Italy, Brazil, and again in the U.S. until 1935, after which he lived in retirement, primarily at a country home in France. L'Arbre (1901), a collection of all his plays to that date, includes La Jeune fille Violaine, which Claudel later adapted as the well-known The Tidings Brought to Mary. He published Break of Noon in 1906, and The Hostage in 1909, soon followed by the last two plays of the Coëftante trilogy. In 1916 he completed the translation of the last two plays of Aeschylus' Oresteia trilogy. Between 1919 and 1924 he wrote the long play The Satin Slipper, greatly influenced by the Nō theater of Japan (he went to Tokyo as ambassador in 1921). Among his later works the best known are the dramatic oratorios The Book of Christopher Columbus (Le Lièvre de Christophe Colomb; 1927), with music by Darius Milhaud, and Jeanne d'Arc au Bûcher, with music by Arthur Honegger.

Claudel's plays, as well as his lyric poems, are written in poetic "versets" of irregular length, often of several lines, without rhyme or conventional meter; the dynamic, vigorous rhythm often resembles that of biblical verse. His inspiration is primarily religious, but he writes as passionately and eloquently of the physical world as of the spiritual; for him all things are manifestations of God, fulfilling His designs and redounding to His glory. The plays describe the conflict in men between their earthly desires and needs—to plow and reap, to explore and conquer, to delight in sensual pleasures, to love one another—and their eventual spiritual destination. The harmony of the physical cosmos, which he presents with sweeping magnificence, represents for Claudel the grandeur of God; similarly, the energy men bring to their human passions becomes the medium through which they can come to an intimation of divine love; and the greater the capacity of a character's soul for intense passion of any kind, the greater the value and the joy of its final mystic surrender to God.

Shorter lyrical poems include Cinq Grandes Odes (1910), Corona benigneatis anni Dei (1914), and Ode jubilare (1921), about Dante. His prose includes discussions of his own poetic form and of poetry in general, religious meditations as in A Poet Before the Cross (Un Poète regarde la Croix; 1932), and much biblical commentary.

Claudine. Heroine of four semi-autobiographical novels by Colette: Claudine at School (Claudine a l'école; 1900), Claudine in Paris (Claudine à Paris; 1901), Claudine Married (Claudine en ménage; 1902), and The Innocent Wife (Claudine s'en va; 1903).

Claudio. The brother of the virtuous Isabella in Shakespeare's Measure for Measure. He is the pivotal character in the play, embodying humanity's weakness and standing between the strict purity of Isabella and the cruel austerity of Angelo.
Claudius. In Shakespeare's Much Ado About Nothing, a handsome young Florentine lord, who has served with distinction in the army of Don Pedro. He falls in love at first sight with Hero.

Claudius I. Full Latin name, Tiberius Claudius Drusus Nero Germanicus (10 B.C.-A.D. 54). Roman emperor (A.D. 41-54). He was excluded from public affairs by Caligula, his predecessor and nephew. When Caligula was murdered in A.D. 41, Claudius was proclaimed emperor by the praetorian guard. He was persuaded by Agrippina, his second wife, to set aside his own son Britannicus and adopt her son by a former marriage, Lucius Domitius (later Nero), as his successor. When Claudius, too late, repented this move, he was poisoned by Agrippina. Claudius was noted for his writing, but none of his work is extant. He is the principal character in two historical novels, I, Claudius (1934) and Claudius the God (1934), by Robert Graves.

Claudius. In Shakespeare's Hamlet, the uncle of Hamlet. He has poisoned his brother, the king of Denmark, married his widow, and ascended the throne before the play opens. Shakespeare depicts him as a sensual though able ruler whose lust for power fails to be tempered by the gnawing of his conscience.

Claudius, Matthias (1740-1815). German poet, known for his simple, sincere Christianity and his love for the common people and nature. His works include Tändeleien und Erzählungen (Triflings and Stories, 1763) and a periodical that he edited, Der Wandsbecker Botte (The Wandsbeck Messenger, 1771-1775).

Claudius the God (1934). A novel by Robert Graves. A sequel to I, Claudius, it is an unusual historical and psychological novel, written in the form of the autobiography of the Emperor Claudius. It does not present the traditional view of Claudius as a despicable weakling.

Claus, Peter. See Klaus, Peter.

Claus, Santa. See Santa Claus.

Claussen, Sophus (1865-1931). Danish poet and essayist. Influenced by the French symbolist movement, and particularly by the work of Baudelaire, Claussen was Denmark's leading symbolist poet. His poetry, woven of esoteric imagery and intricate paradox, expresses a sensuous joy in life. In a romantic manner he worshiped the creative vitality of nature, likening it to the vigorous creativity of the poet figure. Among his collections are Naturbyen (1887), Røken Regnvej (1894), Pilefjætter (1899), Danishevers (1912), Heroica (1925), and Hvededynger (1930).

Claveret, Jean (1590-1666). French playwright and author. In Traité du poème dramatique, Claveret challenged the classical rule restricting the action of a drama to a 24-hour period. His play L'Esprit fou (1630), which ridicules a man who pretends to be of strong character and independent judgement but who is actually a moral coward, is notable as the first French comedy of manners.

Clavers, Mrs. Mary. See Caroline Kirkland.

Clavelinho. In Cervantes' Don Quixote, the wooden horse in which the knight and his squire make a fantastic journey through the air. It is governed by a wooden pin in its forehead. The horse is a well-known figure in European and Near Eastern folklore.

Clay. A short story in James Joyce's Dubliners (1914). It is about a very ordinary, ineffectual, pitiful spinster called Maria who goes to the family party of a man to whom she was nurse when he was a child. The story, which has little action, is largely a character study of Maria. During a blindfold party game the children play a trick on her, making her put her fingers in a dish of wet clay. The clay is a symbol of her character; she herself is a symbol of Ireland.

Clay, Henry (1777-1852). American statesman, often called "The Great Pacifier." As a member of Congress from Kentucky, he was Speaker of the House (1811-1820, 1823-1825) and a leader of the "war hawks" who urged war with Great Britain before 1812. After running unsuccessfully for the presidency in 1824, he was named secretary of state by John Quincy Adams. He later served in the U.S. Senate (1831-1842, 1849-1852), where he espoused an "American System" of internal improvements and protective tariffs to strengthen the national economy. In 1832 and 1844 he was the unsuccessful Whig candidate for president; he is credited with saying, "I would rather be right than be President." Devoted to the preservation of the Union, he was largely responsible for the enactment of the Compromise of 1850. See John Randolph.

Clayhanger. The first novel in a series by Arnold Bennett. Under the domination of his unimaginative puritanical father, Edwin Clayhanger is forced to give up his ambition to become an architect and enters the family printing business. He falls in love with Hilda Lessways, but his father will not give him enough money to marry, and he learns that Hilda is already married. Hilda's husband, George Cannon, is found to be a bigamist, old Clayhanger dies, and Edwin and Hilda are married. The novel has notable descriptions of Five Towns life, the conflict between father and son, and the son's own inner conflicts. In Hilda Lessways (1911) the same events are narrated from Hilda's point of view; These Twain (1916) is a study of the couple in married life; and The Roll Call (1918) is about Hilda's son, George.

Clea. See Alexandria Quartet, The.

Cléante. The name given by Molière to 3 of his characters. (1) In Le Malade Imaginaire, the lover of Angélique, the daughter of Argan. (2) In L'Illustre, the son of Harpagon. (3) In Le Tartuffe, the brother-in-law of Orgon.

Cleisthenes (Kleisthenes; fl. 507 B.C.). Athenian statesman, considered the second founder of the democracy. Cleisthenes saw that the divisiveness of the clans would forever keep Solon's government from working well. Cleisthenes' organization aimed to do away with local political influence. Taking the natural divisions of the demos as the basis for the Athenian state, he divided the country into three regions: the city, the coast, and the inland area. Each of the regions was divided into ten tritises, a total of 30. From the 30 tritises, Cleisthenes formed ten groups of three, so that none of the ten groups had two tritises from the same region. Each group, though it was based on artificial geography, was known as a tribe. Local political action was ended, and all citizens worked for the general good. Cleis-thene replaced Solon's Council of 400 (based on the four clans) with a Council of 500, fifty from each tribe. The operation of the Council shows that the Athenians understood representative government Cleisthenes is also supposed to have initiated the practice of ostracism.

Clelia. See Cleodia.

Clelie, Histoire Romaine (1654–1660). A novel in 10 volumes by Madeleine de Scudéry. Derived and enormously elaborated from the Roman legend of Clelia, the novel recounts the tribulations endured by Clélie as hostage of Sextus Tarquinius and climaxes with her swimming of the Tiber and her long-sought reunion with her lover Aronce. Rich in digressions, the novel includes the carte de tendre, an imaginative map of the amorous sentiments, drawn up by Madeleine de Scudéry with the aid of her salon.

Clemenceau, Georges (1841–1929). French statesman. During the Civil War Clemenceau served as a correspondent with Grant's army. He was an ardent supporter of Dreyfus and agitated for a new verdict in the case. Serving first as a senator (1902–1920), then as Minister of the Interior (1906), Clemenceau became premier of the Third Republic (1906–1909). Premier again in 1917, he led France to victory in World War I and headed the French delegation to the Peace Conference at Versailles.

Clemens, Samuel Langhorne. See Mark Twain.

Clement VII, Pope. See Medici.

Clementina della Porretta, The Lady. In Samuel Richardson's novel Sir Charles Grandison, a devout young Catholic deeply in love with Sir Charles.

Cléofas Pérez Zambullo, Don. The high-spirited hero of two picaresque novels: Le Diable boiteux (1707) by Alain René Lesage; the other (on which Lesage modelled his novel), El Diab*o cojuelo (1641) by Louis Vélez de Guevara. In both books Don Cléofas uncorks the little devil Asmodeus from a bottle, and as a reward, the latter shows him the vices of Madrid.

Cleon or Kleon (d. 422). Athenian demagogue and leader of the war party during the Peloponnesian War. He is chiefly remembered today as one of the favorite butts of Aristophanes, particularly in his comedy The Knights.

Cléonte. In Molière's Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme, the suitor for the hand of M. Jourdain's daughter. Since he is a commoner and M. Jourdain will have none but a nobleman for son-in-law, Cléonte is forced to disguise himself as the son of the Grand Turk in order to win her hand.

Cleopatra. In the chronology of Egyptian queens, Cleopatra VII (69–30 B.C.). Last Macedonian queen of Egypt. From 51 to 49 B.C. she was joint ruler with and wife of her brother Ptolemy XIII, in accordance with Egyptian tradition. She was driven from the throne by her brother, but reinstated by Julius Caesar in 48; this gave rise to a war between Caesar and Ptolemy XIII in which the latter was killed, and his younger brother Ptolemy XIV ascended the throne and married Cleopatra. Cleopatra lived with Caesar in Rome from 46 to 44 and had by him a son, Ptolemy XV, who was later put to death in

The carte de tendre from an English edition of Clelie. In the form of a map, it outlines the course of love.
by Augustus. Returning to Egypt after Caesar’s assassination, Cleopatra gave her support to the Second Triumvirate of Antony, Octavius (later Augustus), and Lepidus against the republicans Brutus and Cassius. Mark Antony, who had been appointed to rule over Asia and the East, succumbed completely to her charms and abandoned his wife Octavia to live with Cleopatra. They had three children. After the defeat of Antony and Cleopatra at Actium, Antony killed himself on hearing a false report of her death; some say she spread the report herself to gain favor with Octavius by causing Antony’s death. When she heard that Octavius planned to exhibit her triumphantly in Rome, she committed suicide by applying a poison asp to her bosom. Famed for her extraordinary charm and beauty, she was also highly culvated.

The capricious and imperious queen is one of the most complex and fully developed of Shakespeare’s female characters. In his Antony and Cleopatra, she is a wildly erratic, jealous, and avaricious woman, but withal sincerely in love with Antony. The famous speech of Enobarbus aptly describes her:

> Age cannot wither her, nor custom stale
> Her infinite variety; other women dloy
> The appetites they feed, but she makes hungry
> Where most she satisfies; for vilest things
> Become themselves in her, that the holy priests
> Bless her when she is riggish.

She also appears in Dryden’s All for Love or The World Well Lost and Shaw’s Caesar and Cleopatra.

Cleopatra’s Needle. Either of two obelisks in Central Park in New York City, the other on the Thames Embankment in London. They were erected by Thothmes III, a pharaoh of the 18th dynasty, in Heliopolis. Augustus had them removed to Alexandria about 9 B.C. They antedated Cleopatra by many centuries.

clerihew. A form of verse invented by Edmund Clerihew Bentley. It consists of two couplets that humorously characterize a person whose name is one of the rhymes.

Clerk’s Tale, The. One of the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer, written in rhymed royal and based on a Latin adaptation by Petrarch of the 100th tale in Boccaccio’s Decameron (see Griselda). The people of Saluzzo urge their Marquis Walter to marry and provide a successor. He chooses Griselda, the virtuous, lovely, and hard-working daughter of the poorest man in town. She promises that she will always willingly obey him, proves well gifted for helping him rule, and is much beloved by the people, but he insists on trying her steadfast devotion to the extreme. He takes both of their children away from her shortly after birth, telling her that he must kill them because the people feel that his heirs must not share her lowly ancestry. Finally he divorces her, sending her home, then recalling her to supervise the preparation of the palace and the reception of a new bride. She does everything willingly, until finally Walter reveals that the supposed bride and her brother are Griselda’s own children, secretly raised by Walter’s sister, and all live in affectionate happe-Clitandre. The impostor-hero of Molière’s comédie-ballet L’Amour Médecin. Also, a tragicomedy by Pierre Corneille (1632).

Clitus. In Shakespeare’s Julius Caesar, a servant of Brutus. When Brutus asks Clitus to kill him, he refuses, saying that he would rather kill himself.
Clive, Robert. Baron Clive of Plassey (1725–1774). Founder of the empire of British India and governor of Bengal (1764), who obtained for the East India Company sovereignty over the whole province. On his return to England in 1767, he met a storm of obloquy and inquiries into his actions, and although he was acquitted, he later committed suicide.

Clodius Pulcher, Publius (d. 52 B.C.). Roman patrician and tribune. He was known as a profligate and as a bitter enemy of Cicero. Cicero had disproved Clodius' alibi when the latter was accused of profaning the rites of the Boxa Dea by attending them in disguise, and, though through bribery Clodius was acquitted, he hated Cicero and harassed him from then on. It was Clodius who passed a bill exiling anyone who put a Roman to death without right of appeal—a measure directed against Cicero who had members of the Cataline conspiracy executed—and thus sent Cicero into exile (58). Clodius was the brother of the notorious Clodia, the "Lesbia" of Catullus' poetry.

Cloelia or Clelia. In the legendary history of Rome, a Roman maiden, one of the hostages given to Lars Porsena. She made her escape from the Etruscan camp by swimming across the Tiber. She was sent back by the honorable Romans; Porsena, however, not only set her at liberty in recognition of her courage but also released her fellow hostages. Mlle. de Scudéry took this story as the framework for her celebrated romance Clelie, published in 10 volumes (1654–1660).

Cloete, [Edward Fairly] Stuart [Graham] (1897– ). South African novelist. His novels, such as Turning Wheels (1937), are often set in South Africa and are usually historical, about the early Boer settlers. Voyages Around the World (1962) is a travel book.

Cloister and the Hearth, The (1861). A historical novel by Charles Reade. The action takes place on the Continent in the latter years of the 15th century. Among the historical characters of note whom Reade introduces into the narrative are Froissart, Gringoire, Deschamps, Luther, Villon, and—as a child—Erasmus. The story centers around the tragically thwarted love of Erasmus' parents: Gerard, a talented young writer, and the red-haired Margaret, daughter of Peter Brandt. A forged letter convinces Gerard of Margaret's death; and, after a period of despair and wild living, he becomes a monk of the Dominican order, unaware that Margaret has given birth to Erasmus, his son. When after many adventures and misadventures the pair meet again, Gerard is unable, because of his vows, to live with his family. He manages, however, to settle nearby. Margaret soon dies of the plague, and the heartbroken Gerard dies shortly thereafter.

Clootie, Auld. See Auld Hornie.

Cloridano. In the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, a Moorish soldier, companion of Medoro, who goes with the latter to retrieve from the battlefeild the body of their king Dardinello, after he had been killed by Rinaldo at the siege of Paris. Surprised by Zerbino, he leaves the body to Medoro and flies, but later dies defending his friend.

Clorinda. In the Gerusalemme Liberata of Tasso, a pagan warrior maid from Persia. She is the daughter of King Senapo (Senapus) of Ethiopia, but when she was born, her mother the queen, fearful that the child's white complexion would arouse the suspicions of the king, substitutes a Negro child for her and gives her up to the care of the eunuch Arsete. At one point, Arsete loses her and she is suckled by a tiger. Later, he finds her again and takes her to the East, where she grows up skilled in arms. At the battle of Antioch, to which she comes to fight the knights of the First Crusade, she meets briefly and falls deeply in love with Tancred (Tancred), one of the leading Crusaders. When she offers her arms to the king of Jerusalem, Aladino, in exchange for the lives of Sosofrina and Olindo, she finds herself once again in combat with her beloved. Unwittingly, Tancred wounds her in a night attack. Before she dies in his arms, she seeks baptism, having learned from Arsete of her Christian parentage. Tancred, in desperate grief, grants her wish and receives her forgiveness. Later, he has a vision of her in heaven.

Closterman, Pierre (1921– ). French novelist. The work of Closterman, a World War II aviator, has risen to popularity in France with the work of other explorers and adventurers, among them Maurice Herzog who writes of mountain climbing, and Alain Bombard who writes of the sea. Testaments to man's courage and to his powers of endurance, Closterman's works include Le Grand Cirque (The Big Show, 1948) and Feux du ciel (Flames in the Sky, 1951).

Cloten. In Shakespeare's Cymbeline, the son of the second wife of Cymbeline by a former husband. He is an arrogant, vindictive lout who does, however, display some good sense. Cloten is the rejected lover of Imogen.

Clotho. See the Fates.

Cloud, The (1820). A poem by Percy Bysshe Shelley. A lyrical description by a cloud of its cyclical journey from the sky to the earth and back once more to the sky, it expresses the poet's pantheism and his idea of nature's eternal alteration, rebirth, and recurrence.

Cloud-cuckoo-land (Gr., Nepheleococygia). A Utopian city built in the sky by the birds in Aristophanes' comedy The Birds. It has come to refer to visionary schemes in general.

Clouds, The (Nepheleis). A comedy by Aristophanes (423 B.C.). This clever satire unfairly equates Socrates with the Sophists, noted for their capacity to use argument cunningly to prove whatever point they wished to make, whereas the actual Socrates seriously criticized them, believing that argument was useful only if it arrived at truth. A dishonest farmer, Strepsiades encourages his son Phidippides to enroll in Socrates' school, the Thinkery, where he can learn to evade his numerous creditors through shrewd argument. Strepsiades is delighted with his son's immense success until the young man turns his new talent against his father. At this point the old man regrets turning away from the old virtues and ends by setting fire to the Thinkery.

Clouet, François (c. 1510–c. 1572). French painter. Appointed court painter by Francis I, he is known for his soberly accurate portrait drawings and paintings. His father, Jean (c. 1486–1541), who served in a similar capacity, was a noted miniaturist.
Cocktail Party, The

Clovis I. Ger. Chlodwig, equivalent to later Fr. Louis (c. 466-511). King of the Salian Franks (after 481) who reunited the kingdom of his grandfather Meroveé and firmly established the Merovingian dynasty. He married a Christian princess and had himself and all his people baptized, thus securing the political backing of the Roman Catholic Church.

Churcnaue. In Irish folklore, an elf, particularly one guarding secret treasure.

Clutton-Brock, Arthur (1868-1924). English essayist and critic. He is highly regarded for his style. He wrote studies of Shelley (1909) and William Morris (1914). He was a Fabian socialist.

Clymene (Klymene). In Greek mythology, the daughter of Oceanus and Thetis, wife of Iapetus, and mother of Atlas, Prometheus, and Epimetheus. Clymene is, also, the name of many other heroines in Greek mythology and legend, especially that of the mother of Phaethon.

Clytemnestra (Klytainnemta or Klytainmesta). In Greek legend, the daughter of Tyndareus and Leda. She became the wife of Agamemnon, whom she and her paramour Agamemnon murdered after his return from Troy. She was slain by her son Orestes. See the House of Athens.

Clytie (Klytie). In classical mythology, an ocean nymph, in love with the Sun-God. Her love passed unnoticed, and she was changed into the heliotrope, or sunflower, which, traditionally, still turns to the sun, following him through his daily course.

Coates, Robert M[yron] (1897- ). American writer and art critic. During the 1920's Coates was an expatriate in Europe, where he wrote his first novel, The Eater of Darkness (1929). He later became an art critic for The New Yorker. He is also the author of The Outlaw Years (1930), a history of the Natchez Trace pirates, and Wisteria Cottage (1948) and The Farther Shore (1957), two fictional studies of criminal psychology.

Cobb, Humphrey (1889-1944). American novelist. He is best known for Paths of Glory (1935), his powerful World War I novel belonging to the school of Remarque. It was made into a successful play by Sidney Howard and into an excellent movie.

Cobb, Irvin S[hrewsbury] (1876-1944). American writer, humorist, and newspaperman. Noted especially for his Judge Priest stories, Cobb earlier was a newspaperman for the New York Sun and the World. He later wrote for The Saturday Evening Post and, from 1922 to 1932, for Cosmopolitan. Cobb was in the main stream of American humor and was a direct follower of Artemus Ward and Mark Twain. The number of books and stories he wrote was immense. His first book was Back Home (1912). In addition to the Judge Priest books, Cobb wrote humorous skits, travel books, such as Europe Revised (1914), and an autobiography, Exit Laughing (1941).

Cobbett, William (1762-1835). English writer and journalist. He is best known for his pro-British pamphlets written in the U.S. under the pseudonym Peter Porcupine, and for his newspaper Cobbett's Political Register, published in England beginning in 1813. He became a member of Parliament in 1832. Rural Rides (1830), descriptions of life and agricultural conditions in the English countryside, remains his most interesting work today.

Cobden, Richard (1804-1865). English statesman and publicist. He is especially known as an advocate of free trade and peace. He was a member of Parliament most of the time from 1841 to his death, but refused party affiliation and opportunities to become a cabinet minister. He was a leader, with John Bright, of the Anti-Corn Law League (see corn laws) and earned some unpopularity for his opposition to the Crimean War. He was an adherent of the North in the U.S. Civil War. His Political Writings were published in 1867 and his Speeches on Questions of Public Policy in 1870.

Cobweb. See PEA-BLOSSOM.

Coccoli, Carlo (1920- ). Italian-born writer who now publishes in French. In 1946 Coccoli published his first novel, Il Migliore et l'ultimo. Le Ciel et la Terre (1952, translated from the Italian) is the story of the struggles of a parish priest, Don Ardito Picardi. In its concern with spiritual problems it reveals a marked kinship with the work of Georges Bermanos. La Ville et le Sang (1955), Manuel le Mexicain (1956), and La Table Ronde (1957) were written in French.

Cockatrice. A fabulous and heraldic monster with the wings of a fowl, tail of a dragon, and head of a cock. It was so called because it was said to be produced from a cock's egg hatched by a serpent. According to legend, the very look of this monster would cause instant death. In consequence of the crest with which the head is crowned, the creature is called a basilisk. Isaiah (King James version) says, "The weaned child shall put his hand on the cockatrice' den" (xi, 8), to signify that the most obnoxious animal should not hurt the most feeble of God's creatures.

Cock Lane Ghost. The ghost of one Mrs. Kent; she appeared as a "luminous lady" and was supposedly responsible for mysterious noises. This fraud, perpetrated in Cock Lane, Smithfield, London by a man and his 11-year-old daughter, was exposed in 1762. Samuel Johnson took an interest in the ghost and was satirized for believing in it by Charles Churchill in his poem The Ghost; Johnson's interest, of course, did not stem from credulity, but from a determination to expose the fraud.

Cockney School. An epithet applied by John Gibson Lockhart to the group of writers that included Leigh Hunt, Hazlitt, Shelley, and Keats. The group was largely composed of Londoners, and Lockhart, who was a devoted partisan of the LAKES POETS and a fierce enemy of writers whose aims or principles varied from his own, sneeringly referred to Hunt as "the Cockney Homer" and to Hazlitt as "the Cockney Aristotelie.

Cocktail Party, The (1949). A poetic drama by T. S. Eliot. On one level the play is a contemporary drawing-room comedy; on another it is a profound religious work concerned with universal themes. The cocktail party is a trivial affair at which ordinary Edward tries to hide from his friends the fact that his wife, Lavinia, has just left him. Edward and Celia are lovers, and Celia urges Edward to take the opportunity, divorce his wife, and marry her. However, Edward suddenly feels he needs his wife most. An unidentified stranger at the party warns Edward that his decision has set in motion events that he may not be able to control. When Lavinia returns the couple go together to a psychiatrist, Sir Henry Harcourt-Reilly, who turns out to be the stranger who was at the party. He reconciles the couple, telling them there are two kinds of good life, the acceptance of ordinary day-to-day duties, such as they have chosen, and the way of self-dedication and self-sacrifice, which Celia has finally chosen; Celia's choice is the best. Two years later, at another cocktail party, the guests learn that Celia has been martyred on a tropical island. The psychiatrist and Julia, a meddling old woman, are god and guardian-angel figures, and put forward Eliot's Christian point of view. The verse, characterized by passages of incantation and repetition, is written in the rhythms of conversation.

Cocteau, Jean (1889–1963). French poet, novelist, dramatist, essayist, film writer, and director. In the vanguard of almost every experimental artistic movement of the century, especially cubism and surrealism, Cocteau did much to promote the work of such innovators as Picasso, Chirico, Stravinsky, and the Groupe des six. Through all his works runs the theme of the poet-angel, defier of Destiny and guardian of the divine in man. The poet can be glimpsed in children and legendary heroes, but he risks being lost in the disorder of the modern world.

The most famous of his modernistic ballets are Parade (1916), music by Erik Satie, scenery by Picasso; Le Boeuf sur le toit (1920), music by Darius Milhaud; and Les Marines de la tour Eiffel (1921), music by the Groupe des six.

His poetic novels are Thomas the Imposter (1923), set in World War I, The Grand Ecrt (1923), and Les Enfants terribles (1930).

For the theater Cocteau adapted a number of myths and legends: Antigone (1922), Romeo et Juliette (1924), Orphée (1926), Oedipus Rex (1928; a libretto for an opera by Stravinsky), The Infernal Machine (1934; also on the Oedipus myth), Les Chevaliers de la Table Ronde (1937), and Racineux (1951). Original plots include those of The Human Voice (1930; made into an opera by Francis Poulenc), Intimate Relations (Les Parents terribles; 1938), The Typewriter (La Machine à écrire; 1941), and The Eagle Has Two Heads (L'Aigle a Deux Têtes; 1946).

His most famous films include the surrealistic The Blood of a Poet (Le Sang d'un Poète; 1932), The Eternal Return (1944), Beauty and the Beast (La Belle et la Bête; 1945), Les Parents terribles (1948) and Les Enfants terribles (1950).

In addition to a number of volumes of poetry his works include the cartoons, verse, and prose of Le Potomak (1913, pub. 1919); the critical essays of A Call to Order (1926); the personal account Opium: A Diary of a Cure (1930); and the autobiography Portraits-Souvenirs (1935).

Cucu imaginaire, le. See Sganarelle.

Coeytus (Kokytas). One of the five rivers of hell in Greek mythology. The word means the river of lamentation. The unbodied were doomed to wander about its banks for 100 years. It flows into the river Acheron. See SYRE.

Code of Justinian. See JUSTINIAN I.

Cody, William F[red]erick]. Known as Buffalo Bill (1846–1917). American scout, showman, and folk hero. An expert horseman and marksman, Cody was a rider for the pony express, a frontier scout, and a hunter of buffalo. After 1883 he toured the U.S. and Europe in his "Wild West Show." Cody's career was popularized by the dime novels of E. Z. C. JUNSON (Ned Buntline), who claimed that he had given Cody his sobriquet.

Coffin, Robert F[eter] Tristram (1892–1955). American poet. Coffin is noted for his writings dealing with his native state of Maine. A Pulitzer Prize winner in poetry for Strange Holiness (1936), he wrote many volumes of verse, including Golden Palms (1929), Maine Ballads (1938), and People Are Like Ballads (1946). He also wrote several prose works about Maine and the volume called The Kennebec (1937) for the Rivers of America series. Positive and optimistic (America, he said, "is promises—promises kept"), both his prose and poetry are marked by a frank colloquialism.

cogito ergo sum. The axiom of Descartes. It was formulated as the starting point of his system of philosophy. It means "I think, therefore I exist." Descartes, at the beginning, provisionally doubted everything, but he could not doubt the existence of the ego, for the mere fact that I doubt presupposes the existence of the I: in other words, the doubt could not exist without the "I."

Cohan, George M[ichael] (1878–1942). American actor, song writer, playwright, and producer. As a child Cohan acted in vaudeville in a family theatrical group, "The Four Cohans." The first play that he wrote, produced, and acted in was The Governor's Son (1901). He followed this with Little Johnny Jones (1904), in which he played a role always thereafter associated with him, "the Yankee Doodle Boy." Among his musicals and dramas were Forty-Five Minutes from Broadway (1906); Get-Rich-Quick Wallingford; Broadway Jones (1912), a play and musical about a young spendthrift; and Seven Keys to Baldpate (1913), based on a novel by Earl Derr Biggers. In the course of his career, Cohan wrote many songs which have remained American favorites: Over There, I'm a Yankee Doodle Dandy, Grand Old Flag, Give My Regards to Broadway, and Mary Is a Grand Old Name.

Cohen, Octavus Roy (1891–1959). American writer of short stories and detective fiction. Best known for his stories about stereotyped Negro characters, he was the creator of Florian Slippey and Epic Peters. They appeared in such books as Florian Slippey Goes Abroad (1928), Epic Peters, Pullman Porter (1930), and Florian Slippey (1938).

Coignard, Jéréme. A character created by Anatole France. Coignard is an irreverent, licentious abé who also manages to be a wise and witty philosopher. The chief personage in At the Sign of the Reine Pédaque and Les Opinions de Jéréme Coignard (1893), Coignard is one of France's most popular characters. Many of the author's own beliefs and opinions are voiced by him.

Colbert, Jean Ecarte (1619–1683). French statesman. After hastening the downfall of Fouquet, Colbert was made controller general of finance by Louis XIV in 1665. Although Colbert initiated many wise reforms, the costs of the king's wars and courtly met Robert Southey at Oxford, and the two developed their plan, called Pantisocracy, to establish a small, ideal community in the U. S. Unable to finance their project, they had to abandon it. In the meantime, because marriage was an essential factor in the pantisocratic scheme, Coleridge became engaged to Sarah Fricker, sister of Southey's fiancée, only to discover, too late, that his love for Mary Evans was reciprocated. His unfortunate marriage (1799) to Miss Fricker ended in separation some seven years later.

In 1796, Coleridge published his first volume of poems, and in the same year began the publication of The Watchman, a liberal political periodical, which lasted only 10 issues. He was by now in great financial difficulty and was considering entering the Unitarian ministry when the brothers Josiah and Thomas Wedgewood granted him an annuity of 150 pounds, thus enabling him to pursue his literary career.

In 1797, Coleridge formed a friendship with Wordsworth, a friendship that stimulated Coleridge's finest achievements in poetry, including The Rime of the Ancient Mariner, Kubla Khan, and the first part of Christabel. Wordsworth and Coleridge together published Lyrical Ballads, and subsequently traveled to Germany where Coleridge studied philosophy at Göttingen University and mastered the German language. On their return to England (1799), Coleridge translated Schiller's Wallenstein. Afflicted by the damp climate of the Lake District, where he had settled in order to be near Wordsworth, Coleridge took up opium as a remedy and swiftly became addicted. After writing the second part of Christabel and Dejection: An Ode, Coleridge wrote very little poetry from then on. Hoping to improve his health, he sailed to Malta in 1804 but returned to England in 1806 without improvement. From 1808 to 1819 he gave seven series of lectures on Shakespeare and other literary subjects, which were brilliant if disorganized. During the years 1809 and 1810 he published a politico-philosophical review, The Friend, and a revised version of his tragedy Otranto (written 1797) was successfully produced in 1813. Three years later Coleridge took up residence with a doctor, in order to control his opium addiction. In 1817 he republished his earlier poems and Biographia Literaria, which contains a good deal of information on Wordsworth as well as much of Coleridge's finest literary criticism. Although his poetic achievement was small in quantity, Coleridge was without a doubt the most perceptive English critic of his time and virtual intellectual spokesman for the English romantic movement.

Colette, Sidonie Gabrielle. Pen name: Colette Willy (1873–1954). French novelist. She was encouraged to write the Claudine books by her music-critic husband, who published them under her pseudonym Willy. After her divorce in 1906 she became a music-hall dancer and mime, providing herself with background material for La Vagabonde (1910), L'Envers du music-hall (1912), and Mitsou (1919). Remarried twice, she continued to write whimsically narrating novels of the demi-monde and the feminine heart: often the older one, as in Chéri (1920) and La Fin de Chéri (1926). Her best-known works include Gigi (1945); her childhood reminiscences in La Maison de Claudine (1922) and Sido (1929); her description of German Occupation in Paris de ma fenêtre (1944); and her later memoirs published in L’Étoile Vesper (1946) and Le Panal Bleu (1949).

Colette Baudoche. See Maurice Barres.

Coligny, Gaspard de (1519–1572). French admiral. During the reign of Charles IX he was leader of the Huguenots and made several attempts to establish colonies for French Protestants in America. He was a victim of the Massacre of St. Bartholomew.

Collin and Lucy. A tragic love ballad by Thomas Tickell (1720). It was called by Oliver Goldsmith “the best ballad in our language.” Collin was betrothed to Lucy but forsook her for a bride “three as rich as she.” Lucy was sad, but was present at the wedding; when Collin saw her, “the damps of death be dewed his brow, and he died.” Both were buried in one tomb, and many betrothed maidens came there “to deck it with garlands and true-love knots.”

Collin Clouts Come Home Again (1595). A long allegorical pastoral poem by Edmund Spenser. The shepherd Collin Clout describes to his fellow-shepherds his journey with the Shepherd of the Ocean (Sir Walter Raleigh) to the land of the beautiful shepherdess Cynthia (Queen Elizabeth). Collin Clout also appears in The Shepherdes Calender.

Collar, The (1633). A poem by George Herbert, in which the author, after rebelling against his profitless service of God, is abruptly and totally reconciled. The poem makes use of irregular line-lengths and rhymes to achieve a remarkable dramatic effect. The collar is the clerical collar, emblem of servitude to God.

Collean, May. The heroine of a Scottish ballad. “Fause Sir John” carried her to a rock in order to throw her down into the sea; but May outwitted him and subjected him to the fate he had designed for her.

Collection, The (1662). A one-act play by Harold Pinter. It is about a homosexual who is accused of making love to another man’s wife. The husband enters into a strange, aggressive relationship with the homosexual, perhaps in an attempt to enrage the homosexual’s partner as he himself feels outrage and injury.

The Collection was first produced on BBC television (1961).

Collège de France. An institution of higher learning in Paris. Founded by Francis I in 1530 at the instigation of Guillaume Budé, it represented an attempt to place humanistic studies on an equal footing with the theological studies provided at the Sorbonne. Hebrew and Greek were taught for the first time, thus earning it the plaudits of enthusiastic humanists such as Rabelais and Ronsard. First known as the Collège des Lecteurs royaux, it has been called the Collège de France since the Revolution.

College Widow, The (1904). A comedy of college life by George Arne. In the play, the daughter of the college president is asked to use her charms on a certain halfback to induce him to play for the right team. Extremely popular in its day, it has continued to be produced.

Colleoni, Bartolommeo (1400–1475). A famous Italian condottiere. Following a brilliant military career highlighted by his tactical genius with artillery, Colleoni lived in pleasant retirement as lord of Bergamo; most of his fellow condottieri met violent ends. The statue made of him by the sculptor Verrocchio, still to be seen in Venice, is the major prop of his present-day fame.

Colletet, Guillaume (1598–1659). French poet and playwright. One of the original members of the Académie and one of Richelieu’s cinq auteurs, Colletet is less remembered for his plays than for his poems, which include Divertissements (1651–1653), Banquet des Poètes (1646), and Epigrammes (1653).

Collier, Constance. Stage name of Laura Constance Hardie (1880–1955). English actress. Once an Edwardes Gaiety Girl, she appeared in Peter Ibbetson (1917), Our Betters (1923), which had 548 performances, and many other plays. Harlequinade (1930) is her autobiography.

Collier, Jeremy (1650–1726). English clergyman, known for his Short View of the Immorality and Profaneness of the English Stage (1698), an attack on the licentiousness of the Restoration theater. His work drew an angry reply from Congreve, whom he had signaled for censure, along with Dryden, D’Urfey, and Vanbrugh.

Collier, John (1901– ). English-born American short-story writer and novelist. Collier’s first novel, His Monkey Wife: Or Married to a Chimpanzee (1931), was written in the sardonic and fantastic vein that characterized his later work. His other novels include Epistle to a Friend (1931), Full Circle (1933), and Defy the Fool Fiend (1934). Best known for his numerous short stories, which are witty, satiric, grotesque, often macabre, and graced with a delicate and impeccable style, he is often compared to Saki. Among his short-story collections are No Traveller Returns (1931), Green Thoughts (1932), The Devil and All (1934), Variations on a Theme (1935), A Touch of Nutmeg (1935), and Presenting Moonshine (1941). Many of the stories in these collections, as well as previously unpublished works, were reprinted in Fancies and Goodnights (1951).

Collin, Jacques. The consummate villain of Honoré de Balzac’s La Comédie Humaine. Collin plays a part in many of the novels. In Le Père Goriot, under the name and disguise of Vautrin, he makes love to the landlady and eats her cheap scantly food until the spiteful Mlle Michonneau gives him up to the police. Collin also appears in Les Splendeurs et mières des courtisanes (1843) and La Dernière incarnation de Vautrin (1847) as a Spanish priest and philosopher.

Collins, Mr. In Jane Austen’s Pride and Prejudice, a self-important clergyman, very much the toady and prig. Elizabeth Bennet refuses his proposal of marriage, and he marries Charlotte Lucas instead.

Collins, [William] Willie (1824–1889). Scottish novelist, best known as the author of The Woman in White and The Moonstone. He is considered by some to have been the first English author of bona fide detective and mystery novels. Collins was a good friend of Charles Dickens, a contributor to Dickens' magazines and occasional collaborator. The two men reciprocally admired and influenced one another, and though their talents are in other respects unequal, Collins occasionally rivaled Dickens in the creation of character and mood, excelled him in handling plot. Among Collins’ other books are The New Magdalen (1873), The Haunted Hotel (1879), and Heart and Science (1883).

Collins, William (1721-1759). English poet. One of the preromantics of the eighteenth century, Collins wrote only a small quantity of poetry, consisting chiefly of narrative subjects in a quiet, melancholy vein, distinguished by their smoothness and their skillful use of sound-effects. Such work, centering around a personified abstraction, came to be called the “descriptive” or “allegorical” ode. His best-known poems, many of which were published in Odes on Several Descriptive and Allegorical Subjects (1746), are Ode to Evening (1746); How Sleep the Brave (1746); Dirge in Cymbeline (1744); and Ode Occasioned by the death of Mr. Thomson (1749), commemorating his significant literary relationship with the poet James Thomson. Collins’ view of poetry, as set forth in his Ode on the Poetical Character, is that it is essentially imaginative, divine in origin, and wild and impassioned in method and insight. All his life Collins suffered from poverty and illness, and he was insane before his death.

Colman, George. Known as Colman the elder (1732-1794). English dramatist. He is best remembered for such comedies as The Clandestine Marriage (1766), written with David Garrick, and The Jealous Wife (1761).

Colman, George. Known as Colman the younger (1762-1836). English playwright known for The Heir at Law (1797) and John Bull (1803), both comedies. See Della-Cruscans.

Colon, Luis (1851-1915). Spanish priest and author. He is best known for the satiric novel Pequeñeces (Currita, Countess of Albornoz, 1891). This vigorous and realistic work was widely enjoyed during the period at the expense of the real personages so easily identifiable with its characters.

Colonel Jack (1722). The hero and shortened title of The History of the Most Remarkable Life and Extraordinary Adventures of the truly Hon. Colonel, Jacque, vulgarly called Colonel Jack, written in the form of an autobiographical novel of a convicted pickpocket, by Daniel Defoe. The colonel (born a gentleman and bred a pickpocket) goes to Virginia, and passes through all the stages of colonial life, from “slave” to slave owner and landowner, while his haunting sense of guilt and wrong-doing gradually vanishes.

Colonna, Francesco (1432?-1527). Italian author and Dominican monk. He created one of the most beautiful and mystifying books of the Italian Renaissance, the Hypnerotomachia Poliphilus (The Strife of Love in a Dream with the Lover of Polia); written in 1467, it was published by Aldus in 1499 with nearly 20 woodcuts. In two books and in a Latinized Italian prose, the author tells of the dream-journey of Poliphilus and of his love for Polia. Beneath the surface of its allegorical and romantic plot are various esoteric meanings and devices, such as the fact that the initial letters of its chapters spell out the author’s name and address. An anonymous Elizabethan translation spread its influence then; but its appeal extended to modern times, as in Charles Reade’s Cloister and the Hearth.

Colonna, Vittoria (1492-1547). Italian poet. She was a friend of Michelangelo, who addressed several of his poems to her. Her own poems include sonnets on her dead husband, Ferrante d’Avalos, and upon religious themes. They were published in her Canzoniere (Song Book, 1538).

Coloquio de los perros, El. One of the stories in Cervantes’ Novelas Ejemplares. In this picturesque tale, the dog Benvinda is given the power of speech for one night and describes to another dog his experiences under various masters, satirizing human behavior in the process.

Colossians, The Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the. A book of the New Testament. It is a letter written by Paul, while he was in prison, to the early Christians of Colossae, the ancient city of Phrygia in Asia Minor. He urges them to ignore the syncretic ideas then common in the Near East.

Colossus of Rhodes. A gigantic statue of Helios on the island of Rhodes. Completed about 280 B.C., this famous statue commemorated the successful defense of Rhodes against Demetrius Poliorcetes in 304 B.C. One of the Seven Wonders of the World, it stood 105 feet high, and is said to have been made from the warlike engines abandoned by Demetrius. It was designed and built by the sculptor Chares, a pupil of Lycippus. The story that it destroyed the harbor arose only in the 16th century.

Colum, Mary (1886?-1957). Irish-American literary critic; wife of Padraic Colum. From These Roots (1937) is a book of criticism and Life and the Dream (1947) is an autobiography that throws light on the literary life of Ireland in the early 20th century.

Colum, Padraic (1881- ). Irish poet and dramatist; later resident in the U.S. and president of the Poetry Society of America. He was associated with the Irish Renaissance and the Irish National Theater, in company with William Butler Yeats, A. E., Lady Gregory, and John Millington Synge. The Fiddler’s House (1907) and Thomas Muskerry (1910) are earthy, Irish-ness plays. Wild Earth (1907) is a collection of poems about Irish country life. Many of his lyrics have been set to music and are familiar as near-folk songs. He also wrote books on travel and folklore. The Poet’s Circuits appeared in 1960.

Cumbra, St. (Ir., Colum; 521-597). An Irish saint. After establishing several churches and monasteries in Ireland, the nobly born Cumbra converted the Picts in northern Scotland, where he founded more monasteries.

Cumbrian, St. (543-615). An Irish saint. Most of his life was devoted to the founding of monasteries in France, Switzerland, and Italy. Several of his erudite writings are extant.

Cumbriadi, The (1807). An epic poem by Joel Barlow, first published in briefer form as The Vision of Columbus (1787). Columbus is taken by Hesper, the spirit of the Western World, to the Mount of Visitation and there foresees the future of the North American continent.

Among its editors were Mathew Carey and Francis Hopkinson. It ran until 1792 and featured an unusual amount of American fiction.

Columbine. A stock character in old Italian comedy, she first appeared about 1560 and was shortly thereafter transplanted to English pantomime. She is the daughter of PANTALOON and the sweet-heart of HARLEQUIN. Like Harlequin, she is supposed to be invisible to mortal eyes. See Pierrot.

Columbus, Christopher (Sp. Cristóbal Colón; It. Cristoforo Colombo; 1451–1506). Discoverer of America. The son of a Genoese wool weaver, Columbus went to sea as a youth, becoming a skilled navigator. He conceived a plan to reach Asia by sailing westward, but was rebuffed at the English, French, and Portuguese courts; in 1492 Ferdinand and Isabella of Spain finally agreed to sponsor the voyage, naming him Admiral of the Ocean Sea, Viceroy, and governor of the lands he might discover.

Columbus set sail from Palos, Spain, on Aug. 3, 1492, with a fleet of three ships: the Niña, the Pinta, and the flagship Santa María—and some 90 officers and men. On October 12 he made his first landfall on an island in the Bahamas, probably Guanahani, which he called San Salvador. Ignorant of the fact that he had discovered a new world, Columbus then reached Cuba and Hispaniola (Santo Domingo), where he established a settlement called Navidad, and sailed for Spain.

During his second voyage (1493–1496), Columbus discovered Puerto Rico and Jamaica. However, he began to have difficulties with the Spaniards on Hispaniola, who chafed at his iron discipline. Returning to America in 1498, he touched Trinidad and sailed along the coast of Venezuela. Meanwhile, the trouble on Hispaniola continued, and Francisco Bobadilla, who had been sent as royal commissioner to investigate complaints against Columbus, ordered him back to Spain in chains. Though none of his political powers were restored, Columbus was permitted to undertake a fourth voyage (1502–1504), during which he explored the coast of Central America. After being marooned on Jamaica for over a year, he returned to Spain, where he died in poverty and neglect. Both Seville and Santo Domingo claim to possess his remains.

The best known of Columbus’ writings is the journal of his first voyage. Washington Irving wrote a three-volume biography, The Life and Voyages of Columbus (1828), based on material he gathered while serving as an attache at the American legation in Madrid. Poems about the great discoverer include James Russell Lowell’s Columbus (1847), Walt Whitman’s The Prayer of Columbus (1874), and Joaquin Miller’s Columbus (1896). Paul Claudel wrote a dramatic oratorio, The Book of Christopher Columbus (1927), with music by Darius Milhaud.

Columbus, History of the Life and Voyages of (1829). A multivolume biography by Washington Irving. He gathered the material while serving in the U.S. embassy at Madrid. The book includes some of the documents made available by the duke of Veraguas, a descendant of Columbus. Although Irving idealized the explorer, the book remains readable. He later added a volume called The Companions of Columbus (1831).

Combat. See Albert Camus.

Combray. A French village in Marcel Proust’s Remembrance of Things Past. The narrator’s family visit relatives there, and it is the scene of many of his childhood memories, including the walks along the Méséglise Way and the Guermantes Way. Based on the village of Illiers, southwest of Chartres on the Loire River, it includes some details from Proust’s birthplace in the Parisian suburb Auteuil.

comedia de capa y espada (Sp., “cloak-and-sword play”). A form of Spanish drama, dealing with the upper middle classes and deriving its name from the typical street costume of these groups. Stressing incident rather than characterization, these plays have complex and romantic plots that employ such devices as mistaken identities, disguises, and mutual misunderstandings. Lope de Vega and Calderón wrote excellent examples of this type of play.

comédie-ballet. A theatrical form, originally devised by Molière for the entertainment of Louis XIV, consisting of comedy with ballet inserted between the acts. The comédie-ballet was one of the most popular entertainments of 17th-century France.

Comédie-Française. French national theater, now known as the Théâtre-Français and housed in a Paris theater of that name. A troupe of Molière’s actors, established at the Théâtre de Petit-Bourbon in 1658, became the core of a new theater formed in 1681 by the union of several theatrical companies and titled officially the Comédie-Française. The company was often called La Maison de Molière. After the Revolution, the Comédie-Française was renamed the Théâtre-Français (1791) and given the theater where its performances are still held today.

Comédie Humaine, La (The Human Comedy). The title given by Honoré de Balzac in 1841 to the whole body of his work, including both completed and projected novels. The vast canvas of the work is France itself, seen from a variety of perspectives and peopled by more than 2,000 characters. Individuals of all social classes are depicted with accuracy and massive detail. A forerunner of such naturalistic works as those of Zola and the Goncourt brothers, La Comédie Humaine is divided into three main areas of study: manners, philosophy, and marriage. The first group is subdivided into scenes of private life, provincial life, Parisian life, country life, political life, and military life. Among the best known of these novels are Les Chouans, Eugénie Grandet, Le Père Goriot, La Recherche de l’Absolu, César Birotteau, Le Curé de village (1839), La Cousine Bette, The Country Doctor, and Cousin Pons.

comédie larmoyante (Fr., “tearful comedy”). A popular French 18th-century type of sentimental comedy in which the exaggeratedly pathetic situations of the characters made the audience weep. Concerned with the triumph of virtue afforded playwrights the opportunity of moralizing to excess. Examples of this type of play are to be found in La Chaussée’s La Fausse antiopathie (1733), Le Préjugé à la mode (1735), and Mélanide (1741); in Voltaire’s L’Enfant prodigue (1736) and Nanine (1749); and in Des- touches’ Le Glorieux (1732). The comédie larmoyante was to develop into the bourgeoise drama.

Comedy of Errors, The (c. 1592). A comedy by William Shakespeare. Aemilia, wife of Aegeon, has twin sons, both named Antipholus, who shipwrecked in infancy have been carried, one to Syracuse, the other to Ephesus. The play represents Antipholus of Syracuse going in search of his brother; and to make the confusion of identities more absurd, the brothers each have a slave named Dromio, and the Dromios are also indistinguishable twins. Adriana, the wife of the Ephesian, mistakes the Syracusan for her husband and later has her real husband arrested as a madman. Great confusion results, but ultimately the matter is brought into court. Not only do the brothers recognize each other at last, but their mother, Amicia, now an abess in whose priory the Syracusan had taken refuge during the excitement, and their father Aegemon, who had come to Ephesus to search for his son, appear in court, and the entire family is reunited. The sources of the plot are the Menachmi and the Amphitruo of Plautus, both written in the second century B.C.

Come Hither (1923). An anthology of verse and prose compiled by Walter de la Mare. It has become a classic book for children.

Come into the Garden, Maud. Well-known first line of Alfred Tennyson's Maud.

Comendador de Ocaña, El. See Peribanez o el Comendador de Ocaña.

Comical History of the States and Empires of the Moon and Comical History of the States and Empires of the Sun. See Cyrano de Bergerac.

Comic Relief. The relaxation of the audience's tension by means of an interpolated comic episode in a serious play. Its function is to permit a stronger renewal of the emotional surge. A good example is the grave-diggers' scene in Hamlet. Some critics hold that the function of such scenes is not relief but increased tension through senseless and ironic juxtaposition of opposites.

Comines (also Commines or Commynes), Philippe de (c. 1446–1511). Flemish-born French chronicler and diplomat, in the service of Charles the Bold, then Louis XI, then Charles VIII. The largest part of his Memoirs (written 1489–1490) describes the reign of Louis XI; the last part (written 1497–1498) concerns the Italian expedition of Charles VIII. The Memoirs are more serious and impartial than any European history written up until that time; and they were the basis for Scott's novel Quentin Durward.

Coming Struggle for Power, The (1932). The chief work of John Strachey. It predicts a close and final conflict between capitalism and Communism, and the doom of capitalism.

Cominius. In Shakespeare's Coriolanus, the Roman general under whom Coriolanus serves in the battle against the Volscians. He has a judiciousness and humility which Coriolanus lacks.

Comintern. See International.

comitia. In ancient Rome, an assembly of the people that had the authority to act on certain matters submitted to them through official channels. They met at the foot of the Capitol at a place called Comitium.

Commager, Henry Steele (1902– ). American historian. A native of Pittsburgh, Pa., Commager was educated at the University of Chicago. From 1939 to 1956 he was professor of history at Columbia University; in the latter year he joined the faculty of Amherst College. His writings are popular among both scholars and the general public. His works include The Growth of the American Republic (1930), written with S. E. Morison and subsequently revised and expanded; Theodore Parker (1935); The Heritage of America (1939), with Allan Nevins; and The American Mind (1950). He also edited Documents of American History (1934).

Commander of the Faithful. A title of the Caliphs, first assumed by Omar I (581, 634–644).

commedia dell'arte (It., comedy of the profession or of skill). Italian dramatic genre dating from the mid-16th century, when professional theatrical companies, especially the famous Gelosi (The Jealous Ones) began to include in their repertoire a new form of comedy characterized by improvisation upon a bare outline of plot (scenario), and the use of stock characters, some wearing masks, that combined features of the learned as well as the popular drama. It is this testing of the actor's virtuosity and skill that gave the genre its name, not an association with a professional craft or guild. Among the famous and enduring stock characters were "the beautiful young lady," an ingenue with a name such as Julia or Lucinda; her "lover," handsome but inept, sometimes called Octavio; Pantalone, a Venetian merchant as foolish as he is wealthy; the Doctor, sometimes called Graziano, who is a hopeless pedant; a braggart captain, later called Scaramuccia; and a collection of servants who provide anything from sparkling wit to acrobatics as they move in and out of the story, sometimes helping, at other times hindering the affairs of their masters and mistresses. The oldest of the wily or blundering manservants is Zanni (a dialect version of Gianni or Giovannì); later the word was used to designate a whole troupe of comedians. Following variations of the type included Arlecchino or Harlequin, famous for his particolored costume (derived from the original patched garments he wore); he is sometimes called Truffaldino or Mezzetino; Tartaglia, noted for his eyeglasses and his comic stuttering; Brighella, the usual companion of Arlecchino; and Pulcinella, who speaks in Neapolitan dialect, has a tremendous nose, and is always hungry—he survives in the Punch and Judy shows of the puppet theater. The commedia dell'arte was popular in Italy and throughout Europe (thanks to traveling companies) for several hundred years; it strongly influenced the development of European comedy and of individual writers such as Molìere, Goldoni, and Gozzi.

Commemoration Ode (1865). A poem by James Russell Lowell, more accurately entitled Ode Recited at the Harvard Commemoration. It was written on request in honor of the Harvard students who had died in the Civil War. In its published form, Lowell added 66 lines, beginning with the famous "Such was he, our Martyr-Chief."

Commentaries on the Gallic War (c. 58–44 B.C.). An historical work in 7 books by Julius Caesar. Written in a brisk, straightforward third person, each book covering one year, it narrates the campaigns, starting in 58 B.C., by which Caesar made Gaul a permanent part of the empire. Though not intended as polished literature, the work is valued as a masterpiece of clear, concise Latin and historical accuracy. Caesar, who had never lost a campaign or left the field before the enemy, had no reason to exaggerate or misrepresent; perhaps the only subjective note in the Commentaries is introduced in his justification of the war.

Commines or Commynes, Philippe de. See Commines.

Committee of Public Safety (Comité de salut public). Formed on April 6, 1793, it assumed direction of the government during the French Revolution from 1793 to 1795. Although theoretically subordinate to the Constitutional Convention, this committee soon concentrated all power in its hands and instituted the Reign of Terror. Its most famous members were Robespierre, Antoine Saint-Just, Georges Couthon, Lazzare Carnot, and Bertrand Barère.

Commodus, Lucius Aelius Aurelius (A.D. 161–192). Roman emperor (180–192). He succeeded to the throne on the death of his father Marcus Aurelius. His reign was marked by his prodigality, self-indulgence, and violence. He prided himself on his gladiatorial skill and was strangled by an athlete in a conspiracy.

Common, Doll. The mistress and assistant in charlantary of Subtle in Jonson's The Alchemist.

Common Sense (1776). A political treatise by Thomas Paine, urging immediate separation from England. In a few months more than 100,000 copies were published in America. The work was influential in bringing about the Declaration of Independence.

Commune of Paris. The revolutionary government established in Paris during 1792 by the representatives of the communes, the smallest administrative districts of France. It led to the period known as the Reign of Terror. More commonly, the term is applied to the insurrectionary government that took possession of Paris (March 18–May 28, 1871), after the withdrawal of the Prussian troops.

Communist Manifesto, The (Das Kommunistische Manifest); 1848. A pamphlet by Karl Marx and Friedrich Engels, the classic document of communist theory. It analyzes history in terms of class conflict, predicts the imminent overthrow of the ruling bourgeoisie by the oppressed proletariat, and envisions a resulting classless society in which personal property would be abolished. The Manifesto calls upon the proletariat of the world to unite and strengthen itself for this final revolution.

Company of Jesus. See Jesuits.

Compensation (1841). An essay by Ralph Waldo Emerson. The writer claims that evil is balanced by good, that "every sweet hath its sour; every evil its good." The doctrine of compensation, precluding the necessity for an afterlife, caused Emerson to be criticized by the religiously orthodox, as well as the liberals who considered his view too naive.

Compleat Angler, The, or the Contemplative Man's Recreation (1653). A treatise on fishing by Izaak Walton. It takes the form of a dialogue in which Fisgctor (an angler) tries to convince Venator (a hunter) that fishing is the superior sport. Their friend Acespe, a fowler, is silenced early in the work. Charles Cotton wrote a continuation which appeared in the fifth edition (1676).

Compromise of 1850. In U.S. history, a collective name for five acts of Congress which attempted to settle the controversy over the extension of slavery into the territory recently acquired from Mexico. In the Senate, Henry Clay and Daniel Webster supported compromise measures, while John C. Calhoun pleaded for equal rights for the South, and William Seward argued that "a higher law" forbade constitutional safeguards for slavery. The compromise bills provided for the admission of California as a free state and for the establishment of territorial governments in New Mexico and Utah without restrictions regarding slavery; in addition, the Fugitive Slave Law was strengthened, and the slave trade was abolished in the District of Columbia.

Compton, a family in The Sound and The Fury and other works by William Faulkner. One of the old, aristocratic families of YTKAPATAWPA County, the Compsons trace their American ancestry back to the early 18th century, but by the early 20th century the family is decaying. In the 1930s the family property is sold and the last male Compson is a childless bachelor. The family includes Benjimar, the idiot of The Sound and the Fury; Candace (Caddy), a girl whose checkered career includes a seduction, a marriage to a banker and another to a motion-picture executive, and who is last seen in Paris during the German occupation; Jason Lycurgus Compson I, the first of the family to settle in Mississippi; Jason II, a brigadier general in the Civil War to whom Thomas Sutpen of Absalom, Absalom! tells part of his story; Jason III, an intelligent but ineffectual lawyer who first sells some of the family property; Jason IV, a shrewd and selfish storekeeper who sells the remaining property; Quentin Compson, the illegitimate daughter of Caddy; Quentin MacLachan Compson, an introspective young man who commits suicide at Harvard in 1910.

In addition to The Sound and the Fury, the Compson family appears in the short story That Evening Sun, and Quentin MacLachan Compson is one of the three narrators in Absalom, Absalom!

Compton-Burnett, Ivy (1892– ). English novelist. A pitiless observer of human cruelty and lust for power, she writes witty and terrifying social comedies of family life—all in dialogue. Her wit, irony, and malice are like a fiercer Jane Austen's. All her novels follow the same form. They are set in large country houses, between 1885 and 1901, and consist almost entirely of polite, mannered, aphoristic dialogue between the members of the ingrown household. The background story concerns a struggle for power between a tyrant and his victim (often servants or precarious children), and a murder or some other melodramatic event. Some of her titles are Pastors and Masters (1925), Brothers and Sisters (1929), A House and Its Head (1935), Elders and Betters (1944), Manservant and Maid servant (1947, U.S. title, Bullivant and the Lambs), Two Worlds and Their Ways (1949), Mother and Son (1953), and The Mighty and Their Fall (1962).

Comte, [Isidore] Auguste [Marie François] (1798–1857). French philosopher. Known as the founder of positivism, Comte sought to apply the methods of observation and experimentation used in the sciences to philosophy, social science, and even religion. He hoped that, through the use of such methods, rather than through idealists' appeal to absolute principles, social reform might be achieved. The philosophy of positivism only admits knowledge gained by the scientific method as real or positive.
Cours de philosophie positive (6 vols., 1839–1842) is Comte's basic formulation of the doctrine. Comte had a significant influence on the thought of his time. Both Taine and John Stuart Mill show the effect of his ideas in their own philosophical writings.

Comus (1634). A Masque by John Milton. In late Roman mythology, Comus was the god of sensual pleasure, son of Bacchus and Circe. The name is from the Greek komos meaning "revel." In the masque, a young lady is left in the woods by her two brothers who have gone to find food for her. She falls into the hands of Comus, who tries to persuade her to become his consort, queen of his band of riotous monsters. She resists, is almost rescued by her brothers aided by an attendant spirit, but a spell has been cast upon her, which is broken by the power of Sabrina, nymph of the river Severn.

The masque was first performed in the Ludlow castle of the earl of Bridgewater, whose three children played the parts of the brothers and sister. Its theme is the struggle between chaste temperance and sensual pleasure; both causes are eloquently represented, and its richness of language and fancy make it one of the greatest works of its kind.

Conan Doyle. See Sir Arthur Conan Doyle. conceit. A whimsical, ingenious, extended metaphor. In a conceit an object, scene, person, situation, or emotion is presented in terms of a simpler analogue, usually chosen from nature or a context familiar to author and reader alike. First developed by Petrarch, the conceit became a standard stylistic device in poetry and spread to England in the 16th century.

The metaphysical poets, by extending the range of poetic analogy into the realms of science, religion, learning, and practical life, produced a distinct and arresting kind of conceit. Their aim was to startle the reader by showing a very exact correspondence between a thought or emotion and some particular aspect of a seemingly alien and inappropriate object. A famous example is found in these lines from Donne's A Valediction: Forbidding Mourning in which, parting from his mistress, he uses the figure of a drawing compass to describe the bond between their souls:

If they be two, they are two so
As stiffe twin compasses are two,
Thy soule the fixt foot, makes no show
To move, but doth, if th'other doe.
And though it in the center sit,
Yet when the other far doth rove,
It leans, and hearkens after it,
And groves erect, as that comes home.

Here the conceit is adapted as the best means of expressing a complicated thought; its exactitude and naturalness give it force. With the later metaphysical poets, like John Cleveland and Abraham Cowley, the conceit becomes more fanciful, less exact, at best a kind of witty ornament, at worst absurdity, as when Cleveland speaks of his mistress' hand:

So soft, 'tis air but once removed,
Tender as 'twere a jelly gloved.
Cleveland, Fuscara

conceptism or conceptismo (from Sp., concepto, "a conceit"). A 17th-century Spanish stylistic form which sought to express clever and penetrating ideas by means of verbal devices such as puns, antitheses, and epigrams. Often, however, originality and wit were achieved at the expense of thought and common sense. Conceptism is best exemplified in the works of Baltasar Gracián, whose Agudeza y arte de ingenio (1648) exhaustively describes every type of literary conceit. See Gonordism.

Conciliatore, II. An Italian semimonthly published in Milan (1818–19). Edited by Silvio Pellelico, it adopted a liberal, progressive position on political, social, and literary questions and, accordingly, favored the romantic movement just then emerging in Italy. It was suppressed by the Austrian police because of its politically liberal point of view.

Concord, Battle of. See Lexington.

Concord Hymn (1836). A poem by Ralph Waldo Emerson. Written at the completion of the Concord Monument, the poem includes the famous lines:

Here once the embattled farmers stood
And fired the shot heard round the world.

Condenado por desconfiado, El (pub. 1635). A religious drama by Tirso de Molina, dealing with the problem of free will and predestination. Paulo is persuaded by the devil to leave his hermitage and seek Enrico, whose fate, he is told, will be the same as his. Discovering that Enrico is a cheat and a bully, Paulo becomes a bandit in despair. An angel disguised as a shepherd asks him to repent and trust in God, but Paulo refuses. Enrico, however, repents before he dies and is saved. Unwilling to believe in Enrico's salvation, Paulo refuses to confess his sins and is damned for his pride and lack of faith.

Condensed Novels and Other Papers (1867). A series of parodies by Bret Harte. The book imitates such writers as Dickens, Cooper, Simms, Hawthorne, and Irving. Not all travesties, some of the sketches reflect Harte's admiration and respect for writers who influenced him.

Condillac, Etienne Bonnot, Abbé (1715–1780). French philosopher. He contributed articles on philosophy to the Encyclopédie. In his Essai sur l'origine des connaissances humaines (1746) and Traité des sensations (1754), he shows, as a disciple of Locke, that thought is not innate, but is derived from sensations and experience. He exerted considerable influence on the idéologues.

Condition humaine, La. See Man's Fate.

Condorcet, Marquis de. Marie Jean Antoine Nicolas Caritat (1743–1794). French philosopher and mathematician. He advocated the theory of the "infinite perfectibility of man" in his Essai d'une tableau historique des progrès de l'esprit humain (1794). In this work, Condorcet traces human development through 9 epochs, and predicts that man will become perfect in the 10th. Arrested as a member of the Girondist faction, he died in prison.

condottiere (it.). A professional soldier of fortune who leads or conducts a band of mercenaries. During the Italian Renaissance, these captains were commissioned to fight wars in support of the city states and petty duchies. Some of them, such as the Sforza, eventually became nobles themselves; others (the Gonzaga and Montefeltro families) sold their armed services even though they were already nobles in possession of states and petty principalities. Foreigners, such as the famous Sir John Hawkwood, an English captain, numbered among their ranks. Their legendary cruelty is captured by Verrochio in his statue of Bartolommeo Colleoni, which still frightens tourists in Venice.

Confessio Amantis (1386/1390). Poem in Middle English by John Gower, of over 30,000 lines in octosyllabic couplets. The narrator is an unhappy lover who appeals to Venus and is sent to confess to her priest Genius, who instructs him concerning the seven deadly sins against Love; each lesson is embellished with one or more stories from Biblical or classical legend. Chaucer had certainly read this work when he wrote the Man of Law's Tale and the Wife of Bath's Tale, although Gower was not his only source for the stories. The tale of Apollonius of Tyre also was a source for Shakespeare's Pericles, Prince of Tyre.

Confession, A (Isposed; 1879–1881). An account by Count Leo Tolstoy of the spiritual crisis leading to the formation of the religious and philosophical ideas he preached in his later years. The work records Tolstoy's growing discontent with life as he experienced it in civilized society, and his gradual conclusion that a life close to nature was requisite for the ideal life. A Confession is regarded as one of Tolstoy's most powerful nonfiction works because of its effective depiction of the intense spiritual struggles of one of the world's great geniuses.

Confessions. A form of autobiography or simulated autobiography. Intimate and possibly guilty matters not usually disclosed are "confessed," presumably to serve some sort of didactic purpose. Confessions constitute a literary genre which began with the Confessions of St. Augustine. They reached the height of their development in the era of Romanticism, when they already began to show symptoms of narcissistic decadence. Among the most famous confessions in literature are Rousseau's Confessions and De Quincey's Confessions of an English Opium Eater.

Confessions. An autobiography by Jean Jacques Rousseau. Written between 1766–1770, it was published posthumously (Books I–VI in 1782, Books VII–XII in 1789). In this work, Rousseau "frankly and sincerely" reveals the details of his erratic and rebellious life. Scholars find, however, that his unconscious motivation was to justify himself in the eyes of his supposedly numerous persecutors. The autobiographical account given in Confessions is supplemented by the three dialogues written in 1775–1776: Rousseau juge de Jean-Jacques, Révérées du promeneur solitaire, and Correspondance. They inaugurated a fashion in literature for confessions, but Rousseau's successors, such as Chateaubriand, Lamartine, George Sand, and Renan lack his openness.

Confessions of an English Opium Eater (1822). A largely autobiographical work by Thomas De Quincey. It gives an account of the poet's early life and describes the growth and effects of his habit of taking opium.

Confessions of a Thug. See Philip Meadows Taylor.

Confessions of Felix Krull: Confidence Man (Bekennnisse des Hochstaplers Felix Krull; 1954). A novel by Thomas Mann. In its adventurous and episodic quality, it is his closest approach to the picaresque novel. Krull, like many of Mann's characters, represents the artist, and his profession indicates the symbolic connection in Mann's mind between the artist and the actor or charlatan.

Confessions of Saint Augustine, The (397–401). A spiritual autobiography by St. Augustine. He describes his devoutly Christian mother, Monica, his life with the concubine who gave him his son Adeodatus (371–389), his exploration of Manichaeism and neo-Platonism, and his conversion to Christianity. Designed to show the details of the soul's progress, from enjoyment of the beauties outside itself to a study of its own nature and finally to joy in the knowledge of God, the work was the first in literature to be concerned entirely with an introspective analysis of the author's own spiritual and emotional experiences.

Confidence-Man, The: His Masquerade (1857). A novel by Herman Melville. The scene is a Mississippi River boat, ironically named the Fidèle. A plotless satire taking place on April Fool's Day, the book is filled with characters difficult to distinguish from one another; most of them are different manifestations of the confidence man. A sign hanging on the door of the Fidèle's barbershop expresses the theme: "No Trust." The confidence man, king of a world without principle, succeeds in gulling men by capitalizing on false hopes and offering false pity. At the end of the book, the flickering light hanging above the table where an old man reads the Bible goes out completely.

Confucianism. Chinese political and moral philosophy based on the teachings of Confucius. Originally one of the several rival teachings during the Chou Dynasty (1027–256 B.C.), it found little favor at first, but by the second century B.C. had become the official creed of China. Essentially a guide for statecraft and a moral teaching, it was enlarged upon and developed by Mencius, often regarded after Confucius as the second Chinese sage. In the third century B.C. the Hsün Tzu further elaborated and organized the teachings, and by the Han Dynasty (202 B.C.–A.D. 220) it was the orthodox teaching, dominating Chinese political and ethical thought until the early 20th century. During the Han Dynasty many extraneous elements, such as the Yin and Yang theory, were introduced, attempts were made to deify Confucius, and to use Confucian doctrines as justification for the absolute right of the emperors. Throughout its history Confucianism came into frequent conflict with Buddhism and Taoism, but it retained its position as the official state philosophy, largely because of the Imperial University and the examination system for government employees that perpetuated its power. The Sung Dynasty (960–1279) witnessed a great Confucian revival under the leadership of Chu Hsi and his school. Known as Neo-Confucianism, the teachings were reorganized; a distinctive examination of the precepts of the Confucian sages as well as of all external phenomena was called for, and the Four Books became the basis... for all education. Neo-Confucianism had great influence in Japan, where it became the basis on which the Tokugawa government was organized.

Confucius (551–497 B.C.). Chinese political and ethical philosopher and would-be reformer. Failing to achieve personal ambitions and success, he taught a large number of disciples who carried on, developed, and greatly altered his teachings, so that by the second century B.C. they formed the dominant philosophy in China. Confucius advocated a this-worldly, rational philosophy, which emphasizes humanity (jen), reverence for the ancient sages, and government by personal virtue.

Congregationalist. A member of the Congregational Church. Its doctrines, known as evangelical or orthodox, include autonomy tempered by co-operation and fellowship of the individual congregations.

Congreve, William (1670–1729). English dramatist, usually considered the greatest master of the Restoration comedy of manners. The son of an English army officer stationed in Ireland, Congreve was educated at the Kilkenny School, where Swift was a schoolmate, and at Trinity College, Dublin. His first play, The Old Bachelor (1693), which was produced under Dryden's auspices, was widely acclaimed. It was followed by three other comedies: The Double Dealer (1693), Love for Love, and his masterpiece, The Way of the World. In these plays Congreve revealed a genius for urban, scintillating wit that rivalled Molière's. He also wrote a tragedy, The Mourning Bride (1697), remembered chiefly as the source of such oft-quoted phrases as "Music hath charms to soothe a savage breast." The same year he engaged in controversy with the Reverend Jeremy Collier, who attacked the lewdness of the English stage, and was apparently bested in the exchange. After 1700, Congreve gave up writing for the theater and spent the rest of his life in the company of such friends as Swift, Steele, and Pope, who dedicated his translation of the Iliad to him; the visiting Voltaire, however, regretted that the "writer" had turned into a "gentleman." See Anne Bracegirdle.

Coningsby, or the New Generation (1844). A novel by Benjamin Disraeli. It contains many of his political opinions on the social issues of his day. There appear in the book several prominent contemporary figures, thinly disguised, and much of the book's popularity may be credited to the interest in identifying them. Gladstone is said to be depicted as Millbank, the Marquis of Hertford as the Marquis of Monmouth, and Coningsby may represent either Lord Littleton or Lord Lincoln. A notable character is the Jew, Sidonia, said to be drawn partly from Baron Alfred de Rothschild, partly from the author himself.

Coniston (1906). A historical novel by Winston Churchill. Churchill became interested in the politics of New Hampshire, where he lived for many years, and to some extent embodied his observations and conclusions in this story, laid in the years between the administrations of President Jackson and President Grant. His chief character is Jethro Bass, an able but corrupt Vermont politician whose quest for power leads him to break with the woman he loves. Bass was modeled on Ruel Durkee, a New Hampshire political boss.

Conjectures on Original Composition, in a Letter to the Author of Sir Charles Grandison (1759). An essay by Edward Young which undertakes to defend originality against slavish imitation. Young restates many of the arguments in the old controversy between the Ancients and Moderns (see Battle of the Books), and concludes that, in the long run, it is in the nature of man and the universe that the future shall surpass the past and that the progress of art is basically the result of the efforts of the original genius.

Connecticut Wits. See Hartford Wits.

Connecticut Yankee in King Arthur's Court, A (1889). A novel by Mark Twain. A blow on the head conveys the superintendent of a Hartford arms factory back to the days of King Arthur. When the Yankee's ingenuity and know-how encounter the world of medieval superstition, Mark Twain takes the opportunity to satirize the Old World, chivalry, kings, and the church. Many of the Arthurian knights are seen through the unimpressed eyes of the Yankee. He marries and has a child, but another blow restores him to his own time.

Connell, Norreys. See Conal O'Riordan.
Connelly, Marc [us Cook] (1890– ). American playwright. Connelly collaborated with George S. Kaufman on several plays: Dulcy; To the Ladies (1922), a study in illusions; Merton of the Movies (1922), a dramatization of Harry Leon Wilson’s satiric novel about Hollywood; and Beggar on Horseback. By himself he wrote The Wisdom Tooth (1926), a clerk’s futile but pleasant dream of how he defeats his employer; The Green Pastures; The Farmer Takes a Wife (1934), with characters taken from Walter D. Edmonds’ Rome Haul (1929); and A Story for Strangers (1948), a parable about a talking horse.

“Connelly, Cyril (1903– ). English essayist, critic, and novelist. He ran the magazine Horizon (1940–1949). His best-known book is The Unquiet Grave (1944), a collection of melancholy pensées, aphorisms, and quotations. It was published under the pen name Palinusurus (Connolly thinks Palinusurus fell into the sea through a typically modern will to failure). His other works are his partly autobiographical Enemies of Promise (1938); The Condemned Playground (1944), a collection of essays and literary criticism; the novel The Rock Pool (1935); and The Missing Diplomats (1953).

Conquest of Canaan, The. (1) A 9,000-line epic poem (1785) by Timothy Dwight, based on the Old Testament Book of Joshua and called by its author “the first American epic.” Joshua, who in the poem represents George Washington, was the leader under whom the Jews entered the Promised Land of Canaan and defeated the inhabitants. In the poem, one critic has remarked, 18th-century Americans with Hebrew names talk like Milton’s angels and fight like prehistoric Greeks.

(2) A novel (1905) by Booth Tarkington. Canaan is a town in Indiana where intolerance and narrow-mindedness hold sway. Joe London, making his way against great obstacles, wins out against the townspeople, marries a beautiful heiress, Ariel Tabor, and becomes the town’s mayor.

Conquistador (1932). A narrative poem by Archibald MacLeish. Awarded the 1933 Pulitzer Prize in poetry, it is based on an eye-witness account of the Spanish expedition led by Hernando Cortez to Mexico in the 16th century written by Bernal Diaz del Castillo. Heroic and realistic, it emphasizes the love of individual men for adventure, rather than official plans for expansion, as the real motive for the expedition.

Conrad. The hero of Lord Byron’s poem The Corsair. He is said to have been partly modeled on Jean Laffitte, the famous pirate who assisted Andrew Jackson at the Battle of New Orleans.

Conrad, Joseph (1857–1924). Polish-born English novelist, whose original name was Teodor Józef Konrad Korzeniowski. Best known in his own time as a writer of sea stories, he is now more admired as a novelist of moral exploration and a master of narrative technique. He was influenced by the technique of Henry James. (See Marlow.) Nostromo, Heart of Darkness, and Lord Jim are regarded as his greatest works. His earliest novels, including Almayer’s Folly and An Outcast of the Islands, are full of romantic description, with a mysterious, mystical atmosphere and much analysis and brooding. Youth, Typhoon, and The Shadow-Line—and, indeed, in some respect, most of his tales—describe men’s characters being tested in conditions of extreme danger and difficulty. Almost all his mature novels are concerned with moral dilemmas, isolation, and the psychology of men’s inner urges. Among these are The Nigger of the Narcissus, The Secret Agent, Under Western Eyes, Chance, Victory, The Arrow of Gold, and The Rescue. The Secret Sharer is a remarkable short story. Conrad collaborated with Ford Madox Ford on the novels The Inheritors (1901) and Romance (1903). He also wrote The Mirror of the Sea (1906), Some Reminiscences (1912, U.S. title, A Personal Record), and Notes on Life and Letters (1921).

The son of a Polish nobleman, writer, and militant nationalist, Conrad had an adventurous youth. (See Arrow of Gold and, for an account of his smuggling days, Mirror of the Sea.) From 1878 to 1894 he worked at sea on British merchant ships, rising to the rank of captain. As a boy he had educated himself by reading widely in Polish and French, but he began to learn English only when he became a seaman. He was a naturalized British citizen. In 1895 he published his first novel, Almayer’s Folly, left the sea, married, and settled down near London to write. Conrad is regarded as a major 20th-century novelist and a distinguished stylist in the English language.

Conradi, Hermann (1862–1890). German author and radical exponent of naturalism. In the preface to the anthology Moderne Dichtercharaktere (Modern Figures in Poetry, 1884) edited by him, he expresses the desire for a “modern” poetic movement, meaning timeliness and sincerity, as opposed to formal polish and artificiality. Among his own works are a collection of prose sketches, Brudertüten (Brualities, 1886), and a novel Adam Mensch (Adam Man, 1889).

Conrat, Valentin (1603–1675). French grammarian and man of letters. An original member of the Académie française, he was appointed perpetual secretary of that organization and enormously influenced its policies on grammar and style. Not a prolific author, he is remembered chiefly for the extant fragments of his Mémoires (1824), which include an account of the Fronde.

Conscience, Hendrik (1812–1883). Flemish novelist. In’t Wonderjaar 1566 (In the Year of Mars, 1566), published in 1837, was his first novel and the first book to be published in modern Flemish. De Leeuw van Vlanderen (The Lion of Flanders) of 1838 is the one of his more than 100 books that is likely to continue to be read.

conscience clause. A clause in an act of Parliament. It relieves persons with conscientious scruples from certain requirements in the act in which it appears. It generally has reference to religious matters, but came into wider prominence with the English Compulsory Vaccination Act of 1898, and with the introduction of conscription in the First World War.

conscript fathers. (Lat., Patres conscript.) The senators of ancient Rome. Romulus instituted a senate consisting of 100 elders, called Patres. After the Sabines joined the state, another hundred were added. Tarquinius Priscus, the fifth king of Rome, added a third hundred. When Tarquinius Superbus, the seventh and last king of Rome, was driven out by Junius Brutus, several of the senate followed him. Brutus appointed new men to the vacancies. The new members were enrolled in the senatorial registry and called Conscriputi; the entire body was then addressed as Patres et Conscriputi, or Patres conscriputi.

Consolation of Philosophy, The (De Consolatione Philosophiae; c. 524). A philosophical work by Boethius. Written while Boethius was in prison awaiting execution, it consists of a dialogue in alternating prose and verse between the author, lamenting his own sorrows, and a majestic woman who is the incarnation of his guardian Philosophy. She develops a modified form of Neoplatonism and Stoicism, demonstrating the unreality of earthly fortunes, then proving that the highest good and the highest happiness are in God, and reconciling the apparent contradictions concerning the existence of evil, if God is all-good and all-powerful, and the existence of man's free will, if God has foreknowledge of everything. The work became very popular; it inspired many translations, including English ones by King Alfred, Chaucer, and Queen Elizabeth.

Consonance. In poetry and prose, the identity of consonants, as in the words "leaves" and "lives." Like assonance and alliteration, consonance may be considered a form of rhyme since it involves degrees of identity of sound and serves to unify a poem.

Constable, Henry (1562–1613). English poet. A convert to Catholicism, Constable lived much of his life on the Continent. He wrote sonnets and pastoral poems, which are represented in England's Helicon (1600) and other anthologies. His sonnet sequence Diana was published in 1592 and expanded in 1594. A series of religious sonnets, Spiritual Sonnets to the Honor of God and His Saints (published 1815) is attributed to him.

Constable, John (1776–1837). English landscape painter. Mostly self-taught, he repeatedly sketched the same scenes, notably Salisbury cathedral, under varying conditions. In order to impart to his naturalistic landscapes the impression of moving clouds and changing light, he used looser, less blended brushstrokes than were usual at his time. He painted more finished exhibition pieces, yet gained little recognition in England. In France, however, Eugène Delacroix learned much from his brighter colors, the Barbizon school was influenced by the directness of his observation, and later, the Impressionists admired his temporary effects of light.

Constance. See under MAN OF LAW'S TALE.

Constance, Council of (1414–1418). The church council that brought about the end of the Great Schism, which had seen rival French and Roman popes reigning at the same time, each claiming supreme authority.

Constant de Rebecque, Henri Benjamin. Known as Benjamin Constant (1767–1830). Swiss-born French politician, journalist, novelist, best remembered for his short novel Adolphe. His famous liaison with Mme. de Staël began in 1794 and lasted for 17 years. From 1816 he devoted himself to his brilliant political career, writing political and religious treatises, including a pamphlet attacking Napoleon. His journals are of great interest.

Constantine I. Called the Great (a.d. 272–337). Roman emperor (306–337). On the death of his father, Constantine laid claim to part of the empire and was acknowledged as master of the countries beyond the Alps. He defeated Maxentius, who had possession of Italy, in the battle of the Milvian Bridge (312), where, according to legend, a cross appeared to him in the sky bearing the words in hoc signo vinces (“by this sign you will conquer”). He was converted to Christianity in 313. He defeated Licinius (323), who had gained possession of the East, and thus became sole emperor of the whole empire. He called the great Council of Nicaea (325) where the Nicene Creed was adopted. Constantine chose Byzantium as his capital and renamed it Constantinople after himself. See BYZANTINE EMPIRE.

Constantinople. The Christian capital of the Roman empire founded by Constantine the Great and dedicated in a.d. 330 on the site of ancient Byzantium. It remained the center of the Byzantine Empire, the successor to the Eastern Roman Empire, until 1453 when it fell to the Turks. Constantinople is now the Turkish city of Istanbul.

Constant Nymph, The (1924). A consistently popular novel by Margaret Kennedy. It concerns the family and friends of Albert Sanger, an eccentric musician who is the father of numerous children. His children, both legitimate and illegitimate and all talented, are known collectively as Sanger's circus. The nymph is 15-year-old Teresa Sanger, who has to deal with adult problems of love and fidelity.

Constitution. A 44-gun frigate, U.S. Navy, launched in 1797. The Constitution took part in the Tripolitan War against the Barbary corsairs of North Africa. Later, in the War of 1812, under the command of Isaac Hull (1773–1843), she forced the surrender of the British frigate Guerrière off Cape Race, Newfoundland (Aug. 19, 1812), and was victorious in seven other encounters. When the Constitution was ordered dismantled, Oliver Wendell Holmes wrote the poem Old Ironsides (1830), which prompted her rebuilding. She is now permanently moored at Boston and houses a museum.

Constitution of the United States of America. The fundamental law adopted in 1787 and in effect since March, 1789, supplanting the Articles of Confederation signed in 1781. The Constitution established a republican form of government for the U.S., with separate executive, legislative, and judicial branches. Twenty-four amendments to the original instrument have been adopted. The 24th amendment, ratified in 1964, forbids the collection of poll taxes as a requirement for voting in presidential and congressional elections. See BILL OF RIGHTS.

Consuelo (1842). A novel by George Sand. The title character, a gypsy girl raised in the streets of Venice, is discovered by the maestro Porpora and becomes a successful opera singer. She eventually marries a Bohemian count and travels with Joseph Haydn to Vienna. Her adventures end in Berlin, where she is feted and admired by Frederick the Great. La Comtesse de Rudolstadt (1843–1845) is a sequel.

Consul. One of the two chief magistrates of the ancient Roman republic chosen annually in the Campus Martius. In the early ages of Rome they were chosen by noble families, but in 367 B.C. the people were extended the privilege of electing one from among themselves. The consuls were the highest civil authority; they commanded the army and presided over the senate. At the expiration of one year of office, the consul was sent to govern a province and was then called a proconsul. The office continued under the empire and, although almost entirely stripped of its power, was a coveted position until A.D. 534. The original consulate was established in 509 B.C. when the people chose Tarquinius Collatius and Lucius Junius Brutus as consuls, after Brutus had driven Tarquinius Superbus, seventh and last of the Roman kings, out of Rome.

Consul, The (1950). A three-act tragic opera by Gian Carlo Menotti about a woman who desperately needs to leave her country and is frustrated by bureaucratic red tape.

Contes de ma mère l'Oye (Mother Goose Tales, 1697). A book of fairy tales by Charles Perrault. Drawing upon popular folk stories, Perrault collected the tales into a single volume and gave them the simple and graceful form in which they are known today. The Contes included La Belle au Bois Dormant (The Sleeping Beauty), Le Petit Chaperon Rouge (Little Red Riding-Hood), La Barbe-Blonde (Bluebeard), Le Maître-chou ou le chat botté (Puss-in-Boots), Les Fées (The Fairies), Cendrillon ou la petite pantoufle de verre (Cinderella, or The Little Glass Slipper), Riquet à la houppe, and Le Petit Poucet (Tom Thumb).

Contes Drolatiques (Droll Stories, 1832-1837). A collection of tales by Honoré de Balzac. Written in the style of the medieval fabliaux, these frequently gross tales are related with verve and gusto.

Contes et nouvelles en vers (1664-1674). A collection of tales derived from Ariosto, Boccaccio, Machiavelli, Petronius, and others by Jean de La Fontaine. Though set in graceful verse and popular in their day, the tales have often been criticized for their ribaldry, and upon his religious conversion, in 1692, La Fontaine publicly disavowed them.

Continental Congress. The congress of representatives from the British colonies of North America, first convened in Philadelphia in 1774 to consider grievances against the mother country. The Second Continental Congress adopted the Declaration of Independence, organized the Revolutionary Army, and conducted diplomatic negotiations with foreign nations. After the ratification of the Articles of Confederation (1781), it functioned as the central governing body of the new republic under the title, "The United States in Congress Assembled.

Contrast, The (1877). A play by Royall Tyler. Opening at the John Street Theater in New York City on April 16, 1877, it marked the true beginning of American drama. The plot involves the romantic affairs of Billy Dimple, a wealthy Anglophile, whose engagement to the clever Maria does not prevent him from flirting with other women. He eventually loses Maria to the staid but attractive Captain Manly, a Revolutionary officer. The most notable character, however, is Manly's servant Jonathan, first of the innumerable stage Yankees of American drama, whose plain practicality and wisdom make him a symbol of rural virtue.

Conversation at Midnight (1937). A long poem by Edna St. Vincent Millay. Eight men, assembled after dinner in a Washington Square house, discuss controversial social, political, and aesthetic issues of the time.

Conversations with Goethe. See Johann Peter Eckermann.

Convidado de piedra, El. See BURLADOR DE SEVILLA, EL.

Conway, Thomas. See Conway Cabal.

Conway Cabal (1777). A faction that tried unsuccessfully to remove Washington and make General Gates commander-in-chief of the American forces. Doubt still exists as to the nature and extent of the plot, but General Thomas Conway (1735–c. 1800), the man for whom it is named, probably did not play the leading role.

Cook or Cooke, Ebenezer (c. 1672–1732). American colonial poet, self-styled "Poet-laureate of Maryland." What little is known of Cook's life derives from his long satiric poem, The Sot-Weed Factor (1708), a diatribe against the crudities of life in the New World by one forced to live there because of "Friends unkind, and empty Purse." A revised edition of the poem appeared in 1731, with changes presenting a less harsh picture of colonial life. In the same volume, Cook published a verse history of England's Rebellion based upon the Bunceville Papers. Published by William Parks, the volume is entitled The Maryland Muse and is the first volume of American poetry published in the South. In 1960, John Barth published The Sot-Weed Factor, a satirical novel based on Cook's life.

Cook, George Cram (1873-1924). American novelist and playwright. Although Cook wrote Rod-erick Tailiferro (1903), a story of Montezuma's empire, and The Chasm (1911), a socialist novel, he is best known for his association with the American little theater movement. Cook and his wife, Susan Glaspell, organized the Provincetown Players in 1915 in Provincetown, Mass. There, under Cook's direction, the early plays of Eugene O'Neill were first produced. Re-established in New York in 1916, the group continued to produce O'Neill's plays. Suppressed Desires (1915) was a one-act comedy on a Freudian theme by Cook and his wife. His play The Spring was produced in New York in 1921. After the success with the Provincetown Players, Cook, who had no interest in competing with commercial theater, gave up the project and sailed in 1921 for Greece, where he lived until his death.

Cook, James. Known as Captain Cook (1728–1799). English navigator and explorer who discovered New Caledonia and the Sandwich (Hawaiian) Islands. He was murdered by the natives in revenge for a flogging administered to one of them for stealing a boat.

cook one's goose. To ruin one's prospects. According to legend, Eric, king of Sweden, came to a certain town with very few soldiers. The enemy, in mockery, hung out a goose for him to shoot at. Finding, however, that the king meant business, and that it would be no laughing matter for them, they sent heralds to ask him what he wanted. "To cook your goose for you," he replied.

Cook's Tale, The. An unfinished fragment in the Canterbury Tales of Geoffrey Chaucer. Roger the Cook laughs at the Recus'Tale and offers to tell a similarly bawdy jest. He begins a story about the apprentice Perkin, a reveller too fond of dice and women for his master's taste. A metrical romance sometimes called The Cook's Tale of Gamelyn has been erroneously attributed to Chaucer, who probably at one time intended to adapt it. See GAMELYN.

Coolidge, [John] Calvin (1872-1933). 30th president of the U.S. (1923-1929). Coolidge first won national attention when, as governor of Massachusetts, he broke the Boston police strike of 1919, declaring that there was "no right to strike against the public safety by anybody, anywhere, any time." In 1924 he became the Republican vice-presidential nominee and, succeeding to the presidency on the death of Warren G. Harding, was elected in his own right in 1924. In 1928 he announced that he did not "choose to run" for the presidency again. An uncompromising Republican, noted for his taciturnity and frugality, Coolidge wrote an Autobiography (1929). He was the subject of a well-known biography by William Allen White, A Puritan in Baby-ton (1938).

Cooper, Anthony Ashley. See 1st earl of Shaftesbury.

Cooper, James Fenimore (1789-1851). American novelist. James Fenimore Cooper, a son of the wealthy landowner Judge William Cooper, who founded Cooperstown, N.Y., was born in Burlington, N.J. After his expulsion from Yale, he became a sailor; in 1811, he married Susan DeLancy, and occupied himself as a gentleman farmer. At the age of 31 he wrote his first novel. Although Precaution (1820) was a failure, Cooper continued to write. In 1823, he wrote The Pioneers and The Pilot, both works of signal importance in American literature.
The Pilot is the first American novel of the sea, and
The Pioneers introduces the character of Natty Bumppo, the natural man uncorrupted by civilization. Natty has taken on mythic significance in the history of the American imagination. Cooper's audience demanded that he be revived in The Last of the Mohicans, The Prairie, The Pathfinder, and The Deerslayer.

From 1826 to 1833 the Coopers lived abroad. Turning out novels at a prolific rate, Cooper returned to Jacksonian America dismayed to discover that the democracy he had defended abroad had turned to mobocracy. He was outspoken in his criticism, and was denounced in the American press. In the 1840's, while involved in numerous lawsuits, he wrote an Antirent trilogy, The Littlepage Manuscripts, in which he defended the existence of a landed gentry as a stabilizing force in democracy. Satansto, with its lively portraits of contrasting Yankee, Middle Colony, and Dutch manners in colonial New York, is one of Cooper's most successful books.

Although Cooper's literary craftsmanship can rarely be admired, his 50-odd volumes, in their use of the American landscape and their unique creation of Leatherstocking, constitute the foundation of American literature. See LEATHERSTOCKING TALES, The; Spy, The; Monikins, The; American Democrat, The.

Cooper, Peter (1791-1883). American industrialist and philanthropist. The owner of a Baltimore iron works, Cooper designed and built the first American steam locomotive, popularly known as "Tom Thumb," in 1830. In 1857 he founded Cooper Union, an educational institution in New York City dedicated to the "advancement of science and art." He ran for the presidency in 1876 as the candidate of the Greenback Party.

Cooper, Samuel (1725-1783). American clergyman, known for his revolutionary writings against British rule in the colonies. He was the author of sermons, pamphlets, and articles for the Boston Gazette. His most famous work is The Crisis (1754), a pamphlet attacking the currently proposed bill for excise taxes in America. Cooper also worked prominently in support of the alliance with France (1778) made by Benjamin Franklin.

Coper, Jacques (1879-1949). Theatrical producer and critic. From 1904 to 1910, Copeau wrote as a drama critic; his essays are collected in Critiques d'Un autre temps (1923). With Gide and Riviére, he helped to found the Nouvelle Revue Française in 1909, and later became its editor in chief (1912-1914). Best known for his theatrical career, Copeau opposed the realism of Antoine and Lugné-Poë. With Charles Dullin and Louis Jouvet, he directed the Théâtre du Vieux-Colombier, an experimental playhouse that sought to bring poetry and subtle evocation back to the theater. Dullin and Jouvet eventually left to begin their own theaters; Copeau spent some years training young actors and from 1936 to 1941 served as a producer of the Comédie Française.

Copernicus, Nicolaus. Latinized form of Niklas Kopernigk (1473-1543). Polish astronomer. It was Copernicus who laid the foundations for modern astronomy by upsetting the Ptolemaic system of astronomy, which had prevailed since the second century. Proxem placed the earth at the center of the universe; Copernicus advanced the theory that the earth and all the other planets revolved around the sun in individual orbits while spinning on their axes.
He finished his treatise on this subject, De Revolu-tionibus Orbium Coelestium (On the Revolutions of Heavenly Bodies), in 1530, but it was not published until 1543, when its author lay dying. Opposition to his theories was theological as well as scientific: not only had Copernicus ignored the wisdom of the ancients, he had displaced man from the center of the universe.

Cophetua. A mythical king of Africa. Of great wealth, he fell in love with a beggar girl, Penelope (Zenelophon in Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost, IV, i.), and married her. He is the hero of a ballad in Percy's Reliques, and Tennyson versified the tale in The Beggar Maid.

Copland, Aaron (1900- ). American com-oposer. He is probably the best known representative of American nationalism in music. His most popular works employ American subjects and styles, often modeled on jazz or folk music, for example, in Music for the Theatre (1925), El Salon Mexico
(1937), and Appalachian Spring (1944, a ballet). Since 1930s he has been concerned with improving general understanding of modern music by organizing concerts and writing such books as What to Listen for in Music (1939), Our New Music (1941), and Music and the Imagination (1952).

Copley, John Singleton (1738-1815). American painter. He began his career as a portrait painter in Boston; in 1775, he settled in England, where he turned to historical painting. He is best known for his early portraits, sharply observed and executed in a severe and uncompromising manner.

Coppard, A[lfred] E[dgar] (1878-1957). English short-story writer and poet. Adam and Eve and Pinch Me (1921) was his first collection of short stories. Ranging from realism to fantasy, his stories are marked by pathos and gentle irony, and possess the direct narrative interest of the folk tale. His Collected Tales were published in 1951 and Lucy in Her Pink Jacket in 1954; his Collected Poems appeared in 1928.

Coppée, François Eduard Joachim (1842-1908). French poet and playwright. Coppée was a contributor to the Parnasse Contemporain (1866). His poetic works include Le Reliquaire (1866), Inimités (1869), Les Humbles (1872), Le Cahier Rouge (1874), and Les Récits et les Élégies (1878).

Copperheads. In U.S. history, Northerners, mainly Democrats, who during the Civil War favored the Confederate cause and advocated a negotiated peace.

Copts. Christian Egyptians who hold that St. Mark founded their church at Alexandria. They belong to the Jacobite branch of the Eastern Orthodox Church and, since the Council of Chalcedon in 451, have possessed the patriarchal chair of Alexandria. The word is probably derived from Coptos, the metropolis of the Thebaid. The Copts conduct their worship in a dead language called "Coptic," derived from ancient Egyptian but written in Greek capital letters. St. Anthony (c. 250-350), the founder of Christian monachism, was a Copt.

copyright. The exclusive right to reproduce, publish, and sell works of literature, music, or art. The first copyright act in England was that of 1709, subsequently subject to various modifications and additions. In 1842 a new act was passed granting copyright for 42 years after publication or until 7 years after the author's death, whichever should be the longer period. This act was superseded by the Copyright Act of 1911, under which the period of protection was extended to 50 years after the death of the author, irrespective of date of publication. This act also deals with copyright in photographs, engravings, architectural designs, musical compositions, and phonograph records.

The first copyright act in the U.S. was enacted by the states of Connecticut and Massachusetts in 1773, following vigorous agitation by Noah Webster. The first national statute, passed in 1790, was modelled upon the then existing British law. Additional acts were passed in 1846, 1856, 1839, and 1865. At present, U.S. copyrights may be secured under the Act of March 4, 1909 (as amended), for a period of 28 years; a 28 year renewal period is allowed, bringing the maximum period of copyright to 56 years.

Influenced by lobbyists for book manufacturers reluctant to extend U.S. copyright to books manufactured abroad, the U.S. did not sign the Berne International Copyright Convention (1886), and thus, until the formulating of the Universal Copyright Convention under the auspices of UNESCO, a certain confusion existed in the field of U.S.-international copyright. As the U.S. is one of the members of the Berne convention have signed the Universal Copyright Convention, a worldwide international copyright does not at the moment exist, the Soviet Union preferring in general to remain outside copyright conventions.

A common-law copyright, secured to the author by the act of creation and requiring no formality, is recognized in the U.S. and in England.

Coquette, The (1797). An American novel by Hannah Webster Foster. It is a roman à clef in epis tolary form, in which the heroine is seduced by an army officer and is later deserted by a minister who had once wooed her. Inconclusive attempts have been made to identify her as the daughter of a prominent Yale trustee, and her seducer as Aaron Burr or as the son of Jonathan Edwards.

Corbaccio (Carrion Crow). A miserably Venetian in Jonson's comedy Volpone, or the Fox. He disinherit his own son in a vain attempt to inherit the wealth of Volpone. His desperate attempts to acquire more wealth than he has already are more ironic in that Corbaccio himself is so old and decrepit that he will be unable to enjoy it.

Corbacho, El. See Alfonso Martínez de Toledo.

Corbet, Richard (1582-1635). English churchman and poet, known for his joviality. Although he served as bishop of Oxford and of Norwich, he was too convivial and tolerant to be an efficient prelate; his success was mainly due to his reputation as an anti-Puritan and his assiduous courtship of the powerful. A friend of Ben Jonson, he was popular at the Mermaid Tavern because of his skill at extemporizing poetry. Of his written works the best known is The Fairies' Farewell (1647), a humorous lament for the departure of England's merrier fairies, which Corbet blames on Puritanism.

Corbière, Edouard Joachim. Known as Tristan Corbière (1845-1875). French poet. Associated with the symbolist school, in his Gens de mers (published in Les Amours Jaunes, 1873), Corbière treats the world of those who live upon the sea in a realistic and forceful manner. See SYMBOLISTS.

Corbin, Alice. See Alice Corbin Henderson.

Corcoca. See Fabrie Queene, The.

Corday, Charlotte (1768-1793). French patriot who stabbed Jean Paul Marat to death in his bath. She was an adherent of the Revolution and sympathized with the Girondists, but was repelled by the excesses of the Reign of Terror. She was guillotined on July 17, 1793.

Cordelia. In Shakespeare's King Lear, the youngest daughter of Lear. She is disinherited by Lear because she lacks the "glib and oily art" of flattery. Her simplicity and sincerity move the king of France to marry her despite her disinheritance. It is of her that Lear speaks the famous lines: "Her voice was ever soft, gentle and low, an excellent thing in woman."

Cordelier (i.e. cord-wearer). A Franciscan friar of the strict rule. In the Middle Ages they distinguished themselves in philosophy and theology. Duw Scott was one of their most distinguished members. The traditional origin of the name is that in the reign of St. Louis they repulsed an army of infidels, and the king asked who those gens de cordeliers (corded people) were.

Cordeliers, the. French Revolutionary club of 1790 known officially as La Société des Amis des Droits de l'Homme et du Citoyen. Marat, Danton, and Robespierre were among the speakers at its meetings. The club played an active part in overthrowing both the monarchy and the Girondists. It ceased to function in 1794 when its leading members were guillotined. The name "Cordeliers" comes from the old (Franciscan) Cordelier monastery, where the club held its meetings.

Corelli, Arcangelo (1653–1713). Italian violinist and composer. He had a wide European reputation, and was the first to establish a characteristic style of writing for the violin. His best-known work is a set of variations on the Spanish dance La Folia.

Corelli, Marie. Pen name of Mary Mackay (1855–1924). English romantic novelist. She was sensationally popular at the end of the 19th century. At first ambitious to be a musician, she turned to literature after a "psychical experience." Her first novel, A Romance of Two Worlds (1886), like most of her later books, was about "spirit power and universal love." She also wrote Vendetta (1886), Barbies (1893), The Sorrows of Satan (1895), The Master Christian (1900), and many other novels.

Corin. In Shakespeare's As You Like It, a philosophical old shepherd who assuages Silvius' romantic grief and befriends Rosalind.

Corinna's Going A-Maying (1648). A poem by Robert Herrick, in which the poet implores his late-sleeping mistress to rise and join the May Day festivities. Against a background of spring freshness and picturesque country rite, he sings of life's shortness, urging love and "the harmless folly of the time."

Corinne, or Italy (1807). A romantic novel by Mme. de Staël. Oswald Nevil, an English lord, recuperating in Rome, meets the famous poetess Corinne, who, half-English and half-Italian, has exiled herself from her native England; they fall in love. Nevil wishes to marry Corinne, but she hesitates, fearing the rigidity of the English life she once knew; her present unconventional life is too dear to her. Oswald, forced to return to England, later gives in to the pressures of his social milieu and marries the wholly English Lucile, half sister of Corinne. When she learns of the marriage, Corinne dies of grief. Idealistic and passionate, Corinne is a psychological study of two tormented souls, and a celebrated description of Italian civilization and mores.

Corinthians, The First Epistle and The Second Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the. Two books of the New Testament. They are letters written by Paul to the troubled Christian church in the cosmopolitan Greek city of Corinth. The two canonical letters incorporate parts of two other letters. The Christians in Corinth were exposed to the very worldly, licentious atmosphere of this city. Paul tells them to ignore these influences; he also deals with a crisis over internal dissension and local authority. These two books are of particular historical interest because of the insight they offer into first-century Christians' problems with the pagan world. The 13th chapter of I Corinthians contains Paul's beautiful discourse on Christian love, one of the most noteworthy chapters in the Bible.

Coriolanus, The Tragedy of (c. 1608). A tragedy by William Shakespeare. Caius Martius, an honorable but haughty patrician, defeats the Volscians under Tullus Aufidius at Corioli and is given the name of Coriolanus. He is then persuaded to seek election to the consulship, though the thought of curryng favor with the masses repels him. When Brutus and Sicinius, two unscrupulous tribunes, incite the populace against him, Coriolanus angrily denounces the plebeians for their fickleness and ingratitude and is driven from the city. Enraged by the treatment he has received, he joins the forces of Aufidius, who is preparing another attack on Rome. As the Volscian army menaces Rome, Menenius and Cominius, two old friends, unsuccessfully plead with Coriolanus to spare the city, but he remains obdurate until Volurnia, his mother, and Virgilia, his wife, add their appeals to the others. Coriolanus raises the siege and tries to explain his conduct to the Volscians. Aufidius, envious of the Roman's prestige, accuses him of treachery, and as the Volscians hurl abuse at him, Coriolanus is murdered by agents of Aufidius.

The direct source of the play is Thomas North's translation (1579) of Plutarch's Lives, which records the career of the legendary patrician.

Cornoaro, Luigi (1467–1566). Italian author. He wrote four Discorsi della vita sobria (Discourses on the Life of Moderation). His work was translated by George Herbert and admired by many subsequent authors, including Addison.

Corneille, Pierre (1606–1684). French dramatist. Son of a lawyer, he abandoned a career at the bar in order to write for the theater, initially under the patronage of Richelieu as one of the cardinal's Cinque Auteurs. Mélite (1629), his first play and a comedy of manners, was successfully produced in Paris. There followed the tragicomedy Cilindro (1632), seven comedies of only moderate interest, and his first tragedy, Mérope (1635). Although La Cm (1637) won an enormous popular success, Richelieu persuaded the Académie française to censure the play's violation of the dramatic unities as well as its emotional style. Madame de Rambouillet's salon also expressed doubt concerning the play's merit. For three years, chastened and disturbed, Corneille wrote nothing for the theater. He finally broke his silence with the tragedies Horace, Cinna, Polyeucte, Rodogune, Héraclius, La Mort de Pompée, Nicomède, Andromède, and a comedy, Le Menteur. With Le Cid, these tragedies marked Corneille's brief leadership of the French stage. After the failure of Pertharies (1651), Corneille withdrew to Rouen. In 1659 he returned to the theater with Oedipe, only to find that during his absence the public had come to prefer the directness and simplicity of Racine to the complexity of his own late style. The plays of Corneille's decline include the tragedies La Toison d'or (The Golden Fleece, 1660), Sertorius (1662), Sophonisbe (1663), Othon (1664), Agésilas, Attila, Suréna (1674), and the comedies Tite et Bérente (1670) and Pulchérie (1672). Corneille eventually retired from the theater and translated The Imitation of Christ into French verse.

Corneille can be considered the prime shaper of the French classic theater. While earlier writers had attempted a tragedy of actions, Corneille sought tragedy in the depiction of the human soul, thus substituting an interior drama for the exterior drama of his predecessors. Borrowing the greater part of his subjects from classical mythology and history, Cornellie excelled in the creation of tragic protagonists: men and women of heroic dimension caught in the conflict of reason, will, or duty with an all-powerful love or hatred. Propelled by the highest sentiments and gifted with an enormous will to triumph over the obstacles of destiny, his characters are drawn in large, bold strokes and sometimes, in the magnificence of their deeds and language, exceed the bounds of humanity and rise to the superhuman.

Cornelle, Thomas (1625-1709). French playwright and brother of Pierre Cornelle. A skilled technicen and an accomplished imitator, he kept the French theater stocked with workmanlike though not highly original plays during the interval between Pierre Corneille's great tragedies and those of Racine. Notable among his works are the romantic tragedy Timocrate (1656), based on an episode in La Calprenède's Cléopâtre, and the heroic tragedy Ariane (1672), based on the Ariadne legend.

Cornelia. See GRATCHE.

Cornelius. See VOLTIMAND.

Cornford, Frances Crofts (1886-1960). English poet. The granddaughter of Charles Darwin and wife of Francis Macdonald Cornford, she usually wrote restrained poems about nature; her best-known poem is the ironic To a Fat Lady Seen from the Train. Her Collected Poems appeared in 1954.

Cornford, Francis Macdonald (1874-1943). English scholar. He wrote From Religion to Philosophy (1912), an anthropological study, and The Origin of Attic Comedy (1914), in which he traces comedy back to the Dionysian fertility rites.

Cornhuskers (1918). A collection of poems by Carl Sandburg. It includes such well-known poems as Cool Tombs, Prairie, Caboose Thoughts, Wilderness, Chicago Poet, Testament, and Haunts.

corn laws. Laws passed at various times in English history, from 1436 to 1842, regulating the domestic and foreign grain trade of England. The most controversial corn laws were those of the 19th century, which levied a high duty on imports and raised domestic prices, causing great hardship among the poor of England, especially in the manufacturing districts. Feeling against the laws ran high and when the Corn Law of 1815 was passed in order to counteract the post-Napoleonic depression, there were riots. In 1839, an Anti-Corn Law League was formed to bring about repeal of the laws. Richard Cobden and John Bright were the leading orators associated with the Anti-Corn Law League. The grain tariff was reduced in 1846 and entirely abolished in 1862.

Cornucopia. The horn of plenty, an ancient symbol of the bounty of growing things. Often identified with the horn of Amaltheia, the goat that suckled the infant Zeus, it was frequently shown in art as an attribute of various forms of a fertility daemon.

Cornwall, duke of. In Shakespeare's King Lear, the grasping, ruthless husband of Lear's daughter Regan. When Gloucester shelters Lear, Cornwall plucks Gloucester's eyes out in revenge. A servant, horrified at the cruel deed, kills Cornwall and is in turn killed by Regan.

Cornwallis, Charles, 1st marquis (1738-1805). English major general in the American Revolution. He defeated General Greene at Guilford Courthouse, N.C., but was forced to surrender at Yorktown shortly thereafter. He later served as viceroy of Ireland and governor-general of India.

Coronado, Francisco Vásquez de (1510-1554), Spanish explorer. In 1540 Coronado left Mexico as commander of an expedition to conquer the Seven Cities of Cibola in present New Mexico, which earlier explorers had described in glowing terms. After undergoing extreme hardships and traversing Arizona, New Mexico, Texas, Oklahoma, and Kansas, Coronado returned to Mexico empty-handed and disillusioned. One of his men, García López de Caldelón, discovered the Grand Canyon on a side expedition.

Corot, Jean Baptiste Camille (1796-1875). French landscape painter. The least realistic of the Barbizon school, his style evolved from the influence of contemporary classicism to the poetic rendition of landscapes in which a silver-grey haze envelops and harmonizes perfectly balanced figures and trees. Corot's work also includes historical subjects and figure paintings, the latter being only less prized than his landscapes today.

Corpus Juris Civilis. See under JUSTINIAN I.

Correggio, Antonio Allegri da (c. 1489-1534). Italian painter. He is known for his use of chiaroscuro and blurred outlines in mythological paintings. These have a sensuous, almost seductive, sweetness and reveal his use of light and trompe l'oeil to create the illusion of church ceilings opening up into the heavens. His mythological paintings—Antiope, Jupiter and Io, Ganymede—strongly influenced French painting during the 18th century. His frescoes on the octagonal cupola of the cathedral at Parma was a leading source of later baroque ceiling decoration in Italy and throughout Europe.

Corsair, The (1814). A narrative poem by Lord Byron. The pirate chief Conrad disguises himself as a dervish, in order to enter the palace of Sultan Seyd. He is discovered and imprisoned, but Gulnare, que of the harem, releases him, and he returns to the pirates' isle, only to find that Medora, his true love, has died in his absence. He, therefore, returns to his native Greece, where he heads a rebellion and is shot. Upon his death, his page Kaled is discovered to be Gulnare in disguise. Lara (1814), another narrative poem, deals with Conrad's last adventures in Spain, where he has returned as Lara. He lives a strange and secluded life until he is recognized and killed. Conrad and Lara are prototypes of the Byronic hero, extrava gant, romantic, and mysterious. See Sir Ezzelin.

Corso, Gregory. See BEAT MOVEMENT.

Cortez or Cortés, Hernando or Hernán (1485-1547). Spanish conqueror of Mexico. Cortez arrived in the New World in 1504 and was mayor of Santiago, Cuba, when he was ordered by Governor Velázquez to lead an expedition to Mexico. Velázquez later tried to halt the voyage, but Cortez had already set sail (1519). Reaching the mainland, he was fortunate in acquiring the services of two interpreters, one of whom was the famed Malinche or Doña Marina, daughter of an Aztec chieftain, whom the Maya had enslaved; she became Cortez' mistress as well as his confidante.

After founding the city of Vera Cruz, Cortez moved against the Aztec capital at Tenochtitlán, forming alliances with other Indian tribes, such as the Tlaxcalans, who hated the Aztecs. When some of the more faint-hearted Spaniards spoke of returning to Cuba, Cortez ordered their ships to be destroyed.

Although Montezuma, the Aztec chief at Tenochtitlán, was outwardly friendly, Cortez captured him and held him as a hostage. Upon hearing that Velázquez, in an attempt to reassert his authority over Mexico, had dispatched another expedition under Pánfilo de Narváez, Cortez returned to the seacoast and persuaded Narváez' men to desert their commander and join him. Back in Tenochtitlán, he found that the actions of Pedro de Alvarado, his deputy, who had incited the Indians to revolt and that Montezuma had been killed. During the disastrous noche triste, or "sad night" (June 30, 1520), the Spaniards were forced to flee with the loss of many men. Cortez immediately began to plan another campaign against Tenochtitlán, which was captured the following year. Though he was granted many honors and was created marquis of the Valley of Oaxaca, Cortez gradually lost his political power in Mexico and was supplanted in 1535 by the first viceroy, Antonio de Mendoza.

Cortez himself gave a vivid description of the conquest of Mexico in five letters he wrote to Charles V of Spain. The best-known account, however, is the history of Bernal Díaz del Castillo, which Archibald MacLeish used as the basis of his poem Conquistador (1932). Novels laid in this period include Lew Wallace's The Fair God (1873) and Samuel Shellabarger's Captain from Castile (1945). See CUAHTÉMOC.

Corvino (It., "Raven"). A greedy merchant in Jonson's comedy Volpone, or the Fox. Though very jealous of his innocent young wife, Celina, he willingly offers her to the lecherous Volpone in the hope of inheriting some of his money.

Corvo, Baron. See Frederick Rolfe.

Cory, William Johnson (1823–1892). English poet, classicist. Cory published a single volume of verse, Ionica (1858), in which is found the famous translation from Callimachus, Hecatus, beginning "They told me, Hecatus, they told me you were dead."

Coryate or Coryat, Thomas (1577–1617). English traveler and buffoon at court. Coryate's Crudities (1611) is a curious account of his travels on foot through France, Savoy, Italy, and other countries.

corybantes (korybantes). See CYBELE.

Corydon. A conventional name for a rustic or shepherd; a brainless, love-sick youth derived from the shepherd in Vergil's Bucolic II. See ARCADES AMBO.

Corydon (1924). An essay in dialogue form by André Gide. Written during the years 1911–1920, it maintains that the homosexual is not unnatural, nor harmful either to himself or to society. It provoked violent criticism, directed less toward the book than toward Gide himself.

Coryell, John R. See Nick CARTER.

cyphaios (koryphaios). The leader of the chorus in Greek classical drama. An earlier term for the same office was choragos. Both words have been used figuratively to apply to the leader of any group, or, more especially, its most active member.

Cosette. In Victor Hugo's novel Les Misérables, the daughter of Fantine and the adopted daughter of Jean Valjean.

Cosimo, Piero di (1462–1521). Florentine painter. He is noted for the lyric quality of his paintings and his penchant for the fantastic and the strange. In his religious works or in his mythological scenes, harshness alternates with tender melancholy. Vasari says he boiled his eggs with the varnishes, 50 at a time, in order to devote every minute to his work. His best-known works include the Death of Procris, the Passage of the Red Sea (one of the Sistine Chapel frescoes), and the Memorial Portrait of Simonetta Vespucci, the celebrated Florentine beauty used by Boticelli as a model for his Primavera and Birth of Venus.

Cossacks, The (Kazaki; 1863). A novel by Count Leo Tolstoy. The central character, Olenin, tired of life in civilized society, attempts to find happiness among the wild, free-living Cossacks of the Caucasus. The portraits of the old Cossack Eroshka and the native girl Maryana are especially successful. Critics generally cite this short work as the finest book written by Tolstoi before War and Peace.

Costain, Thomas B[ extravagant] (1885– ). Canadian-born American writer. Costain came to the U.S. in 1920 and became fiction editor of The Saturday Evening Post. He is best known for his historical novels, notably The Black Rose (1945), which is set in medieval England and China, and The Silver Chalice (1953), a biblical tale woven around the chalice of Antioch. Costain also wrote Joshua (1943), a biography of the biblical hero, and several volumes of popular history, including The Three Edwards (1958) and The Last Plantagenets (1962), Son of a Hundred Kings (1930) is a semi-autobiographical novel about a Canadian boy.

Costard. In Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost, an unlettered clown who tries to imitate the learned court wits of Elizabethan times. He uses the word "honoficabilitudinitatibus" and speaks of the "contempts" of a letter.

Côté de chez Swann, Du. See REMEMBRANCE OF THINGS PAST.

Côté de Guermantes, Le. See REMEMBRANCE OF THINGS PAST.

Cotton, Charles (1630–1687). English poet and translator. Cotton is best known for his translation (1683) of Montaigne's Essais, a clear, faithful, and vigorous version which is often preferred to the earlier Florio translation. An intimate friend of Izaak Walton, he wrote a treatise on fly-fishing which was included in the fifth edition (1676) of The Compleat Angler. Cotton was also the author of several other translations from the French, some rather scurrilous burlesques of Vergil and Lucian, and a number of poems on fishing, country life, and related subjects, which have a certain homely charm and fidelity to the rural scene. These last, collected in Poems on Several Occasions (1689), were admired by Wordsworth, Coleridge, and Lamb.
Cotton, John (1584-1652). English-born Puritan clergyman and writer. Dissatisfied with conditions in England, Cotton, who was already a famous clergyman, emigrated to Boston in 1633 and became one of the colony's most influential leaders. Known for his tireless scholarship and aristocratic political views, he wrote numerous works including The Keys of the Kingdom of Heaven (1644); Milk for Babes (1646), a children's catechism; and The Bloudy Tenent Washed (1647), part of a celebrated controversy with Roger Williams (see BLOODY TENENT, ThE). Cotton Mather was his grandson.

Cotton, Sir Robert Bruce (1571-1631). English antiquary, collector of books, manuscripts, coins, medals, etc. He was the founder of the famous Cottonian Library, now in the British Museum, which contained many otherwise unobtainable manuscripts saved from destroyed monasteries, including those of Beowulf, The Pearl, and Gawaine and the Green Knight. The identifying titles of the manuscripts were derived from the busts of Roman emperors which adorned the bookcases holding these collections; thus, the Beowulf manuscript is called "Cotton Vitellius A XV" from the Emperor Vitellius, and the manuscript of The Pearl is known as "Cotton Nero A X" from the Emperor Nero.

Cotton allowed the free use of his library to leading scholars of his time and presented manuscripts from his collection to the Bodleian Library when it was founded. His library was bequeathed to the English nation on the death of his grandson in 1701.

Cotytto. The Thracian goddess of fertility, worshipped at Athens with licentious rites. See BAPTES.

Council of Nicaea (325). The first ecumenical council of the Christian Church. Called by CONSTANTINE THE GREAT, it was held in Nicaea, a small town in Bithynia, Asia Minor. The major undertaking of the council was a discussion of the views of Arius, who held that Jesus was the most exalted human of all time, but had not been created out of nothing nor was he eternally existent, and that he was capable of right and wrong in his own free will. The council's decision was against Arius, ascribing a purely divine nature to Jesus (see TRINITY).

The council published a confession of faith called the Nicene Creed (from the Latin credo, "I believe"). It was based on an older creed that had been used in Caesarea, but carefully defined the orthodox doctrine of the Trinity. The Nicene Creed is used (with minor changes) in the liturgies of the Roman, Greek, and Anglican churches, and its doctrinal teachings have been accepted by most Protestants.

Counterfeaters, The (Les Faux-Monnayeurs; 1926). A novel by André GIDE. The novelist Edouard keeps a journal of events in order to write a novel about the nature of reality. The intrigues of a gang of counterfeiters symbolize the "counterfeit" personalities with which people disguise themselves to conform hypocritically to convention or to deceive themselves. The adolescent boys Bernard Profidentieu and Olivier Molnier, having left home in order to be free to find and develop their true selves, encounter many varieties of hypocrisy and self-deception in human relationships and barely escape falling into such poses themselves. Both begin by seeking a close emotional tie with Edouard. Each, however, comes to recognize that Edouard is inadequate as an ideal for emulation, particularly when the novelist cannot recognize the psychological reality of the schoolboy Boris' useless suicide, which is an indirect result of the counterfeiters' machinations.

Counter Reformation. A term used to describe the Roman Catholic reaction to the Protestant Reformation of the 16th century. Beginning with the Council of Trent, and later through the efforts of the INQUISITION and the JESUITS, the Roman church sought to consolidate its position and win back its former adherents. Literature and the other arts became involved as vehicles for the renewal of faith and the propagandizing of Roman Catholic dogma. Artists were bound by conscience and external pressure to help or at least not hinder the cause. The so-called Counter-Reformation style in literature, sometimes identified with or considered a part of the baroque style, flourished during the latter half of the 16th century and the first half of the 17th century. It was characterized by the use of rhetoric, a straining after the ironic, the paradoxical, and the witty, attempts to render reality as well as the world of the spirit in concrete and highly sensuous imagery, especially in religious verse. Though its leading practitioners in Italy, Spain, France, and England, poets such as Tasso, Marino, Ceppède, Gongora, Lope de Vega, Southwell, and Crashaw were Catholics, the style left its mark on such Protestant poets as D'Aubigné and Donne in their use of the metaphysical conceit.

Countess Cathleen, The (1891). A poetic drama by William Butler Yeats. It describes how the countess Cathleen sells her soul to the devil in exchange for the souls of the starving Irish peasants. In her wanderings through Ireland the Countess Cathleen is accompanied by Oona, an old nurse, and Alel, a poet who loves her in vain. The part of the countess was written for Maud Gonne. The play was one of the first produced by the company that was later to become the ABBEY THEATRE company. At its first production it provoked a riot by Catholics offended at what they considered Yeats's theological irregularity in having God save the heroine's soul at the end.

Count of Monte Cristo, The (Le Comte de Monte Cristo; 1844). A romance by Alexandre DUMAS. The hero, Edmond Dantès, is about to begin a blissful existence as captain of his vessel and husband of his sweetheart, when a false political charge condemns him to life imprisonment. He escapes, in a highly dramatic manner, and flees to the island of Monte Cristo. With the aid of a treasure he uncovers, Dantès becomes a powerful and darkly mysterious figure. Eventually, all who wronged him suffer his revenge.

Country Doctor, The (Le Médecin de campagne; 1833). A novel, part of La Comédie Humaine, by Honoré de BALZAC. The title character is Dr. Benassis, whose kindling spirit and indefatigable efforts on behalf of the people of his village make him universally beloved.

Country House, The (1907). A novel by John GALSworthy. It is a naturalistic social study of the traditions and attitudes of the English landed aristocracy. These traditions are threatened in the Pendyce family when the dashing young son, George Pendyce, becomes involved in a divorce scandal. Eventually, through the coercion of his father and the sentimental persuasions of his mother, George is extricated. Thus Galsworthy ends by supporting the values of country house life and reassuring his conservative readers that they need not take his satire and criticism too seriously.

Country of the Pointed Firs, The (1896). A book of tales and sketches by Sarah Orne Jewett. Thinly bound together by a faint thread of plot, the entire series describes a Maine seaport town from the point of view of a summer resident. The portraits of the townspeople are sympathetically drawn. Willa Cather thought so well of the book that she placed it beside Huckleberry Finn and The Scarlet Letter.

Country Wife, The (1675). A comedy by William Wycherley. Pinchwife, an overly jealous husband, brings his simple country wife, Margery, to London for the marriage of his sister Alitha to the cedulous Sparkish. Despite Pinchwife's efforts, Margery soon becomes familiar with the fashionable ways of the city and ends by cuckoldling him with the libertine Horner, who has spread the rumor that he is a eunuch to facilitate his access to willing wives. Thus, Pinchwife's jealousy leads his wife to infidelity while Sparkish eventually loses Alitha because of excessive confidence in her loyalty.

In 1766 Garrick rewrote the play as The Country Girl, modifying some of its bawdiness.

Couperus, Louis Marie Anne (1863-1923). Dutch novelist. He is known as the outstanding writer of the Dutch realist school of fiction. His most important works chronicle the lives of insignificant people with great insight and attention to detail. The Small Souls, the first of a tetralogy, is the best example of this preoccupation, though Old People and the Things That Pass is probably his outstanding single novel. He wrote more than 30 novels.

Couplet. In prosody, a pair of lines forming a unit. This is usually because they are either set off as a separate stanza or because they rhyme. The best known couplet is the so-called heroïc couplet.

Courbet, Gustave (1819-1877). French painter. Spokesman of realism, he painted straightforward and unembellished, oversized scenes of everyday life and autobiographical events. Although he was decried by his contemporary contemporaries, he rejected harmonious composition and color in his desire to express truth, and achieved a forceful expression, especially in his landscapes.

Cours de Philosophie Positive. See Auguste Comte.

Courtier, The (II Cortegiano; 1528). A Renaissance courtesy book by Baldassare Castiglione. Written in 1518, its four books of dialogues describe the conversations held at the court of Urbino on four successive evenings in 1507. The main interlocutors are Federico Fregoso, Lodovico Di Canossa, Bernardo Bibbiena, Giuliano de' Medici, Pietro Bembo, Ottaviano Fregoso, and Emilia Pia, who along with the hostess, Elisabetta Gonzaga, acts as moderator. In the first book, the ideal courtier is said to require noble birth, skill in arms, courage, a handsome appearance, and dexterity in swimming, hunting, dancing, and the arts. He must be able to write and speak well, but above all without affectation. The manner of doing these things must be nonchalant and natural (sprezzatura).

The second book is devoted to language, the kind and the occasion of speech as well as the manner of addressing oneself to princes and friends. Bibbiena dominates the discussion with a long treatment of jests and witticisms. The third book features Giuliano de' Medici's discourse on the donna di palazzo, the court lady, who is required to maintain her femininity while displaying a knowledge of letters, the arts, and how to entertain the court. She must be morally superior, an injunction that produces a lengthy debate on the chastity of women and the problems of amatory relationships at court.

The fourth book deals with the final and true role of the ideal courtier: to guide his prince in matters of government and state. After further discussion of the education of the prince and the best forms of political organization, Bembo concludes the book with a rhapsodic explanation of Platonic Love, the union of beauty and goodness in the ascent to God.

Not long after its publication, the book was translated into French, German, Spanish, and Russian. The English version of Sir Thomas Hoby (1561) insured its popularity in England, where it influenced the writings of Spenser and Sidney, the plays of Shakespeare, and the educational and social theory and practice of the English Renaissance. With the courtesy books of Guazzo and Della Casa, it formed a trio of crucial landmarks in the development of English attitudes towards the requirements of being a gentleman.

Courtin', The (1867). A poem by James Russell Lowell. Written in Yankee dialect, it was originally published in the second series of The Biglow Papers. This tale of rural courtship was introduced as a diversion from the discussions of politics with which the rest of the Biglow Papers are concerned. The poem is still valued as a fine example of native American humor and sentiment.

courty love or (Fr.) amour courtois. A medieval code of attitudes toward love and of the highly conventionalized conduct considered suitable for noble lords and ladies. It postulates the adoration and respect of a gallant and courageous knight or courtier for a beautiful, intelligent, lofty-minded noblewoman who usually remains chaste and unattainable. He performs noble deeds for her sake, but suffers terribly because she remains indifferent or, even if she favors his devotion, because her purity and his respect for it prevent the consumption of their love. Often he must keep secret the name of his beloved, although he carries her scarf or glove into battle or celebrates her beauty in song, for the lady is usually married to someone else; a basic tenet of the code is the incompatibility of love with marriage. Nevertheless, the lover welcomes the suffering of his passion, for it en-nobles him and inspires him to great achievements.

The tradition of courtly love seems to have first been popularized by the Provencal trouvaires of southern France in the 11th century. Through Eleanor of Aquitaine's patronage of the trouba-dours, the convention spread to the royal courts of northern France, of England, and then of Germany (see MINSINGERS). Eleanor's daughter Marie de Champagne urged her chaplain Andraas Capellanus to write a treatise on the art of love; and the "court of love," in which a group of court gentlefolk gather to debate specific theoretical problems of conduct in the interpretation of the code, became popular as a social pastime and a literary convention. The principles of courtly love were embodied in the first part of the allegorical Romance of the Rose, and in medieval romances such as the cycles concerning King Arthur, Tristan and Isolde, and Troilus and Cressida, most notably in the version of the Lancrelott legend
by Chretien de Troyes.

In the 16th century the Stilnovisti of the late 13th century adapted the tradition in a "sweet new style," which further idealized the role of woman in the spiritual erection of the man who adores her. This worship of the beloved thus became fused with the cult of the Virgin Mary, and with the concept of the ideal in Platonism. By the 16th century courtly love had become only one aspect of the code governing the entire bearing and conduct of the courtier and his lady.
The most famous handbook of courtly behavior was Castiglione's The Courtier, translated into English by Sir Thomas Hoby in 1561. This and the Stilnovistic works of Dante and Petrarch, all identifying physical beauty and social decorum with moral and ultimately with spiritual worth and the approach to a Platonic ideal, greatly influenced much Elizabethan writing, such as that of Sir Philip Sidney and Edmund Spenser. The exaltation of a worthy woman because of the elevating aspect of courtly love is especially prominent in Spenser's _Four Hymns_.

Courts of Miles Standish. The (1858). A long narrative poem by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. The captain of the Plymouth settlement, Miles Standish, sends his friend John Alden to woo Priscilla Mullins for him. Despite his honest pleas for the older man, Priscilla prefers John as a husband.

When Miles is reported killed, the lovers plan their marriage. On the eve of the wedding Standish returns to give his blessings to the young couple.

Cousin, Victor (1792–1867). French philosopher and teacher. A professor of philosophy at the Sor-bonne, Cousin delivered brilliant lectures, helping to increase the reputation of the university. A student of German philosophy, he met both Hegel and Schel-
ing. Not a philosophical creator, but a synthesizer who drew upon former systems, Cousin is considered the founder of the Eclectic school. Among his published works are Cours d'histoire de la philosophie moderne (1841–46) and _Fragments pour servir à l'histoire de la philosophie* (1865).

Cousine Bette, La (1846). A novel, part of La Comédie Humaine, by Honoré de Balzac. The title character, Lisbeth Fischer, is a harsh old spinster who marks frustration and bitterness behind a facade of good will. Driven by fierce jealousy, she deliberately destroys a romance between her young niece and a Polish sculptor.

Cousin Pons, Le (1847). A novel, part of La Comédie Humaine, by Honoré de Balzac. The hero, Silvain Pons, is a musical composer who squanders most of his income on works of art. Ugly and lonely, he becomes a glutton and social parasite as he grows older.

Cousins, Norman (1912– ). American journalistic and editor. Cousins became editor of the Saturday Review in 1942. A decade later he dropped the words "of Literature" from the title and broad-ned the magazine's scope to reflect his interest in world affairs and arts of communication other than literature. Cousin has also written books on world federalism and foreign policy, including _Modern Man Is Obsolete_ (1945) and _In Place of Folly_ (1961).

Cousteau, Jacques-Yves (1910– ). French underwater explorer and writer. Inventor of the Aqua-Lung and other devices for submarine investigation, he records many of his experiments and discovers in _The Silent World_ (1953) and _The Living

Covenants. A term applied, during the 16th and 17th centuries, to the Scottish Presbyterians who banded together in a series of agreements, or covenants, to defend their religion against royal encroachments. In 1643 the English Parliament and the Scots drew up a Solemn League and Covenant that provided for changes in the English church in conformity with Presbyterian principles; in return, the Covenants agreed to join the Parliamentary struggle against Charles I.

Coventry Cycle. A cycle of miracle plays. Supposedly they were performed at Coventry, England.
They are among the best of the surviving plays of this genre.

Coverdale, Miles (1) (1488–1568). An English priest, converted to Lutheranism and translator of the first complete Bible in English (1535). See _Bible, English versions_.

(2) The narrator of Hawthorne's _Blithedale Romances_ and a leading character in the story.

Coverley, Sir Roger de. The simple, good, and altogether delightful country squire created by Richard Steele as a chief character in the imaginary club that supposedly wrote _The Spectator_. He was further developed by Joseph Addison, and it is to Addison that we are indebted for this portrait of a perfect English gentleman in the reign of Queen Anne. Roger de Coverley is the name of a country-dance similar to the Virginia Reel and it was Addison's fiction that Sir Roger's great-grandfather invented the dance.

Covetous Knight, The. See LITTLE TRAGEDIES.

Coxey's Army. A group of about 400 unemployed who marched on Washington, D.C., in 1894 during a period of economic distress. Led by Jacob S. Coxey (1854–1951), they demanded federal legislation to create jobs and increase the amount of money in circulation. The army disbanded after Coxey and two other leaders were arrested for trespassing on the grounds of the Capitol. Coxey led another army in 1914.

Coward, Noel [Pierce] (1899–). English actor, composer, and playwright. He is best known for his witty, brittle, and sophisticated comedies of the British "leisure class." His works for the theater, in addition to musical revues, include The Vortex (1923), a serious drama; Bitter Sweet (1929), an operetta; Private Lives (1931), his most successful comedy; Cavalcade (1931), a patriotic play on the British Victorian tradition in the history of a single family; and Blithe Spirit (1941). Present Indicative (1937) is an autobiography; Pomp and Circumstance (1960) is a novel. He wrote, directed, and acted in a war movie In Which We Serve (1943). The second volume of his autobiography Future Indefinite was published in 1954; it describes his experiences as an entertainer in the second World War. His costume piece Quadrille (1954), starring the Lunts, had long runs in both London and New York. He has appeared on television and in night clubs.

cowboy. A Western cattle herder. The name was originally applied to Tory raiders during the American Revolution who plundered neutral land. The Western version is a breed that learned much of its ways of life from the Mexican vaquero. Dime novels did much to make the cowboy a popular folk figure in the U.S., and the tradition has been carried on with apparently untiring success by the motion pictures and, later, by television.

Cowley, Abraham (1618–1667). English metaphysical poet and essayist. His conceits were fantastic and extreme, popular in his own day, but regarded with disfavor by the time of Dryden. He was also famous as the originator of the English Pindaric ode. Cowley published his first volume, Poetical Blossoms (1633), at the age of 15; later works include Davidides, his best-known poem.

Cowley, Mrs. Hannah (1743–1809). English dramatist. One of the earliest English female playwrights, she wrote a number of comedies of manners touched with sentimentality. Among the best are The Belle's Stratagem (1780) and A Bold Stroke for a Husband (1783).

Cowley, Malcolm (1898– ). American critic and poet. A member of the American colony in France during the 1920's, Cowley discussed expatriate psychology in Exile's Return: A Narrative of Ideas (1934; rev. 1951). His other works include two volumes of poetry, Blue Juniata (1929) and The Dry Season (1942), and The Literarian Situation (1954), an analysis of the writer's place in American society. He wrote an influential study of William Faulkner's works as the introduction to the Viking Portable Faulkner (1946), which he edited.

Cowper, William (1731–1800). English pre-romantic poet. From the time he was 24, Cowper suffered from a religious mania and was subject to fits of despair—he was convinced that he was excluded from salvation—and intermittent attacks of insanity. After his first breakdown, he went to Huntingdon to board with Morley Unwin until Unwin's death (1767). He then moved, with the widowed Mary Unwin, to Olney and continued to live with her until her death (1796). His poetic career began late in life, with the production of hymns, didactic verse, nature lyrics, and religious poetry. His best-known poem is The Task. Others, also well known, include Truth, The Progress of Error, Expostulation, Hope, Charity, Conversation, and Retirement, all published in 1782, The Diverting History of John Gilpin, a humorous ballad published with The Task, and the Olney Hymns (1779). He also translated Homer (1791) and on his death left many letters and retrospective autobiographical writings. Cowper was interested in freeing English verse from the facility of the followers of Pope. "Give me a manly rough line," writes Cowper, "with a deal of meaning in it, rather than a whole poem full of musical periods, that have nothing but their oily smoothness to recommend them." See The Castaway; Stricken Deer.

Cowperwood, Frank Algernon. The central character in a trilogy of novels by Theodore Dreiser. Patterned after the life of Charles T. Yerkes, Cowperwood is a man with an overweening desire for power, which drives him on to ruthless pursuit of financial dominance but fails to bring him happiness. The three novels are The Financier, The Titan, and The Stoic.

Coyle, Kathleen (1886–1952). Irish novelist. A Flock of Birds (1930) is a sensitive novel about the Irish revolution. In Immortal Ease (1939), the character Victoria Rising is supposed to be based on Elinor Wylie.

Cozzens, James Gould (1903– ). American novelist. His S.S. San Pedro (1931), a novel based on the sinking of the Vestriq in 1928, was the first of his works to attract wide attention. Guard of Honor (1948), which received a Pulitzer Prize, deals with soldiers and civilians at a Florida air force base during World War II. By Love Possessed (1957) became a best seller and was highly praised by many critics. Perhaps because it was so highly praised, a critical reaction set in, and Cozzens' work was attacked, most notably by Dwight Macdonald in Commentary in an article called "By Cozzens Possessed." Other novels by Cozzens include The Last Adam (1933), Men and Brethren (1936), and The Just and the Unjust (1942).

Crabbe, George (1754–1832). English poet. He escaped extreme poverty through the financial assistance of Edmund Burke. Considered a transitional figure between neoclassicism and romanticism, Crabbe wrote in the heroic couplet; his sympathies were humanitarian but opposed to sentimentality. His best-known poem is The Village, a realistic answer to Oliver Goldsmith's The Deserted Village. Other poems by Crabbe, similar in theme to The Village, include The Newspaper (1785), The Parish Register (1809), and The Borough (1810). Peter Grimes, one of the most powerful tales in The Borough, is the subject of a tragic opera, first produced in 1945, by Benjamin Britten.

Crabbed Age and Youth. An anonymous Elizabethan lyric (1599), presenting a series of antitheses between youth and age.

Crabtree, Cadwallader. In Tobias Smollett's novel Peregrine Pickle, an embittered and misanthropic old Welshman, who assists the hero in his satiric exposé of society's folly.

Craddock, Charles Egbert. See Mary Noailles Murfree.

Craig, [Edward] Gordon (1872- ). English actor, stage designer, producer, and writer on subjects related to the theater. He organized and published a journal, The Mask (1908), and founded a theatrical school at the Arena Goldoni in Florence, Italy. He is the son of Ellen Terry and Edward Goodwin.

Craigieburn. A lonely farm near Dumfries, Scotland, owned by Jane Welsh, the wife of Thomas Carlyle. The couple lived there from 1828 to 1834, and it was there that Carlyle wrote much of his best work. Ralph Waldo Emerson visited the Carlies at Craigieburnock in 1833.

Craigie, Pearle Mary Teresa. Pen name John Oliver Hobbes (1867-1906). American-born English novelist and dramatist. Her best-known work—such as her play The Ambassadors (1898) and the novels Some Emotions and a Moral (1891) and The Herb-Moon (1896)—are marked by sophistication and satirical wit. Though a devout, even mystical Catholic, Mrs. Craigie was very much a woman of the world, active in the fashionable life of London.

Craig's Wife (1925). A play by George Kelly. It is a study of a selfish, narrow woman, more interested in her house than in her husband; by the end of the play everyone has left her and she is alone with the house. It was awarded a Pulitzer Prize.

Craig, Dinah Maria Mulock (1826-1887). English novelist, author of over 40 volumes including novels, tales for children, books of travel, and poetry. Her only novel of note is John Halifax, Gentleman. Most of her work is characterized by a note of rather tedious piety and sentimentality.

Cranach or Kranach, Lucas (1472-1553). German painter and engraver. He owes his fame to his altarpieces and to his portraits of Martin Luther and other German reformers. As court painter to the elector of Saxony, he also painted a number of biblical and mythological scenes.

Crane, [Harold] Hart (1899-1932). American poet. One of the first to attempt to express the spirit of a mechanized 20th century in valid and appropriate poetic terms, Crane is known for his unique, imaginative, and powerful creative talent. Strongly influenced by such poets as Arthur Rimbaud and T. S. Eliot, he nevertheless created his own distinctive style of dramatic rhetoric and extremely complex, compact imagery. In constant revolt from a father who had little appreciation for his poetic gifts, Crane often used elements from his own life for the stuff of his poetry. As a young man he came to New York from Ohio, worked at various jobs, and wrote poetry which was finally published in Poetry, the Little Review, and other little magazines. In 1926 he published his first collection of verse, White Buildings, containing an inscription from Rimbaud, whose influence is clear.

Crane reacted strongly to the poetry of T. S. Eliot, recognizing the power of the verse at the same time that he rejected the negative view of modern culture found especially in The Waste Land. The Banjo was, in part, an answer to Eliot, an attempt to evoke the "myth of America," to write a poem that would fuse American culture, past, present, and future, into one ecstatic whole. (This rejection of cultural pessimism was not new to Crane; it infused several of the poems in White Buildings, notably For the Marriage of Faustus and Helen.) The poem remains one of the major achievements of 20th-century poetry.

Always torn by personal difficulties, in the throes of despair over what he considered his failing literary powers, Crane committed suicide by jumping overboard from the ship bringing him back from Mexico, where he had gone on a Guggenheim fellowship to write a poem on the Spanish Conquest.

After his death, a volume of poems collected for publication, Key West: An Island Sheaf, was found. This group, together with other unpublished poems, was included in Collected Verse (1933). See Samuel Greenberg.

Crane, Ichabod. A character in Washington Irving's tale, The Legend of Sleepy Hollow. Crane is a gawky schoolmaster, described as resembling "some scarecrow eloped from a field."

Crane, Stephen [Townley] (1871-1900). American novelist, short-story writer, poet, and war correspondent. In his short life, Crane managed to produce work that assured him a permanent place in American literature. Best known for his novel The Red Badge of Courage, he has been variously described as an impressionist, a realist, and a symbolist.

Ignored by critics in the years immediately after his death, he has since been the subject of much critical controversy, but his importance as a writer is indisputable.

Crane was born in Newark, N.J., the son of a Methodist minister and writer of religious tracts. His mother was also a writer, for a time editor of the Christian Advocate. After one semester each at Lafayette College and Syracuse University, he gave up formal schooling and devoted himself to journalism and literature.

His first novel was Maggie: A Girl of the Streets. Although published by Crane at his own expense and ignored by reviewers, this realistic study brought him the respect of Hamlin Garland and William Dean Howells. In 1895, Crane published both The Red Badge of Courage, which brought him immense prestige, especially in England, and his first volume of poems, The Black Riders. George's Mother appeared the following year.

Sent to cover a filibustering expedition to Cuba, Crane was on board the Commodore when it sank on New Year's Day, 1897. From this experience came The Open Boat, the short story that has been called one of the finest in the English language. Meanwhile, Crane had fallen in love with Cora Taylor, whom he had met in Florida, and together they went to Greece as war correspondents, an experience responsible for the novel Active Service (1899). At the close of the war, they established themselves in England.

During the Spanish-American War, Crane went to Crazy Jane. A beggar, the spokesman and her heroine of a series of poems by William Butler Yeats. "Though his manner was often overelaborate, his work was filled with uncommon ardor and brilliance hardly surpassed in literature, but he can also be overwrought and tasteless."

In 1646 Crashaw published Steps to the Temple, a collection which contains his well-known secular poems Musæi Dœculi and Wishes to His Supposed Mistress, and his religious poems to Sts. Theresa and Mary Magdalen. The Flaming Heart, a hymn to St. Theresa, which deals with her precocious piety and mystic transports, shows Crashaw at his strongest; but St. Mary Magdalen, or The Weper, in which he describes her penitential tears in a series of extended and extravagant images, contains overelaborate conceits and bathetic passages. Other works by Crashaw are Epigrammatum Sacrorum Liber (1634) and Carmen Deo Nostro (1652).

Crassus, Marcus Licinius. Surnamed Dives, i.e., "the Rich" (115–53 B.C.). Roman financier and politician. Shortly after the civil war of Marius and Sulla, Crassus came into political prominence by defeating the slave army of Spartacus in 71. After this military victory, he turned his talents to business and by shrewd speculation was able, within 10 years, to amass a vast fortune. In 59 he joined Caesar and Pompey in the First Triumvirate and was allotted the command of Asia Minor. He was killed fighting the Parthians at Carrhae.

Cratchit, Bob. In Charles Dickens' A CHRISTMAS CAROL, the clerk of Ebenezer Scrooge. Though Cratchit has to maintain nine dependents on meager wages, his home, unlike his employer's, is filled with happiness and love.

Tiny Tim Cratchit. The little lame son of Bob Cratchit, a winsome and beloved child. In the ordinary course of events he was doomed to an early death, but Scrooge, after his change of character, makes Tiny Tim his special care.

Crawley, Captain Rawdon. The husband of Becky Sharp in Thackeray's Vanity Fair. Separated from his wife, he ends his days as governor of Coventry Island.

Sir Pitt Crawley. Rawdon's father. A rich, vulgar baronet, he is "a philosopher with a taste for low life." On the death of his second wife, Sir Pitt proposes to Becky Sharp, but she has already married his son.

Mr. Pitt Crawley. Sir Pitt's eldest son. He inherits fortunes from his father and from the aunt who disowned Crawley for his marriage to Becky.

Mr. and Mrs. Bute Crawley. A "tall, stately, jolly, shovel-hatted rector," brother of Sir Pitt, and his politic little wife.

Crayon, Geoffrey. A pen name of Washington Irving. He published The Sketch Book and The Crayon Miscellany (1835) under this pseudonym.

Crazy Jane. A beggar, the spokesman and heroine of a series of poems by William Butler Yeats.
Advocating the natural joys of life, she flouts conventional morality, especially in Crazy Jane and the Bishop.

Creakle. In Charles Dickens' David Copperfield, a hard, vulgar schoolmaster to whose charge David is entrusted and in whose school he first makes the acquaintance of Steerforth. The portrait of Creakle is Dickens' protest against the harsh treatment meted out to children by schoolmasters.

Cream of the Jest, The (1917). A novel by James Branch Cabell. This "comedy of evasions" is the story of an author, Felix Kennaston, who by means of a hieroglyphic disk escapes into a dream world where he pursues a changing yet always similar image of his beloved. She turns out to be his wife.

Creasey, John (1908- ). English writer of crime fiction. One of the ablest and most prolific practitioners of his craft, Creasey is perhaps best known for his documentary novels about George Gideon of Scotland Yard, which he writes under the pseudonym of J. J. Marric. These include Gideon's Day (1955), Gideon's Week (1956), Gideon's Staff (1959), and Gideon's Risk (1961). Creasey also uses other pen names, including Michael Halliday, Gordon Ashe, and Jeremy York.

creation myths. The earliest known myth of the creation is from Sumer of the third millennium B.C. First was the goddess Nammu, the primeval sea; she gave birth to An, the sky-god, and Ki, the earth-god —earth and sky, both solid elements, being joined together. Their offspring Enil, the god of air, separated them. He lighted his realm by begetting Nanna, the moon-god, who in turn fathered Utu, the sun-god. Enil next impregnated Ki, who gave birth to Enki, the god of water and of wisdom. Enki ordered the universe, but was unable to create man—a task that the goddess Nintu accomplished by molding him of clay.

In the Babylonian creation myth of the War of the Gods (Enuma elish), Marduk forms man out of the blood and bones of Kingu, a henchman of the defeated Tiamat. An Egyptian belief was that the original sun-god, Atum, standing on a mound in the midst of the slowly receding primeval waters, gave birth parthenogenetically to the other gods and to those parts of the universe which they embodied. According to the familiar biblical story in the first chapter of Genesis, the universe and man were created by Yahweh in seven days, beginning with light and ending with man and woman. In the second chapter appears a variation on the creation of man, which is older and closer to folk tale; woman is created of a rib detached from Adam while he sleeps. Christian theology added that the Son and the Holy Ghost existed with Yahweh from before the creation. The Eastern branch of the Church, however, denied that Jesus had existed from the beginning and the resulting "filioque controversy" was the ostensible cause of the split between Eastern and Western churches in 1054.

The first Greek description of creation, in the Theogony, attributed to Hesiod, seems to have been a theological elaboration of genuine myth. First to exist was Chaos, from which came Earth, Tartarus, Love, Darkness, and Night. Night and Darkness gave birth to Day and the upper air (Aether). Earth parthenogenetically produced Heaven, Mountains, and Sea. After this prelude, the Hesiodic version proceeds with nearly universal mythic elements that are probably far older. Uniting with Heaven (Ur anus), Earth (Ge) gave birth to Oceanus and the Titans. The last of these was Cronus, who overthrew and emasculated his father, only to be supplanted in turn by his son Zeus (see KUMARA). A highly artificial myth current in the doctrines of Orphism claimed that Chaos, Night, and Darkness existed at the beginning; Love (Eros) sprang from an egg laid by Night and himself gave birth to the other gods. The creation of man seems not to have interested the Greeks very deeply; of various versions, the most prominent made Prometheus their creator—he having molded them of clay.

In Vedic mythology, creation began with Aditi, celestial space. Sky and Earth were sometimes regarded as the first goddesses, sometimes as the original male and female elements, which are known to so many other mythologies; later the sky was personified as Varuna. The first man was Manu; his daughter-mate Ida was born of the food that he offered as a sacrifice to Vishnu in gratitude for being saved from the flood.

Crébillon, Claude Prosper Jolyot de (1707-1777). French author and son of Prosper Jolyot de Crébillon. His novels, tales, and dialogues reflect the moral laxity of his day. Le Sopha (1745), for example, tells the experiences of a man transformed by metempsychosis into a sofa, and the scandalous adventures which take place on it. His other works include L’Écumoire (1733) and La Nuit et le moment (1755). He was, like his father, one of the dramatic censors of the French government.

Crébillon, Prosper Jolyot de (1674-1762). French dramatist. His tragedies rely more on violence and horror than on grandeur. Nicolas Boileau called him a "drunken Racine." His best play, Rhadamiste et Zénobie (1711), whose subject was taken from a novel of Jean Segrais, enjoyed considerable popularity; his other plays did not. He was elected to the French Academy in 1731, and became one of the official dramatic censors of the time. Though he considered himself a literary descendant of Racine, he is merely a precursor of the romantic melodrama.

credо (Lat., "I believe"). A creed or confession of faith. The most important historical Christian creeds are the Apostles and the Nicene (both 4th century), and the Athanasian (5th century). Later creedal statements of importance are found in the Decrees of the Council of Trent (1563), the Augustsburg Confession (1530), and the Westminster Confession of Faith (1647).

Creevey, Thomas (1768-1839). English diarist of the Georgian era. His journals and correspondence covering a period of 36 years were published in 1903 as the Creevey Papers.

Cremona. A fine violin made in Cremona, in Lombardy. There, in the 17th and early 18th centuries, lived violin makers of worldwide renown, such as Andrea Amati (c. 1520-c. 1610), Niccolò Amati (1596-1684), Antonio Stradivari (1644-1737), and numerous members of the Guarneri family, especially Giuseppe (1687-1744).
Crime of Sylvestre Bonnard, The Creon (Kreon). (1) In Greek mythology, a king of Thebes. The brother of Jocasta, he served as regent after the death of her husband Laius, and became king after the death of Etocles in the War of the Seven against Thebes. He condemned Oedipus' daughter Antigone to death and, repenting too late, lost his own son Haemon as a consequence.

(2) A King of Corinth, whose daughter Glauce married Jason and met her horrible fate through the jealousy of Medea. He appears in Euripides' tragedy Medea.

Crepuscolari, I (ital., "the twilight poets," a name coined by the critic G. A. Borgese). A group of Italian poets of the early 20th century whose work is notable for its use of musical and mood-conveying language and its general tone of despondency. Their attitude represents a reaction to the content-poetry and rhetorical style of Carducci and D'Annunzio, favoring instead the unadorned language and homely themes typical of Pascoli. An affinity existed with the French symbolists (Valéry, Rimbaud, and Mallarmé).

Guido Gozzano was the most competent exponent of the movement.

Cressida. See Cresseye.

Crettes. See Acastus.

Crétin, Roger Auguste. See Roger Vergel.

Crœusa (Krousa). (1) See Ion.

(2) In the Aeneid, the daughter of Priam and Hecuba and wife of Aneas.

Crévecoeur, Michel Guillaume Jean de. Pen name J. Hector St. John (1735–1813). French author, agronomist, traveler and settler in America from 1754 to 1780. After having traveled through Canada, the Great Lakes region, and Pennsylvania, he settled on a farm in the colony of New York. Here, between 1770 and 1781, he wrote Letters from an American Farmer, an extremely popular series of essay-letters. On his return to the U.S. to serve as French consul in 1783, he did much to improve Franco-American relations. More letters, found in 1922 and published as Sketches of Eighteenth Century America (1925), give informative and accurate descriptions of colonial American rural life.

He also wrote Voyage dans la haute Pennsylvanie et dans l'état de New York, par un membre adoptif de la nation Onéda (1801), an account of his early travels and of the American Indians, which he pretended to have translated from an original manuscript. Selections from Voyage were translated and published under the title Crévecoeur's Eighteenth-Century Travels in Pennsylvania and New York (1961) by Percy G. Adams.

Cricket on the Hearth (1845). A Christmas tale by Charles Dickens. In the happy home of John Peerybingle and his wife Dot, the cricket on the hearth chirps when all is well and is silent when unhappiness pervades. They take in an elderly boarder whom John soon discovers is a young man in disguise. His suspicions are aroused when he sees this man with his arm around Dot. The cricket takes things in hand, counseling John not to find fault. Soon, the young man, who turns out to be Edward Pluvroy, bursts in with his young bride May Fielding. He explains all: after his long absence he came back disguised so that he could ascertain whether May truly loved Tackleton, the man she was to marry. Happiness returns to the house and Edward is reunited with his father Caleb and his blind sister Bertha.

Crillon, Louis des Balbis de Berton de (1541–1615). French general, known as L'Homme sans peur (Fr., "the man without fear"). He fought against the Huguenots in the French religious wars and took part in the battle of Lepanto. He later entered the service of Henry IV, who called him "bravest of the brave," and fought at the battle of Ivry.

Crime and Punishment (Prestupleniye i nakazaniye; 1866). A novel by Fedor Dostoevski. The poor student Raskolnikov, after a long period of brooding over his poverty and the helpless position of his mother and young sister, plans and carries out the murder of an old woman pawnbroker. Surprised in the act, he has to kill the old woman's sister, also. His motives for the murder are then re-examined. Raskolnikov, whose name is derived from the Russian word for schismatic, has claimed that he needed the money to help his family, that with the money he could raise himself and become a benefactor to mankind, and finally that by transgressing the law he showed a boldness that put him in the same category as a Napoleon. One by one Raskolnikov's motives are proven false, as his conscience works on him. He instinctively feels disgust for his act, and is unable to bring himself to use the money he has stolen. The torments of conscience he endures prove to him that he lacks the qualities of an amoral superman. He turns for sympathy to Sonya Marmeladova, a young girl forced into prostitution to support her drunken father, his wife, and three small children. Sonya urges him to confess his crime. The police inspector Porfiri Petrovich, an astute psychologist, already strongly suspects Raskolnikov and simply waits for the confession he is sure will come. Raskolnikov finally does break down, although he stubbornly refuses to admit sorrow for having killed the old pawnbroker. He is sentenced to Siberia, where Sonya devotedly follows him, and there he gradually begins to achieve the peace and humility necessary for his sincere repentance.

The novel, the first of Dostoevski's five large works, reveals the mastery of psychological observation and analysis for which the author is hailed. Beside the depiction of Raskolnikov's anguished mind before, during, and after his crime, there are vivid studies of the profligate Svidrigailov, the saintly Sonya, and her drunken father, Marmeladov.

Crimean War (1854–1856). A war between Turkey with its allies (England, France, and Sardinia) and Russia. It succeeded for the time being in shattering Russia's ambitions of leadership in southeastern Europe. The chief battles were at Alma, Balaklava, Inkerman, and the famous siege of Sevastopol. The result was the Treaty and Declaration of Paris (1856), in which the integrity of Turkey was guaranteed, the Black Sea neutralized, and Danubian navigation declared free. An event in this war was celebrated by Tennyson in his poem The Charge of the Light Brigade. It was also the scene of Florence Nightingale's heroic activities as a nurse.

Crime of Sylvestre Bonnard, The (Le Crime de Sylvestre Bonnard; 1881). A novel by Anatole France. Sylvestre Bonnard is a kind-hearted, absent-minded old archeologist. The aged scholar's crime is... the kidnapping of Jeanne Alexandre, the orphaned daughter of his former love, from a school in which she is abused and unhappy. Threatening complications result, but when it is discovered that Jeanne’s guardian is an embezzler, she is made the legal ward of M. Bonnard.

Criselda. The heroine of Giovanni Boccaccio’s romance *Fi loftro*ato and the prototype of Chaucer’s heroine in his Troilus and Crisyele.

Crisyele. Beloved of Troilus in Geoffrey Chaucer’s Troilus and Crisyele. She is more complicated than her prototype in Boccaccio’s Il Filostrato: although a practical opportunist, she is genuinely affectionate, not the heartlessly fickle girl she becomes in Shakespeare’s Troilus and Cressida.

Crishna. See K.RISHNA.

Crisis, The (1901). A historical novel by Winston Churchill. The action centers in St. Louis during the controversy over slavery. The hero, Stephen Brice, is a Yankee; the heroine, Virginia Carvel, a Southerner. The novel shows the inevitability of the Civil War, yet stresses the fact that neither side wanted it. The book includes a notable portrait of Lincoln.

Criterion, The (1922–1939). A quarterly literary review. It was edited in London by T. S. Eliot and reflected his opinions.

Critical Fable, A (1922). Amy Lowell’s imitation of her kinman James Russell Lowell’s Fable for Critics. For a time the poem was thought to have been written by Leonard Bacon, an attribution encouraged by Miss Lowell. The poem consists of a dialogue with the earlier Lowell, during the course of which many poets of the 1920’s are discussed.

Critical philosophy. See Immanuel Kant.

Criticism, El (1651, 1653, 1657). A philosophical novel by Baltasar Gracian. Divided into three seasons (the spring of childhood, the autumn of manhood, and the winter of old age); it describes the encounter on a desert island of the wise and noble Critico, with the savage Andriano. Critilo brings Andriano in contact with civilization, acting as his guide to human society. The pessimistic conclusions of both men probably explain at least part of the admiration that Schopenhauer felt for the book.

Critique of Judgment (Kritik der Urteilskraft; 1790). A philosophical work by Immanuel Kant. It contains Kant’s aesthetic philosophy. He believed that the representation of a thing in art constitutes a partial understanding of the thing in itself (Ding an sich).

Critique of Practical Reason (Kritik der praktischen Vernunft; 1788). A philosophical work by Immanuel Kant. Kant constructed a philosophy of ethics based on practical reason, or the free will of man. Since the moral law itself is unconditional and universal, it is called the categorical imperative; its basic formulation is “Act only on that maxim whereby you can at the same time will that it should become a universal law.” Our knowledge of God is obtained through our moral feelings, not through pure reason.

Critique of Pure Reason (Kritik der reinen Vernunft; 1781). A philosophical work by Immanuel Kant, in which he maintained that all sense experience must be inherently rational, and therefore, that rational knowledge about experience is possible. But although reason can understand a thing considered as an object of experience, reason cannot understand the thing-in-itself (Ding an sich).

Crito (Kriton; fl. 400 B.C.). An Athenian friend and follower of Socrates. Plato wrote a dialogue called Crito in which his friend attempts to persuade Socrates to escape from prison. Socrates refuses to break the law of Athens. His well-known last words were, “Crito, I owe a cock to Asclepius.”

Crocket, Benedetto (1866–1952). Italian philosopher, literary critic, and historian. A prolific writer of encyclopedic range, Croce set forth his philosophical system, in which the influence of German idealism is discernible, in the four volumes of his Filosofia dello Spirito: Estetica Come Scienza dell’Espressione e Linguistica Generale (1902), Logica Come Scienza del Concetto Puro (1905), Filosofia della Pratica, Economica, ed Etica (1908), and Teoria e Storia della Storiografia (1916). He was perhaps most influential as an aesthetician, emphasizing the intuitive nature of art.

He also wrote numerous works of literary criticism, including La Poesia di Dante (1920) and the six-volume Letteratura della Nuova Italia (1914–1940). Among his other works are Materiorismo Storico e Economia Marxista (1900), Breviario di Estetica (1913), and Storia d’Italia dal 1871 al 1915 (1927). For 27 years he edited La Critica, a bimonthly magazine.

A staunch liberal during the fascist regime, he was a member of the post-World War II Committee of Liberation, a delegate to the constitution-making Italian Parliament (1945–1947), and president of the Italian Liberal Party until 1947.

Crockett, David or Davy (1786–1836). American frontiersman, public official, and folk hero. After serving as a scout under Andrew Jackson in the Creek War of 1813–1814, Crockett became a justice of the peace in Tennessee; he later boasted that none of his decisions, which were based on “natural-born sense instead of law learning,” was ever reversed. He was also a prodigious hunter of bears and claimed to have killed over 100 in eight or nine months. A humorous suggestion that he run for Congress led him to undertake the race, and he was elected for three terms (1827–1831, 1833–1835), becoming known as the “coonskin Congressman.” His opposition to the policies of President Jackson endeared him to the Whigs but cost him his seat, and he decided to go to Texas, where he died fighting heroically at the Alamo. He was speedily made into an American folk hero who could talk the language of animals, ride the lightning, lie with extravagant grandeur, and whip his weight in wildcats.

Several books have been attributed to Crockett, notably A Narrative of the Life of David Crockett (1834). He may also have had a hand in some of the Crockett Almanacs, which appeared from 1835 to 1856. They contained the usual meteorological and astronomical data, as well as tall tales involving such figures as Crockett, Davy Crockett, and Kit Carson.

Crosett, Samuel Rutherford (1860–1914). Scottish novelist. Abandoning the ministry for a literary career, he participated in the romantic revival. A member of the Kailyard school of writers, he wrote The Stickit Minister (1893) and many fine and exciting historical novels.
crocodile. A symbol of deity among the ancient Egyptians. According to Plutarch, it is the only aquatic animal that has its eyes covered with a thin transparent membrane, by reason of which it sees and is not seen, as God sees all, Himself not being seen. To this, he adds: "The Egyptians worship God symbolically in the crocodile, that being the only animal without a tongue, like the Divine Logos, which standeth not in need of speech" (De Iside et Osiride). Achilles Tattus says, "The number of its teeth equals the number of days in a year." Another tradition is that during the seven days held sacred to Apis, the crocodile will harm no one. See TROCHILUS.

crocodile tears. Hypocritical tears. The tale is that crocodiles moan and sigh like a person in deep distress to allure travelers to the spot, and even shed tears over their prey while in the act of devouring it. Shakespeare refers to this in the second part of Henry VI (1592).

Croesus. In classic legend, a young man enamored of the nymph Smilax. She did not return his love. The gods changed him into the crocus flower, to signify unrequited love.

Croesus (Kroisos; fl. 550 B.C.). King of Lydia famous for his wealth. According to a story recounted by Herodotus, Croesus was once visited by Solon, who, instead of calling Croesus the happiest of mortals, as the vain ruler had expected, said, "Account no man happy before his death." Croesus indignantly dismissed Solon, but the Greek proved to be right. Later, misinterpreting an oracle from Delphi that war with Persia would cause the fall of a great empire, Croesus attacked Cyrus, king of Persia, in 546 B.C. The kingdom to fall turned out to be his own. Sentenced to death by fire, Croesus called the name of Solon, recalling too late his wisdom. Cyrus, upon inquiry, learned the story of the interview, and countermanded the death sentence. Instead he made Croesus one of his trusted advisers.

Unfortunately for the story, it is chronologically impossible, since the dates of Croesus and Solon did not coincide. The remark attributed to Solon was a popular proverb; it appears as the final lines of Sophocles' Oedipus Tyrannos, among other places.

Crofts, Freeman Wills (1879-1957). Anglo-Irish writer of detective stories and creator of Inspector French. The Cask (1920) is one of his cleverest novels.

Crome Yellow (1922). A satirical novel by Aldous Huxley. It is concerned with the odd, learned conversations and comic adventures of a group of people gathered at a country house party: Mrs. Wimbush, who believes in spiritualism; Mr. Wimbush, who reads aloud portions of his absurd history of his house, Crome; Mr. Scogan, who is planning a "Rational State" much like the one Huxley describes in Brave New World; and other eccentrics. The central character is Denis Stone, an ineffectual young poet whose banal verse is included in the novel. His one decisive action takes him away from the girl he shyly and secretly loves.

Crommelynck, Fernand (1885- ). Belgian dramatist. Le Cocu magnifique (1920) is the best known of his poetic, sardonic farces. Among his other plays are Le Sculpteur de masques (1908), Tripes d'or (1925), and Chaud et Froid ou L'Idée de monsieur Dom (1934).

Crommyonian sow. In Greek mythology, a dangerous wild pig. This animal roamed the land of Crommyon on the Isthmus of Corinth. Theseus killed it.

Cromwell, Oliver (1599-1658). English Puritan leader and Lord Protector of the Realm (1653-1658). As commander of the famous cavalry regiment called Ironsides, he contributed to the Parliamentary victories at Edgehill and Marston Moor and, as joint commander of the New Model Army, defeated the Royalists at Naseby. After the execution of Charles I, he led an army against the rebellious Roman Catholics of Ireland, whom he persecuted so relentlessly that his name is still regarded there with odium. Although he refused the title of king, his powers as lord protector were such that he was able to rule as virtual dictator. An efficient administrator, he permitted religious toleration and pursued a vigorous foreign policy. His son, Richard, trained to be his successor, alienated both the army and Parliament and was dismissed in 1659.

Cromwell, Thomas, Earl of Essex (1457-1540). English statesman. In 1524 Cromwell was employed by Cardinal Wolsey to survey some of the smaller monasteries with a view to their suppression. He was attached to Wolsey until the latter's fall from royal favor in 1529, after which time Cromwell himself rose steadily in power. According to Cardinal Pole, Cromwell urged Henry VIII to proclaim himself head of the church and thereby make unnecessary a papal dispensation for his divorce from Catherine of Aragon. When in 1534 the Act of Supremacy established the king as head of the Church, Cromwell's policy was made law, and he became Henry's chief adviser in ecclesiastical matters. He became Lord Chamberlain in 1539, but the following year incurred Henry's disfavor over the king's marriage to Anne of Cleves, which Cromwell had fostered in the hope of gaining the support of German Protestants. He was accused of treason by his enemies, and executed in 1540.

Cronos (Kronos). One of the Titans of Greek mythology, and father of Zeus. Born of Uranus (sky) and Ge (earth), he married his sister-titan Rhea. Learning from Ge that his son would dethrone him, he swallowed their children, Hestia, Demeter, Hera, Hades, and Poseidon, but Rhea and his sons rescued Zeus. This son did indeed dethrone Cronos, as had been predicted.

Cronos is believed to have been an ancient pre-Hellenic god of fertility. The sickle with which he is depicted in art probably was his attribute as a god of crops, though the Greeks explained that this was the sickle with which he had castrated his father Uranus. The Romans identified Cronos with their equally vague deity Saturn.
cross. An ancient symbol of many uses. Long before the birth of Christ, it was used in Carthage for ornamental purposes. Runic crosses were set up by the Scandinavians as boundary marks, and were erected over the graves of kings and heroes. According to Cicero, the staff with which the Roman augur marked out the heavens was in the shape of a cross. The Egyptians employed it as a sacred symbol, and two buns marked with crosses were discovered at Herculaneum. It was a sacred symbol among the Aztecs long before the landing of Cortez. It was worshiped in Cosuinel and Palenque; in Tabasco, it symbolized the god of rain. It was also the emblem of Quetzalcoatl as lord of the four cardinal points and their respective winds.

There are many legends about the cross of the crucifixion. It is said to have been made of four kinds of wood: palm, cedar, olive, and cypress, signifying the four quarters of the globe. Another legend says that Solomon cut down a cedar and buried it on the spot where the pool of Bethesda later stood. Shortly before the crucifixion, the cedar floated to the surface of the pool, and was used as the upright of the cross. During the Middle Ages, enough fragments of the "true cross" were sold as relics to account for an entire forest of crosses. According to legend, the Emperor Constantine, on his march to Rome, saw a luminous cross in the sky, with the motto "In hoc signo vinces" (by this sign conquer). The night before the battle of Saxaruba (312) a vision appeared to the emperor in his sleep instructing him to inscribe the cross and the motto on the shields of his soldiers. He obeyed the voice and the vision, and won the battle. A very similar legend has been applied to various other conquerors, however. The cross generally associated with the crucifixion in art is a Latin cross, or crux immissa. St. Andrew's cross, the crux decussata, is shaped like an X; the tau cross, or crux commissa, is a very ancient symbol of a T shape, thought to have been originally a phallic emblem.

The tau cross with a circle at the top, the crux ansata, was common to various Egyptian deities, including Isis and Osiris. The circle signifies the eternal preserver of the world. The tau is the monogram of Thoth, the Egyptian Hermes, the god of wisdom.

Crossing, The (1904). A historical novel by Winston Churchill. It deals mainly with the settlement of Kentucky and with the conquest of the Northwest Territory by George Rogers Clark during the American Revolution. The hero, a youth named David Ritchie, takes part in Clark's campaign.

Crossing Brooklyn Ferry (1856). A poem by Walt Whitman. The poet is one with all those who cross from shore to shore. Regardless of time and space, he shares the experience of life itself.

Crossing the Bar (1889). A famous poem by Alfred Tennyson, which uses, as a metaphor for death, a description of putting out to sea on a calm evening. Before his death the author instructed his publishers to insert it at the end of each section of his works.

Cross Purposes. See Misunderstanding, The.

Crotchet Castle (1831). A novel by Thomas Love Peacock. A delightful satire on romantic themes, being a humorously erudite discussion of various curious topics. The central one is an argument to determine the most desirable period of history, with the Rev. Folliott contending for Athenian Greece, Mr. MacGready for contemporary Scotland, and Mr. Chainmail for the Middle Ages.

Crothers, Rachel (1878–1958). American playwright. She is interested in the place of women in the modern world. Susan and God (1937) is a play about a woman who masks her selfishness under a new-found religious zeal. Among her plays: Nice People (1921), Let Us Be Gay (1929), and When Ladies Meet (1932).

Crouse, Russel (1893– ). American journalist, playwright, and theatrical producer. Crouse early wrote the libretto for the musical The Gang's All Here (1931) and published two books on 19th-century American life: Mr. Currier and Mr. Ive (1930) and It Seems Like Yesterday (1931). With Howard Lindsay he dramatized Life with Father and Life with Mother (1948), based on the books by Clarence Day; State of the Union (1945), a Pulitzer Prize-winning satire on American politics; Call Me Madam (1950), a musical comedy; and Tall Story (1959). Also with Lindsay he produced Joseph Kesselring's comedy Arsenic and Old Lace (1940), the story of two old ladies who poison people for their own good. Crouse wrote the book on which The Sound of Music (1960) was based.

Crowdero. In Butler's Hudibras, one of the rabble leaders encountered by Hudibras at a bear-baiting. The original was one Jackson or Jephson, a milliner.

Crowe, Captain. In Tobias Smollett's novel The Adventures of Sir Launcelot Greaves, the attendant of Sir Launcelot in his peregrinations to reform society. Sir Launcelot is a Georgian Don Quixote; Captain Crowe is his Sancho Panza.

Crowley, [Edward] Aleister (1875–1947). English poet and author of books on magic and occult lore. He was a legendary figure, notorious for his celebrations of Black Magic rites. He wrote such books as Songs of the Spirit (1898) and The Diary of a Drug Fiend (1922). He is the subject of Somerset Maugham's novel The Magician.

Crowne, John (c. 1640–c. 1703). English dramatist, best known for his lively comedy Sir Courtly Nice, or It Cannot Be (1685). His other plays include the heroic drama The Destruction of Jerusalem by Titus Vespasian (1677), The Country Wit (1675), The English Friar (1689), The Married Beau (1694), and a string of meretricious tragedies.

Crowninshield, Frank [Francis Welch] (1872–1947). American editor. Associated with various magazines, including The Bookman, he is best known as the editor of Vanity Fair (1914–1935). As a witty after-dinner speaker, he was one of the founders of the Museum of Modern Art and wrote such books as Manners for the Metropolis (1908) and The Bridge Fiend (1909).

Crucible, The (1953). A play about the Salem, Mass., witchcraft trials of 1692 by Arthur Miller. Raising the question of freedom of conscience, it provided a parallel to McCarthyism in America during the early 1950's.

Cruikshank, George (1792–1878). English illustrator and caricaturist. He is famous as the illustrator of Dickens' Sketches by Boz and Oliver Twist* and Scott, and as a social and political satirist.

Crumles, Mr. Vincent. See Nicholas Nickleby.

Cruncher, Jerry. A minor character in Charles Dickens' A Tale of Two Cities. He works in a bank by day and is a resurrection man by night. His wife is continually saying her prayers, which Jerry terms "tapping."

Crusades. Wars undertaken in late medieval times by Christians against the Turks and Saracens for the recovery of the Holy Land and, nominally at least, for the honor of the cross. The word is derived from Lat. crux, "cross."

Crusoe. A self-reliant solitary man who adjusts himself to the primitive conditions he finds, from the novel Robinson Crusoe by Daniel Defoe.

Crusts. See Hostage, The.

Cruz, Sor Juana Inés de la. See Juana Inés de la Cruz, Sor.

Cruz Cano y Olmedilla, Ramón de la (1731–1794). Spanish dramatist. His humorous one-act plays, or sainetes, form the body of his work. These may be described as classical only insofar as their satiric mirroring of 18th-century Spanish life remains didactic in nature. The most famous of his portrayals of middle-class mores are La pradera de San Indómito, El rastro por la mañana, Le Plaza Mayor por Navidad, and El fandango del candil.

Cry of the Children, The (1843). A poem by Elizabeth Barrett Browning, expressing intense sympathy for the victims of child labor in the English mines and factories of her day and indicting those who were responsible for their exploitation.

Cry, The Beloved Country (1948). A widely read and influential novel by Alan Paton. It is the moving story of a Zulu country person who comes to Johannesburg to find that the environment has forced his sister to become a prostitute and his son a murderer. The language is Biblical and poetic. The novel was made into a musical play entitled Lost in the Stars (1949), with words by Maxwell Anderson and music by Kurt Weill.

cuaderna vía. A form of medieval Spanish versification. The stanza consists of four 14-syllable lines with a single rhyme, and each line is divided into two equal hemistichs. Cuaderna vía was always used for poetry written in the style known as mester de clerecía.

Cuauhtémoc (1457–1525). Last Aztec emperor of Mexico. The nephew and son-in-law of Monte-zuma, Cuauhtémoc became emperor after the latter's death and led the Indian resistance to the Spaniards after they had been driven out of Tenochtitlán. He was seized by Cortez after the capital had been taken and was put to torture when he refused to reveal the location of a supposedly fabulous Aztec treasure. Forced to accompany Cortez on an expedition to Honduras, he was accused of inciting the Indians to revolt and was executed.

Cubism. An artistic movement begun in 1907 in Paris. It was influenced by the structural simplifications of African sculpture and by Cézanne's concepts of geometry in the visual representation of objects. Cubism is characterized by a reduction of objects, figures, and occasionally of landscapes to their basic geometric forms. This effect is achieved by flattening and superimposing planes without the use of perspective or light. Analytical cubism (1910–1912) increased the breakdown of forms and simultaneously represented various aspects of the same object. Monochromatic and austere, this phase led to the inclusion on the canvas of such materials as sand, glass, newspaper, and cloth. With synthetic cubism (1913–1914) the planes grew larger and more varied, form and color reappeared, and reality was represented in its most general terms. Pablo Picasso and Georges Braque were the founders of cubism in the visual arts, and its most outstanding representatives.

In literature, the poets Guillaume Apollinaire, Max Jacob, Pierre Reverdy, and André Salmon helped to form cubist doctrines and collaborated on the cubist bulletins, although they preferred the term l'esprit nouveau (new spirit) to cubism. They experimented with cubistic poetry, arranging apparently imagistic lines in clear-cut blocks. The results were the immediate precursors of surrealistic poetry: Apollinaire's Alcools (1913) and Calligrammes (1918); Jean Cocteau's Ode à Picasso (1917); Jacob's Le Laboratoire central (1921); Reverdy's Les Arborises du Toit (1918) and Crawates de charrière (1922); and Salmon's Prélude (1919).

Cú Chulainn. Also known as Cuculain, Cuchulain, Cuchulain, and Cú Cullín; original name Setanta. In Gaelic literature, chiefly the Ulster cycle, an Irish warrior of pagan times, a great hero of legendary feats. He is sometimes described as "the Achilles of the Gael." Ostensibly of mortal parentage, Cú Chulainn is represented to be in fact the son of the sun god Lugh. When, as a mere child, he is attacked by a ferocious hound, he kills it; when he sees the grief of its owner, Culain, he takes on the role of watchdog until a hound can be found to replace the one he killed. He is thereafter known as "the hound of Culain," or Cú Chulainn. As a young man he receives training at arms from the woman warrior Scathach on the isle of Scathach, now Skye. When Scathach is attacked by Aoife, another female warrior, Cú Chulainn subdues Aoife and makes love to her; when leaving the island, he instructs her to send their son Conlaoch to Ireland when he comes of age, under a vow to let no man stop him or force him to reveal his name. Conlaoch arrives in Ireland years later and kills so many warriors that he becomes embattled with Cú Chulainn who kills him, learning his identity too late. In one version, they kill each other; in another, Cú Chulainn, in his grief, does battle with the sea and finally sinks, exhausted, into it.

In the most widely known version of the Cú Chulainn story, Cú Chulainn singlehandedly deters the invading army of Queen Maeve until the Red Branch warriors of Ulster awaken from an enchantment. In this version Cú Chulainn duels with his foster brother, Ferdiaid. (See Cattle-Raid of Cooley. ) Some years later, Mebf gathers an army for the express purpose of killing Cú Chulainn and succeeds by creating, with the help of magic, an imaginary host with whom he fights to exhaustion. Fatally wounded, Cú Chulainn binds himself to a pillar and dies standing and facing the enemy. Emer, his widow to whom he had returned after being seduced by Fand, the wife of the sea god Mananan, throws herself into his grave and dies. During the Irish Renaissance, Cú Chulainn became a favorite subject for poets, notably William Butler Yeats, who describes his central exploit in On Baile’s Strand.

cuckold. The husband of an adulterous wife. The name derives from cuckoo, the chief characteristic of this bird being to deposit its eggs in other birds’ nests. Dr. Johnson explained that “it was usual to alarm a husband at the approach of an adulterer by calling out Cuckoo, which by mistake was applied in time to the person warned.” The cuckold was traditionally supposed to wear horns as the attribute of his condition. The usage is ancient; the Romans used to call an adulterer a cuckoo.

Cudworth, Ralph. See Cambridge Platonists.

Cueva de Garoza, Juan de la (1550?–1610). Spanish dramatist and poet. Cueva was one of the first playwrights to compose dramas dealing with events in Spanish history, such as Los siete infantes de Lara and Cerco de Zamora. For, as he maintained in his Exemplar poético (1606), he believed that dramatists should use native themes and meters instead of blindly imitating Greek and Latin models. The principal character of his comedy El infamador is considered a forerunner of Tirso de Molina. Cueva’s poems include Coro febrero de romances históricas (1587), a collection of old ballads, and La conquista de la Bética (1603), an epic about the conquest of Andalusia.

Cuff, Sergeant. See Moonstone, The.

Cullden, or Drummossie Moor. A heath in Scotland where the duke of Cumberland defeated Prince Charles Edward Stuart (the Young Pretender) on April 27, 1746. The old Scottish ballad of Cullden begins “Drummossie Moor, Drummossie Day!” See Flora Macnald.

Culprit Fay, The. See Joseph Rodman Drake.

Culture and Anarchy (1869). A collection of essays on political and social conditions by Matthew Arnold. In these are found some of his most famous arguments for the role of literary culture in the spiritual life of England. The collection includes the famous essay Hebranism and Hellenism.

Culverwell, Nathaniel. See Cambridge Platonists.

Cumberland, Richard (1732–1811). English dramatist. He is the author of a number of sentimental domestic comedies such as The West Indian (1771), The Jew (1794), The Fashionable Lover (1772) and The Brothers (1769).

Cumberland Road. The first main road to the American West, begun in 1811 and built for the most part with Federal money. It ran from Cumberland, Md., over the mountains to Wheeling and on to Zanesville on the Ohio and finally to Vandalia, Illinois. When completed it was about 600 miles long, 60 feet wide, and had a paved strip 20 feet wide in the middle. Over this National Pike ran the Western mails.

Cummings, E[ward] E[stlin] (1894–1962). American poet. One of the most gifted and independent poets of his era, Cummings was born in Cambridge, Mass., and was educated at Harvard. He is known for the eccentricity of his typography and punctuation, which he employed to indicate the rhythmic pattern and interwoven meaning of his poems. Until the 1930’s he preferred the lower case e. e. cummings.

His work includes lyrical love poems, humorous character sketches, and bitter satires on the foibles and institutions of his time. Tough characters of the sort well publicized in the U.S. in the 1920’s frequently appear in his poems, along with contemporary slang and dialect and the rhythms of jazz. Cummings’ first published work was The Enormous Room, a novel based on his experiences in a French prison in World War I. This was followed by the first of his many volumes of poetry, Tulips and Chimneys (1923). His other volumes of verse include XLI Poems (1925), &c (1925), Is 5 (1926), Viva (1931), No Thanks (1935), 30 poems (1940), 1 x 1 (1944), Poems 1923–1954 (1954), and Ninety-five poems (1958). He also published two plays, HIM and Santa Claus (1946), a book of drawings and paintings called CIOPW (1931); a travel book, ERM; a satirical ballet, Tom (1935); and i, six nonlectures (1953).

Cunings, Maria Susanna. See Lamplighter, The.

Cunetor (Lat., “the delayerm”). Epithet for Quintus Fabius Maximus (d. 203 B.C.). He was the Roman general who harassed Hannibal by avoiding direct engagements, and wore him out by marches, countermarches, and skirmishes from a distance. The English Fabian Society was so named in honor of his policy.

Cunégonde. See Candide.

Cunha, Euclides da. See Sertões, Os.

Cunningham, Allan (1784–1842). Scottish poet, essayist, and biographer. Many of his poems are in Scottish dialect or are adaptations of traditional lyrics. His Songs of Scotland (1825) includes the well-known A Wet Sheet and a Flowing Sea. Other verse collections by Cunningham are Songs (1813) and Songs and Poems (1847). He is also known for his Lives of the Most Eminent British Painters, Sculptors, and Architects (1829–1833) and for his Memoirs of Burns (1834).

Cunningham-Graham, Robert Bontine (1852–1936). Scottish-Spanish travel and story writer and historian. At different times he was an adventurer in South America, a Labour member of Parliament, and a friend of W. H. Hudson, Joseph Conrad, and Bernard Shaw. He wrote Mogreb-el-Ackas, or Journey in Morocco (1898), Scottish Stories (1914) and other collections of short stories; and many biographical and historical works on South America, including The Conquest of New Granada (1922).

Cunstace. See Man of Law’s Tale.
Cupid. In Roman mythology, the god of love, son of Venus and Mercury, and counterpart of the Greek Eros. He is usually represented as an exquisite boy with wings, bearing a bow and quiver of arrows, and is often described as blind or blindfolded. The bow is used to shoot the arrows, which are invisible and which cause the one shot to fall irrevocably in love. Originally depicted as a young man, as in the myth of Cupid and Psyche, Cupid later developed into the familiar cherubic but mischievous little boy.

Curate of Meudon. See François Rabelais.

Curel, François de (1854-1928). French dramatist. Curel's career began in 1892, when Antoine, director of the Théâtre Libre, accepted some of his plays, among them Les Fossiles and L'Envers d'une saincte. A landed aristocrat who did not depend on the theater for his living, Curel wrote erratically. His work may be seen, however, in terms of a gradual dramatic evolution. The early plays, Sauvage des eaux (1899, later produced as L'Amour brodé [1931]), and La Danse devant le miroir (1913), L'Imxivité (1893), and L'Envers d'une saincte (1982), are dramas of passion that portray a conflict between some desired ideal and a brutal reality. The next group of plays, La Nouvelle Idole (1895), Le Repas du lion (1897), La Fille Sauvage (1902), are rather weighty dramas of ideas, although the emphasis still falls on inner turmoil. His last plays, among them L'Ame en folie (1919), L'erreure du sage (1922), and Orage mystique (1927), are characterized by a biting gaiety and contain more autobiographical elements than the earlier work.

Curetes (Kouretes). In Greek mythology, sons of Rhea. They protected the infant Zeus from Cronos by covering his cries with the clashing of their shields as he grew up in a cave on Mount Dicte in Crete. They were regularly associated with the rites of Zeus' mother Rhea, and were identified with the Greeks with the Corybantes, who performed a similar function in the rites of Cybele. Jane Harrison, in her Themis, suggests that both were minor divinities who had originally been the young men (kouroi) who took children from their mothers at puberty and initiated them in noisy rites into manhood and full membership in the tribe. (The Curetes were also a tribe who were neighbors of the Calydonians.)

Curiae. In Pierre Corneille's tragedy Horace, the opponent of Horace in the combat between the cities of Rome and Alba. Although Curiae is the fiancé of Horace's sister Camille, Horace must kill him for the honor and safety of his native city, Rome.

Curiatii, the. In legendary Roman history, the three brothers who engaged in combat against the three Horatii.

Curie, Marie Sklodowska (1867-1934). Polish scientist. She is best known for her discovery, with her husband, Pierre Curie, of radium. With A. H. Becquerel, they were awarded the Nobel Prize for physics (1903) for this discovery. She again won the Nobel Prize for chemistry in 1911. Madame Curie (1937) is a biography written by her daughter Eve Curie. Another daughter, Irène Curie-Joliot (with her husband Frédéric Joliot) won the Nobel Prize for chemistry (1935).

Curran, John Philpot (1750-1817). Irish orator and magistrate. He is noted for his defense of the leaders of the Irish insurrection of 1798, for his defense of parliamentary reform, and for his support of Catholic emancipation.

Currier and Ives. Nathaniel Currier (1813-1888) and James Merritt Ives (1824-1895), American lithographers. In 1835 Currier began to sell lithographs of notable current events and four years later formed a partnership with Ives, his former bookkeeper. The firm published lithographic prints illustrating scenes of farm life, sports, famous disasters on land and sea, and all the mechanical and technical innovations of the age. Drawn in great detail by a number of artists, these prints were done, supplanted by photography, but they are a valuable record of the middle and latter part of the 19th century.

Curry, John Steuart (1897-1946). American painter. He is known for his portrayals of rural life in his native Kansas.

Curse of Kehama, The (1810). An epic poem by Robert Southey. Kehama is the mighty raja of the world. To save his daughter Kailiyal from the advances of Kehama's son, Ladurlad kills him. In retaliation Kehama curses Ladurlad, charming his life so that, while he cannot be harmed by disease, weapons, or age, neither can he eat or drink. The curse turns out to be a blessing, for Ladurlad is able, through his immunity, to save his daughter from countless dangers. Eventually, Kehama tries to take over hell and, drinking a potion of immortality, finds he has drunk of immortal death and is forever condemned to hell as a supporter of the lord of hell. Kailiyal also drinks the potion and is brought to immortality in the Bower of Bliss, while Ladurlad dies and awakes in heaven. The background of the poem is Hindu folklore and mythology.

Cursus Mundi (c. 1300). Anonymous religious poem in a northern dialect of Middle English, of about 24,000 lines largely in rhyming couplets. Very popular in its day, it describes the "course of the world" in seven ages from the creation to doomsday; its history is based on the Old and New Testaments, interspersed with numerous legends and saints' lives from medieval lore, and told in a style resembling that of the chivalric romances.

cursus honorum (Lat., "course of honors"). In ancient Rome, the steps up the ladder of political success. In order of influence, the magistrates whose offices were generally included in the cursus honorum were the tribune, the quaestor, the aedile, the praetor, and the consul. By the time he reached the consulate, the Roman politician had usually made his fortune and was ready to be assigned the comfortable governorship of a conquered province.

Curtain Theatre. Famous Elizabethan playhouse. It was located in Shoreditch and used as an "easer" (an annex to accommodate overflow crowds) to the neighboring Theatre. Shakespeare's company, the Lord Chamberlain's Men occupied the Curtain between the closing of the Theatre in 1597 and the opening of the Globe in 1599. Some scholars believe it to be the "wooden O" referred to in Shakespeare's Henry V.

Curtis, George William. See Potipherah Bar.
Curtius, Marcus. Legendary Roman hero of 4th century B.C. He is said to have leaped in full armor on horseback into a chasm that had been opened in the Forum at Rome by an earthquake; in so doing he fulfilled a soothsayer’s proclamation that the sacrifice of Rome’s chief treasure, which Curtius interpreted to mean a brave man, would close the fissure.

Cusa, Nicholas of (Nicholas Krebs or Krypfl). Also known as Nicolaus Cusanus (1401-1464). Born at Cusa (Kues) near Trier in Germany, he became a cardinal, an ecclesiastical statesman, and a theologian, but was also an outstanding humanist, philosopher, and mathematician. Known mainly as an early forerunner of the Copernican theory, he was more famous in his day as a brilliant student at Padua, a papal legate at the age of 25, and an influential figure at the Council of Basel (1433). His trip to Constantinople a few years later brought about the Council of Ferrara (1438), which led to the temporary union of the Eastern and Western churches and brought many Greek scholars to Italy (See Revival of Learning and Humanism). As deputy to his friend Pope Pius II, he was able to write philosophical works in peace and deal with them in esoteric and subtle ideas. He intuited notions later explored by Copernicus and Bruno (the infinity of the universe, the cosmological relevance of mathematics, the coincidence of opposites). His most famous work, De docta ignorantia (On Learned Ignorance), insists on the simplicity of truth against the Aristotelian weaving of abstractions and verbal webs.

Custer, George Armstrong (1839-1876). American general. Custer is best known for his “last stand” (1876) at the Little Big Horn River in Dakota Territory when he and his troops were overwhelmed and annihilated by Sioux warriors under Crazy Horse. Custer’s wife, Elizabeth Bacon Custer (1843-1933), described their life together in Boots and Saddles (1885). See Sitting Bull.

Custom of the Country, The (1913). A novel by Edith Wharton. The heroine is Undine Spragg, a ruthless social climber who, through several marriages and divorces, samples the pleasures of money and aristocratic titles before finding her own level and marrying the youth from her home town who has become a millionaire.

Cutty Sark. A witch in Robert Burns’ poem Tam O’Shanter. The term means “short skirt” (cutty being the Scottish word for short, sark being Scottish for shirt), and Burns uses it jocularly to describe the witch that catches Tam’s eye. Cutty is also used to describe a short, plump woman and, by extension, is used playfully to describe a hussy.

Cuvier, Baron Georges Léopold Chrétien Frédéric Dagobert (1769-1832). French zoologist and paleontologist. Cuvier was instrumental in founding the sciences of comparative anatomy and paleontology. He published a series of lectures on his findings, Leçons d’anatomie comparée (1800-1805), and a work entitled Recherches sur les ossements fossiles (1821-1824).

Cuzco, El. A city in Peru, once the capital of the Inca empire. According to one Inca legend, it was founded about 1100 by the first emperor, Manco Capac, who was given a golden staff by the sun god and told to establish a city on the spot where the staff sank into the ground.

Cybele (Kybele or Kybebe). An ancient Asian goddess identified by the Greeks with Rhea. Originally a bisexual earth goddess, she was made a female by the gods. Jealously in love with the beautiful youth Attis, who was preparing to marry a nymph, she drove him to madness, in which he castrated himself and died. She mourned for him thereafter. Cybele was celebrated in orgiastic rites by eunuch priests.

In her rites she was always associated with the corybantes, a group of young men who dance and play musical instruments. Because these rites were similar to those of Rhea and her attendant Curillas, which were also widely practiced in Phrygia, the two became identified. Cybele, one of whose names was the Great Mother, became an important goddess in Rome, where she was known as Magna Deum Mater.

Cyclopic masonry. The gigantic old Pelasgic ruins of Greece, Asia Minor, and Italy, such as the Gallery of Tyns, the Gate of Lions at Mycenae, the Treasury of Athens, and the Tombs of Phoroneus and Danaos. They are composed of huge blocks fitted together without mortar, with marvelous nicety, and are fabled to be the work of the Cyclops. The term is also applied to similar structures in many parts of the world.

Cyclops (Gr., kyklops, circular eye). Any of a group of giants, offspring of Ge and Uranus. Hesiod listed three of them, named Brontes, Steropes, and Arges, who forged Zeus’s thunderbolts. Each had only one eye, which was set in the middle of his forehead.

The most famous of the Cyclops, however, was Polyphemus, whose cannibal welcome to Odysseus and his sailors is related both in the Odyssey and in Euripides’ satyr play Cyclops.

Cygne, Le (The Swan). A poem by Stéphane Mallarmé. The swan serves as a symbol representing the cold and sterile solitude of the poet, who lives in a world apart set from that of ordinary men. Images of whiteness, ice, and snow are used to create the poem’s atmosphere.

Cymbeline. One of the kings in the 12th-century History of the Kings of Britain written by Geoffrey of Monmouth. When Caesar invaded the British island, he forced the Britons to pay tribute and took Cymbeline with him as a hostage. Cymbeline was brought up in Rome as a Roman. When he became king of Britain, he lived peacefully with the Romans. After his death, his sons Guiderius and Arviragus refused to pay tribute, and a new Roman invasion ensued. Some three centuries later, he became the central, titular figure of Shakespeare's play Cymbeline.

Cymbeline (c. 1610). A play by William Shakespere. Upon hearing of the secret marriage between his daughter Imogen and Posthumus Leonatus, a gentleman of his court, Cymbeline, king of Britain, banishes Posthumus, who goes to Rome. There he meets the cynical Iachimo, who makes a wager that, going to Britain, he will cause Imogen to be unfaithful. When Imogen scorns his advances, Iachimo resorts to subterfuge. He gains access to her bedroom in the dead of night, steals her bracelet, and convinces Posthumus that he has won the wager. The outraged husband orders his servant Pisanio to murder Imogen, but the kindly fellow allows her to escape dressed as a boy.
In the wilds of Wales she comes upon the banished lord Belarius, who is living with Cymbeline's two sons, Guiderius and Arviragus, whom he had adducted as infants. Eventually Iachimo's villainy is exposed, Imogen and Posthumus are reconciled, and Cymbeline is reunited with his sons.

The historical source of the play is Holinshed's Chronicles (1577), but the theme of the wager is taken from Boccaccio's Decameron. Although the highly complicated plot often seems to be a parody of the extravagance of Elizabethan drama, the play itself contains much beautiful and moving poetry,
"Hark! hark! the lark" and "Fear no more the heat
o' the sun" being famous examples.

Cymocles. See Faerie Queen, The.

Cymodoce. A sea nymph and companion of Venus, in Vergil's Georgics and Aeneid. See Faerie Queen, The.

Cynara. The lady to whom the best-known poem of Ernest Dowson is addressed. Each stanza closes,
"I have been faithful to thee, Cynara, in my fashion."
The poem has a Latin title: Non sum qualiis eram bonae sub regno Cynarae.

Cynewulf or Cynwulf (early 9th century). Old English religious poet. His identity is known because he wove runes spelling his name into the ends of four poems in alliterative verse: The Fates of the Apostles, the Ascension, Juliana, and Elene, the story of St. Helena and her son Constantine. In the Exeter Book the Ascension is preceded by the Incarnation and followed by the Last Judgement, also attributed to Cynewulf, the three poems being commonly known as Christ. The more than 80 "riddles" in the Exeter Book were long attributed to Cynewulf, but he probably wrote very few of them. His work probably influenced the unknown authors of Christ and Satana (see under Caradmon), Andreas, and the remain ing "riddles," which are short poems of description, some simple, some very obscure. See Vercelli Book.

Cynics. A Greek school of philosophy. It was founded at Athens by Antisthenes (c. 455-c. 360 B.C.), a pupil of Socrates. Antisthenes held that happiness is only to be attained by freedom from desires.
The principles of the Cynics were illustrated in the life of Diogenes. The school may have been named after Antisthenes' school in the gymnasion at Cy-nosarges, or it may have been derived from kyōn (dog). Diogenes' nickname. The views of the Cynics were later adopted and modified by the Stoics under Zeno.

Cynthia. The moon; a surname of Artemis or Diana. The Roman Diana, who personified the moon, was so called from Mount Cynthus in Delos, where she was born.

Cyprian, St. Full name Thascius Caecilius Cyprianus (c. 200-258). The first Christian bishop to suffer martyrdom. The son of a wealthy patrician family, he was converted to Christianity (246), made bishop of Carthage (248), and there beheaded as a martyr (258). His Letters are an important source of information about the early Christian church.

Cyrano de Bergerac, Savinien (1619-1655).
French author and playwright. In his fantasies Histoire comique des états et empires de la lune (Comical History of the States and Empires of the Moon, 1655) and Histoire comique des états et empires du soleil (Comical History of the States and Empires of the Sun, 1661) Cyrano recounts his imaginary visits to the moon and sun; his descriptions of their people and institutions are broadly satirical of the society and politics of his own day. He also composed the comedy Le Pédant joué (The Pedant Tricked, 1654) and the tragedy La Mort d'Agrippine
(The Death of Agrippina, 1653), both still recognized as poetic and remarkable works. A freethinker and a soldier, famed for his skill in duels as well as for his inordinately long nose, Cyrano served as inspiration for the central character in Edmond Rostand's play Cyrano de Bergerac (1897).

Cyreniac School. See Aristippus.

Cyrus the Great (d. 529 B.C.). The founder of the Persian Empire. Cyrus dethroned his grandfather Astyages, and conquered Lydia and Babylonia. He permitted the exiled Jews to rebuild Jerusalem, as recorded in the Old Testament and treated generously the conquered Lydian king Croesus. Legends surrounding his birth are related by Herodotus.

Cytherea (Kytherea). An epithet of Aphrodite. It resulted from her first setting foot on the island of Cythera after her birth from seafoam.
Dabit, Eugène (1898–1936). French novelist of the working class. Like Hôtel du Nord (1929), his other novels treat sympathetically the life of the laborer: Villa Oasis (1932), Faubourgs de Paris (1933), and Le Mal de Vivre (1939).

dactyl. In English prosody, a metrical foot consisting of three syllables, the first accented and the second and third unaccented. The word “won-der-ful” is a dactyl. The meter made up of such units is called dactylic meter. The six-foot dactylic line was the epic verse of Latin and Greek poetry and was used by Homer and Vergil. An example in English is: “this is the/ forest pri/ meval, the/ murmuring/ pines and the/ hemlocks . . .” from Longfellow’s Evangeline.

Dactyls (Daktyloi). Sacred smiths vaguely connected with the worship of Rhea in Crete and sometimes identified with the Curetes and the Corybantes (see Cybele). The idea that they were possessed of magical powers is related to the ancient notion that all smiths were magicians.

Dada or Dadaism. A literary and artistic movement founded in 1916 and devoted to the negation of all traditional values in philosophy and the arts. Its form was a protest against what its leaders felt to be the insane destruction of civilized life and thought during World War I. Organized in Zurich by Tristan Tzara, with Hans Arp, the German poet Hugo Ball, and medical student Richard Huelsenbeck, the movement produced the Dada review. This review proclaimed its intention to replace logical reason in thought with deliberate madness, and to substitute intentionally discordant chaos for established notions of beauty or harmony in the arts. Dada meetings turned into riots; art exhibits were mocking hoaxes. The former cubist painter Francis Picabia, who had been leading a similar movement in New York with Marcel Duchamp, joined Tzara’s group in 1918. The next year they joined in Paris with André Breton, who with Louis Aragon, Paul Eluard, and Philippe Soupault founded the ironically named review Littérature. While Tzara continued his sensational efforts at pure negation, the Germans adapted the revolt to the service of Communism. Breton and his group became interested in the subconscious, breaking with Tzara in 1921 and officially founding Surrealism in 1924. Dadaism revived in the 1930’s in England and America, as a revolt against traditional artistic values.

Daedalus (Daidalos). In Greek mythology, a fabulously cunning artisan. An Athenian, the son of Metion and descendant of Hephaestus, he was exiled from Athens for murdering his apprentice Talus or Perdix. Fleeing to Crete, he earned a questionable distinction by constructing the wooden cow in which Minos’ queen Pasiphaë was able to satisfy her passion for a bull. He was then faced with the necessity of providing a place to keep their offspring, the Minotaur; for this purpose he built the famous LABYRINTH.

Having made himself so useful to Minos, he was imprisoned in his own Labyrinth so that he could not leave the king’s service. Making wings of wax and feathers for himself and his son Icarus, he flew away to Sicily. Icarus, however, disobeying his father’s instructions, flew too close to the sun; the wings melted and he fell to his death in the sea.

demon (daimon). A minor divinity in ancient Greece. Originally beneficent spirits of the dead who insured fertility and often had animal as well as human forms, certain daemons became more individualized in function and ultimately developed into heroes or gods. Dionysus retained most clearly the character of a fertility daemon.

daemonic (Ger., das Dämonische). In a special sense, a quality of certain characters in Goethe’s works, such as the heroes of Götz von Berlichingen and Egmont. The daemonic figure is endowed with a powerful, uncannily attractive individual force that sweeps other people along in its violent destiny. In Faust, it is Mephistopheles rather than Faust himself who exemplifies this quality. In his famous poem Urworte, Orphisch (Primal Orphic Words, 1817), Goethe defines the basic elements in human destiny as Daemon, Chance, Love, Necessity, and Hope, Daemon referring to each man’s unique, inborn, developmental force, the unalterable law of his own individual growth.

Dagon. A god of the Philistines. He was supposed (from very uncertain etymological and mythological indications) to have been symbolized as half man and half fish. He is mentioned by Milton in Paradise Lost and Samson Agonistes.

Damonische, das

Dahm, Felix (1834–1912). German author, best known for his "professorial novels," so called because of the antiquarian and scholarly exactness that destroys their artistic value. The most famous is Ein Kampf um Rom (A Struggle for Rome, 1876).

daimyō (daimyo, "great name"). Feudal lord. It was used chiefly in reference to the clan heads and owners of large fiefs during the Tokugawa period (1600–1689).

Daisy Miller (1878). A novelette by Henry James. It deals with an unsophisticated, "strikingly, admirably pretty" girl from Schenectady who runs away with the conventions of a group of Europeanized Americans who enforce the rules with unthinking severity.

Daladier, Édouard (1884– ). Premier of France three times: in 1933, 1934, 1938–1940. With the English prime minister Neville Chamberlain, Daladier was responsible for signing the Munich pact with Hitler in 1938. In 1939 Daladier signed the declaration of war against Germany; he resigned as premier just before the German invasion and the surrender of France. Daladier was arrested, first by the Vichy regime, and was later imprisoned in Germany. After the war he was elected to a seat in the National Assembly.

Dalai Lama. See Lama.

Daleroze. See Jacques-Dalcroze.

Dali, Salvador (1904– ). Spanish painter and etcher. He is best known for his paintings of irrational subjects done in a meticulously realistic style. Long a disciple of surrealism, he has also experimented with pointillism, scientific cubism, futurism, constructivism, and bulbulism. The last-named involves shooting a 16th-century blunderbuss filled with graphite at a blank etching plate and printing the resulting pattern. Many critics and a great deal of the public dismiss Dali as merely an artistic prankster; however, his work has been purchased and displayed by the Museum of Modern Art (New York) and the Metropolitan Museum of Art (New York). Perhaps his most famous painting is Persistence of Memory (1931), a desolate landscape with limp, melting watches sagging over cliffs and leafless trees.

Dalinda. The servant of the calumnied Ginevra in an episode of the Orlando Furtivo of Ariosto. Her revelations to Rinaldo expose the villain Polinesso, the slanderer of her mistress, and he is then denounced and killed in a duel.

Dalloway, Mrs. See Mrs. Dalloway.

Daly, Arnold (1875–1927). American actor and producer. In 1903 he produced Shaw's Candida and thereafter appeared exclusively in Shaw's dramas. His arrest, trial, and acquittal after the first performance of Mrs. Warren's Profession (1905) is a famous case. The play caused a sensation because Mrs. Warren's profession is prostitution.

Daly, [Thomas] Augustine (1871–1948). American newspaperman and poet. He is best known for his poems in Italian and Irish dialect, especially Mia Carlotta. Among his books are Canzoni (1906), Carmina (1909), Madrigali (1912), and Macaroni Ballads (1919).

Damascus. A city in Syria on the edge of the desert. Famous for its silks and steel, it is generally considered the oldest city to have continuing existence in the world. It is frequently referred to in the Old Testament (Gen. 14:15; 15:2). Its role in the history of Paul's conversion is told in the New Testament, Acts 9.

Damayanti. See Nala.

Dame aux Camélia(s), La (Camille, 1852). A play by Alexandre Dumas, fils. The work, which was first published as a novel (1848), met with great success, both at home and abroad. The heroine, Marguerite Gautier, known in America as Camille, is a beautiful courtesan who has become part of the fashionable world of Paris. Sooning the wealthy Count de Varville who has offered to relieve her debts should she once more become his mistress, she escapes to the country with her penniless lover Armand Duval. Here Camille makes him a great sacrifice. Giving Armand whom she truly loves the impression that she has tired of their life together, but actually at the request of his family, she returns to Paris and her life of frivolity. The tale concludes with the ultimate tragic reunion of Armand and the dying Camille. This sentimental story, dealing with a real moral and social problem, is also the basis of Verdi's opera La Traviata.

Dankina. In Babylonian mythology, the wife of Marduk.

Dannation of Theron Ware, The (1896). A novel by Harold Frederic. The main character, an earnest young clergyman, suffers emotional conflict when he realizes the deficiencies of the church. The book, suggesting the disintegration of religious orthodoxy, was sensational at the time of its publication.

Dameclos' sword. A symbol of anxiety. Damocles, a scyphocrat of Dionysius the Elder, of Syracuse, was invited by the tyrant to try the felicity he so much envied. Accepting, he was set down to a sumptuous banquet, but overhead was a sword suspended by a hair. Damocles was afraid to stir, and the banquet was a tantalizing torment to him.

Damoetas. A herald. Theoricus and Vergil use the name in their pastoral.

Damon and Pythias. Two inseparable friends of Greek legend. They were Syracusans of the first half of the fourth century B.C. Pythias, condemned to death by Dionysius the tyrant, obtained leave to go home to arrange his affairs on condition that Damon agree to take his place and be executed should Pythias not return. Pythias was delayed, Damon was led to execution, but his friend arrived just in time to save him. Dionysius was so struck with this honorable friendship that he pardoned both of them.

Dämönische, das. See Darmomic.
Dampier, William (1652-1715). English navigator and buccaneer. Perhaps the first Englishman to see Australia, he discovered and named New Britain Island in the Pacific, and Dampier Archipelago, off the coast of Australia, is named after him. During a voyage around the world, he marooned Alexander Selkirk, the prototype of Robinson Crusoe, on the Juan Fernandez Islands near Chile, and subsequently was the pilot of the privateering company that rescued Selkirk in 1709. He wrote several accounts of his experiences, the best known of which is A New Voyage Round the World (1697).

Damrosch, Walter [Johannes] (1862-1950). German-born conductor and composer. He championed the cause of Wagner in the U.S., and was the originator of educational radio concerts. My Musical Life (1923) is his autobiography. His father, Leopold Damrosch (1832-1885) and his brother, Frank [Heino] Damrosch (1859-1937), were also conductors.

Dana, Charles Anderson (1819-1897). American journalist. Reformer and editor, Dana became assistant secretary of war under Stanton. After the Civil War he bought the New York Sun, which soon became one of the leading newspapers in the U.S. Although he competed with Godkin's Post in sensationalism, Dana surrounded himself with the best newspaper writers of the day. H. L. Mencken said that he "produced the first newspaper on earth that was decently written." Dana discussed his craft in The Art of Newspaper Making (1895).

Dana, Richard Henry, Jr. (1815-1882). American lawyer and writer. During his student days, Dana had serious difficulty with his eyes; he shipped out as a common sailor to improve his health. Dana might have traveled as a passenger, but chose the more strenuous course of working on the Pilgrim on a voyage around Cape Horn in 1834. He returned home in 1836, his health much improved. From the journey he had kept, he wrote the American sea classic, Two Years Before the Mast. The same year, he finished law school and was admitted to the bar; his experiences at sea led him to become a sailor's lawyer. He wrote a manual for sailors, The Seaman's Friend (1841), which became an authority on naval law. His sympathy for the downtrodden did not allow him to amass wealth as a lawyer, nor did it leave him much time for writing. He did collect the lectures of a famous teacher, Edward Tyrell Channing (1855).

Dana, Richard Henry, Sr. (1787-1879). American poet, editor, and lecturer. A founder of the North American Review, he also published his own journal, called The Idle Man (1821-1822). In 1833, his work was collected in the two-volume Poems and Prose Writings (enlarged, 1850).

Danaë. The daughter of King Acrisius of Argos. Because the Delphic oracle predicted that his death would come at the hands of his daughter's son, Acrisius built a tower of brass and shut Danaë in it. But Zeus visited her as a shower of gold and made her the mother of Perseus. Acrisius then set mother and son adrift in a chest, but they were saved by Zeus.

Danaides. The 50 daughters of Danaos. They were punished in Hades for having murdered their husbands on their wedding night by having to draw water everlastingly in sieves from a deep well. The reason for their gory deed was told in a trilogy of plays by Aeschylus, of which only The Suppliant Women remains.

dance of death. An allegorical representation of the triumph of Death over people of every age and class, reminding men of their mortality. Originating in the Middle Ages as a morality play, it became even more popular as a subject for pictures, such as the woodcuts by Hans Holbein. Closely related is the dance macabre, in which the dead themselves lead the dance, rather than an abstract personification of Death.

Goethe used "dance of death" for the title of his ballad Todtentanz; W. H. Auden's The Dance of Death (1933) is a dramatic poem satirizing the decline of the English middle class.

Dance of Death, The (1901). A double play by August Strindberg. One of Strindberg's most powerful plays, The Dance of Death is characterized by intense psychological realism in its presentation of a love-hate relationship between husband and wife. Alice has been virtually imprisoned by Edgar, her tyrannical husband, for 25 years; now he is gravely ill, and the conflict focuses on his attempts to maintain his domination of his wife and her attempts at retaliatory torture.

Dance to the Music of Time, A. A sequence of novels by Anthony Powell. It includes A Question of Upbringing (1951), A Buyer's Market (1952), The Acceptance World (1955), At Lady Molly's (1957), Casanova's Chinese Restaurant (1960), and The Kindly Ones (1962). The novels describe the narrator's schooldays, youth, and maturity, and the lives of his various friends. Though primarily satiric in tone, they are indebted to Marcel Proust for the underlying sadness they express about life and time.

Dancourt, Florent Carton. Known as Sieur d'Ancourt (1661-1725). French comic playwright. Jesuit-educated and intended for the law, Dancourt married an actress and devoted himself to acting and playwriting instead. His prose comedies are informal in style and often reveal their hasty composition, but rollicking satire and topical subject matter redeem such works as Le Chevalier à la mode, La Loterie (The Lottery, 1697), Le Notaire obligant (The Obliging Notary, 1685), Les Bourgeoisies à la mode (1692), Le Mari retrouvé (The Rediscovered Husband, 1698), Les Bourgeoisies de Qualité (1700), and Les Agioteurs (The Stock-Speculators, 1710), in which Dancourt lampooned decadent aristocracy, social climbers, financial fraud, speculation, judicial inefficiency, and other vices and foibles of his day.

Dandaka. In Hindu legend, a king of the solar dynasty (Raghu), who raped the daughter of his guru. He was punished by having his kingdom turned into the forest known as Dandakaranya, often mentioned in classical Indian writing (Sansk. aranya, forest).

Dandin. The mad magistrate and central figure of Jean Racine's comedy Les Plaideurs. Locked up in the house by his son and prevented from judging in court, he hears facial cases involving neighbors, household servants, and pets.

Dandin. See Perrin DENDIN.

Dane, Clemence. Pen name, taken from the church of St. Clements Dane in London, of Winifred Ashton (— ). English novelist, dramatist, and poet. Her best-known play A Bill of Divorce- ment (1921) made the reputation of Katharine Corn- nell; she adapted it for the stage from her novel Legend (1919). Her other well-known novels are Regiment of Women (1917) and Broome Stages (1931), about a theatrical family whose history paral- lels that of the Plantagenet family. Her other plays include Will Shakespeare (1921); Naboth’s Vine- yard (1925), a play about Jezabel; Come of Age (1934), a poetic play about Thomas Chatterton; and Till Time Shall End (1961).

Danel or Daniel. Father of the young hero in the Canaanite The Poem of Agam. Daniel is a powerful but pious chieftain, who is granted a son by El only to lose him at the hands of Anat.

Dangeau, Marquis de. Philippe de Courcillon (1638–1720). French courtier and favorite of Louis XIV. His ill-written but scrupulously detailed Mé- moires, a record of court affairs from 1684 to 1720, are an invaluable historical source and aided Saint-Simon in the composition of his own Mémoires.

Dangerfield, Thomas. See Meal-Tub Plot.

Dangerous Corner (1932). A play by J. B. Priestley. A chance remark at a party is the “danger- ous corner” which leads to embarrassing revela- tions about those present. At the end of the play the opening conversation is renegotiated, this time success- fully.

Daniel. A biblical hero whose deeds and prophe- cies are recorded in the Old Testament book of his name. For continuing to pray to his own God while a captive in Babylon, he was cast into a den of lions, but divinely delivered. Especially gifted with “understanding in all visions and dreams” (Dan. 2:17), he successfully exercised this gift by interpret- ing Nebuchadnezzar’s disquieting dreams, as well as the mysterious handwriting on the wall which disturbed the revelry of Belshazzar (Dan. 5:5).

Nothing is known of Daniel except what appears in his book. The first half of the book tells the story of the Hebrew prophet living in Babylon during the exile; the second half is his prophetic vision.

It is now thought that Daniel was written c. 164 b.c. instead of in the sixth century B.C., that Daniel’s “predictions” were history by the time of writing.

Daniel, Arnau[l]t (12th century). Provençal Troubadour, for a while attached to the court of Richard the Lion-hearted. He invented the Eustina, and was greatly praised by Dante and Petrarch for the technical virtuosity of his versification.

Daniel, Samuel (c. 1562–1619). English poet and dramatist. Daniel is known for the purity of his dictio n, the smoothness and grace of his verse: he was called “well-languaged Daniel” by contempo- raries. His works include the famous sonnet se- quence, Delta (1592, with numerous later “aug- mented” editions); The Complaint of Rosamund (1592), a first-person narrative of the sort found in the Mirror for Magistrates; The Civil Wars (1595– 1609), a verse history of the Wars of the Roses; A Defense of the Rosary (1603), an essay answering Thomas Campion’s attack on English rhymed and accentual versification; and The Vision of the Twelve Goddesses (1604), the first masque to be written for the new court of James I. He wrote two tragedies in the style of Seneca, Cleopatra (c. 1593) and Philotas (1604).

Daniel Deronda (1874–1876). The last novel of George Eliot. The heroine, Gwendolyn Harleth, marries Henleigh Grandcourt in order to avoid im- pending destitution of herself and her mother; this she does in spite of a previous promise not to, made to the mother of his illegitimate children. Grand- court turns out to be a tyrannical, selfish man, bent on breaking Gwendolyn’s high-spiritedness. When Grandcourt drowns in a moment of delay before Gwendolyn throws him a rope, she blames herself. In her distress she turns to Daniel Deronda, a man of fine character whom she has long admired. His sympathetic advice and her suffering, caused by the realization that he will never marry her, serve to develop her finer qualities. Deronda, a man of the highest ideals, has been brought up by his rich guardian as a Christian, but learns that he is a Jew. He marries Mirah Cohen whom he had saved from suicide. In Mordecai, who turns out to be Mirah’s lost brother, he finds a friend who inspires him with the cause of Jewish nationalism. After Mordecai’s death he and Mirah go to Palestine to live.

Danniello, Bernardino (d. 1565). Italian critic from Lucca. He wrote the first Italian Renaissance treatise on the art of poetry, La poesia (1536).

Danniels, Jonathan [Worth] (1902— ). American journalist and writer. The son of Josephus Danniels, he succeeded his father as editor of the Raleigh, N. C., News and Observer. From 1943 to 1945 he was an administrative assistant to Presi- dent Roosevelt. Frontier on the Potomac (1946) describes the Washington scene during those years. He also wrote A Southerner Discovers the South (1938), Tar Heels: A Portrait of North Carolina (1941), and The End of Innocence (1954).

Danniels, Josephus (1862–1948). American jour- nalist and statesman. Born in Washington, N. C., Daniels was editor of the Raleigh Times and Ob-server from 1884 until his death. He served as secre- tary of the navy (1913–1921) and as ambassador to Mexico (1933–1941). His autobiographical volumes are of great historical interest: Editor: In Politics (1940), The Wilson Era (2 vols., 1944, 1945), and Shirt Sleeve Diplomat (1947).

D’Annunzio, Gabriele (1863–1938). Italian poet, novelist, dramatist, and soldier. He was an excep- tionally prolific writer whose principal artistic aim seems to have been the perfect and verbally precise analysis of passion. His position as a decadent results from the absence of any real concern for morality, conscience, and thought in his work, so that the well-exercised pleasures of the senses alone give mean- ing to life. His heroes are unfettered by the bourgeois ethic; their refined ability to enjoy sensual pleasure and to experience "perfect passion" make them a law to themselves, suggestive of Nietzsche's superman.

The D'Annunzio hero first appeared in the novel Il Piacere (The Child of Pleasure, 1889) in the person of the amoral sybarite Andrea Sperelli. His other novels include Giovanni Episcopo (Episcopo & Company, 1892), L'Innocente (The Intruder, 1892), Il Trionfo della Morte (The Triumph of Death, 1894), and The Flame of Life, based on his celebrated liaison with Eleonora Duse. Among his best-known dramas are La Citta Morla (The Dead City, 1893), La Croonda, Francesca da Rimini (see Paolo and Francesca), and La Figlia di Jorio (The Daughter of Jorio, 1904). His finest lyric poems are probably included in Le Laudi (1903-1912), particularly in the third book, Alcane. He also wrote short stories describing peasant life in his native Abruzzi: Terra Vergine (1882), Libro delle Vergini (1884), and San Pantaleone (1886).

An ardent nationalist, he led an expedition into the city of Fiume in 1919 and held it for 15 months in defiance of Italy's obligations under the Treaty of Versailles. He later supported the chauvinistic Fascist Party.

Dante. Full name, Dante (or Durante) Alighieri (1265-1321). Italian poet. The first important author to write in Italian and one of the greatest poets in all literature, he was born in Florence, where he became thoroughly educated in both classical and Christian literature. As a young man, Dante joined actively in both the politics and the actual fighting in the wars between the Guelphs and Ghibellines. He belonged to the Bianchi, one of the rival factions within the Guelph party, and when the Neri finally achieved power late in 1301, Dante and many others were sentenced (1302) to perpetual banishment, condemned to death by burning should they be caught again in Florence. The Bianchi soon made an alliance with the Ghibelline party and attempted several unsuccessful attacks on Florence. Their hopes ended with the death (1313) of the emperor Henry VII, who they had hoped would reunite Germany and Italy. Thereafter, Dante spent most of his time writing his Commedia (see The Divine Comedy) under the patronage of Ghibelline leaders, one in Verona, then one in Ravenna. The exact period of the composition of the Commedia is unknown. Dante may have begun it as early as 1300, more probably 1307, but the major part of the writing was almost certainly done after 1315, and the last section completed shortly before his death.

Dante had first met Beatrice in 1274 when he was nine; their second meeting was nine years later. After her death in 1290 he wrote La Vita Nuova, which reveals the significance of his idealized love for her as the inspiration for most of his works. He finally married Gemma Donati (1292?), by whom he had two sons and one or two daughters; she did not, however, accompany him into exile in 1302.

Dante's early works include a number of amatory lyrics in the form of the canzone and the sonnet, many of which appear in La Vita Nuova and in the unfinished Il Convivio or Convito (The Banquet, 1304-1307), which consists of three long commentaries, encyclopedic in scope, each on one of his own canzoni (see Stilnovisti).

De vulgari eloquentia (1304-1306) is a Latin treatise "on the vernacular tongue." In opposition to the general assumption of his day that Latin must be used for all important writing, Dante urges that the naturally Italian used for amatory lyrics be enriched with the best from every spoken dialect and established as a serious literary language, thus unifying the separated Italian territories by the creation of a national culture. He also analyzes several Italian dialects, anticipating the much later science of linguistics, and considers various problems of literary style and specific poetic forms, especially the canzone. In fact, Dante used his native Tuscan for the Commedia and La Vita Nuova, and thereby established that dialect as the ancestor of modern Italian.

In the Latin treatise De Monarchia (On Monarchy, usually translated as On World Government, c. 1313) Dante presents the political perspective that also becomes a major theme in the Commedia. He believes that a unified temporal authority, the Holy Roman Empire, is necessary, but deplores the rivalry for supreme political power currently raging between the emperors and the papacy. He prophesies that peace will only be achieved when the universal monarchy of the empire is established and recognized as being dependent only on God, although reverent toward the spiritual authority of the Church. Then Church and State will be allies with separate responsibilities in guiding mankind to peaceful happiness on earth and bliss in heaven.

Other works include two Eclogues (c. 1319) in Latin verse; the Quaestio de aqua et terra (1320), a Dantès, Edmond. See Count of Monte Cristo.

Danton, Georges Jacques (1759–1794). French lawyer, orator, and leader of the French Revolution. He became a leader of the Cordeliers early in the Revolution, a member of the Legislative Assembly in 1792, and was a major figure in the storming of the Tuileries. In the new republic he was the minister of justice. He instituted the Revolutionary Tribunal (Mar. 10, 1793). Now a partisan of peace, he came into increasing conflict with Robespierre, who later charged him and his followers with a conspiracy to overthrow the government. His trial was a mockery and he was guillotined. His death is the subject of a dramatic poem, Dantons Tod (Ger., Danton’s Death, 1835) by Georg Büchner. In a speech (Sept. 2, 1792) inspired by the dangers of the European alliance against revolutionary France, Danton uttered the famous words: “Il nous faut de l’audace, encore de l’audace, et toujours de l’audace, et la France est sauve.” (Fr., “We must dare and dare, and dare again—and France is saved.”).

Dantons Tod (Danton’s Death, 1835). A drama by George Büchner, depicting with convincing psychological perception and frequent ironic humor the steps leading up to the execution of George Jacques Danton. The play is starkly realistic; Danton first appears in it as a tired, apathetic, somewhat licentious, and rather unrevolutionary character. But this, by contrast, only increases the effectiveness of his idealistic commitment when he finally defies Robespierre.

Daphne. In Greek mythology, the daughter of a river-god, loved by Apollo. She fled from the amorous god, and escaped by being changed into a laurel, thenceforth the favorite tree of Apollo.

Daphnis. In Greek mythology, the Sicilian shepherd who invented pastoral poetry. Though the son of Hermes and a nymph, and a half-brother of Pan, he was unfortunate in love, being blinded by a nymph for a not very clear reason. He made up sad but lovely songs on the subject, and was eventually taken up to heaven by Hermes. On the other hand, Theocritus, the human inventor of the pastoral, claims in his first idyl that Daphnis died unrequited love, a punishment from Aphrodite for having refused the love of women.

Daphnis and Chloé. A Greek pastoral poem, generally ascribed to the sophist Longus (fourth or fifth century A.D.). It tells the story of the tender love of Daphnis and Chloé, the children of a goat-herd and a shepherd. It owes its fame in modern times to the French version by Amyot (1559). Major works in its later tradition are Tasso’s Aminta, Montemayor’s Diana, and Saint Pierre’s Paul et Virginie. Maurice Ravel made two highly popular orchestral suites from his ballet music for Daphnis and Chloé (1912).

Da Ponte, Lorenzo (1749–1838). Italian librettist and poet. Appointed poet to the Italian Theater in Vienna, he was commissioned by Mozart to write the librettos for Le Nozze di Figaro (1786; see Figaro), Don Giovanni, and Così Fan Tutte (1790). In 1805 he emigrated to the U.S., where he was appointed professor of Italian literature at Columbia University. His colorful memoirs, Memoire, first appeared in 1823.

Da Porto, Luigi (1486–1529). Italian soldier and courtier. Da Porto took a story by Masuccio and turned it into Giulietta e Romeo (see Romeo and Juliet), first published in 1530. Although it reached Shakespeare through such intermediary sources as Bandello and English translators, it was Da Porto who first gave it its definitive plot and characters.

Dapper. A character in Ben Jonson’s comedy The Alchemist (1610). A lawyer’s clerk, he goes to Subide, the “alchemist,” to be supplied with a familiar to make him win in horse-racing, cards, and all games of chance.

Darby and Joan. A designation for a loving, old-fashioned, virtuous married couple. The names appear in a ballad called The Happy Old Couple, probably written by Henry Woodfall, and the original characters are said to have been John Darby of Bartholomew Close, who died in 1730, and his wife. Woodfall served his apprenticeship as a printer to John Darby. Some authorities attribute the ballad to Matthew Prior. It was originally distributed as a broadside ballad in 1748.

Darcy. See Pride and Prejudice.

Dardanelles. The ancient Hellespont, a strait between Europe and Asiatic Turkey. During World War I the Allies attacked the Turks here, and suffered defeat. In 1941 it was the gateway to Russia from the Mediterranean but Turkey, as neutral, refused passage of it. Its fortifications were so strong that no attempt on it was made by sea.

Dardinello. In the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, the King of Zunara in Africa, son of Almonte, and one of the leading pagan warriors besieging the forces of Charlemagne at Paris. He is killed by Rinaldo.

Dare, Virginia (1587–?). The first child of English parents born in America. She and her parents were among the settlers who disappeared from the “lost colony” at Roanoke Island.

Dares Phrygius. In Homer’s Iliad, the priest of Hephaestus in Troy. He allegedly wrote a poem on the siege of Troy. A Latin poem of the fifth century after Christ, Excidio Troiae Historia, purported to be a translation of Dares Phrygius’ work. The translation is attributed to Cornelius Nepos because it is prefaced by a forged letter from him to Sallust claiming to have found the old manuscript written in Phrygian characters. Although now known to be a literary forgery, the decidedly inferior poem was one of the versions by which the story of Troy was known to the Middle Ages. See Dictys Cretensis.

Darío, Rubén. Pen name of Félix Rubén García (1867–1916). Nicaraguan poet and essayist, famed as the founder and high priest of modernism. Raised by relatives, Darío wrote verse as a child and was known in Central America as “the boy poet.” In 1886, he went to Chile, where he published his first major work, Axol (1888), a collection of verse and prose sketches that bore the imprint of French Parnassianism and revealed the fondness for lush, exotic imagery that was to characterize his work. In 1890, he returned to Central America, where he embarked on the first of his two unhappy marriages, and, after a short visit to Spain in 1892, moved to Buenos Aires. The appearance of Prosas profanas (1896), in which the influence of French symbolism is fused with that of the Parnassians, marked the highpoint of the modernist movement. In 1898, Dario went to Spain as a correspondent for La Nación, a Buenos Aires newspaper with which he was long associated. He was acclaimed by the intellectuals of Spain’s “generation of 98,” who, like Dario, were profoundly affected by the outcome of the Spanish-American War. Cantos de vida y esperanza, generally regarded as his best work, appeared in 1905. Not only does it show the technical excellence and lyric beauty of his earlier poetry, but there is greater freedom and a new feeling for native themes, which he had previously rejected. Dario’s concern for “our America” is also evident in “A Roosevelt,” a poetic diatribe against the U.S. favored by the seizure of Panama in 1903, and in Canto a la Argentina (1910). Dario’s later work also reveals a deepening disillusionment and despair. Although he was named Nicaraguan minister to Spain in 1908, Dario’s last years were marred by financial difficulties and poor health due in part to his heavy drinking. In 1915, after an unsuccessful lecture tour of the U.S., he was stricken by pneumonia in New York and died soon after his return to Nicaragua. Dario’s influence on Spanish poetry can be measured by the statement of Pedro Henríquez Ureña that “of any poem written in Spanish it can be told with certainty whether it was written before or after him.”

Darius I. Known as Darius the Great (c. 550–486 B.C.). King of Persia. A member of a younger branch of the royal family, Darius assumed the throne in 521 after quelling a rebellion led by the magician Gautama, who claimed to be Bardiya, brother of the dead king Cambyses. Darius was an excellent administrator, extended the boundaries of the Persian Empire, and built an imposing capital at Persepolis. His exploits are recorded on the famous monument at Behistun in Iran.

According to legend, Darius was one of seven Persian princes who agreed that he should be king whose horse neighed first; his was the first to do so when he tethered a mare near it.

Darius III. Surnamed Codomannus (c. 380–330 B.C.). Last king of Persia. Defeated by Alexander the Great at the Granicus river, at Issus, and at Arbela, he was killed by one of his own satraps.

Legend relates that when Alexander succeeded to the Macedonian throne, Darius sent to him for the traditional tribute of golden eggs, but Alexander answered, “The bird which laid them is flown to the other world, where Darius must seek them.” The Persian king then sent him a bat and ball, in ridicule of his youth; but Alexander told the messengers that with the bat he would beat the ball of power from their master’s hand. Lastly, Darius sent him a bitter melon as emblem of the grief in store for him; but the Macedonian declared that he would make the shah eat his own fruit.

Dark Ages. The earlier centuries of the Middle Ages. Roughly, it encompasses the era between the death of Constantine and the close of the Carolingian dynasty. It was so termed because of the intellectual darkness supposedly characteristic of the period, but nowadays few writers dare to use the term without the qualification “so-called.”

Dark Laughter (1925). A novel by Sherwood Anderson. It deals with the escape of John Stockton, a Chicago newspaperman, from a life he regards as sterile and oppressive, ruled by the machine. In conscious imitation of Mark Twain’s Huckleberry Finn, Stockton travels by boat down the Mississippi River. Eventually, he takes a job as a laborer, under the name of Bruce Dudley, in a factory in his former hometown in Indiana, and there he and Aline Grey, the wife of his employer and a woman similarly dissatisfied with a mechanical life, “in love and elope.” The “dark laughter” of the title is that of the American Negro, who, uncorrupted by white civilization and white morality, is alone still capable of a simple, uninhibited joy.

Darkness at Noon (1941). A novel by Arthur Koestler. Analyzing various kinds of Communist psychology, it is an account of the moral struggles of an idealistic revolutionary who is persuaded by his superiors to confess to crimes against the state which he did not commit.

Darley, George (1795–1846). Irish-born English poet, mathematician. In his use of symbols to express abstract ideas, he anticipates the symbolist school of poetry. He first earned a living writing mathematical textbooks and, but for a severe speech impediment, might have been an eminent professor of that subject. Later he wrote astute, if harsh, criticism of drama and art. His work includes the verse drama Sylvia (1827), and the collections Errors of Ectasie (1822) and Nepenthe, published posthumously in 1876.

Darling, Wendy, Michael, and John. See Peter Pan.

Darnay, Charles. In Charles Dickens’ A Tale of Two Cities, a teacher of languages who loves Lucie Manette and marries her. He is a French aristocrat, nephew of the Marquis de St. Evrémonde, and has changed his name, emigrating to England in rebellion against his family, who have committed grave injustices against peasants. Because of his family’s history, he is considered an enemy of the revolution and when he returns to Paris to help an old servant unjustly imprisoned, he himself is arrested and sentenced to the guillotine; he is saved by the self-sacrificing intervention of Sydney Carton.

Darnel, Aurelia. See Launcelot Greaves.

Darnley, Henry Stuart, Lord (1545–1567). Great-grandson of Henry VII, and the second husband of Mary, Queen of Scots. Displeased at not receiving the crown matrimonial from Mary, Darnley became jealous of David Rizzio, one of her favorite counselors, and was an accomplice in his murder. Shortly thereafter Darnley himself was murdered—possibly with Mary’s knowledge—at Kirk o’ Field, a solitary house near Edinburgh; the house was blown up with gunpowder, and Darnley’s body, apparently strangled, found nearby.

Darrow, Clarence [Seward] (1857–1938). American lawyer, lecturer, and writer. A well-paid railroad lawyer, Darrow viewed the cases he defended unsympathetically. In the famous Eugene Debs case, Darrow resigned his position with the railroads and won a national reputation for his defense of Debs. Later, he defended Nat Leopold and Richard Loeb, who murdered a young boy (1924), and saved them from execution. He was the chief counsel for J. T. Scopes, who was accused of violating Tennessee law by teaching evolution in a public school. (See SCOPES TRIAL.) Although Darrow lost the case, he destroyed the reputation of the prosecuting attorney, William Jennings Bryan.

Darrow wrote two novels, Farmington (1904) and An Eye for an Eye (1905). Among his other volumes are Crime: Its Cause and Its Treatment (1922); Infidels and Heretics (with Wallace Rice, 1929), an anthology; and The Story of My Life (1932). He appears as a character in Inherit the Wind (1955), a play based on the Scopes trial, by Robert E. Lee and Jerome Lawrence, and in Meyer Levin's book Compulsion (1956), based on the Leob-Leopold case.

D'Artagnan. See Charles de Bataz d'Artagnan.

Darwin, Charles Robert (1809–1882). English naturalist, grandson of Erasmus Darwin. An original expounder of the theory of evolution by natural selection, since known as Darwinism, he was to have a profound influence on human concepts of life and the universe. Although he studied medicine at Edinburgh and prepared for the ministry at Cambridge, his abiding interest was natural history, and it was as naturalist that he sailed on the Beagle (1831–1836) on an expedition to southern islands, South American coasts, and Australia. On his return to England he published Zoology of the Voyage of the Beagle (1840). As secretary of the Geological Society (1838–1841), he came into contact with the noted geologist Sir Charles Lyell (1797–1875), who urged him to write on his experiments in inbreeding and his theory of evolution by natural selection. He received (1858) from Alfred Russel Wallace (1823–1913) an abstract outlining an identical theory of natural selection, independently arrived at. He published Wallace's essay along with his own, written in 1844, in 1858. In 1859 he published his Origin of Species; it is said that the first edition sold out in one day, and immediately a raging controversy arose. Within one year, the book's importance, still felt today, as the leading work in natural philosophy in the history of mankind, was recognized. Darwin's later important works include The Movements and Habits of Climbing Plants (1865), The Variation of Animals and Plants under Domestication (1868), The Descent of Man (1871), and Selection in Relation to Sex (1871). See SCOPES TRIAL.

Darwin, Erasmus (1731–1802). English physician, botanist, and poet. He is the author of The Botanic Garden (1789, 1791), a didactic poem in heroic couplets discussing on plants and flowers according to the theories of Linnaeus. Darwin's Zoönomia (1794–1796) is a treatise on evolutionary development, not, however, in the sense that his grandson Charles Robert Darwin was to assign to that term.

Das, Deb Kumar (1936—). Indian poet writing in English; also a research scientist. He published The Night Before Us (1960).

Dasharatha. In Hindu legend, a king of the solar dynasty; in the Ramayana, father of Rama. He had three chief queens, and when the sage Rishyasringa performed a special sacrifice for him, Rama was born to Kaushalya, Lakshmana and Shatrughna to Sumitra, and Bharata to Kaikeyi. His daughter was Sushila. After he ordered Rama into fourteen years’ exile in order to keep a promise he had made to the evil-minded Kaikeyi, he died of a broken heart.

Dashwood, Elinor and Marianne. See Sense and Sensibility.

Dashwood, Elizabeth Monica. See E. M. Delafield.

Datta, Sudhindranath (1901–1960). Indian poet and critic in Bengali. He was a leader of the modernist movement in Bengali and translated European poetry. His best-known work is Orchestra.

Daudet, Alphonse (1840–1897). French novelist of the naturalist school. Daudet is noted for his keen observation, his sympathetic portrayal of character, and his vivid presentation of incident. His novels deal with life in Provence, his birthplace, and with the various social classes of Paris. The Provençal stories (see TARTARIN), vigorous and good-humored, include Lettres de MON Moulin, Tartarin de Tarascon (1872); Tartarin sur les Alpes (1885), and Port-Tarascon (1890). Daudet's novels of Parisian manners include Le Nabob (1877), Numa Roume- stan, Les Rois en exil (1879), and Sapho (1894).

Daudet, Léon (1868–1942). French journalist and writer. The son of Alphonse Daudet, he gave up medicine to devote himself to political journalism. His intemperate, antidemocratic articles, polemical essays, and diatribes at first appeared in Le Gaulois, Le Figaro, and the fanatically anti-Semitic La Libre Parole; then, in 1908, Daudet became coeditor with Charles Maurras of the ultraroyalist Catholic journal L'Action Française. For 20 years the force of his invective was feared, and he wielded a political influence that enabled him to be elected to the Chamber of Deputies, where he served from 1919 to 1924. His influence was, however, insufficient to sustain a murder charge which he had brought against the chauffeur in whose cab his son had committed suicide. The chauffeur prosecuted him, and, following a noisy trial, he was sentenced to prison for defamation. With royalist help he escaped and fled to Belgium in 1927. Daudet wrote the novels L'Astre noir (The Black Heavenly Body, 1893), Les Morti- coles (1894), and Sylla et son destin (1922). His nonfiction books include L'Avant-guerre (1913), Souvenirs (1914), L'Hérédé (1916), Le Morte des images (1919), and Le Stupide XIXe siècle (The Stupid XIXth Century, 1922).

Daumier, Honoré (1808–1879). French painter and caricaturist. On the staff of La Caricature and Charivari, he produced an enormous number of powerful lithographs commenting with bitter humor, scathing satire, or tragic seriousness upon the faults of the bourgeois, the corruption of the law, and the injustices of his age. His direct, economically stated paintings with their superb handling of light and shade remained unappreciated until after his death.

Dauphin. The heir to the French crown under the Valois and Bourbon dynasties. Guy VIII, count of Vienne, was the first so styled, apparently because he wore as his emblem a dolphin. The title descended in the family until 1349, when Humbert III ceded his seigneurie, the Dauphiné, to Philippe, duc de Valois, then, one condition being that the heir of France assume the style of le Dauphin. The first French prince so called was Jean, who succeeded Philippe; the last was a Duc d'Angoulême, son of Charles X, who renounced the title in 1830.
Dauphin remembered in connection with Joan of Arc was Charles VII (1403–1461), the son of the feeble-minded Charles VI. The early part of his reign was wasted in internal dissensions within the court which the weak Dauphin was unable to put down. Thanks to the efforts of Joan, he was crowned in 1429, but it was not till some years later that a group of more vigorous councillors than he had previously had were able to make the new king take a firm policy. Eventually, partly due to the influence of his remarkable mistress Agnes Sorel, Charles became a fairly strong monarch. Apparently embarrassed over his lack of support for Joan during her lifetime, he arranged for her rehabilitation about 25 years later.

The so-called Lost Dauphin was Charles, son of Louis XVI and Marie Antoinette, called after his father's death Louis XVII by French loyalists. According to official accounts he died in prison two years later, but the secrecy surrounding his death inevitably led sympathizers to believe that he had actually escaped. In later years, innumerable pretenders appeared who claimed to be the Lost Dauphin.

Davenant or D'Avenant, Sir William (1606–1668). English dramatist and poet, thought by some to be an illegitimate son of Shakespeare. His Stace of Rhode, a heroic tragedy with “musical recitative,” is considered the first English opera. Though his writing was very popular in his time, his only outstanding work is Gondibert (1651), a heroic poem formed on the aesthetic theories of Hobbes and anticipating Dryden's style.

Davenport, Marcia (1903– ). American novelist. Mrs. Davenport is the daughter of the famous singer Alma Gluck, and her first book was a life of Mozart (1932; rev. 1956). She followed this with several highly popular novels, including Of Lena Geyer (1936), The Valley of Decision (1942), East Side, West Side (1947), My Brother's Keeper (1954), and Constant Image (1960).

David. The shepherd-king of the Old Testament and the reputed author of many of the Psalms. The youngest son of Jesse, he was secretly anointed king by the prophet Samuel while Saul was still on the throne. Stories of his early life are concerned with his immortal friendship for Saul's son Jonathan, and with Saul's growing jealousy. Though he charmed away the black moods of Saul with his harp (I Sam. 16:23), he was, for many years, forced to flee from Saul's anger. When no one else would venture to respond to the giant's challenge, he killed Goliath, the huge champion of the Philistines, with only his slingshot and some stones (I Sam. 17).

After the death of Saul and Jonathan, David became the second king of Israel (c. 1000–c. 960 B.C.). His latter years were concerned with his guilty love for Bathsheba, and his grief over the revolt of his son Absalom.

David, St. (fl. 6th century A.D.). The patron saint of Wales. Legend relates that he was son of Xantus, Prince of Cereticus, now called Cardiganshire; he was brought up a priest, became an ascetic in the Isle of Wight, preached to the Britons, confuted Pelagius, and was preferred to the see of Caerleon or Menevia (i.e., main aw, narrow water or firth). Here the saint had received his early education, and when Dywig, the archbishop, resigned his see to him, St. David removed the archiepiscopal residence to Menevia, which was henceforth called St. David's. The waters of Bath “owe their warmth and salutary qualities to the benediction of this saint.” The leek worn by Welshmen on St. David's Day is in memory of a complete victory obtained by them over the Saxons (March 1, 640). This victory is ascribed to the prayers of St. David, and his judicious adoption of a leek in the cap, that the Britons might readily recognize each other. The Saxons, having no badge, not unfrequently turned their swords against their own supporters.

David, [Jacques] Louis (1748–1825). French painter. An accomplished realist, he lent the precision of his drawing to the formulation of a measured and heroic art inspired by the antiquity of republican Rome, and became the indubitable leader of French classicism. During the French Revolution, he supported Robespierre and produced one of his masterpieces, The Death of Marat (1793); he then became court painter on the accession of Napoleon. The figures of his historical paintings are sharply lit and sculptural in quality, but often harshly colored and theatrically posed. His exactitude was more suited to the art of portraiture, of which he has given us some admirable examples.

David Copperfield (1849–1850). A novel by Charles Dickens, admittedly autobiographical. As a mere boy, after his mother's death, David is sent by his cruel stepfather Mr. Murdstone to London to make his living; here he pastes labels on bottles in a warehouse by day and is the single lodger of the poverty-striken though optimistic Mr. Micawber and his family. David finally runs away to his great-aunt Betsey Trotwood, who becomes his guardian. After a period of school life in Crickley's school, he settles down to work with Mr. Wickfield, a lawyer, and finds a warm friend in Wickfield's daughter Agnes. Unaware of Agnes's deep devotion to him, David marries Dora Spenlow, a rattlebrained childlike woman, who dies soon after. Neither his literary success nor his marriage has brought him the peace and happiness he yearns for, and David turns to Agnes with the realization that he has always loved her. She is involved in extricating her father from the decsits of the unctuous Uriah Heep, who has gained a financial hold over them. With the help of Mr. Micawber, Uriah Heep is foiled; David marries Agnes and together they find happiness.

David Copperfield is a devastating exposé of the inhuman treatment of children in 19th-century England. Among the well-known secondary characters in the book are Barkis, the Peggotty family, Steerforth, and Tommie Traddles.

Davidies (1565). An epic poem in four books by Abraham Cowley, describing the troubles of King David of the Hebrews. The poem is incomplete.

Davidson, Jo (1883–1952). American sculptor. He was a portraitist of eminent personalities, such as Franklin D. Roosevelt and Georges Clemenceau.

Davidson, John (1857–1909). Scottish poet, playwright, and author. Known in his day as the poet of Anarchy from the gloomy, pessimistic philosophy expressed in his long poetic Testaments (1901, 1902, 1908), Davidson survives through a few lyrics such as The Ballad of Hell (1894) and A Rannable Stag (1906). Collections of his verse include Fleet Street Eclogues (1893, 1896) and several volumes of Ballads (1894, 1897, 1899). He also wrote successful plays, several novels, translations, and criticism.

Davidson, Lawrence H. The pen name under which D. H. Lawrence published Movements in European History (1921).

Davies, Sir John (1569–1626). English poet of the Spencerian school. The author of epigrammatic and ingenious poetry and treatises in verse, he is known for the vigor and intelligence of his writing. Among his works are Orchestra (1596), a treatment in poetry of the dance; Hymns to Astraee (1599), a collection of acrostic hymns praising Queen Elizabeth; and Noue Teipsum (1599), a philosophical poem on the immortality of the soul.

Davies, W[illiam] H[enry] (1871–1940). Welsh-born English poet. He wrote simple, Wordsworthian poems on nature, and was associated with the Georgians. Until he was over 30, he was a hobo and peddler by choice. His best-known book is his prose Autobiography of a Super-Tramp (1908).

Daviot, Gordon. See Elizabeth Mackintosh.

Davis, Clyde Brion (1894–1962). American newspaperman and novelist. Davis worked on many newspapers from coast to coast, but he is best known for his novel The Great American Novel (1938), the story of a newspaperman whose roving life is spent in dreaming about the great American novel he expects to write. The Anointed (1937) is the story of a tailor who thinks he is divinely inspired. Davis also wrote The Arkansas (1940) for the Rivers of America series, and over 15 other novels with American settings.

Davis, Elmer [Holmes] (1890–1958). American journalist and radio commentator. Born in Indiana, Davis worked for the New York Times and wrote a history of the newspaper (1921). Having joined the staff of CBS in 1939, he interrupted his work there to head the Office of War Information (1942–1945), then returned to radio work. Known for his fearless interpretation of the news, he attacked Senator McCarthy in a collection of essays called But We Were Born Free (1954). Davis also wrote several works of fiction, notably Giant-Killer (1928), a novel telling the story of King David from a rationalist viewpoint.

Davis, H[arold] L[enoir] (1896–1960). American novelist. He became well known for his realistic historical novel Honey in the Horn (1935), a story of frontier life in Oregon. He is also the author of Harp of a Thousand Strings (1947), a narrative dealing with the French Revolution; Beulah Land (1949) and Winds of Morning (1951), both frontier novels; Team Bells Woke Me (1953), a collection of short stories; and Distant Music (1957), a family chronicle set in southeastern Oregon.

Davis, Jefferson (1808–1889). American statesman. A graduate of West Point, Davis was wounded at the battle of Buena Vista in the Mexican War. In 1847 he became U.S. Senator from Mississippi and later served as secretary of war under Franklin Pierce. Again elected to the Senate in 1857, he resigned when Mississippi seceded and was chosen president of the Confederacy in 1861. His policies, however, aroused much controversy within Confederate ranks. After the Civil War, he was captured and imprisoned; in 1866 he was indicted for treason, but was never tried.

Davis, Owen (1874–1956). American playwright. He is the author of numerous popular melodramas, the most celebrated of which are Nellie, the Beautiful Cloak Model (1906) and The Nervous Wreck (1923). He won a Pulitzer Prize for Icebound (1923), the story of a family who greedily wait for the mother to die. Davis successfully dramatized Ethan Frome (1936) and a number of other novels.

Davis, Rebecca [Blaine] Harding (1831–1910). American author and mother of Richard Harding Davis. She was one of the earliest American realists, known for her attempts to deal in fiction with the life of industrial workers, the problem of the Negro, and political corruption. Her early success was the "muckraking" Life in the Iron Mills, published in The Atlantic Monthly in April, 1861. This was followed by Margaret Hought (1862), a novel set in an Indian milltown. Waiting for the Verdict (1869) was a story about racial bias; John Andros (1874) was a tale of political corruption.

Davis, Richard Harding (1864–1916). American journalist and novelist. The son of novelist Rebecca Harding Davis, he covered wars all over the world, and his vivid, dramatic dispatches made him the leading reporter of his day. Aided by his good looks and sartorial elegance, he became equally famous as a personality, the embodiment of "the mauve decade" of the 1890's. Although his fiction is considered somewhat slick and superficial, he was a skillful storyteller and created several memorable characters, notably Gallegher, the enterprising office boy, and Cortland Van Bibber, the Robin Hood of the social set. Davis' works of fiction include Gallegher and Other Stories (1891), Van Bibber and Others (1892), Soldiers of Fortune (1897), Captain Macklin (1902), and The Bar Sinister (1903). He also wrote more than 20 plays, including The Dictator (1909).

Davis, Thomas Osborne (1814–1845). Irish poet. Davis founded, with John Blake Dillon and Charles Gavan Duffy, The Nation (1842), in its day the most influential organ of Irish nationalism. He is best known for his ballads, collected in Poems (1846).

Davy Jones. A sailor's name for the evil spirit of the sea. The term seems to be a corruption of Duffy or Duppy Jonah, the word duffy or duwpy standing, among the Negroes of the West Indies, for "a haunting spirit or ghost." Jones is a corruption of Jonah, the prophet who was thrown into the sea. "He's gone to Davy Jones' locker" is the nautical way of saying that a messmate is dead and has been buried at sea.

Day, Clarence [Shepard], Jr. (1874–1935). American writer. He was best known as the author of two unique collections of humorous sketches based on recollections of his parents: Life with Father and Life with Mother (1936). Day also wrote This Simian World (1920), God and My Father (1932), and Scenes from the Mesozoic (1935).

Day, John (c. 1574–c. 1640). English dramatist. He is best known for The Parliament of Bees (1608) and part one of The Blind Beggar of Bethnal Green, or Thomas Rowd (1600), written with Henry Chettle. His other plays include The Isle of Gulls (1606) and The Travels of Three English Brothers (1607). He also collaborated with Thomas Dekker.

Day or Daye, Stephen (1594–1668). The first printer in New England. He brought out the Bay Psalm Book (1640), the first book printed in the English colonies. The town of Cambridge, Mass., granted him 300 acres of land for "being the first that set them upon printing."

Day-Lewis, C[ecil] (1904– ). Irish-born English poet and author of detective stories under the pen name Nicholas Blake. Associated during the 1930's with the Marxist poets W. H. Auden and Stephen Spender, he, like them, wrote much didactic verse, and used the imagery of industrial society. His later poetry is more personal and reflective. Among his collections of poetry are From Feathers to Iron (1931), The Magnetic Mountain (1933), A Time to Dance (1935), and An Italian Visit (1935). A Hope for Poetry (1934) and Revolution in Writing (1935) are critical essays on the aims of the Marxist poets. He has made good verse translations of Vergil's Georgics (1941) and Aeneid (1952), and has also written children's books. Among his detective novels is The Worm of Death (1961).

Day of Atonement or Yom Kippur. The most solemn Jewish fast. It commemorates the 10 days of penitence at the beginning of the Jewish New Year, falling on the 10th day of the 7th month (Tishri). In ancient times, a priest made atonement for the whole community, a bullock was sacrificed; its blood sprinkled on the Ark of the Covenant; and a scapegoat selected to carry the people's sins "into a solitary land." It involved abstinence from all labor, food or drink and the recitation of penitent prayers for forgiveness.

Day of Doom, The (1662). A celebrated poem by Michael Wigglesworth. It describes the Day of Judgment and the sentencing to punishment in Hell of sinners and of infants who died before baptism. So popular was the poem that no first or second edition of it exists; the copies were apparently thumbed to shreds. It is estimated that one out of every 20 persons in the Bay colony bought a copy, making it the first American best seller.

Day of the Rambler, The (1901). An attack by James Joyce on the parochial nationalism of the Irish Literary Theatre (see Abbey Theatre). He accused this theater movement of neglecting true art in trying to appease the people, or Irish rambler.

Days (1852). One of the best poems by Ralph Waldo Emerson. It expresses this thought from his essay, Works and Days: "He only is rich who owns the day."
Days of the Turbins (Dni Turbinikh; 1926). A drama by Mikhail Bulgakov. It gives a well-balanced account of the conflict during the Russian Revolution between the Czarist White Guard and the forces of the Red Army.

Dazai Osamu. Pen name of Tushima Shuji (1909-1948). Japanese novelist, author of pessimistic works, widely read in the postwar period. He died with a woman in a suicide pact. Several of his works have appeared in translation: Shayo (The Setting Sun, 1947) and Ningen Shikkaku (No Longer Human, 1915), both translated by Donald Keene.

D’Azeglio, Marchese. Massimo Taparelli (1798–1866). Italian patriot and writer of historical novels which were inspired by the Italian struggle for national independence (the Risorgimento). Most noted are Ettore Fieramosca (1833) and Niccolò del Lapi (1841). He is also known for his polemical writings and for his memoirs, I Miei Ricordi (1867).

Deacon’s Masterpiece, The, or, The Wonderful “One-Hoss Shay” (1858). A poem by Oliver Wendell Holmes. The deacon built his shay so stupidly that it would never break down; based on logic, it lasted a hundred years. The shay never did break down; it simply fell apart all at once: “Just as bubbles do when they burst.” Clearly Holmes was satirizing Calvinist dogma, or any inflexible though highly logical system designed for permanence.

Dead, The. The last and most famous of the short stories in James Joyce’s Dubliners (1914). It concerns Gabriel Conway, an Irish college teacher. Gabriel and his wife Greta spend the evening at his elderly aunts’ Christmas dance, a rather moribund affair; one incident after another makes Gabriel feel more and more a social failure. Seeing his wife look radiant after hearing an old song, he takes her home in a romantic mood. She tells him the song reminded her of a boy called Michael Furey, who was once in love with her, but who died when he was 17. In a famous last paragraph Joyce describes Gabriel looking at the snow and thinking of his aunts who will soon be dead, of himself who is spiritually almost dead, and of his wife’s dead lover.

Dead Sea Scrolls (also called Qumram manuscripts). The fragmentary remains of a large library of the ancient Jewish sect of Essenes. They were discovered in 1947 in a cave around the Qumram Valley of the Dead Sea. Thousands of fragments of manuscripts comprise the archaeological discovery; over 100 scrolls of Old Testament books—all except the book of Esther—have appeared. The oldest texts date from 200 B.C., 1,000 years older than any previously existing documents.

Dead Souls (Myortvy Dushi; 1842). A novel by Nikolai Gogol. It relates the adventures of an archswindler, Pavel I. Chichikov. The hero, who has already been in trouble for shady deals when he appears on the scene, has concocted a weird scheme for making his fortune anew. He intends to buy from landowners all of their serfs who have died since the last census was taken. These serfs are still alive according to government records, and the landowner has to pay taxes on them until the next census strikes them off the list. Chichikov’s plan is to pay the owner a small sum, assume the burden of the taxes on these “dead souls” himself, and become the rightful owner of them. Then he intends to mortgage them and to acquire a real estate of his own in eastern Russia. The novel follows Chichikov as he makes friends with the right people in town and visits the local landowners, to each of whom he gently puts his strange proposition. He neglects to tell them, however, what he plans to do with the dead souls once he has them. The description of the landowners he visits, their reactions to his proposal, and Chichikov’s reactions to their reactions make up some of the finest scenes in the novel. Eventually the rumors spread through the town about Chichikov’s deals with the landowners Manilov, Sorakevich, Kirovich, Korocheika, and Plyushkin. The obnoxious Nozdrev adds lies of his own invention to the rumors, and Chichikov finally wings away from the town in his troika.

Gogol was working on a second part to the novel in which Chichikov was to be reformed and become a genuinely respectable citizen. The author destroyed most of the manuscript shortly before his death and only fragments of it have survived.

Dead Souls has been unanimously acclaimed as one of the greatest novels in the Russian language, for its characterizations, humor, and style. The perpetual question of whether Gogol was a realist or a fantasist has created differences of opinion, however, about just what kind of novel Gogol wrote. The influential critic Vissarion Belinski accepted Gogol’s fiction as being truthful to Russian life. This view, retained by later radical critics, is the official Soviet doctrine on Gogol. Other critics have stressed the many fantastic elements in Gogol’s work: the grotesque caricatures of real people that compose his characters, the extravagance of his imagery, and use of hyperbolic language.

De Amicis, Edmondo (1846–1908). Italian educator, moralist, and essayist. De Amicis is noted for the sentimental and moral tenor of his writings. An admirer of Manzoni and politically a moderate socialist, he was chiefly interested in the pedagogical and social problems of post-Risorgimento Italian society. His fiction—Le Novelle, a collection of short stories (1872); Gli Amici (1884); and Il Cuore (1886)—is candidly didactic. La Vita Militare (1869) recounts his experiences as an infantry officer in the Italian army during the Austro-Prussian War (1866), Romanzo di Un Maestro (1890) and Idioma Gentile (1905) are interesting essays in practical pedagogy: the former discusses state-run public schools; the latter treats informally the correct spoken and written usage of the Italian language.

A world traveler, De Amicis was one of the first men of letters to write carefully detailed accounts of the places he visited: Londra (1874), Spagna (1873), Olanda (1874), Marocco (1876), Constantinopoli (1878), and Parigi (1879). In his later years he devoted himself to improving the lot of the impoverished Italian proletariat. His Sull’Oceano (1889) vividly narrates the plight of Italian emigrants to the Americas.

De Amicitia (44 b.c.). A dialogue on the subject of friendship by Cicero. The chief interlocutor is Gaius Laelius Sapiens. Hence the essay is also known as the Laelius.
Dear Judas, and Other Poems (1929). A collection by Robinson Jeffers. The title poem is an attempt to rehabilitate the reputation of Judas. He is presented as a man who loves Jesus but finds himself grown too fond of power. Judas therefore betrays him in the belief that he will be jailed for a few days and then released, escaping later execution as a rebel.

Death and the Fool. See Tor und der Tod, Der.

Death Comes for the Archbishop (1927). A novel by Willa Cather. It describes the missionary efforts of the French bishop Jean Latour and his vicar, Father Joseph Vaillant, to establish a diocese in the territory of New Mexico. The novel is based on the lives of the two eminent French clerics, Bishop Jean Baptiste L'Ami (1814–1888) and Father Joseph Machebeuf. They prevail over all adversities to build a cathedral in the wilderness.

Death in Venice (Der Tod in Venedig; 1913). A novella by Thomas Mann. Gustav von Aschenbach, the hero, is a successful author, proud of the self-discipline with which he has ordered his life and work. On a trip to Venice, however, he becomes aware of mysterious decadent potentialities in himself, and he finally succumbs to a consuming love for a frail but beautiful Polish boy named Tadzio. Though he learns that there is danger of a cholera epidemic in Venice, he finds he cannot leave the city, and eventually he dies of the disease. The story is permeated by a rich and varied symbolism with frequent overtones from Greek literature and mythology.

Death of a Hero (1929). A novel by Richard Aldington. It expresses the author's disillusionment with the idealistic patriotism of World War I. The "hero" is so disgusted by a corrupt and wasteful English society, neurotic parents, and the complications in his love life, that he invites his own death.

Death of a Salesman (1949). A play by Arthur Miller. A bitter indictment of American values, it is the story of Willy Loman, a traveling salesman, who experiences a profound sense of failure as he discovers signs of aging in himself and takes stock of his accomplishments. The play ends in his suicide.

Death of Ivan Ilyich, The (Smert' Ivana Il'icha; 1886). A story by Count Leo Tolstoy. It concerns the thoughts on life and death of a dying man. An ordinary man who had never particularly bothered himself about large questions, Ivan is forced into his contemplation by the discovery that he will soon die of cancer. The problems he ponders are similar to those that acutely occupied Tolstoi himself when he went through the spiritual crisis described in A Confession. Ivan's acceptance of death as part of the natural order of things recalls a similar conclusion reached by Prince Andrei Bolkonski in War and Peace.

Death of Pompey, The. See Mort de Pompée, L.A.

Death of Seneca, The. See François L'Hermitte.

Death of the Heart, The (1938). A novel by Elizabeth Bowen. It is the story of Portia, an illegitimate 16-year-old girl who comes to live with her half brother when her mother dies. To escape from the arid, artificial, unfeeling social world of her London relations she falls in love with ordinary, insensitive Eddie—who is soon found holding hands with someone else. Innocence and idealism die in Portia's heart, but she also grows up into an acceptance of the world as it is.

Death of the Hired Man, The (1914). A poem by Robert Frost. It narrates the argument between a farmer and his wife over whether or not to keep a defeated old hired hand, who, in his last hours, has returned to them. When the farmer seeks out the man he finds him dead. The poem contains the kind of folk wisdom that made Frost popular, but also has an almost mystical undercurrent giving layers of meaning beyond the obvious debate.

Désastre, La (The Downfall, 1892). A novel in the ROUGON-MACQUART series by Emile Zola. The characters in La Désastre are dwarfed by Zola's realistic and thoroughly detailed account of the Franco-Prussian War.

de Barral, Flora. The heroine of Joseph Conrad's novel CHANCE. She is torn between her husband and her father.

De belló Gallicó. See Commentaries on the Gallic War.

Debord, John (1752–1822). English publisher and original compiler of the Peerage of England, Scotland, and Ireland (1802) and the Baronetage of England (1808).

Debs, Eugene Victor (1855–1926), American socialist leader. Founder of the Social Democratic Party and its leader during the period of its greatest influence (1897–1916), Debs was a candidate for the presidency five times, and was renowned for his campaign oratory. He came to prominence as a leader of the famous Pullman strike in Chicago (1894) and was imprisoned for his participation. (See Clarence Darrow.) A powerful figure in American politics, he always insisted on the primacy of democratic procedures. His Writings and Speeches were collected in 1948 by Arthur M. Schlesinger, Jr.

Debussy, Claude [Achille] (1862–1918). French composer. He is identified with musical impressionism, although he preferred to call himself simply musicien français. Certain revolutionary characteristics of his work, such as unresolved discords, exotic scales, and free forms, prepared the way for many developments of modern music. His best-known pieces include Suite Bergamasque, a piano suite containing the famous Clair de Lune; Prélude à l'après-midi d'un faune (1894), a tone poem inspired by Mallarmé's eclogue L'Après-midi d'un faune (Afternoon of a Faun, 1876); Pelléas et Mélisande (1902), his only opera, composed to Maeterlinck's play; La Mer ("The Sea," 1905), a tone poem; Children's Corner Suite (1908), a piano suite; and Jeux ("Games," 1913), a ballet.

décadents. A term applied narrowly to the group of French poets whose leaders were Rimbaud, Verlaine, and Mallarmé (see SYMBOLISTS). Broadly and more popularly the term décadents is applied to the poets and prose writers, chiefly French, of the post-romantic period. Morbid and perverse tastes, unconventional and often sensational social behavior, and hyperaesthetic temperaments characterize the décadents. In their writings, they placed emphasis upon creative self-expression, advancing the ideal of pure art. In his novel Against the Grain (A Rebours), J. K. Huysmans creates a hero who is the epitome of the décadent. Oscar Wilde is the leading figure in the English counterpart of this French phenomenon.

Decalogue. See Ten Commandments.

Decameron, The. A collection of tales by Giovanni Boccaccio, written 1351–1353. The title (from Gr., deca, ten, and hêmera, day) refers to the frame story: in the year of the black death, 1348, seven young ladies and three young gallants meet in a Florentine church and decide to escape from the city to the hills of Fiesole. There they spend the time in telling stories on 10 days. The 100 novelle, ranging from anecdotes and fabulists to folk tales and fairy tales of ancient lineage, include many that became famous and influential in European literature: Ser Ciappelletto, Bernabò of Genoa, Gillette of Naronne, The Revenge of Tancred, Isabella, or The Pot of Basil, The Eaten Heart, Brother Cipolla, A Garden in January, Calandrino and the Heliotrope, Titus and Gisippus, The Patient Griselda. It is unlikely that Chaucer knew the book, though he used similar stories; but the tales have appeared in the works of other English and European writers in a steady stream up to modern times. They have also been used for plays, operas, and paintings.

De Casseres, Benjamin (1873–1945). American newspaperman, poet, and biographer. An innovator and radical individualist, he wrote flamboyant essays for the New York papers. His books include The Shadow-Eater (1915), Black Suns (1936), and Don Marquis (1938).

Decatur, Stephen (1779–1820). American naval officer. He commanded the squadron that sailed to Algeria in 1815 to impose upon the British a peace on American terms. On his return, he uttered this famous toast at a banquet: "Our country! In her intercourse with foreign nations may she always be in the right; but our country, right or wrong!"

Decembrist revolt. A short-lived, unsuccessful uprising in Russia in December, 1825. Led by young nobles of some of Russia's oldest families, the Decembrists wanted to institute a constitutional form of government and deny the throne to Nicholas I following his accession on the death of Alexander I. The insurgents were arrested; 5 were executed, and over 100 exiled to Siberia. The revolt was the first such uprising led by members of the aristocracy. The event has been a constant point of reference for Russian revolutionaries and writers as an example of a courageous bid for freedom. The Decembrists included many friends of the poet Pushkin, but he was never proved to have been involved in the affair.

Declaration of Independence. The public act by which the Second Continental Congress, on July 4, 1776, declared the 13 North American colonies to be free and independent of Great Britain. New York alone did not ratify the act until July 9. It was signed on Aug. 2, 1776, by the representatives of all 13 colonies. The document was nominally the work of a drafting committee, but actually Thomas Jefferson wrote it practically in its entirety.

Declaration of the Rights of Man (La Déclaration des droits de l'homme et du citoyen). In French history, a document setting forth the principles of the French Revolution. Consisting of a preamble and 17 articles, it was modeled on the American Declaration of Independence and was voted by the Constituent Assembly on August 27, 1789.

Decline and Fall (1928). A bitter, farcical, satiric novel by Evelyn Waugh. Paul Pennyfeather, the unfortunate hero, is unjustly expelled from Oxford and turns to teaching at an appalling boys' school. He falls in love with the mother of one of his pupils, and is arrested and imprisoned for unknowingly working in her white slave trade business. Finally he returns to Oxford to study theology.

Decline and Fall of the Roman Empire, The History of the (1776–1788). A history by Edward Gibbon. Although later scholarship has superseded much of the information in this work, it has taken its place among the classical works of historical literature in the English language. The work is divided into three periods and covers a total of 13 centuries: from the rule of Trajan and the Antonines to the decay of the Western Empire; from the era of Justinian in the Eastern Empire to the founding of the Holy Roman Empire in the west under Charlemagne; and from the restoration of the Western Empire to the capture, in 1453, of Constantinople by the Turks. Gibbon's point of view is best expressed in his observation that history is a record of "little more than the crimes, follies, and misfortunes of mankind."

decorum. The ideal of propriety, or appropriateness. Stemming from classical authors, it was defined and put into practice as a literary principle by the neoclassicists of the latter part of the 17th and the 18th centuries. In accordance with this principle, literature, especially poetry, was required to be polished, dignified, clear, rational, moderate, conventional, and "elevated"; in order to achieve elegance, Latinized diction and generality and abstraction in figurative language were preferred elements of style. Wide use of the epithet was one result of the latter tendency. Leading exponents of the principle of decorum were Boileau, Pope, and Samuel Johnson. See neoclassicism.
Decoud, Martin. A character in Joseph Conrad's novel Nostromo. A cynic with no inner resources, he kills himself when he is stranded on an isolated island.

Decretals. The name of ecclesiastical historians for the second part of the canon law. It contains the decrees and decisions of the early popes on disputed points.

The false or forged decreals were designed to support the claim of the popes to temporal as well as spiritual authority, and purport to be the decisions of some thirty popes of the first three centuries.

The ninth century forgery known as the Donation of Constantine is among the false decreals. This purports to relate how Constantine the Great, when retired to the Bosphorus in 330, conferred all his rights, honors, and property as Emperor of the West on the Pope of Rome and his successors. It is said, also, to have been confirmed by Charlemagne.

Dedalus, Stephen. The hero of James Joyce's novel A Portrait of the Artist as a Young Man and one of the three chief characters in his novel Ulysses. Stephen's character, background, and life history are closely modeled on Joyce's own. His name is clearly symbolic of the creative artist (see ADALUS).

Portrait concerns Stephen's struggle to gain his identity as an artist by freeing himself from his family ties, the narrowness of his Catholic upbringing, and the cultural arbitrariness and frenzied nationalism of Ireland. The book ends on an affirmative note as Stephen is about to leave Dublin for Paris. In Ulysses, however, Stephen has returned to Ireland, defeated and undeceived. Still emotionally involved with the cultural and religious values his intellect rejects, Stephen is paralyzed as an artist. In the earlier book Stephen is portrayed fairly straightforwardly, his adolescent sense of superiority and colossal pride are presented with no trace of irony. But Joyce's detached portrayal of Stephen in Ulysses stands in ironic contrast to his earlier vision.

Dedlock, Lady. See Bleak House.

Dee, John (1527–1608). English mathematician and astrologer. A magician who had practiced at various European courts, Dee was imprisoned in England soon after the accession of Mary Tudor on the charge of having practised sorcery against her life. He was released in 1555, and later enjoyed the favor of Elizabeth, whom he instructed in astrology. He wrote numerous works on astrology and mathematics.

Deerslayer, The (1841). A novel by James Fenimore Cooper. Although it was the last of the Leatherstocking Tales to be written, The Deerslayer is the novel of Natty Bumppo's youth. The scene is Lake Onego, N. Y., called Glimmerglass in the story. Young hunters, Natty and his friend Harry Harry March live with the Delaware Indians. They fight the Hurons with the aid of the British. Part of the story deals with the fruitless attempts of Judith Hutter to interest Natty romantically. Chingachgook, the Delaware chief who becomes Natty's companion in other volumes, enters the hero's life in this book.

Defarge, M. In Charles Dickens' A Tale of Two Cities, a revolutionist, keeper of a wine shop in the Faubourg St. Antoine, in Paris. He is a rough, bull-necked, implacable-looking man.

Mme Defarge. M. Defarge's wife, a harsh, remoteless woman and a revolutionary fanatic. It is her sister whom St. Evrémonde attacks and in her revenge she is instrumental in having Charles Darnay sentenced to the guillotine because he is related to the marquis. She has compiled a list of aristocrats and enemies of the Revolution, encoded in the stitches of her knitting. Knitting incessantly while watching the daily executions at the guillotine, she is a perfect example of the tricoteuses.

Défense et Illustration de la Langue française (1549). A treatise on poetry by Joachim Du Bellay which served as the doctrine of the French poets of the Pléiade. It contained two main propositions:

(1) that the French language be "defended" as a mode of poetic expression against those who were trying to rival the classic poets by writing in Latin;

(2) that in order to attain its full potential of expression, French must be "illustrated" or embellished by borrowing from Greek and Latin and by the use of archaic, dialectal, and technical words. "Illustration" also included the imitation of literary formulas discovered by the ancients and the adoption of poetic forms such as the classical ode and the Italian sonnet.

None of these ideas was new with Du Bellay, who sought to raise poetry to the eminence it had enjoyed in ancient times, but by fitting them into a coherent system, he gave form to the revolutionary aims of the Renaissance poets.

Defland, Marquise du, Marie de Vicey-Chamrond (1697–1780). Witty and cynical French noblewoman, leader in Parisian social life and literary and philosophical circles. Her salon was frequented by Turgot, d'Alembert, Marivaux, Baron de Grimm, and others. When she lost her sight in 1754, she engaged Julie Lespinasse as a companion; a violent quarrel between the two broke up the salon. Her correspondence with Voltaire, Montesquieu, Horace Walpole, and others documents 18th-century society.

Déficit, Madame. Contemptuous name given to Marie Antoinette because she was always demanding money of her ministers and never had any. See BAKER.

Definition of Love, The (1681). A poem by Andrew Marvell, dealing with exalted passion and the improbability of its fulfillment.

Defoe, Daniel (1660–1731). English novelist, pamphleteer, journalist, and political agent. He is celebrated for his frank and dramatic realism in fiction, and the accuracy, vigor, and lucidity of his journalism. Defoe was born Daniel Foe, son of a London tallow-chandler (he added the genteele "De" when over forty years of age). He is best known for his novels Robinson Crusoe and Moll Flanders, and for his Journal of the Plague Year, a historical reconstruction. Others of his works include The True-Born Englishman (1701), a rugged, sa-trical poem on English hatred of foreigners when, in fact, there is no true-born Englishman; The Shortest Way with the Dissenters (1702), satirizing ecclesiastical intolerance in the extreme right of the Church of England by ironically proposing that all Non-Conformist preachers be hanged—and for which he was imprisoned and pilloried; A Tour Thro' the Whole Island of Great Britain (1724–1727), in three volumes, an important source for early English economic life; and several novels other than his most famous, including Memoirs of a Cavalier (1720), a romance concerning the Cavalier's service under Gustavus Adolphus, King of Sweden; Captain Singleton; Colonel Jack; and Roxana, or, the Fortunate Mistress (1724), which purports to be a true account of a trumpet flourishing among the aristocracy. Defoe edited, from 1704 to 1713, The Review, a newspaper which anticipated the Tatler and the Spectator, though it laid much greater stress on discussions of commerce and the news than did the others. He supported King William III and was later a secret agent in the pay of the moderate Tories under Robert Harley (1705). Defoe was also the first author of ghost-stories in modern English literature, an example of which is A True Relation of the Apparition of One Mrs. Veal. See Mrs. Veal.

De Forest, John William (1826–1905). American novelist and memoirist. At the outbreak of the Civil War, De Forest joined the Union army; after Lee's surrender he served as the head of the Freedman's Bureau in South Carolina. His best-known novel, Miss Ravenel's Conversion from Secession to Loyalty, includes a realistic treatment of war; also based on his Southern experience is Kate Beumont (1872). Among De Forest's other books are the novels Witching Times (1856), Seafell (1859), Overland (1871), and Honest John Vane (1875). His posthumously published memoirs are included in A Volunteer's Adventures (1944) and A Union Officer in the Reconstruction (1948). An early American realist, De Forest was admired by William Dean Howells, and is considered a forerunner of Stephen Crane.

Deformed Transformed, The (1824). An unfinished poetic drama by Lord Byron. The hero Arnold hates life because he is horribly deformed, but when he is by magic transformed into the shape of his own choosing, he goes forth a young Achilles, bent on adventure. He joins the besieging Bourbon army at Rome and attempts to rescue the beautiful but disdainful Olimpia; here the drama breaks off.

Degas, [Hilaire Germain] Edgar (1834–1917). French painter. Associated with the impressionists, although he was not interested in landscape, Degas is noted for his mastery of motion, his superb line and color, and the veracity of his observation. He painted, drew, made lithographs, etchings, and modeled clay figures, but his favorite medium was pastels. He portrayed ballet dancers at work or in the glare of spotlights, milliners, laundresses, and women at their toilet, with scientific attention to the strained, even ungraceful, momentary positions of unobserved movement and transfigured his subjects. It was from the pose, whose prints became known in France about 1860, that Degas derived much of the intimacy of presentation, originality of composition, and heightened decorative quality that marks his painting.

de Gaulle, Charles [André Joseph Marie] (1890– ). French general and statesman. After the surrender of France to German forces in 1940, de Gaulle rallied his countrymen to the cause of a Free France, refusing to accept the terms of the armistice with Germany. Court-martialed in absentia and condemned to death (August, 1940), he appointed himself leader of the Free French and established his headquarters in England. At the Casablanca Conference with Winston Churchill and Franklin D. Roosevelt he represented France. After the war de Gaulle served as head of a provisional government, from November, 1944 to January, 1946. During twelve years of retirement from political life he wrote and published his three-volume memoirs, Mémoires de guerre (1954–1959). In English the books are titled The Call to Honour (1940–1942), Unity (1942–1944), and Salvation (1944–1946). In June 1958, at the height of the Algerian crisis, de Gaulle became the last premier of the Fourth Republic. A new constitution, providing for a much strengthened executive branch, was drafted and de Gaulle was elected the first President of the French Fifth Republic in December, 1958.

Degée, Olivier. See Jean Toussaint.

Dehmel, Richard (1863–1920). German lyric poet influenced by Nietzsche. His early work, like that of his friend Lilien, shows characteristics of naturalism, but he quickly developed an ecstatic subjective style similar to that of expressionism. His best-known volumes include Erlösungen (Salvations, 1891), Welt und Welt (Woman and the World, 1896), and Schöne wilde Welt (Beautiful Wild World, 1913).

Deimos. See Phobos.

Deiphobus (Deiphobos). In classic legend, one of the sons of Priam. Next to Hector, he was considered the bravest and boldest of all the Trojans. On the death of his brother Paris, he married Helen; but Helen betrayed him to her first husband, Menelaus, who slew him. He appears in the Iliad and Aeneid, and also in Shakespeare's Troilus and Cressida.

Dei plenus. Full of the god. Inspired, or possessed by frenzy as the Maeans in Greco-Roman mythology, who celebrated the orgiastic rites of Dionysus or the Corybantes dancing to Cybele.

Deirdre. The heroine of the greatest love story in Irish legend, found in the Ulster Cycle. Like the elopement tale Pursuit of Diarmaid and Gráinne, the story of Deirdre is an early parallel to episodes in the Tristan and Isolde legend. The story has many versions, but, in general, Deirdre is the daughter of Felim, storyteller to Conchobar, king of Ulster. When she is born it is prophesied that she will be the most beautiful woman of Ireland and that she will bring bloodshed and death. To avert the prophecy, Conchobar determines to marry her when she comes of age. She is raised by the nurse Lavarcham in a sequestered house in the woods where she sees no one but a few servants. Lavarcham's stories about Noísi, nephew of Conchobar and son of Uisnech, fire his young imagination, and her constant plea finally persuades Lavarcham to bring him to the house. Deirdre falls in love with him, and the two with Noísi's two brothers flee to Alba, or Scotland, to avoid the wrath of Conchobar. Ultimately they are persuaded to return and, betrayed, the sons of Usmech are killed. In some versions Deirdre kills herself at the grave of Nois; in others, finding herself a captive of Conchobar, she dashes her brains against a rock. Synge's play Deirdre of the Sorrows (1910) is based on this legend, as is Yeats's Deirdre (1907).

Deism. A belief in the existence of a personal God who is manifested neither supernaturally in history nor immanently in nature. Deism has been called "natural religion"; it is based on reason as opposed to revelation. It sprang up with the spread of scientific knowledge during the Renaissance and reached its height in the 18th century. Notable adherents of deism included Lord Herbert of Cherbury, the 3d earl of Shaftesbury, and Henry St. John in England, and Voltaire and the Encyclopedists in France. Their views affected literature—for example, Pope's Essay on Man—and the views of nature entertained by Wordsworth, Coleridge, and others.

Dekker, Thomas (1572—1632). English dramatist. He was one of the Henslowe group who worked long and hard to produce the quantities of plays needed by that company. Consequently, his plays are often hastily constructed but brightened by charming verse and Dekker's warm, easy feeling for people. Among his best are The Shoemaker's Holiday, The Honest Whores (parts I and II), and the allegorical Old Fortunatus. Most of his plays, however, were written in collaboration: The Roaring Girl, with Thomas Middleton; The Virgin Martyr (c. 1620), with Philip Massinger; The Witch of Edmonton (1621), with John Ford and William Rowley; and The Sun's Darling (1624), with Ford.

De Koven, Reginald (1857—1920). American composer of light operas (The Begum, 1887; Robin Hood, 1890; Student King, 1906) and the grand opera Canterbury Pilgrims (1917), with a libretto by Percy MacKaye. He is also known for his musical setting for Kipling's Rассessional.

De Kruif, Paul (1890— ). American bacteriologist and popular writer on science and medicine. De Kruif (whose name rhymes with knife) collaborated with Sinclair Lewis on much of the medical background for Arrowsmith. His own books on great figures and events in medical history are written in a lively style and have been very popular. Among them are Microbe Hunters (1926); The Hunger Fighters (1928); Men Against Death (1932); Yellow Jack (1934), a play written in collaboration with Sidney Howard; The Fight for Life (1938); Men Against Insanity (1957). His autobiography, The Sweeping Wind, appeared in 1962.

Delacroix, [Ferdinand Victor] Eugène (1799—1863). French painter. Leader of the romantic movement, he opposed the fire of his vision to the clarity of Ingres. He often used for his compositions past historical subjects, but he was also involved in contemporary struggles as evidenced by two of his most famous paintings: The Massacre of Chios (1824) and Liberty Leading the People (1831). A visit to North Africa, in 1832, furnished him with further subjects, notably hunting scenes, which he continued to paint throughout his life. Delacroix stressed movement and color for emotive and dramatic purposes. His vibrant palette, heightened by the juxtaposition of complementary colors, and his observation that shadows have color anticipated the discoveries of the impressionists. His famous Journals (1893—1895) are a distinguished contribution to literary and artistic criticism.

Delafie1d, E. M. Pen name of Elizabeth Monica Dashwood (1890—1943). English novelist. She wrote ironic comedies of manners, among them Diary of a Provincial Lady and The Provincial Lady in America (1934).

De la Mare, Walter (1873—1956). English poet, novelist, and anthologist. He was a romantic writer whose work expressed his interest in childhood, nature, dreams, and the uncanny. Much of his writing is nominally for children. Among his collections of poetry are The Listeners (1912), the title poem of which is his most famous and successful lyric; Peacock Pie (1913); and Collected Poems (1942). His prose writings include the novels Henry Brooken (1904), The Return, and Memoirs of a Midget; Crossings, a Fairy Play (1921), Early One Morning (1933), a book about children; and short stories. Among De la Mare's fine anthologies are Come Hither and Behold, This Dreamer! (1939).

Deland, Margaret [la Wade Campbell] (1857—1945). American novelist and short-story writer. Often associated with the local colorists, she was the creator of the Pennsylvania town of Old Chester, home of Dr. Lavendar, a kindly rector who appears in many of her stories. The town is the setting for Old Chester Tales (1898); The Awakening of Helena Richie (1906), a novel about a woman who must choose between her lover and her adopted son; and its sequel, The Iron Woman (1911). Other novels by Mrs. Deland include John Ward, Preacher (1888), about an orthodox minister married to a woman of liberal religious views, and Philip and His Wife (1894), about the conflict of an artist and his wife over the rearing of their only child.

Delaney, Shelah (1936— ). English playwright. She writes with wit and bawdy humor about the English lower class into which she was born. Her first play, A Taste of Honey (1958), was written when she was 18. The heroine is pregnant with the illegitimate child of a Negro sailor. She is helped by the companionship of her friend, a homosexual artist. Delaney's second play, The Lion in Love (1960), is the story of an impudent street peddler and his extravagant wife. As with her first play, this work is filled with an extraordinary collection of vivid, unique characters.

de la Roche, Mazo (1879—1961). Canadian novelist. Miss de la Roche's novels of the Whiteoak family of Jalna, an estate in southern Ontario, have sold over two million copies. Among the many titles in the series are Jalna (1927), Whiteoaks of Jalna.
(1933), Young Renny (1935), Whiteoak Harvest (1936), Whiteoak Heritage (1940), Return to Jalna (1946), The Whiteoak Brothers (1953), Centenary at Jalna (1958), Morning at Jalna (1960). Ringing the Changes (1957) is an autobiography.

Delectable Mountains. See Pilgrim's Progress.

Deledda, Grazia (1875-1936). Italian novelist. She is noted for her many novels and short stories depicting the peasantry of her native Sardinia. An incidental rather than deliberate realist, she was concerned chiefly with the inner experiences of her characters. Among her best known works are Racconti Sardi (1894), Anime Onaste (1905), Elias Portolu (1903), Centere (1904), L'Edera (1908), and La Madre (The Mother, 1920), which was made into a motion picture with Eleonora Duse. She was awarded the Nobel Prize for literature in 1926.

Delia. The name of many ladies addressed in poetry. She was a shepherdess in Vergil's Eclogues, the lady love of Tibullus, and the lady to whom Samuel Daniel addressed his sonnets. The Delia of Pope's satires is the second Lady Deloraine of Ledwell Park.

Delias. The Delian ship (i.e. the ship of Delos) that according to legend, Theseus made; it carried him to Crete when he slew the Minotaur. In memory of this it was sent every fourth year with a solemn deputation to the Delian Apollo. During the festival, which lasted 30 days, no Athenian could be put to death, and as Socrates was condemned during this period his death was deferred till the return of the sacred vessel. The ship had been so often repaired that not a stick of the original vessel remained at that time.

Delibes, Léo (1836-1891). French composer. While he is most famous for his ballets, Delibes is also the composer of Lakmé, a staple of the French repertory of opera. His ballets include La source (1866), Coppélia (1870), Jean de Nivelle (1880), and Kassya, which was finished by Massenet after the composer's death.

Delight in Disorder (1648). A poem by Robert Herrick. He pleads for "a sweet disorder in the dress" on the grounds that the little imperfections in a lady's dress are particularly beguiling.

Delilah. A Philistine woman in the Old Testament who was mistress of Samson and betrayed him. When she discovered that Samson's strength lay in his hair, she cut it off so that he was able to be captured by the Philistines (Judg. 16). Her name has come to be associated with any fascinating and deceitful woman.

Dell, Ethel M. Maiden name and pen name of Ethel Mary Savage (1881-1939). English novelist. She was the author of such novels as The Way of an Eagle (1912) and Sown Among Thorns (1939).

Dell, Floyd (1887- ). American novelist, playwright, and editor. Early associated with the Chicago Group of writers, Dell moved to New York in 1914 and became an associate editor of the leftist periodicals The Masses and the Liberator. He later became known for a number of novels dealing with postwar disillusion, youth in the jazz age, and the Bohemian life current at the time in Greenwich Village. His most popular novel is Moon-Calf. The Briary-Bush (1921) is a sequel. Janet March (1923) and Runaway (1925) are other novels similar in theme and treatment. His most successful play was the comedy Little Accident (1928), based on his novel The Unmarried Father (1927). In 1927 he edited with Paul Jordan Smith an excellent edition of Burton's Anatomy of Melancholy. Love in the Machine Age (1930) is a reasoned statement of his attitudes toward sex. Homecoming (1933) is an autobiography.

Della Casa, Giovanni (1503-1556). Florentine cleric and author of the popular courtesy book, Il Galateo, written 1551-1555. Unlike The Courtier of Castiglione, it is realistically concerned with minor problems of good manners in polite, rather than courtly, society. It was translated by Peterson in 1576, in time to influence Elizabethan concepts of courtesy. To this day, sapere il galateo ("to know the Galateo") is a popular Italian phrase signifying that one is polite.

Della-Cruscans. A clique of English poets who met originally in Florence in the latter part of the 18th century. Their sentimental, affected work, which appeared in the periodical magazines the World and the Oracle, created for a time quite a furore, but was mercilessly gibbeted in The Baviad and The Maeviad of William Gifford. The clique took its name from the famous Academia della Crusca (literally, “Academy of Chaff”) which was founded in Florence in 1582 with the object of purifying the Italian language—sifting away its “chaff”—and which published an important dictionary in 1611. Members of the clique included Robert Merry, who signed himself “Della Crusca,” Mrs. Hannah Cowley, who signed herself Anna Matilda, James Cobb, a writer of farces, James Boswell, Thomas Morton, George Colman, and Mrs. Elizabeth Robinson.

Della Porta, Giambattista (1535–1615). Neapolitan author and amateur scientist. Della Porta wrote some 30 comedies as well as books on various scientific subjects. His plays were known in England by such dramatists as Middleton, and his Magia naturalis (1589) gained popular attention in its translation as Natural Magic.

Della Rovere. Italian family prominent during the Renaissance.

Francesco della Rovere (1414–1484) became Pope Sixtus IV in 1471. The famous Sistine Chapel of the Vatican bears his name.

Giuliano della Rovere, nephew of Francesco, became Pope Julius II in 1503, at the age of 60; still he led the papal forces in the field. Before his death in 1513, he had founded the Vatican Museum, begun the construction of St. Peter’s, and employed Raphael, Bramante, and Michelangelo in various projects. In 1506, the Della Rovere became dukes of Urbino when Guidobaldo of Montefeltro died leaving no heir.

Deloney, Thomas (1543?–1600). English prose writer, a silk-weaver and author of numerous broadside ballads. He is best known for his vivid tales of life among the craftsmen and laborers of London. The most famous of these is The Gentle Craft (1597).

Delos. A small island in the Cyclades where Apollo and Artemis were born. Having been the only place to accept Leto when she was ready to give birth to these gods, it was honored by becoming sacred to Apollo. This story is told in the Homeric Hymn to Delian Apollo. Delos was said to have been a floating island, which Poseidon finally made fast to the bottom of the sea.

Delphic oracle. An ancient oracle at Delphi, on the southern slope of Mount Parnassus. It was of extremely ancient origin, having originally belonged to a chthonic deity. Aeschylus’ claim in the Eumenides that it belonged successively to Ge, Themis, and Phoebe—two of whom, at least, were earth goddesses—may not be far from wrong. In later times, the oracle was taken over by Apollo, who, according to the Homeric Hymn to Pythian Apollo, killed the python, a sacred snake associated with the oracle. The oracular utterances were made by the Python, a priestess who sat on a tripod over a cleft in the rock. Her incomprehensible mouthings were interpreted by a priest.

Although there were many oracles in the Greek world, the Delphic oracle was regarded as a final authority in religious matters. A great many of the most famous Greek myths involve the working out of oracles that issued from Delphi.

Associated with the shrine was the omphalos, a sacred stone that was regarded as the navel of the world, though various other centers made the same claim. Some authorities believe that the omphalos was the phallic cap of a tomb, possibly that of the python, since many oracles were associated with the tombs of heroes. In the first part of the Eumenides, Orestes clings to the omphalos in seeking sanctuary from the Erinyes or Furies.

Delphine (1802). Epistolary romantic novel by Mme de Staël. It is the story of an unfulfilled love between Delphine and Léonice (a character inspired by Benjamin Constant de Rémusat). In the end she is shot as a traitor and she poisons herself. The book is one of the first feminine autobiographies in French literature. See Mme de Vernin.

Deluge, The. The second in a trilogy of historical novels by Henryk Sienkiewicz. See With Fire and Sword.

De Marchi, Emilio (1851–1901). Italian novelist. Like Manzoni, he believed that the novel could be used legitimately as a guide to moral living. He was also influenced by the Scapegliatura and by the prose style of Verga and Capuana. His three best-known novels—Demetrio Pianelli (1889), Arabella (1892), and Giacomol L’Idéaliste (1897)—reflect his interest in contemporary social and moral problems. His protagonists are defeated by evil forces operating in society, yet their defeat awakens in them an attitude of resignation and purposeful self-sacrifice that seems to the writer the final victory of the human spirit. Demetrio Pianelli, for example, is an unassuming government clerk who realizes a capacity for love and self-sacrifice through a succession of tragic events.

An interesting example of De Marchi’s narrative skill is il Cappello del Prete (1888), which describes the hallucinating experiences of a priest’s murderer. The scene is Naples, and the action centers on the Neapolitans’ proverbial passion for the national lottery, a theme exploited by Matilda Serao in Il Paese della Cuccagna (1891).

Demeter. The Greek goddess of corn. Her principal myth concerned the abduction of her daughter Persephone by Hades, which took place in Sicily. When the young goddess, called also simply Kore (daughter), plucked a certain flower, the earth opened and Hades snatched her away to the underworld in his chariot. Demeter, bearing torches, sought her all over the world until Helios told her what had happened. She left Olympus in anger that the gods had permitted the abduction, and the earth grew desolate. Appearing as an old woman in the village of Eleusis, she was hospitably received by King Celeus and his wife Metaneira. She tended their son Deiphooon, and would have immortalized him in the fire had not Metaneira seen her doing so and screamed. The goddess thereupon revealed her true identity and commanded that her rites should be celebrated at Eleusis.

Disturbed at the blight on the earth, Zeus approached Hades to bring about a reconciliation. Because Persephone had eaten pomegranate seeds in the underworld, she was not allowed to leave permanently, but it was arranged that she should spend two thirds of every year with her mother. In gratitude for Eleusinian hospitality, Demeter gave a bag of seeds to Celeus’ son Triptolemus and sent him in a chariot by winged dragons throughout the world to plant corn and teach its culture. Demeter was very widely worshiped, but her most important cult center remained Eleusis, her major festival the Eleusinian Mysteries. For other legends of Demeter see Pelasgus and Lasion.

Demetrius. In Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream, a young man betrothed to Hermia by her father's decree. When she escapes to the forest with her lover Lysander, he pursues them and is pursued in turn by Helena, his jilted sweetheart.

De Mille, Cecil B[1ount] (1881–1959). American motion-picture producer and director. De Mille began his long association with Hollywood when he went there in 1913 with Jesse L. Lasky and Samuel Goldwyn and directed The Squaw Man, one of the first full-length movies ever made. In 1921 he became president of Cecil B. De Mille Productions and began to produce the monumental motion-picture extravaganzas so identified with his name. Among the best-known of these are The Ten Commandments (1923; remake, 1956), The King of Kings (1927), The Sign of the Cross (1932), The Plainsman (1936), Union Pacific (1939), and The Greatest Show on Earth (1952).

Demigurge (Demiourgos). Any power or personality creating a world, real or imaginary. From the Greek for "worker of the people." The modern meaning goes back to Plato's use of the word for the inferior god who created the world.

Democracy (1880). A novel by Henry Adams, first published anonymously. A social and political satire based on the corruption of the second Grant administration, the book includes characters modeled on President Hayes and James G. Blaine. A charming and intelligent young widow, Madeleine Leigh, moves to Washington "to touch with her own hands the massive machinery of society." She finally rejects an offer of marriage from a senator who has compromised his moral integrity for political advantage.

Democratic Vistas (1871). An essay by Walt Whitman, The poet, alarmed by the "hollowness of heart" in post-Civil War America, sees a decline in vigor and moral consciousness. Although the U.S. has enjoyed "unprecedented materialistic advancement," it has become increasingly superficial in social, moral, and intellectual spheres. "We live," says Whitman, "in an atmosphere of hypocrisy throughout."

Turning to the future, he envisions, in an America disburdened of foreign imitation, the rise of a group of artists. These men and women are needed, for "the work of the New World is not ended, but only fairly begun."

Democritus (Demokritos; c. 460–c. 370 B.C.). A philosopher, also called the Abderite and the Laughing Philosopher. He was born in Abdera and traveled widely. He adopted the atomistic theory of Leucippus, holding that the universe is composed of atoms that move about in space and form themselves into bodies. Atoms are eternal, while bodies perish; the soul is a form of fire, which animates the human body. Democritus also held that pleasure, along with self-control, was the goal of life. His cheerful disposition won him the epithet of the Laughing Philosopher. He is supposed to have put out his eyes in order that he might think without outside disturbances.

Demodocus (Demodokos). A minstrel. According to Homer (Odyssey viii), he sang the amours of Ares and Aphrodite in the court of Alcinous while Odysseus was a guest there.

Demogorgon. A terrible deity, whose very name was capable of producing the most horrible effects. He is first mentioned by the 4th-century Christian writer, Lactantius, who, in so doing, is believed to have broken the spell of a mystery, for Demogorgon is supposed to be identical with the infernal Power of the ancients, the very mention of whose name brought death and disaster, to whom reference is made by Lucan and others. Hence Milton speaks of "the dreaded name of Demogorgon" in Paradise Lost. According to Ariosto, Demogorgon was a king of the elves and fays who lived on the Himalayas, and once in five years summoned all his subjects before him to give an account of their stewardship. Spencer, in The Faerie Queene, says that he dwelleth in the deep abyss with the three fatal sisters. Shelley so calls eternity in Prometheus Unbound.

De Morgan, William (1839–1917). English novelist. A retired manufacturer, De Morgan achieved immediate success at the age of 67 with his somewhat old-fashioned, Dickensian first novel, Joseph Vance (1906). Alice-for-Short (1907) and other successful novels followed.

Demosthenes (384–322 B.C.). The most famous of Greek orators. Opposed to the encroachment of Philip II of Macedon, Demosthenes delivered the first Philippic in 351 B.C. Five years later he was sent as an ambassador, with nine others, to conclude a peace with Philip. Dissatisfied with the agreement, Demosthenes refused to honor its terms. When Philip broke the treaty shortly afterward, the Greek patriotic party chose Demosthenes as its leader. After Philip's assassination in 336 B.C., Demosthenes was one of the leaders of the anti-Macedon uprising. Alexander demanded his arrest, but he was spared. When Harpalus, the Macedonian treasurer, fled to Athens, the 700 talents he had stolen from Alexander were placed in a vault to be returned; later, Demosthenes was accused of having accepted part of the money as a bribe. He was forced into exile, though the patriotic party recalled him at the death of Alexander. In 322 B.C. the joint rulers of Macedon, Antipater, and Craterus captured Athens, and Demosthenes took poison to escape arrest. His major orations are the three Philippics (351, 344, 341 B.C.), three Olynthiacs (349, 349 B.C.), On the Peace (346 B.C.), On the Embassy (344 B.C.), On the Affairs of the Chersonese (341 B.C.), and On the Crown (330 B.C.).

Demosthenes is traditionally supposed to have overcome speech defects by speaking over the roar of the sea with pebbles in his mouth. He rigorously applied himself to the development of a fine style, combining great rhetorical skill with simplicity and directness of language. His arguments were designed to appeal to a popular audience. Sixty-one speeches have come down to us under his name, although some are not considered genuine. He influenced, among others, Cicero, Quintilian, Burke, Fox, and Pitt.

demotic writing. An Egyptian hieroglyphic script, developed in the 5th century B.C. A simplified form of hieratic writing, running from left to right in horizontal lines, it was first used mainly for social and business purposes, but later for religious and literary purposes as well; it continued to be employed by the priests of Isis as late as a.d. 452.

Dendin or Dandin, Perrin (Fr., "Ninny"). In Rabelais' Gargantua and Pantagruel, an old man whom Judge Bridlegoose cites for the extraordinary number of disputes he settles, though he is not a judge by profession. When his son, Tenot Dendin, attempts to carry on his practice, he fails to settle a single quarrel because, as his father explains, he always intervenes at the very beginning of the dispute when the litigants are still averse to compromise. Perrin's secret is to wait until both parties are so tired of their dispute that they will welcome any judgment that will bring an end to their wrangling.

Racine gave the name "Dandin" to a character with a mania for judging in his comedy Les Plaideurs (1668). In La Fontaine's Fables (1678-1679), "Perrin Dandin" settles the dispute between two pilgrims over an oyster by eating it himself.

Denham, Sir John (1615-1669). Irish-born English poet. He was an architect by profession and was for a time surveyor general of works, with the young Christopher Wren as his assistant. Denham was famous in his own day for The Sofa (1642), a melodramatic tragedy, and Cooper's Hill (1642), a didactic poem. The latter was praised by Dryden, and imitated by Pope in Windsor Forest (1713). See George Wither.

Denikin, Anton Ivanovich (1872-1947). Russian general. In 1917, he supported Kornilov's attempt to overthrow the Bolshevik regime. After Kornilov's death, during the civil war, he succeeded him as supreme commander of the White armies, and led the anti-Bolshevik forces in southern Russia until General Wrangel took over the command in 1920. Denikin then fled to Constantinople and, in 1926, went to live in France.

Dennis, Nigel (1912-). English novelist. He is the author of Cards of Identity (1955), a fantastic, nightmarish satire about modern man's loss of his sense of identity.

dénouement (Fr., "the untying"). In drama and fiction, the final unwinding of the tangled elements of the plot which ends the suspense; it follows the climax. The word is also applied to the final solution of complicated sets of actions in life.

Dery the Audacious. See Card, The.

Deor's Lament or The Complaint of Deor (9th century). Old English poem of 42 lines in alliterative verse. The poet describes the misfortunes of Germanic heroes, which overshadow his own sad luck in being ousted by his lord in favor of another minstrel; there are seven unequal stanzas with the recurring refrain that as "that has passed, this will too."

de profundis (Lat. "out of the deep," hence, an extremely bitter cry of wretchedness). Ps. 130 is so called from the first two words in the Latin version. It forms part of the Roman Catholic burial service. Oscar Wilde's letter to Lord Alfred Douglas, a personal essay of confession and remissence written in prison bore the title De Profundis (1905).

De Quincey, Thomas (1785-1859). English essayist and critic. He is famous for Confessions of an English Opium-Eater, a fascinating memoir distinguished by great imaginative power and prose that is splendid and elaborate without stiffness. These qualities are also present in his personal and fugitive essays such as Suspiria de Profundis (1845), The English Mail Coach (1849), and Murder Considered as One of the Fine Arts (1827, 1839). One of the major critics of the romantic movement, he had clear, judicious taste and remarkable insight, and was learned and original though sometimes prolix and vague. He was closely associated with Wordsworth and Coleridge, residing for a time in the Lake Country, and was also acquainted with Lamb, Hazlitt, Hood, and other literary figures. Much of his work appeared in such journals as Blackwood's Magazine and was collected by himself in the 24-volume Writings (1851-1859).

Derain, André (1880-1954). French painter. He was an original member of the Fauves and was closely associated with Matisse and Vlaminck. He exhibited at the first Fauve show in 1905 at Paris. By 1913 he began to evolve a more distinctive style in his work, influenced by primitive sculpture, cubism, and the works of van Gogh, Gauguin, and Seurat.

De Rerum Natura. See Lucretius.

Derleth, August [William] (1909-). American novelist. He is best known for his Sac Prairie Saga, a group of regional novels depicting life in a Wisconsin community (modeled on Sauk City) from 1830 to the present; included in the series are Still Is the Summer Night (1937), Wind Over Wisconsin (1938), and Restless Is the River (1939). His Wisconsin Saga includes Bright Journey (1940) and The Hills Stand Watch (1960). He is also the author of Still Small Voice (1940), a biography of Zona Gale; Selected Poems (1944); Sac Prairie People (1948); and Wisconsin Earth (1948), collections of short stories; and several volumes of detective and science fiction.

De Roberto, Federico (1866-1927). Italian novelist. He is known as a leading exponent of the precisely realistic fiction produced by the verismo literary movement (see Luigi Capuana). A member of the Milanese circle of naturalistic writers among whom were G. Verga and G. Rovetta, De Roberto gave an objective, scholarly description of contemporary Italian society in his two major historical novels: The Viceroys (I Vicerò; 1894) and L'imperio (1929). The Viceroys is a lengthy account of the political fortunes of an aristocratic Sicilian family, the Uzedas of Francalanza, in the period between the collapse of the Bourbon dynasty and the proclamation of Italian unity (1859-1861). De Roberto's interest centers on a detailed study of character types, and his purpose is to show the determining influence of inherited family traits in the Uzedas' reaction to a critical moment in history.

L'imperio continues the study of the Uzedas family describing the fortunes of the youngest member, Count Consalo, when he becomes a deputy to the new Italian parliament.

De Roberto began his writing career as a literary and art critic for the Milanese newspaper Corriere della Sera. A devoted friend of Verga at a time when the author of The Malavoglias was unfavorably received by the critics, De Roberto wrote his biography (which was never completed).

His minor novels are Ermanno Raeli (1889), L'Illusione (1891), La Sorte (1891), and Spasimo (1897).
Derzhavin, Gavril Romanovich (1743–1816). Russian poet. Though his verse is less polished than that of such poets as Pushkin and Tyutchev, Derzhavin’s work can bear comparison with any Russian poetry for power and vividness. His best-known works are Bog (Ode to God, 1784), Na smert’ kraya zya Mshcherskogo (On the Death of Prince Me scherski, 1779), and Felitsa (Felitsa, 1782). This last is an ode to Catherine the Great, whom Derzhavin served as court poet and administrator.

Desai, Anita (1937— ). Indian novelist writing in English. Born of Indian-German parentage, she was educated in Delhi. Her novel, Cry the Peacock (1963), reveals fine craftsmanship and subtle, delicate feeling.

De Sanctis, Francesco (1817–1883). Italian literary critic. Minister of education in the first Italian cabinet (1861) and professor of comparative literature at the University of Naples (1871–1877), he is noted as the founder of modern literary criticism in Italy. Influenced by Hegel, he formulated an aesthetic theory which maintains that an artist’s formal expression is intrinsically linked to his idea-content; this theory, in turn, influenced Benedetto Croce. De Sanctis wrote critical essays such as Saggi Critici (1865) and Nuovi Saggi Critici (1872), and a celebrated Storia della Letteratura Italiana (1870–1871).

Descartes, René (1596–1650). French mathematician and philosopher. Father of the modern scientific method, he is also known as the originator of analytic geometry and progenitor of modern physiological psychology. Seeking absolute certainty in the application of “methodical doubt” to all received opinions, Descartes challenged the metaphysical view of the universe in his principal works, Discours de la Méthode (Discourse on Method, 1639) and Principia philosophiae (Principles of Philosophy, 1644), in which he divided the universe into mutually exclusive but interacting spirit and matter, the spirit subject to reason and the matter subject to mechanical laws. The resulting philosophy is called Cartesianism after its creator. Descartes formulated the principle Coercro, ergo sum (I think, therefore I am) and held it to be a model of certainty. See Nicolas Malebranche.

descent to the underworld. The motif of numerous stories in the mythology and folk lore of all peoples. The descent is usually made to rescue someone either abducted or rightfully dead, to find the answer to a question or discover a secret from the ruler of the underworld, or to seize some treasure. To partake of the food of the dead (or of fairyland in later folk lore) prevents the visitor from ever returning. Among the most famous descent stories are the Greek myths of Orpheus and Eurydice, Demeter and Persephone, and Heracles’ bringing of Cerberus up from Hades and his rescue of Alcestis. Also well known are the Babylonian story of Ishtar’s descent to rescue Tammuz, the Norse myth of Hermid’s journey to Hel to bring back Balder. There are similar tales in Hindu, Chinese, and Japanese writings, and among the Ainu, Melanesians, North American Indians, and Eskimos. Descents to Hell are common also in early Christian literature.

Deschamps, Eustache (c. 1346–c. 1406). French poet and diplomat. He wrote a great number of bit- terly satirical ballades and rondeaux about the political situation in France and the wars with England, and the first known critical treatise on the writing of poetry in French. His long, unfinished poem Miroir de mariage is a satire against women, including the prototype of the mother-in-law of French farce.

Desdemona. The innocent, artless, and lovely heroine of Shakespeare’s Othello. She is the daughter of Brabantio.

De Senectute (44 B.C.). An essay on old age by Cicero, written in the form of a dialogue. Its main speaker, Cato the Elder, discourses to his younger friends on the advantages of a serene old age. From his name, it is often called the Cato Major.

Deserted Village, The (1770). A poem by Oliver Goldsmith, portraying the rural depopulation of the latter half of the eighteenth century. It attributes it to the increase in luxury, foreign trade, the enclosure of open pastures by absentee landowners, and the cancerous growth of London. The poem is dedicated to Sir Joshua Reynolds. See Auburn.

De Sica, Vittorio (1902— ). Italian motion-picture director and actor. He made his screen debut in What Rascals Men Are (1932); he directed his first motion-picture, Red Roses, in 1939. He is best known for his highly distinguished films: Shoe Shine (1946) and The Bicycle Thief (1949).

Desire Under the Elms (1924). A tragedy by Eugene O’Neill. Set in New England, it deals with Ephraim Cabot and his new young wife, Abbie. Abbie seduces Eben, the youngest son of Ephraim, hoping to bear a son she can claim is Ephraim’s. When it appears to Eben that Abbie has used him only for her own ends, he threatens to expose her infidelity; to prove her love for him she smothers the child. The play exemplifies O’Neill’s interest in Freudian psychology and in the conflict between a repressive Calvinism and Dionysian surrender.

Desmaret, de Saint-Cor; Jean (1595–1676). French poet, novelist, and playwright. An original member of the Académie française and holder of an administrative post by virtue of his intimacy with Richelieu, Desmaret opposed the Jansenists of Port-Royal in religious controversies and vehemently objected to Boileau’s condemnation of national and Christian themes as subjects for epic, deriving his own epics Clovis ou la France Chrétienne (Clovis, or Christian France, 1657) and Esther (1673) from French history and the Bible respectively. His novel Ariane (1632) evokes the Rome of Nero, and his comedy Les Visionnaires (The Visionaries, 1637) ridicules the extravagances of certain fashionable ladies of his day, with cutting reference to Madame de Rambouillet. The play served Molière as model for Les Femmes Savantes.

Desmoulins, Camille (1760–1794). French journalist, pamphleteer, and collaborator with Mirabeau during the French Revolution. He was called Procureur de la lanterne (Fr., "agent of the lantern") for his anti-aristocratic pamphlet Le Discours de la lanterne aux Parisiens. As deputy to the Convention (1792), he had a small rôle to play, and two years later he was executed with Danton by Robespierre.

Desnos, Robert (1900–1945). French poet. At first associated with surrealism, he later turned to simple lyrics, like the love song Poème à la mysterieuse (1926) and other poems of love and liberty in Corps et Biens (1930) and Fortunes (1942). His de Soto, Hernando or Fernando (1500?–1542). Spanish explorer. Having served with Pizarro in Peru, de Soto won permission from Charles V to conquer Florida, where he landed in 1539 with some 600 men. For the next three years he wandered through present Georgia, the Carolinas, Alabama, Mississippi, Arkansas, and Louisiana; though he found no gold, he is credited with discovering the Mississippi River in 1541. He died on the banks of the Mississippi, and his body was sunk in the river by his men.

Despair. See Faerie Queene, The.

Desportes, Philippe (1546–1606). Foremost French poet at the court of Henry III and successor to the Pléiade poets. Solely concerned with pleasing his protectors, he confined himself to writing love poetry and to impropers as to be applicable to any occasion (Premières Oeuvres [1573] and Dernières Amours [1583]) and to translating the Psalms (1591) to flatter the piety of Henry III. He cultivated the modish Petrarcan theme of idealized love and imitated the elaborate metaphors dear to the Italian poets. Clarity, suppleness, and harmony still lend charm to his poetry, otherwise lacking in substance.

Dessalines, Jean Jacques (1758–1806). Negro revolutionary leader and emperor of Haiti. As leader of the insurgent slaves, Dessalines fought along side of Toussaint L'Ouverture and aided by the English, he succeeded in driving out the French in 1803. In 1804, Dessalines established the republic of Haiti, and the following year, under the title Jacques I, he became the country's emperor (1805–1806). His cruel reign led rapidly to his assassination by Henri Christophe and Pétion.

Delouches, Louis Ferdinand. See Louis Ferdinand Céline.

Destouches, Philippe. Pen name of Philippe Néricault (1680–1759), French dramatist. Famous for Le Philosophe marin (1727), Le Glorieux (1732) and other sentimental comedies, Destouches sought to make comedy morally edifying. His plays are early forerunners of the COMÉDIE LARMOYANTE.

Destruotion of Sennacherib, The (1815). A well-known poem by Lord Byron. It vividly portrays the annihilating plague that sunk down the invading army of the Assyrian king Sennacherib in Palestine during the seventh century B.C.

Deucalion's Flood. The Deluge of Greek legend. Deucalion (Deukalion) was son of Prometheus and Clymene, and was king of Phthia, in Thessaly. When Zeus sent the deluge, Deucalion built a ship, and he and his wife, Pyrrha, were the only mortals saved. The ship at last rested on Mount Parnassus, and Deucalion was told by the oracle of Themis that to restore the human race he must cast the bones of his mother behind him. The two cast the stones of the sunken Earth as directed. Those thrown by Deucalion became men, those thrown by his wife became women.

Bayard Taylor has a lyrical drama entitled Prince Deukalion (1878), in which he takes Deukalion and Pyrrha over all the earth and through all ages of history.

deus ex machina. A theatrical device used in Greek tragedy. In several plays of Euripides, a god appears at the last moment to provide the solution to the tangled problems of the main characters. The god is let down from the sky on a sort of crane. The phrase has come to refer to a playwright's use of external means to solve the problems of his characters—a practice generally frowned upon.

Deuteronomy. A book of the Old Testament, the last book of the Pentateuch. It reiterates the Mosaic law and, ending with the death of Moses, contains the final episodes in his life. It was probably written during the reign of Manasseh (c. 688–643 B.C.). Either suppressed or forgotten for a generation, the book was discovered in 621 B.C. hidden in the temple. It has been expanded by later writers. The original parts (most of chaps. 5–26 and 28) are thought to be the first book ever canonized as divine law.

Deutsch, Babette (1895– ). American poet and critic. Her poems, which often have social implications, have been collected in many volumes, from Banners (1919) and Honey out of the Rock (1925) to Animal, Vegetable, Mineral (1954) and Coming of Age: New and Selected Poems (1959). Potable Gold (1929) and This Modern Poetry (1935), enlarged as Poetry in Our Time (1952, 1956, 1962), are critical works. Among her other books is one on Whitman (1941) and Poetry Handbook (1957, rev., 1961). Miss Deutsch is also a translator of German and Russian verse, usually in collaboration with her husband, Avraham Yarmolinsky.

Deval, Jacques (1894– ). French playwright of popular comedies. Best known for Tovarich (1934), about a group of CZarist emigres in France, Deval also wrote the play Mademoiselle (1932).

de Valera, Eamon (1882– ). Irish statesman. de Valera was born in New York City of a Spanish father and an Irish mother. President of the Irish home rule party Sinn Fein from 1917 to 1926, he became the leading statesman of the Irish Free State, as prime minister and later as president.

de Vere, Aubrey Thomas (1814–1902). Anglo-Irish poet, essayist. A friend of Cardinal Newman, de Vere was a convert to Catholicism; his poetry found its inspiration in religion and in the myths and legends of Ireland, a country that he also defended in such prose works as English Misrule and Irish Misdeeds (1848). Three-volume editions of his poetry (Poetical Works) and criticism (Critical Essays) were published between 1884 and 1889. His Recollections (1897)—he was a friend of Tennyson, Browning, Carlyle—are interesting.

devil. In Jewish and Christian theology, an apostate spirit. The name is also given to the chief of devils, known as the Devil, who is the supreme spirit of evil, the adversary of God, the enemy and tempter of man, and the ruler of Hell. In the Bible and Apocrypha the Devil or devils are variously referred to as SATAN, ASMODEUS, BERELZEBUB, SAMAEL, and, according to the Church Fathers, as LUCIFER. Devils' names in literature and popular usage include Mephistopheles, Auld Nick, Auld Hornie, Auld Ane, Clootie, and Hangie.

The Devil and devils are frequently represented with a cloven foot, since rabbinical writers refer to them as ser'irizim (goats). As the goat is the prototype of uncleanliness, the prince of unclean spirits is aptly represented under this emblem.

Dewey decimal system in the Saturday Evening Post, it was adapted as an opera (1938) with music by Douglas Moore, and later was made into a play. In it, a New England farmer, Jabez Stone, sells his soul to the Devil for material prosperity, but is saved from paying his debt by the oratorical eloquence of Daniel Webster before a demonic jury.

Devil and Tom Walker, The (1824). A story by Washington Irving. It first appeared in his collection, Tales of a Traveller. The story concerns the devil's attempt to hold Tom to his bargain. Despite Tom's wiles, the devil succeeds.

Devils, The. See Possession, The.

Devil's Advocate, The. advocatus diaboli, a man appointed to attest the claims of a candidate for canonization before a papal court. He advances all arguments he can against the candidate, who is defended by the advocatus dei (God's advocate), who says all he can in support of the proposed canonization. By extension, the term is used of a destructive critic, or one who deliberately searches for flaws in order to bring out the whole truth.

Devil's Disciple, The (1897). A play by George Bernard Shaw. It is set in America during the Revolution. Dick Dudgeon, a reprobate, allows himself, to his own surprise, to be arrested by the English and sentenced to death in place of Parson Anderson. The parson, too, finds a new side to his personality, when he leads an armed band to fight the British and rescue Dick. Shaw's thesis is that convention and circumstance fix a person's life, but under crisis people make startling discoveries about themselves. An exciting and brilliant play, The Devil's Disciple makes particular fun of the military.

Devil's General, The (Des Teufels General; 1946). A play by Carl Zuckmayer. It depicts the inner struggle of a Nazi Luftwaffe general who, though in principle opposed to Nazism, manages to rationalize his position as a servant of the regime. But when he is confronted by a saboteur, a man true to his principles, who is doing his best to hamper the German war effort, the general recognizes the untenability of his own compromise and deliberately flies off to his death in a sabotaged plane.

De Vinne, Theodore Low (1828–1914). American master printer and historian. He founded and managed Theo. L. De Vinne & Co., later the De Vinne Press, and became widely known for the excellence of his printing and engravings. He was the founder and sixth president of the Grolier Club (1884), a society of bibliophiles in New York City. Among his books are The invention of Printing (1876), and The Practice of Typography (4 v., 1900–1904).

Devocion de la cruz, La. See Pedro Calderón de la Barca.

Devotions upon Emergent Occasions (1624). A series of meditations on the "Variable, and therefore miserable condition of Man" by John Donne. The work was ostensibly written during a long, grave illness. Its style is highly metaphorical and complex. It contains the famous passage from which Ernest Hemingway drew the title of For Whom the Bell Tolls (1940):

No man is an island, entire of itself; every man is a piece of the Continent, a part of the maine; if a Clod be washed away by the Sea, Europe is the lesse, as well as if a Promontorie were ...; any mans death diminishes me, because I am involved in Mankinde; And therefore never send to know for whom the bell tolls; It tolls for thee.

De Voto, Bernard [Augustine] (1897–1955). American historian and critic. De Voto first gained public attention with his Mark Twain in America (1932), a rebuttal to Van Wyck Brooks's Ordained of Mark Twain (1920). He also taught at Harvard, filling "The Easy Chair" of Harper's from 1935 to 1955, and wrote several novels, including The Crooked Mile (1924) and Mountain Time (1947). The work that he himself rightly regarded as his most important was his historical writing, principally The Year of Decision: 1846 (1943); Across the Wide Missouri (1947), which won a Pulitzer Prize; and The Course of Empire (1952).

Devushkin, Makar Alekseyevich. The hero of Feodor Dostoevski's short novel, Poor Folk. Devushkin is a timid clerk, desperately in love with Varvara Alekseyevna Dobroserlova, and acutely conscious of the impossibility of his love because of his greater age and extreme poverty. His condition is sharply brought home to him when he reads Nikolai Gogol's short story, The Overcoat, which portrays a down trodden clerk too much like Devushkin himself. He complains about writers dealing with such subjects in one of his letters to Varvara.

Dewey, George (1857–1917). American naval officer. As commander of the Asiatic Squadron during the Spanish–American War, Dewey moved his fleet into Manila Bay and in a seven-hour battle destroyed the Spanish naval force in the Far East. He then blockaded Manila Bay, enabling General Wesley Merritt to land his troops and effect the conquest of the Philippines.

Dewey, John (1859–1952). American teacher, philosopher, and educational reformer. A believer in William James's pragmatism, Dewey employed the principles of that philosophy in his progressive movement in education. He advocated "learning by doing," rejecting traditional methods of teaching by rote. Although his principles have been adopted by many, not all of Dewey's disciples are restrained by his common sense. Among his many books are The School and Society (1900; rev. 1908, 1932), Interest and Effort in Education (1913), Democracy and Education (1916), The Quest for Certainty (1929), Art as Experience (1934), and The Problems of Man (1946).

Dewey, Melvil (1851–1931). American librarian. Dewey invented his decimal system of library classification while still a student librarian at Amherst College (1874–1876). Referred to as the Dewey Decimal System, it is widely used in the U.S. Dewey later became the librarian of Columbia University, and there founded the first school of library science (1887). He was director of the New York State Library from 1889 to 1906.

Dewey decimal system. A system of book classification for library cataloguing. It was devised by Melvil Dewey in 1876. The system divides books into 10 main groups, represented by figures, as in the following example:

800–899 Literature (novels, plays, poetry, criticism).

Each of the main classes is then further subdivided. When the distinctions between books become fine, Dexter, Timothy (1747-1806). American merchant and eccentric. Becoming enormously wealthy as the result of a series of transactions that should logically have proved disastrous, he named himself "Lord Timothy Dexter" and built a great mansion in Newburyport, Mass. He wrote an admiring and amusing account of his own exploits in A Pickle for the Knowing Ones, or Plain Truths in a Homespun Dress (1802). The book had no punctuation, but Dexter satisfied his critics by including a page full of various punctuation marks in a second edition, inviting his readers to "pepper and salt as they please." John P. Marquand wrote a biography, Lord Timothy Dexter, in 1925, which he revised in 1960 as Timothy Dexter Revisited.

Dey, Frederick Van Rensselaer. See Nick Carter.

dharma (Sans., "that which binds"). An ethical code, way of life, social conscience, truth, the natural order. To a Hindu, swa-dharma (self, self) would mean one's right to perform the duties dictated by one's nature and conscience. In Buddhism dharma is the law of the Buddha.

Dhôtel, André (1900— ). French novelist. In such tales as Faraway (Le Pays ou l'on n'arrive jamais, 1955), Dhôtel creates a poetic atmosphere of magic and suspense.

Diablo cojuelo, El. See Luis Vélez de Guevara.

Diafoirus. The name of 2 quack doctors, father and son, in Molière's comedy Le Malade imaginaire. As their name suggests, they are obsessed with the liver.

Diaghilev, Sergei Pavlovitch (1872-1919). Art critic, impresario, and founder (1909) and director of the Russian Ballet in Paris. He encouraged new ideas and techniques, first as an art critic, later in his ballets, which provided an audience for experiments in the various arts of music, painting, costume design, and dance. As a result, he attracted the talents of such composers as Claude Debussy, Maurice Ravel, Igor Stravinsky, and the members of Les Six; such artists as Pablo Picasso, Leon Bakst, Henri Matisse, and Georges Braque; such dancers and choreographers as M. M. Fokine, Anna Pavlova, Vaslav Nijinsky, and Léonide Massine. Many studies of Diaghilev and his ballet have been written.

Dial, The. A magazine founded in New England in 1840. The organ of the Transcendentalist movement, its founders were Theodore Parker, Bronson Alcott, Orestes Brownson, Margaret Fuller, and Ralph Waldo Emerson. Miss Fuller served as editor from 1840 to 1842, and Emerson, with Thoreau's help, took over until 1844, when the magazine ceased publication. During its short history, it wielded a great deal of influence in literary, philosophic, and religious thought. In addition to publishing the work of its founders, the Dial published the poetry of Jones Very and William Ellery Channing.

Since 1844, three other magazines have taken the same name. Moncure Conway founded the second Dial in 1860, in Cincinnati. In 1880, a conservative group founded the third Dial in Chicago. When it moved to New York in 1918, it became the outstanding literary review of its time. Until 1920, with the aid of Conrad Aiken, Randolph Bourne, and Van Wyck Brooks, it published articles by leading radical thinkers including John Dewey and Thorstein Veblen. After 1920, it was devoted to the encouragement of avant-garde authors. Marianne Moore became editor in 1926. The magazine ceased publication three years later.

The present Dial, a literary quarterly, was founded in 1959. It is edited by James Silberman.

diamond jousts. Jousts instituted by King Arthur, "who by that name had named them, since a diamond was the prize." The story, as embroidered by Tennyson in his Launcelot and Elaine from Malory, is that Arthur found nine diamonds from the crown of a slain knight and offered them as the prize of nine jousts in successive years. Launcelot had won them all, but when he laid them before the queen, Guinevere, in a fit of jealousy—the result of believing false rumors about Launcelot and Elaine—flung them into the river a moment before the corpse of Elaine passed in the barge.

Diamond Necklace Affair. A famous scandal in French history (1783-1785). The jewelers Böhmer and Bassenge had originally made the necklace, containing 500 diamonds, for Mme Du Barry; but, after the death of Louis XV, they were unable to dispose of it. To recoup their investment, they repeatedly but unsuccessfully pressed Marie Antoinette to buy it. The scheming, so-called Comtesse, Jeanne de La Motte, a high-class courtesan, knowing that Cardinal de Rohan, a rich, profligate churchman, wished to ingratiate himself with the queen—partly because he fatuously believed he could become her lover, and partly to regain royal favor—fraudulently persuaded him that Marie Antoinette secretly wished to buy the necklace, convincing him that the queen had chosen him to negotiate for the jewelers on her behalf. He agreed to act as intermediary and to deliver the necklace to Mme de La Motte who, in turn, would deliver it to Marie Antoinette. To lend credibility to her ruse, Mme de La Motte arranged for a young modiste and woman of the streets to impersonate the queen at a short garden meeting with Rohan; she also forged several letters which fanned the cardinal's infatuation and confirmed his role as go-between. He made a down payment on the necklace and delivered it to Mme de La Motte who, with her young accomplice and lover Rétaux de Villette, took it apart, sold the individual diamonds in England and Paris, and kept the money herself. Böhmer tried to collect the balance from the Queen, insisting that she had authorized Rohan to purchase it. The Queen, indignant at being accused of dishonesty, reported the affair to her husband, Louis XVI, who caused a sensation by having the cardinal arrested publicly. At the ensuing trial, Rohan was exonerated, but exiled to the country by the king, who still believed him guilty; Marie Antoinette was cleared of any duplicity; Mme de La Motte was publicly branded, whipped, and sentenced to life imprisonment. She later escaped to England where she wrote her memoirs, accusing the queen.

Diana. An ancient Italian and Roman divinity, later identified with the Olympian goddess Artemis.

Diane de Poitiers (1499–1566). Mistress of Henry II of France. She wielded immense power over Henry, who was 10 years her junior, until his death in 1559. She spent her last years at her château at Anet, which had been designed for her by Philibert Delorme, a celebrated architect.

Dianora. See Garden in January, A.

Diary of a Country Priest, The (Journal d'un curé de campagne; 1936). A novel by Georges Bernanos. It describes the struggles of a young priest with his diseased body and his ineffective parish projects. He is uncertain about whether his intervention in the affairs of the Count's family is true service to God.

Diary of Anne Frank. See Anne Frank.

Diary of A Scoundrel, The (Na vsyakogo mudretza dovolno prostoty); 1868). A comedy by Aleksandr Ostrovskii. A clever rogue, Glumov takes advantage of the foibles of society to advance himself. He is disgusted by the discovery of his diary, in which he ridicules the pretensions and stupidity of his associates, but he brazenly confronts the discoverers and triumphs.

Diary of a Writer, A (Dnevnik pisatelya; 1873, 1876–1877, 1880–1881). A series of collected articles and short sketches published in the form of a journal by Feodor Dostoievski. He began the project as a section in Granshadin (The Citizen), a weekly newspaper he edited in 1873–1874. The so-called diary was concerned mostly with political and social questions, although Dostoievski did publish in it a few of his short stories, including Krooksa (The Meek One, 1876), and Son smeshnogo cheloveka (The Dream of a Ridiculous Man, 1877). In 1880, the Diary contained Dostoievski's famous speech at the Pushkin celebration in Moscow.

Diaz, Porfirio (1830–1915). Mexican dictator. An erstwhile supporter of Juárez, Diaz seized power in 1876 and ruled Mexico for 35 years. Although his regime brought political and fiscal stability, only a handful of politicians, landowners, and foreign capitalists prospered, while the rural masses lived in virtual servitude. Diaz was ousted in 1911 and died in exile in Paris.

Diaz de Bivar, Rodrigo or Ruy. See Cid, Poema de Cantar de mio.

Diaz del Castillo, Bernal (1496–1584). Spanish soldier and historian. Diaz was one of the 400 soldiers who took part in the Spanish conquest of Mexico; he later settled down on an estate in Guatemala. Fugued by an official history of the conquest which he felt unduly glorified the achievements of Cortez, Diaz, then an octogenarian, attempted to tell what really happened in his Historia verdadera de la conquista de la Nueva España (True History of the Conquest of New Spain, 1632), perhaps the best popular history in the Spanish language. With a plethora of minute yet vivid detail, Diaz celebrates the exploits of the common soldiers who accompanied Cortez in a style remarkable for its homely vigor. An intensely personal document in which Diaz does not minimize his own achievements and depicts Cortez as a very fallible human being, the work gives an excellent picture of the individuality and tenacity that characterized the 16th-century conquistadores.

Dichtung und Wahrheit (Poetry and Truth, 1811–1814). An autobiography by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. It is not so much a simple recounting of the events of his life as an attempt to explain the major strains of his inner development and set forth the essential principles on which his poetic activity was based.

Dickens, Charles (1812–1870). English novelist, the most popular and considered by many the greatest of his country. Like that of the children in many of his novels, Dickens' childhood was a difficult and unhappy one; his father, a navy clerk, was constantly in debt and was thrown into debtors' prison, and Dickens was sent to work in a blacking factory at the age of 12. Most bitter for him was his parents' failure to educate him. He reacted to this indifference by working hard, a lifelong characteristic. He became an office boy in a law firm, then a county reporter, and finally a reporter of debates in Parliament for the Morning Chronicle in 1835. His Sketches by Boz, satires on daily life, were serialized in the Old Monthly Magazine (1833–1835). Immediately asked to do another series, he wrote The Posthumous Papers of the Pickwick Club, better known simply as Pickwick Papers; these were illustrated by Phiz (H. K. Browne) and made Dickens successful at 24. With Oliver Twist Dickens began his indictment of the society of his place and time, a society that grossly mistreated and abused the poor, especially children, driving them to crime. While working on Twist, his wife Catherine's sister died; his deep grief and lifelong utterances of love for this sister-in-law underline his less profound relationship with his wife, from whom he was separated in 1858. They had 10 children.

Nicholas Nickleby, like Oliver Twist, was serialized in Bentley's Miscellany. The next two, Barnaby Rudge and The Old Curiosity Shop, were serialized in Dickens' own, new weekly periodical, Master Humphrey's Clock; they were his least successful
In 1842, Dickens made a trip to the U.S. where he trod on native sensibilities by urging the abolition of slavery and the establishment of an international copyright. Back in England, he published his insulting American Notes and Martin Chuzzlewit, a powerfully satiric novel of selfishness, hypocrisy, and financial speculation as it bloomed in insular England and the open spaces but narrow minds of the U.S. Dickens met with sensational success with the publication of A Christmas Carol and he followed it in consecutive years with other Christmas books including A Cricket on the Hearth. His next novel, Dombey and Son, was written in Switzerland.

In 1850 Dickens founded the weekly Household Words, and in 1859 another weekly, All the Year Round, both of which he kept until his death; most of his later works were published in these periodicals.

With David Copperfield, his more mature works begin. Autobiographical, it was Dickens' own favorite. In Bleak House, an exposé of political corruption and court delay, Dickens displays a gloomy lack of faith in the ability of governmental institutions, held together with red tape and filled with archaic practices, to benefit the people. Hard Times is a protest against utilitarian lack of feeling and imagination and is perhaps Dickens' most single-minded social novel. Further disillusionment came in Little Dorrit, which included memories of Dickens' father in debters' prison. Next came his dramatic novel A Tale of Two Cities. This was soon followed by Great Expectations, considered by many as his finest work. Our Mutual Friend is highly regarded by some critics; but others find it humorless, diffuse, and contrived. In 1858, Dickens began to give public readings, which he continued on his second visit to the U.S. in 1867-1868. He died in England while working on his novel The Mystery of Edwin Drood. He was buried in Westminster Abbey.

No other English writer has created a world of characters so distinctively cruel or suffering, comic or repugnant as Dickens has; no other writer has written so convincingly of the wrongs inflicted on children by adults in the 19th century. Attacks on Dickens' sentimentality and tendency to caricature have detracted little from his stature as a great humorist and creator of characters; these he brought to life with a wealth of meaningful detail, a myriad of odd gestures, expressions, speech patterns, and physiognomies. As a social critic he focused sharply on the iniquities and inequities of his environment. See Boz. Dickens, Monica (1915- ). English novelist, great-granddaughter of Charles Dickens. Her popular early books were entertaining accounts of her experiences in new jobs—as a cook in One Pair of Hands (1939) and nurse in One Pair of Feet (1942). Other books include Man Overboard (1938), The Heart of London (1961), and Cobbler's Dream (1963).

Dickinson, Emily (1830-1886). American poet. One of the three children of Edward Dickinson, lawyer and treasurer of Amherst College, she shared a cultivated family life. After attending Amherst Institute and Mount Holyoke Female Seminary, she retired to her home; later, dressing only in white, she rarely came down from her room to meet her guests.

Her father, a stern Calvinist who served a term in Congress, dominated his daughter's life. Among the other men who influenced her were the Reverend Charles Wadsworth, whose trip to California is cryptically referred to in the poetry; Samuel Bowles, editor of the Springfield Daily Republican, where one of her poems appeared; Benjamin F. Newton, a short-lived scholar and lawyer, who introduced her to the works of Emerson; T. W. Higginson, soldier and critic; and Judge Otis P. Lord, a family friend.

Throughout her adult life Emily Dickinson wrote poetry; only two of the almost 2,000 poems she wrote were published in her lifetime. Uniformly short, consisting usually of four-line stanzas, the poems are written in a terse, aphoristic style. Although she personally rejected Calvinist theology, Emily Dickinson was influenced by the philosophy of Jonathan Edwards; like Emerson, she found that spirit manifested in nature. Physically isolated, she belongs in the tradition of American poetry that includes Whitman and Robert Frost.

Dickinson, Goldsworthy Lowes (1862-1932). English philosopher, essayist, and worker for international peace. The Greek View of Life (1896) is among his books.

Dickson, Carter or Carr. See John Dickson Carr.

Di Costanzo, Angelo (1507-1591). Italian Renaissance sonneteer and historian of his native city, Naples. He was important in the development of Petrarchism and Marinism because of his attempts at bringing to the sonnet the witty effects of epigrams. He was especially popular in the 18th century, among the Arcadians. His Rime (Verses) were not published until 1709.

dictator. In ancient Rome, the temporary supreme commander. In times of great national danger, the senate would call upon the consuls to appoint a dictator who would hold office for no longer than six months. See Cincinnatus.

Dictator of Letters. Epithet for Voltaire (Francois Marie Arouet), who was also called "the Great Pan."

Dite (Dikte). A Cretan mountain where, in a cave, the infant Zeus was tended by nymphs and the Curetts and suckled by the goat Amaltheia. An actual cave on this mountain has proved through excavation to have been a center of an important Minoan cult centering about a young child.

diction. Word choice in verbal expression with all that such choice implies in questions of correctness, clarity, and style. The most just, or exactly right word, is the ideal of good diction. Popularly, it is often confused with enunciation.

Dictionary of the English Language (1755). A monumental work by Samuel Johnson, which made his reputation and was the standard dictionary until Noah Webster's. In 1747, Johnson applied to Lord Chesterfield for patronage and was refused; upon completion of the work, Chesterfield made a belated offer, which Johnson then refused in a famous letter. In his preface to the Dictionary, addressing critics, Johnson wrote, "... and it may repress the triumph of malignant criticism to observe, that if our language is not here fully displayed, I have only failed in an attempt which no human powers have hitherto completed."

Dictrys Cretensis. Reputed author of an alleged, eye-witness account in Latin of the siege of Troy, which was one of the versions of the Troilus legend known to the Middle Ages. Both Dictrys Cretensis and Dares Phrygius are names mentioned by Homer.

didactic poetry. Poetry to teach factual information or moral lessons. Didactic verse has since time immemorial combined the mnemonic virtues of rhyme and rhythm with information to be memorized, as in the nursery rhyme "Thirty days hath September." In the view of some philosophers, the underlying aim of all literature is at least in part didactic; but aside from such an underlying aim, purely didactic poetry is no longer written. Some examples of didactic poetry in literary history are: Lucretius's De Rerum Natura, Vergil's Georgics, Erasmus Darwin's Botanic Garden, and Pope's Essay on Man.

Diderot, Denis. Nicknamed Pantophile Diderot (1713-1784). French encyclopedist, materialistic philosopher, novelist, satirist, dramatist, and art critic. Until recently, he was famous mainly for having compiled and edited, with d'Alembert and others, the Encyclopédie ou Dictionnaire raisonné des sciences, des arts et des métiers (28 vols, 5 suppls., 2 index vols.). Among his philosophic works are Pensees philosophiques (1746), which is deistic in thought and a defense of human passions; Lettre sur les aveugles... (1749), a study of how the blind learn, containing his view on materialism (he was imprisoned for three months because of this work); Lettre sur les sourds et les muets (1749), one of the first studies on the deaf and dumb, as well as an inquiry into aesthetics; Pensees sur l'interprétation de la nature (1753), containing ideas which foreshadow discoveries in biology, the theory of transformation, and natural selection. Diderot's audacity and profundity in scientific thought are strikingly illustrated in his Le Rêve de d'Alembert (1769, pub. 1830), one of his three dramatic dialogues in which he presents surprising insights into the physical, moral, and social universe; in it is found the first modern conception of the cellular structure of matter. His novels include Les Bijoux indiscrets (1748); La Religieuse (written 1760, pub. 1796), an attack on life in convents; Le Neveu de Rameau, a dialectical satire on contemporary society and conventional morality; and the satirico-philosophical Jacques le Fataliste, in which Diderot poses the problem of freedom versus predeterminism, and at the same time experiments with the form of the novel. Among Diderot's plays, the most famous are Le Père de famille (1758) and Le Fils naturel (1757). Moral in tone, and rather mediocre, they illustrate his theories on the drama and became prototypes for the bourgeois drama. Diderot's theories on the drama, which he developed in several essays, e.g., Paradoxe sur le comédien (1773-1778, pub. 1830), were put into practice by Émile Augier and Dumas fils, in their moralistic, social-minded plays. In the Salons, written for Baron de Grimm's Correspondance littéraire, philosophique et critique, Diderot inaugurated art criticism as a literary genre. His Lettres à Sophie Volland attest to his genius as a letter-writer.

Dido. Also known as Elissa. The name given by Vergil in his Aeneid to the founder and queen of Carthage. According to Roman legend, she fled from Phoenicia to North Africa after her brother Pygmalion, king of Tyre, had murdered her husband, Sycaeus, for his wealth. (See Byrsa.) The name Dido was also an epithet of the Phoenician goddess Astarte.

In Vergil's poem, she hospitably receives Aeneas and the Trojans when they are shipwrecked on her shores. Through the plotting of the goddess Venus, she falls in love with Aeneas and tries to persuade him to settle in North Africa and share Carthage with her. But when the will of the gods is announced to him by their messenger Mercury, Aeneas yields, half against his will; he must abandon Dido and found his own nation in Italy. After his departure, Dido, in grief, takes her life by the sword, and is cremated on a great funeral pyre which Aeneas, now far out to sea, beholds burning on the shore.

Ovid's Heroides contains a letter, supposedly written by Dido to Aeneas, in which she reminds him of all she has done for him and begs him to remain. Other works dealing with the unfortunate queen include Nash and Marlowe's tragedy Dido, Queen of Carthage (1594), Purcell's opera Dido and Aeneas (1689), and Piccinini's opera Didon (1783).

Diego [Cendoya], Gerardo (1895— ). Spanish poet and scholar. His well-known earlier collections, Imagen (1922), Manual de espumas (1924), and Versos humanos (1925), reveal a style which relates the growth of a poem to that of a living organism. His recent work includes the volume Romanesco de la novia (1944).

Diego, San. A modification of Santiago (Sp., St. James, patron saint of sailors).

Dies Irae. La (Day of Wrath). A famous medieval hymn on the last judgment, probably composed by Thomas of Celano, a native of Abruzzi, who died in 1255. It is derived from the Vulgate version of Joel 2:23, and used in the Mass for the Dead and on All Souls' Day.

Dietrich of Bern. See Theodoric the Great.

Digby, Sir Kenelm (1603-1665). English naval commander, diplomat, writer, and council member of the Royal Society. He discovered the necessity of oxygen for plant life. Among his works are A Treatise of the Nature of Bodies (1644), A Treatise Declaring the Operations and Nature of Man's Soul (1644), and his allegorical Memoirs (1827).

 dilettante (from Italian; literally, one who takes delight in a thing). Like amateur, which means literally, one who likes a thing, the term dilettante is especially applied with reference to the fine arts. Since mere fondness of an art guarantees neither knowledge nor ability, amateur as well as dilettante have come to mean one who dabbles in a given subject. The Spanish word aficionado, popularized in English with the flurry of interest in bullfighting, carries the sense of the knowledgeable enthusiast that the other two words have nearly lost.

Dill Pickle, A (1920). A short story by Katherine Mansfield. A pair of lovers meet by chance in a restaurant after they have been separated for six years. In the half hour they spend together she rediscover his charm and regrets ever leaving him, then rediscover his faults and leaves him sitting in the restaurant. A sour dill pickle in an anecdote he tells functions as a symbol for the whole experience.

dimeter. In prosody, a line of verse containing two metrical feet. It may be in any meter, usually identified together with the name of the meter, as iambic dimeter, trochaic dimeter, etc.

Dimmesdale, Arthur. The guilty minister in Hawthorne's The Scarlet Letter.

Dindenault. See Dingdong.

Dindymus. In ancient geography, a mountain range between Phrygia and Galatia, sacred to Cybele, the Great Mother of the Gods, often also called Dindymene.

Diners Magny. A restaurant in Paris, the scene of informal meetings held by an inner circle of French novelists between 1862 and 1875. Among the men who gathered there, for dinner and discussion, were Edmond and Jules de Goncourt, Théophile Gautier, Alphonse Daudet, Ernest Renan, Gustave Flaubert, and Charles Sainte-Beuve.

Dinesen, Isak. Pen name of Baroness Karen Blixen, born Dinesen (1885–1962). Danish short-story writer. Married to her cousin Baron Blixen, Isak Dinesen lived from 1914 to 1931 on a coffee plantation in British East Africa, now Kenya. Out of Africa (1937), published simultaneously in English and Danish, is a sensitive account of her experiences. Her first book, Seven Gothic Tales (1934), was published in English and received immediate critical acclaim; Winter's Tales (1942) is another well-known collection. During the German occupation of Denmark, Isak Dinesen published a symbolic critique of the conquerors, Gengioldelsens Veje (The Angelic Avengers, 1947) under the name of Pierre Andrézel. A delicate subtility of both mood and expression characterizes her acutely perceptive, often mysterious stories.

Ding an sich. See CRITIQUE OF PURE REASON; CRITIQUE OF JUDGMENT.

Dingdong. An anglicism for Dindenault, the sea-going sheep trader in Rabelais' Gargantua and Pantagruel who sells Panurge a ram for an exorbitant price. Panurge punishes Dingdong by heaving the ram overboard, thus causing the whole herd to stampede into the sea, dragging the trader with them. Panurge declares that such good sport was well worth the price he had paid for the ram.

Dinggedicht (Ger., "thing poem"). A lyric poem about an objective entity which, though it is most often a material thing, may also be a person or situation. The poet seeks not so much to describe from his own point of view as to recreate the intrinsic essence of the object in question, to get inside the object, as it were. Ideally, the reader should react to the poem as though he were reacting, on a deeper and more perceptive level than usual, to the thing itself. In many poems of this type, those by Eduard Mörike and Conrad Ferdinand Meyer for example, the subject is a work of art; but Rainer Maria Rilke, with whom the term Dinggedicht is most often associated, expanded the technique to include such subjects as living animals, human situations, and common household objects. The Dinggedicht is recognized in German literary criticism as a distinct poetic form.

Dinmont, Dundie. An eccentric and humorous farmer in Scott's Guy Mannering. He owns two terriers, Mustard and Pepper, reputedly the progenitors of the Dundie Dinmont breed.

Dioecletian [Gaius Aurelius Valerius] (A.D. 245–305). Roman emperor (284–305). He inaugurated the period of the Partnership of Emperors. He ruled with Maximian from 285, and divided the empire again (293) to include Constantius Chlorus and Galerius as rulers. Dioecletian governed the eastern portion. At the instigation of his colleague Galerius, he began a terrible 10-year persecution of the Christians in 303. Dioecletian abdicated (305) and retired to his native Dalmatia, where he spent the last years of his life.

Diogenes (c. 400–c. 325 B.C.). Greek Cynic philosopher, pupil of Antisthenes. According to Seneca, he lived in a tub. The ascetic Diogenes is said to have searched in daylight with a lantern for an honest man. He exposed the vanity and selfishness of men. Diogenes' contempt for worldly goods is indicated by his reply to Alexander the Great, when the latter asked if he could do the philosopher any favor. Diogenes answered, "Yes, move out of my sunshine." Diogenes' nickname was kyón, or dog, a comment on his mode of living.

Diogenes Laertius (c. 200–250). A Greek author. Nothing is known of this writer's life. He wrote Lives and Opinions of Eminent Philosophers, of unknown date. He included the biographies of 82 Greek thinkers from Thales to Epicurus, which he compiled from the works of earlier writers. Diogenes chiefly records anecdotes to illustrate the viewpoint or character of his subject. The greatest value of the book is its preservation of three epistles and the maxims of Epicurus.

Diomedean swap. An exchange in which all the benefit is on one side. The expression is based on an incident related by Homer in the Iliad. During the proscribed exchange of credentials before a fight to the death, the Greek hero Diomedes and the Trojan hero Glauclus discover that their families had been allied. Forgetting their quarrel, they exchange armor, but Glauclus' armor is pure gold, while Diomedes' is only brass. Homer remarks that Zeus must have added Glauclus' wits.

Diomedes. In Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra, an attendant of Cleopatra. He brings word to Antony that Cleopatra, whom he has been told is falsely dead, is actually still alive.

Diomedes or Diomed. In Greek mythology, a king of Argos. He is described as one of the bravest warriors at the siege of Troy. He survived the siege, but on his return home, found his wife living in adultery, and saved his life by living in exile in Italy. See also DIONYSIAN SWAP.

Dione. A Titaness, a consort of Zeus to whom, according to one Greek myth, she bore Aphrodite. Her name was later occasionally applied to Aphrodite.

Dionysiac. See APOLLONIAN AND DIONYSIAC.
Dirty Hands

Dionysus (Dionysos). Also known as Bacchus in Roman mythology. The Greek god of wine and fertile crops, the son of Zeus and Semele. Saved from his dead mother, the unborn child was sewed into Zeus's thigh. After his birth, he was torn to pieces by the Titans at the jealous Hera's instigation. Revived by Rhea, he was transformed into a kid and raised by nymphs. As a young man, he invented wine and introduced the vine to many lands, accompanied everywhere by a troop of maenads and suitors. Those who opposed his orgiastic rites were driven mad or otherwise destroyed. He married Ariadne, whom Theseus had deserted in the island of Naxos. Later he took the place of Hestia as one of the twelve Olympians and raised his mother from Hades under the name of Thyone.

The important festivals, among them the Eleusinian Mysteries and the Athenian Antestheria, celebrated the cult of Dionysus as the Daemon of reviving vegetation in the spring. An influential development of this cult was Orphism, which in turn influenced the philosophies of Pythagoras and Plato. Euripides' play The Bacchants (408-406 B.C.) tells the story of Dionysus' gory triumph over Pentheus, king of Thebes. It is generally acknowledged that drama, especially tragedy, developed out of the traditional ceremonies performed at Dionysian festivals to celebrate the death and resurrection of the god.

Dioscuri (Gr. Dios kouroi, sons of Zeus). See Castor and Polydeuces.

Diotima. An Arcadian prophetess, the teacher of Socrates. She is quoted by him in Plato's Symposium.

Dionysus riding in a chariot drawn by a satyr, who carries a wine storage jar. Dionysus is crowned with grape leaves.
be willing to have “dirty hands”—that is, apparently, to accept the argument that the end justifies the means. Hoeckerer, who does so, seems most “real” as a person to Hugo and Jessica; idealistic Hugo suffers when he discovers that he cannot.

Dis. A name for Hades and hence the lower world.

Disastrous Peace, the (La Paix malheureuse). A name given to the Treaty of Cateau-Cambrésis (1559). It followed the battle of Gravelines. It was signed by France, Spain, and England, and by it France ceded the Low Countries to Spain, and Savoy, Corsica, and 200 forts to Italy.

Discours de la méthode. See René Descartes.

Discours sur l’histoire universelle. See Jacques Bénigne Bossuet.

Disenchanted, The (1950). A novel by Budd Schulberg. The central character is Manley Halliday, a famous alcoholic novelist of the 1920’s, based on F. Scott Fitzgerald. Schulberg had known the senior writer, and the book—a fictional re-creation of his personal experiences—is a melodrama approximating the tragedy of Fitzgerald’s own life in Hollywood. The book was dramatized in 1958.

disestablishment. The act of withdrawing from a church its established position or privileges in relation to the state. The Irish Church was disestablished by an act of Parliament in 1869. The Church of England was disestablished in Wales by several acts in 1920.

Dismas or Dysmas. The usual name in the apocryphal gospels for the penitent thief. He was crucified with Jesus. He became the patron saint of thieves. The impenitent thief is commonly known as Gestas or Gestas. Longfellow, in his Golden Legend, calls the penitent Titus and his fellow thief Dumaschus.

Disney, Walt[er Elias] (1901— ). American pioneer in animated cartoons and motion-picture producer. Disney studied at the Chicago Academy of Fine Arts and later became a commercial artist. In 1923 he went to Hollywood and began to create the first of his famous animated cartoons. His series of films featuring Oswald the Rabbit won wide favor, after which came those featuring Mickey Mouse and Donald Duck, his almost universally known creations. Disney made The Three Little Pigs in 1933 and, thereafter, turned his attention to making full-length pictures in this technique; Snow White and the Seven Dwarfs (1938), Fantasia (1940), and Dumbo (1942) are among the best known of these. The Living Desert (1935) was the first of a number of documentary films on wild life and nature that Disney subsequently produced.

Disraeli, Benjamin. Ist earl of Beaconsfield (1804–1881). English statesman and novelist. A member of Parliament, leader of the opposition in Commons, thrice chancellor of the exchequer, and twice prime minister, Disraeli was created a peer in 1876. It was by his initiative that Britain acquired the Suez canal in 1875, and he was responsible for having Queen Victoria proclaimed “Empress of India” and for negotiating “peace with honor” at the Congress of Berlin. As a young man, Disraeli had hesitated in deciding between a political and a literary career; his best novels, written at this time, are marked by acute wit, sharp realism, and a totally individual and often fantastic style. They include Vivian Grey, The Young Duke (1831), his two earliest works; Contarini Fleming, a psychological romance (1832), and The Wondrous Tale of Aioy, a historical novel (1832), both of which reveal the pride which Disraeli, a baptized Anglican, felt in his Jewish ancestry, a pride which he was to retain throughout his life; Henrietta Temple, a love story (1836); Venetia (1837), which presented in fictionalized form episodes from the lives of Byron and Shelley; Coningsby, or the New Generation, first in a projected political trilogy; Sybil, or the Two Nations, the second in the series, a depiction of the Chartist movement with such a frank portrayal of labor conditions that it was instrumental in provoking factory reform; Tancred, or the New Crusade, the last novel in the trilogy, an implicit proposal that English politics and church seek a revitalizing inspiration from Semitic sources; and two political novels dating from late in his political career, Lothair (1870) and Endymion (1880). Disraeli’s nonfictional works are now chiefly of historical interest, but like his novels they exemplify his conservative convictions, his disdain for the theories of abstract rights and the a priori systems of the utilitarians, his trust in democratic Toryism, his acceptance of the duty of social reform, and his pride in empire and crown.

D’Israeli, Isaac (1766–1848). Father of Benjamin Disraeli. Isaac’s father, Benjamin D’Israeli, was a Jewish merchant descended from a family of Spanish refugees who came to England in 1748. Isaac had several works published anonymously, including Curiosities of Literature (6 vols., 1791–1834) and Amunities of Literature (3 vols., 1841).

Dissertation on Roast Fig. A. One of the most famous of Charles Lamb’s Essays of Elia, it is a humorous account of the “accidental discovery” of the process of cooking pork.

Dissertation upon Parties (1735). A well-known political pamphlet by Henry St. John, Viscount Bolingbroke, which rejects the notion of divine right of kings and sets forth the idea of a king free from the restrictions of party factionalism, who would assume leadership and preserve both a balanced government and traditional civil liberties.

dissociation of sensibility. A phrase coined by T. S. Eliot in The Metaphysical Poets (1921). According to Eliot, the 17th-century poets could “feel their thought as immediately as the odour of a rose,” but after them a “dissociation of sensibility” set in and poets became either intellectual or emotional, but not both. Like the French symbolists, Eliot was trying to recapture that lost fusion of thought and feeling.

distich. The classical designation of a unit of two lines in a strophic poem for choral recitation. The term is used in English only in relation to or in translations of poetry from other languages. The elegiac distich of classical times consists of a hexameter followed by a pentameter, a form also used by the German poets Goethe and Schiller in poetic aphorisms. An example by Schiller, which is a characterization of the distich, reads, in Coleridge’s translation:

In the hexameter rises the fountain’s silvery column, In the pentameter aye falling in melody back.
dithyramb (Gr., dithyrambos, a choric hymn). Originally a wild, impetuous kind of Dionysian lyric in honor of Dionysus. It was traditionally ascribed to Arion of Lesbos (about 620 B.C.), who was thereafter called the father of dithyrambic poetry. It was said to be the origin of drama.

Ditzen, Rudolf. See Hardy FALALDA.

Dive Bouteille, Oracle de la. See Oracle of the HOLY BOTTLE.

Diverting History of John Bull and Brother Jonathan (1812). A satire by James Kirke Paulding, under the pseudonym of Hector Bullus. The book relates the settling of Jonathan’s farms (the U.S.) and their revolt from Bullock Island (England). Violently anti-British in tone, the story was continued in a sequel, The History of Uncle Sam and His Boys (1835).

Diverting History of John Gilpin, The. See John GILPIN.

Divine Comedy, The (Commedia, completed 1321; called Divina Commedia after the 16th century). An epic poem by Dante, his major work. It has 100 cantos in terza rima, divided equally (after an introductory canto in the first section) into three sections of 33 cantos each. The poet finds himself lost in the wood of Error, Good Friday, 1300. He is met by the spirit of Vergil, the great classical poet whom Dante considers the incarnation of the highest knowledge attainable by the human mind. Vergil conducts him through Hell to free him of the temptation to sin; then on Easter morning they begin the ascent of the mountain of Purgatory to purify Dante’s soul of even the capacity for error. Vergil must leave Dante at the top of the mountain, for man alone, without grace, can go no further; but in the Earthly Paradise there Dante meets Beatrice, who represents divine revelation, and she conducts him through Paradise to God. Details of each section see INFERNO; Purgatorio; Paradise.

The cosmology, angelology, and theology of the work are based firmly on the system of St. Thomas Aquinas, but Dante considered the Church of his time a “harlot” no longer serving God—he meets seven popes in the Inferno, for instance—and was therefore frequently considered a heretic. The characters whom Dante meets on his journey are drawn largely from ancient Roman history and from recent and contemporary Italian history, including Dante’s personal friends and enemies; their vivid portraiture and the constant allusions to human affairs makes the work, although in structure a description of the Beyond, actually a realistic picture and intensely involved analysis of every aspect of earthly human life. Dante’s literal journey is also an allegory of the progress of the individual soul toward God, and the progress of political and social mankind toward peace on earth; it is a compassionate, although moral, evaluation of human nature and a mystic vision of the Absolute toward which it strives. Thus the universality of the drama and the lyric vigor of the poetry are far more important that the specific doctrinal content.

Divinity School Address, The (1838). An address by Ralph Waldo EMERSON. Delivered before the graduates of the Harvard Divinity School, the address shocked Boston’s conservative clergyman. Emerson stressed the divinity of man and the humanity of Christ. He denied miracles and did not quote scripture. Evil was represented as possessing a negative character; instead of a positive force, it became a vacuum into which good would easily flow. Further, he upheld intuition, rather than ritual, as a means of knowing God.

Dix, Dorothy. Pen name of Elizabeth Meriwether Gilmer (1870–1951). American newspaper writer. She is known as the author of a widely syndicated column of advice on domestic problems, which was first published in 1896 in the New Orleans Picayune.

Dixie. A nostalgically regarded American paradise in the South. It is also the popular name of a song, originally entitled I Wish I Was in Dixie’s Land, composed by Daniel Decatur Emmett in 1859. A great favorite in the South, it was taken up by the soldiers in the Confederate army. Fanny Crosby wrote a Union version of the text in 1861, known as Dixie for the Union.

The origin of the word Dixie is obscure. It has been suggested that it is related to the Mason and Dixon line; others believe that a Louisiana bank, printing its pre-Civil War bills in French with a big Dix (ten) in the middle of the 10-dollar notes, made the South the land of “dixies.” A further, and ironic derivation is from the name of a slaveholder on Manhattan Island in the late 18th century; so benevolent was he that when his slaves were moved down south, they pined for “Dixie’s land” up north.

Dixon, Jim. In Kingsley Amis’s novel LUCKY JIM, a young university teacher beset by comic misfortunes.

Djinestan. See JINNISTAN.

 Dobell, Sydney (1824–1874). English poet and critic. Probably the most estimable member of the Yarnsmonic School, Dobell wrote such long poems as The Roman (1850) and Balder (1854) and many ballads and sonnets. While there are numerous fine passages and striking lines in the former, Dobell was an uneven writer and his reputation rests largely on shorter works, such as the ballad Keith of Ravelston (1857).

Dobie, James Frank (1888–1964). American teacher, historian, and folklorist. Dobie, who is especially identified with the University of Texas, has taught in a number of universities. He was a visiting professor at Cambridge University and from this experience came a book of observations, A Texan in England (1945). Among the books of this cultural historian of the Southwest are Coronado’s Children (1931), Tales of the Mustangs (1936), Apache Gold and Yaqui Silver (1939), Guide to Life and Literature in the Southwest (1943; revised and enlarged, 1952), The Mustangs (1952), and I’ll Tell You a Tale (1960).

Döblin, Alfred (1878–1957). German novelist and essayist, known as a leading representative of expressionism. His major novel, however, Berlin Alexanderplatz (1929), is less expressionistically tendentious, more scenic and realistic than his earlier works, and shows the influence of John Dos Passos and James Joyce. Döblin, a physician, emigrated from Germany in 1933 and became a French citizen.

Dobrée, Bonomy (1891– ). English author on Restoration drama. Dobrée is the author of Restoration Comedy (1924) and Restoration Tragedy (1929).

Doctor. A scholastic or honorary title conferred by a university. Today the word is commonly synonymous with physician, from the degree M.D., Doctor of Medicine. In the medieval universities doctors were advanced students who were usually also teachers. The Schoolmen, or theologians who lectured in the cloisters and cathedral schools, were also called doctors.

Doctor. For titles beginning with Doctor, see also under Dr.

Doctors of the Church. Certain early Christian Fathers, especially four in the Greek (or Eastern) Church and four in the Latin (or Western) Church.

Eastern Church. St. Athanasius of Alexandria (d. 373), who defended the divinity of Christ against the Arians; St. Basil the Great of Caesarea (d. 379) and his co-worker St. Gregory of Nazianzus (d. 389); and the eloquent St. John Chrysostom (d. 407), Archbishop of Constantinople.

Western Church. St. Jerome (d. 420), translator of the Vulgate; St. Ambrose (d. 397), bishop of Milan; St. Augustine (d. 430), bishop of Hippo; and St. Gregory the Great (d. 604), the pope who sent St. Augustine, the Apostle of the Anglo-Saxons, to England.

Doctor Zhivago (Doktor Zhivago; 1957). A novel by Boris Pasternak. This famous book centers around the experiences of a member of the intelligentsia during the Russian Revolution. The story's hero, Yuri Zhivago, is a young doctor with a mild interest in the coming revolution and a great interest in literature. He composes poems, mostly with religious overtones; 25 of his verses form the last part of the novel. Zhivago's discussions with his uncle Kolya and his friends contain most of the explicit anti-Marxist passages that offended Soviet censors. The novel was refused publication in the Soviet Union, but was published abroad, bringing down the wrath of Soviet officials on Pasternak's head. Soviet authorities were as much bothered by the religious spirit pervading the novel as they were by the outspoken opposition to Marxism. Pasternak's opposition is implied throughout the book in the frequent contrast between the revolution's attempt to order men's lives rationally and the free, living spirit of Zhivago finds in nature and in such characters as his mistress, Lara. Zhivago's, and the author's, sympathies are always obviously with life as opposed to the ideas about life held by the Marxists. The poetic spirit of the book is enhanced by the language in which it is written. In the original Russian, the lines often fall into the cadences of verse and almost always strike the reader with the intense force usually expected from well-written poetry.

Doctrine and Discipline of Divorce (1644). A famous prose argument by John Milton on the religious justifications and legality of divorce. It may have been prompted, in part, by his own marital difficulties with his first wife, Mary Powell.

Dodd, William Edward (1869–1940). American historian and diplomat. Dodd was ambassador to Germany from 1933 to 1937, when he resigned to lecture against Nazism. His Ambassador Dodd's Diary (1941) contains his reactions to Nazism. Earlier he had written several books on American history, including Statesmen of the Old South (1911), Lincoln or Lee (1928), and The Old South (1937).

Doderer, Heimito von (1896– ). Austrian novelist. Influenced by Robert Musil, he was known for his critical attitude toward what he regarded as the militaristic orientation of the 20th century. His best known novel is Die Strudelhofsäte (1951), which takes its title from the name of a stone stairway in Vienna.

Dodge, Mary Mapes (1831–1905). American writer and editor of St. Nicholas Magazine (1873–1905). Her books for children, Hans Brinker, or the Silver Skates (1865) and Donald and Dorothy (1883), are classics.

Dodgson, Charles Lutwidge. See Lewis Carroll.

Dodona. A famous oracle in the village of Dodona in Epirus, and the most ancient of Greece. It was dedicated to Zeus, and the oracles were delivered from the tops of oak and other trees, the rustling of the wind in the branches being interpreted by the priests. Also, brazen vessels and plates were suspended from the branches, and these, being struck together when the wind blew, gave various sounds from which responses were concocted. Hence the Greek phrase Kalkos Dodones (brass of Dodona), meaning a babbler, or one who talks an infinite deal of nothing.

According to tradition, two black pigeons took their flight from Thebes, in Egypt; one flew to Libya, and the other to Dodona. On the spot where the former alighted, the temple of Zeus Ammon was erected; in the place where the other settled, the oracle of Zeus was established, and there the responses were made by the black pigeons that inhabited the surrounding groves. This fable is probably based on a pun upon the word pepelai, which usually meant "old women," but in the dialect of the Epirotes signified pigeons or doves.

Dodsley, Robert (1703–1764). English poet, playwright, and the most important publisher and bookseller of the eighteenth century. With the aid of Alexander Pope, he opened his bookshop at the sign of Tully's Head in Pall Mall, London, and was soon publishing the works of Pope, Samuel Johnson, Edward Young, William Collins, and many others. His publication of poetry culminated in A Collection of Poems by several hands in 6 volumes (1748–1758); his chief connection with English fiction was the London edition of Tristram Shandy. Dodsley was also the editor of a collection of Old Plays (12 vols., 1744), beginning with a morality play, which went through several revised and enlarged editions.

Dodson and Fogg, Messrs. In Charles Dickens' Pickwick Papers, two unprincipled lawyers who undertake on speculation to bring an action against Mr. Pickwick for breach of promise, and file accordingly the famous suit of Bardell v. Pickwick. The names Dodson and Fogg are frequently used as synonymous with unscrupulous or dishonest solicitors.

Dodsworth (1929). A novel by Sinclair Lewis. Samuel Dodsworth, a rich automobile manufacturer in the Midwestern city of Zenith, retires and goes to Europe with his frivolous wife, Fran. Fran becomes involved in several love affairs with European adventurers, and Dodsworth, lonely and unhappy, meets Edith Cottwright, an American widow who teaches him to appreciate the traditions of Europe. He eventually leaves his wife for the more mature companionship of Edith. The novel was dramatized in 1934 by Sidney Howard.

dog. An animal that in medieval art symbolizes fidelity. A dog is represented as lying at the feet of St. Bernard, St. Benignus, and St. Wendelin; as licking the wounds of St. Roch; as carrying a lighted torch in representations of St. Dominic. In monuments the dog is placed at the feet of women to symbolize affection and fidelity, as a lion is placed at the feet of men to signify courage and magnanimity. Many of the Crusaders are represented with their feet on a dog, to show that they followed the standard of the Lord as faithfully as a dog follows the footsteps of his master.

Dogberry. A pompous but comical constable in Shakespeare's Much Ado About Nothing. He has a habit of confusing his words, sagely remarking, for example, that "comparisons are odorous." He and his cronies Vindice and Borachio into custody as a suspicious character and ask Leonato to question him. Leonato fails to comprehend their garbled story, however, and Don John's plot against Hero and Claudio nearly succeeds.

doggerel. Originally, loose and irregular verse, often comic or burlesque. It gave the impression of having been quickly and casually composed, as in Hudibras, Butler's satirical epic. A pejorative meaning has now become attached to the word, connoting triviality of subject matter and ineptness of technique, as in "mere doggerel."

Dog Star. Sirius, the brightest star in the firmament. Its influence was supposed in ancient times to cause great heat, pestilence, etc. It was called Dog Star (Canis Majoris) because it belongs to the constellation Canis Majoris (the large dog).

Dolce stil nuovo. See Stilnovisti.

Dole, Etienne (1509–1546). French scholar and printer. From his printing press at Lyons he issued works by Rabelais, Clément Marot, and others, as well as his own Commentaries linguae Latinae (1536–1568), a philosophical study. Convicted of heresy and blasphemy, he was hanged and then burned in Paris.

Dolgoruki, Arkadi Makarovitch. The hero of Feodor Dostoevski's novel, A Raw Youth. Arkadi is the illegitimate son of Versilov.

Dolittle, Dr. The animal-loving doctor hero of children's stories by Hugh Lofting.

Dollfuss, Engelbert (1892–1934). Chancellor of Austria (1932–1934). He was assassinated in a Nazi Putsch.

Dolliver Romance, The (1876). An unfinished novel by Nathaniel Hawthorne. It was supposed to have been published serially in The Atlantic Monthly, but the author died before his plans were realized. Dr. Dolliver attempts to prepare an elixir of life so that he might live to care for his granddaughter, Pansie. In contrast to the selfless Dolliver, Colonel Dabney demands the elixir for purely selfish reasons. Dabney finally dies, ironically, of an overdose of the elixir.

Doll's House, A (1879). A play by Henrik Ibsen. Sheltered, petted, and expected to behave like an amiable nitwit by first her father and then her husband, Nora Helmer has committed forgery in order to get money to save her husband's life. Though she has repaid the money, her husband finally finds out about her act. His behavior makes Nora realize that in their eight years of marriage he has never looked on her as a human being, but only as a doll, and she leaves him in order to learn to become a person in her own right.

Dolopathos. See The Seven Wise Masters.

Dombey and Son (1848). A novel by Charles Dickens. The proud, unfeeling Mr. Dombey has but one ambition in life: to have a son that his firm might interperse his narrative with remarks about the present situation. In this way, it is implied that it is the same demonic and always potentially destructive energy inherent in Leverkuhn's music that is also, on a larger scale, behind the outbreak of Nazism. Mann thus suggests that the violent Faustian drive, when it is not diverted into art, or when there is no single artistic genius to harness it into creative process, will be perverted and result in grossly subhuman degradation. Thus, Mann is concerned here with his favorite theme, the artist's isolation in the world; but whereas earlier treatments such as Tosco Karicza had shown the artist attempting to get along with the world's values, here the world is seen attempting to cope with a force that is proper only to art.

Dolce, Lodovico (1508–1566). Italian dramatist. He wrote Senecan tragedies in the modern manner of Giraldi, which influenced the Elizabethan drama. His best-known work is the Marianna (1565).
be called Dombey and Son. When his son Paul is born he promises to fulfill this ambition, which over-rides even grief at the death of Mrs. Dombey. Young Paul, a delicate, sensitive boy, is quite unequal to the great things expected of him; he is sent to Mr. Blimber's school and gives way under the strain of the discipline. In his short life he wins the love of all who know him. Mr. Dombey is embittered by Paul's death. Florence, his daughter, lives on with him trying desperately to win his love, but she has succeeded only in incurring his hatred because she lives while her brother died. Dombey marries again, but his second wife, Edith Granger, runs off with Mr. Canker, his business manager. Florence marries the kind young Walter Gay. Dombey's firm fails, and alone and miserable, he finds himself longing for the sweet and kind daughter whom he treated so coldly. The two are reconciled, and Dombey tries to expiate his past through his grandchildren.

The novel is noted for its complex structure. The symbolism of death as the sea and life as the flow of the river into the sea, used often in his later novels, is first used here.

Dom Casmurro (1900). A novel by Joachim Maria Machado de Assis. The narrator, a middle-aged lawyer nicknamed Dom Casmurro (roughly, "Mr. Peevish") because of his difficult disposition, reflects on his adolescence and on his youthful romance with Capitu, whom he later married. An aura of uncertainty and ambiguity hovers over the book—not even the question of Capitu's adulterous relationship with Escobar, her husband's best friend, is fully settled. Written in a limpid, wryly humorous style, the novel is largely plotless and is frequently interrupted by the narrator's asides.

Dom Daniel (Lat. domus, house or home; Danielis, of Daniel). A fabled abode of evil spirits, gnomes, and enchanters, "under the roots of the ocean" off Tunis, or elsewhere. It first appears in Chaves and Cazotte's Continuation of the Arabian Nights (1788-1793), was introduced by Southey into his Thalaba, and used by Carlyle as synonymous with a den of iniquity.

Domenichino, il. Real name, Domenico Zam-pieri (1581-1641). Italian painter. A product of the ecletic academy of the Carracci at Bologna, he is noted for his religious and mythological works, including the Last Communion of St. Jerome (1614) and several fresco and easel treatments of the life of St. Cecilia, patroness of music.

Domesday or Doomsday Book (1086). Latin record of a census and survey of most of England. It was compiled at the order of William the Conqueror. All property is described and evaluated in detail, along with a census of its inhabitants and its domestic animals, as of (1) the time of Edward the Confessor, (2) the time of William's brother, all of the estates on their owners, and (3) the time of the survey and future potential. Domesday means "day of judgment," and the records were probably so named because they were the final authority for property litigation; they served as the basis for tax assessments until 1522. Other similar records were often called the Domesday Book of a given locality; E. L. Masters used the title for a collection of verse (1920).

Dominic, St. (1170-1221). Spanish-born Roman Catholic priest and founder of the Dominican order. An important church official in his native Spain, he went to Languedoc in 1205 to preach orthodox doc-trine to the Albigenses, but, contrary to the tradi-tion, he was not an "inquisitor," nor did he take a personal part in the bloody massacre of the Albigenses, who held to the Manichaean heresy. In 1215, he organized his band of followers into the Dominical order, or Preaching Friars, devoted to missionary work.

Dominicans. The popular name for the Order of Preachers founded by St. Dominic in 1215. The most famous member of the Order was a theologian, St. Thomas Aquinas. The Dominicans early acquired the punning sobriquet Dominici canes (Lat., "dogs of the Lord") because of their swift and vigorous penetration into the life of the Church over all of Europe. In England they were formerly called Black Friars from their black dress, and in France Jacobins, because their mother establishment in Paris was in the rue St. Jacques.

Dom Juan ou le Festin de Pierre (Don Juan or the Stone Guest, 1665). A prose comedy by Molière. It is derived from the play El BURLADOR de SEVILLA Y EL CONVIDADO de PIEDRA of Tirso de Molina. The rake Don Juan abducts Elvire, marries her, and abandons her—not the first time he has so mistreated a woman. He then ironically invites the statue of a man he has murdered to dinner; the statue accepts and returns the invitation, and as it takes Don Juan by the hand a fiery chasm opens and swallows him. Molière added the character Elvire as well as many characteristic touches to this grim tale. There are scenes of sparkling comedy; the valet Sganarelle is timidity incarnate, and Don Juan assumes the traits common to the libertine nobility of Molière's day. Perhaps for this reason the play, though enormously popular, was suppressed. It was later put into verse by Thomas Cornelle.

Domus Aurea (Lat., "golden house"). A palace of the emperor Nero, at or near the site of the Colosseum. It was the scene of many banquetting orgies.

Doña Bárbara (1929). A novel by Rómulo Gallegos. The central character Doña Bárbara, as her name implies, symbolizes barbarism. Believing herself possessed of supernatural powers, she rules a vast domain on the Venezuelan llanos and bends men to her will through bribery, intimidation, and murder. Some saw in Doña Bárbara's rapacity and ruthlessness a resemblance to the practices of Juan Vicente Gómez, Venezuelan dictator when the book was published.

Donalbain. In Shakespeare's Macbeth, the younger son of Duncan, the murdered king, and the brother of Malcolm. He flees to Ireland after his father's death.

Don Álvaro o la fuerza del sino (1835). A romantic tragedy in prose and verse by Angel Saavedra, duque de Rivas. Don Alvaro, in love with Doña Leonor, accidentally kills the girl's father, then slays her two brothers in a duel. Before he dies, the younger brother kills Doña Leonor in the mistaken belief that she is the paramour of his father's mur-serer. Stricken with grief, Don Alvaro leaps to his death. This play was the basis of Verdi's opera La Forza del Destino (1862).

Donatello. Real name, Donato di Niccolò dei Bardi (1386-1466). Florentine sculptor. An associate of Filippo Brunelleschi and Lorenzo Ghiberti, he studied antique sculpture but rejected the serenity of its idealized beauty in favor of a more vigorous style. In stone and bronze, in reliefs and in free-standing statues admirably integrated with their architectural setting, he stressed power of expression and dramatic action. His masterpieces include The Boy David, the first large bronze free-standing nude since classical times, and the bronze equestrian statue of Gattamelata, also the first of its kind since antiquity.

Donation of Constantine. See Decretals.

Donatus. In full, Donatus de octibus partibus orationis. The most famous Latin grammar. It was named after its author Aelius Donatus, Roman grammarian of the fourth century, who was one of the instructors of St. Jerome.

Don Carlos (1787). A play by Friedrich Schiller, based on the life of the son of the Spanish king Philip II. Don Carlos's libertarian idealism is shared by the older and more experienced Marquis Posa, and the two plot against the tyrannical king. The prince, however, is suspected, and in order to save him, Posa contrives to draw all suspicion upon himself and is murdered by the king. Carlos is then offered his freedom, but in a last, unconsidered burst of idealism, he defies the king, and is turned over to the Inquisition for execution. The play is the basis of Verdi's opera Don Carlos (1867).

Don Flows Home to The Sea, The. See Quiet Don, The.

Don Giovanni (1787). An opera by Wolfgang Amadeus Mozart, with a libretro by Lorenzo Da Ponte. It deals with the adventures of the Spanish libertine Don Juan. After he and his servant Leporello have committed one piece of villainy after another, the statue of a nobleman Don Giovanni has murdered appears and takes him off to the infernal regions. It is regarded as one of the supreme works of art.

Doni, Anton Francesco (1513–1574). Florentine author and unfrocked priest. He is noted for his dialogues I Marmi (The Marble Steps) and I Mondi (The Worlds). The latter was influenced by the Utopia of Thomas More, the first example of an English Renaissance work stirring Italian imitation. Doni's work was, in turn, utilized by Campanella in his utopia, The City of the Sun.

Donizetti, Gaetano (1797–1848). Prolific Italian composer of operas. The best known are Don Pasquale (1845), Lucrezia Borgia (1833), Lucia di Lammermoor, and La Favorita (1840).

Don Juan. A legendary prodigal. The origin of the central theme of his widespread legend—that of a statue of a dead man who accepts a libertine's invitation to dinner—is not known. Its first appearance in any literary form was in Tirso de Molina's El Burlador de Sevilla (1630), which gave the hero the identity that he has retained ever since: Don Juan, a young nobleman of Seville. It also suggested the internal complications of his nature that have endlessly fascinated writers and composers. The name of Tirso's hero quickly became a synonym for an obsessive and unscrupulous pursuer of women.

The basic plot of this play soon reached France, by way of Italy, and was used in several plays, most notably Molière's Don Juan ou le Festin de Pierre, which introduced the figure of Elvire, Don Juan's wife. The attempts of English writers to treat Don Juan, such as Shadwell's The Libertine (1676), were unimpressive until G. B. Shaw included his "Don Juan in Hell" scene in Man and Superman. The only significant one of several Spanish versions of the legend after El Burlador de Sevilla was Don Juan Tenorio (1844), by José Zorrilla y Moral. Among the French versions after Molière's day were stories and plays by Prosper Merimée, Dumas père, Alfred de Musset, Balzac, and Flaubert. Pushkin wrote a short verse drama that closely followed the Don Juan legend, The Stone Guest (see Little Tragedies).

The most famous of all forms of the story is undoubtedly Mozart's great opera Don Giovanni, written to a libretro by Lorenzo da Ponte, although there were several slightly earlier operatic versions. Another outstanding musical work inspired by the Don Juan legend is Richard Strauss's tone poem Don Juan.

Don Juan (1819–1824). An unfinished epic satire by Lord Byron. Byron's Don Juan only slightly resembles the legendary Spanish rake. He begins his adventures in Spain, but is sent abroad at the age of 16 by his mother, Donna Inez. His ship is wrecked and he is cast up on a Greek island, where he is nursed back to health by the beautiful Haidee. Lambro, the girl's father, discovers the lovers together, captures Juan, and sells him as a slave to Gulbeyas, the sultana of Constantinople. However, Juan then falls in love with Duddy, a beautiful girl in the harem, and so arouses the jealousy of Gulbeyas that he barely escapes with his life. His next adventure takes him to Russia, where as a soldier he attracts the favor of the Empress Catherine. She sends Juan to England as a courier. The poem breaks off with Juan in England.

Don Juan is sprinkled with long digressions in which Byron, through his hero, gives his views on wealth, power, society, chastity, poets, diplomats, and England. It is written in ottava rima and even in its incomplete state contains 16,000 lines in its 16 cantos.

Don Juan in Hell. See MAN AND SUPERMAN.

Don Juan Tenorio (1844). A drama in verse by José Zorrilla y Moral. In Zorrilla's version of the Don Juan legend, the hero falls in love with the virtuous Doña Inés, repents of his sins, and is saved by her prayers on his behalf. Though Zorrilla himself deprecated his work, it is one of Spain's most popular plays and is regularly performed during the first week in November.

Donnay, Maurice (1859–1945). French playwright. Donnay began his dramatic career with humorous short pieces which he wrote for the Montmartre cabaret Le Chat Noir. A gay, quick wit characterizes his comedies, the best of which also contain psychological insight: Amants (1895), La Douloureuse (1897), L'Autre Danger (1902), and Paradise (1906). His problem plays, marked by a perceptive wit, include La Clarisse (1900) and Les Eclaireuses (1913), a study of feminism.

Donn-Byrne, Brian Oswald. See DON BYRNE, DONNE, John (1572–1631). English poet, first and greatest of the metaphysical poets. Donn was of good family, bred as a Roman Catholic, well educated in theology and law, and in his youth a lover of company and elegant women. In 1614, after a long period of hardship following his secret marriage to Anne More, and as his hopes of secular preferment waned, he was converted to Anglicanism. Ordained in 1615, he became dean of St. Paul's Cathedral six years later and possibly the most influential preacher in England.

Donne's best-known poetry falls into two classes, the early ironic and erotic verse and the later religious poems. In his verse satires and in such lyrics as Go And Catch a Falling Star (often entitled Song) and Woman's Constancy, Donne makes a witty display of worldliness, skepticism, and fickleness. Other poems, such as The Extaste, The Anniversaries, The Canonization, and Twickenham Garden, are moving expressions of passion or grief. Donne's love poetry is remarkable for its close analysis of the nature and psychology of love; in its emotional sophistication and highly personal tone, it differs markedly from the conventional courtly love poetry of Donne's day. The later religious poems powerfully express the yearning for union with God of a man obsessed with death, oppressed by his sense of human limitation and sin, by an almost invincible doubt of salvation. Among the most famous of these poems are the sonnets, Death Be Not Proud and Batten My Heart; Three Person'd God; and the Hymne to God the Father.

Donne also wrote numerous elegies, epigrams, and verse letters, many sermons, and the Devotions, an extraordinary series of meditations on the theme of sickness and mortality. This last prose work, together with The Anniversaries, reveals his preoccupation with the themes of mutability and death, the paradoxical human union of spirit and matter, themes which are crucial even in the love poems.

Donne's poetry is marked by intellectual power, deep learning, and intense emotion. His imagery, to which the adjective "metaphysical" was chiefly applied, is powerful and striking; it was drawn from Scholastic philosophy, the science of the day, trades and professions, and the simple, commonplace things of everyday life. His meter is irregular and dramatic, preserving the cadence and immediacy of ordinary speech.

Donne's poems were published in 1633 and were very popular and widely imitated during the next generation. He was almost unknown, however, during the 18th century and was disapproved of by Samuel Johnson. A few of the Romantics liked him, but it was only in the 20th century that interest in him was revived to any considerable extent. See CONCERT.

Donnithorne, Arthur. See Adam Bede.

Donnybrook Fair. A fair held near Dublin in August from the time of King John till 1855. It is noted for its bacchanalian orgies and light-hearted rioting. The name has become proverbial for a disorderly gathering.

Don Pasquale (1845). The title of a comic opera by Gaetano Donizetti.

Don Quixote (de la Mancha, El ingenioso hidalgo) (1605, 1615). A novel by Miguel de Cervantes Saavedra. Alonso Quijano is a gaunt country gentleman, kindly and dignified, who lives in the province of La Mancha. His mind is so crazed by reading romances of chivalry that he believes himself called upon to redress the wrongs of the whole world. Changing his name to Don Quixote de la Mancha, he is knighted by an innkeeper whose miserable hostelry he mistakes for a castle. As his lady love he chooses a peasant girl named Aldonza Lorenzo whom he transforms into Dulcinea del Toboso. Don Quixote now sails forth into the world but after several mishaps, including a beating administered by some merchants whom he challenges to a passage at arms, he returns to his home. Undaunted, he asks Sancho Panza, an ignorant rustic, to be his squire and promises to reward him with the governorship of the first lands they conquer. Riding Rocinante, a nag as bony as himself, Don Quixote sets out a second time, accompanied by Sancho on his ass Dapple.

During his travels Don Quixote's overexcited imagination invariably blinds him to reality: he thinks windmills to be giants, flocks of sheep to be armies, and galley-slaves to be oppressed gentlemen. Toward the end of the novel, Sancho is named governor of the isle of Barataria, a mock title given to him by some noblemen whose only aim is to make sport of the squire and his master. After being bested in a duel with the Knight of the White Moon, in reality a student of his acquaintance in disguise, Don Quixote, tired and disillusioned, returns to La Mancha, and shortly before his death, renounces books of knight-errantry.

The first part of Don Quixote, which may have been conceived while Cervantes was in prison, was first printed in 1605 in Madrid by Juan de la Cuesta. In 1614 a second part was published by an unknown author who used the pseudonym Alonso Fernández de Avellaneda. This bit of plagiarism, though not an unusual practice at the time, spurred Cervantes to complete his own sequel, which appeared the following year and is usually considered superior to the first part.

Although it is generally agreed that Cervantes meant his novel to be a satire on the exaggerated chivalric romances of his time, some critics have interpreted it as an ironic story of an idealist frustrated and mocked in a materialistic world. Others have seen it as a veiled attack on the Catholic church or on contemporary Spanish politics. To many, the contrasting figures of Don Quixote and Sancho Panza, the visionary idealist and the practical realist, symbolize the duality of the Spanish character. With its variegated assortment of minor characters, shepherds, innkeepers, students, priests, and nobles, the novel also gives a panoramic view of 17th-century Spanish society. At the same time its essential humanity has made it a universal favorite. See CLAVILÉNO.

Don Ramón. In D. H. Lawrence's The Plumed Serpent, a scholarly Mexican, the political, religious, and sexual hero of the novel.

Don Segundo Sombra (1926). A novel by Ricardo Güiraldes (1886-1927), Argentine novelist and short-story writer. Güiraldes was a wealthy cosmopolite who travelled widely, but Don Segundo Sombra reveals his native roots and draws on his childhood experiences at La Porteña, his family's ranch in Buenos Aires province. The narrator of the novel is a boy who runs away from the aunts who have raised him and attaches himself to Don Segundo Sombra, an itinerant ranch worker. During their five-year odyssey, Don Segundo not only teaches him to be an expert cowboy and horseman, but also shows him how to live with courage and honor, according to the gaucho code. After discovering that he is the illegitimate son of a wealthy rancher who has left him his estate, the narrator, by now a young man, acquires a measure of formal culture. Don Segundo, feeling that there is no longer need for his tutelage, goes on his lonely way. In this novel, considered the outstanding fictional example of gaucho literature, Güiraldes captured the essence of the gaucho myth in his scenes of life on the pampas and, above all, in the idealized figure of Don Segundo.

Dooley, Mr. See Finley Peter DUNNE.

Doolittle, Hilda. Pen name, H.D. (1886-1961). American poet. Miss Doolittle went to Europe in 1911 where she became acquainted with poets practicing imagism, the movement with which her own name and work are primarily identified. She married the English poet Richard Aldington and thereafter lived abroad. Her work shows the influence of the Greek classics and is distinguished for its simplicity, clear, and precise visualizations of scenes, images, and objects. Sea Garden (1916), her first book of poetry, was followed by Hymen (1921); Heliodyora and Other Poems (1924); Collected Poems (1925 and 1940); Hippolytus Temporizes (1927), a verse tragedy; and The Flowering of the Rod (1946). Helen in Egypt (1961), a book-length poem, was published posthumously. She also wrote fiction, usually dealing with historical themes, as in Palimpsest (1926) and Hedylus (1928).

Doomsday Book. See DOMESDAY BOOK.

Doon. A river in Ayrshire, Scotland, celebrated in the poems of Robert Burns.

Doon de Mayence. A medieval cycle of chansons de geste about the heroes opposed, at least part of the time, to Charlemagne. They include the histories of Ganelon, Ouer the DANE, and the Four Sons of Aymon.

Doppelgänger (Ger., doppel, double; gänger, walker). The ghostly or spiritual double of a living being, the appearance of which supposedly presages that person's imminent death. The Doppelgänger theme is a favorite with German romantic authors and has been treated by E. T. A. Hoffmann and Heinrich Heine; the latter's poem, Der Doppelgänger, was set to music by Franz Schubert.

Dora. See Dora Spенlow.

Doralice. In the Orlando poems of Boiardo and Ariosto, the daughter of King Storiliano of Granata and the betrothed of Rodomonte, whom she deserts for Mandricardo, thus causing a fatal discord in the camp of the pagan warriors opposed to Charlemagne and his paladins.

Dorante. The unscrupulous nobleman in Molière's Le Bourgeois Gentilhomme. He flees the social-climbing M. Jourdain of a great deal of his wealth under the pretext of offering him social advancement.

Doré, [Paul] Gustave (1833-1883). French illustrator and painter. He is famous for masterly and imaginative illustrations of such classics as the works of Rabelais, Balzac, Dante, Cervantes, and the Bible.

Doria, Andrea (c. 1468-1560). Genoese admiral; called "Father of Peace" and "Liberator of Genoa." In 1551 his name was given to a luxury liner of the Italian Line, that sank (July 25, 1956) during a transatlantic crossing after having been rammed by the S.S. Stockholm. The name is also that given to one of the main characters in Schiller's Fiesko.

Dorian or Doric. Pertaining to the Dorians, traditionally the last of the groups of tribes who invaded Greece in pre-Classical times. The so-called Dorian invasion, probably from the North, early in the 12th century B.C., put an end to the Mycenaean era and was long thought to have caused a protracted Dark Age, although the process is now considered to have been much less clear-cut and complete than was formerly supposed.

In Classical times, Doric attitudes were identified with solidarity and simplicity, as in the "Doric order" of architecture characterized by plain, chaste forms. The "Dorian mode" in music, a scale that may be reproduced by playing all the white notes from one D to the next on a piano, was regarded by Plato as being conducive to sobriety and other virtues needed by the citizen of an ideal state. See GREEK MUSIC.

Dormouse. the. The mouse in Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. He is thrust into a teapot by the Hatter and the March Hare. The word dormouse probably means "sleeping mouse" (from Fr., dormir, "to sleep").
Dorotea, La (1632). A prose romance in dialogue by Lope de Vega. He called it "the most beloved of my works." The novel is partly autobiographical, and the Dorotea of the title is the actress Elena Osorio, with whom Lope had an affair and whom he called Filis in other works. He wrote the book at an early age but revised it years later, including details of his liaison with Marta de Neavres. La Dorotea was influenced by Læcelsina, whose main character is reincarnated in Lope's work by Gerarda.

Dorotea, St. A martyr under Diocletian about 303. She is represented with a rose branch in her hand, a wreath of roses on her head, and roses with fruit by her side; sometimes with also an angel carrying a basket with three apples and three roses. The legend is that Theophilus, the judge's secretary, scoffingly said to her, as she was going to execution, "Send me some fruit and roses, Dorotea, when you get to Paradise." Immediately after her execution, while Theophilus was at dinner with a party of companions, a young angel brought to him a basket of apples and roses saying, "From Dorotea in Paradise," and vanished. Theophilus, of course, was a convert from that moment. The story forms the basis of Massinger's tragedy, The Virgin Martyr (1622).

Dorr Rebellion (1842). A rising in Rhode Island led by Thomas Wilson Dorr (1805–1854) to revise the state constitution, which severely restricted suffrage. In 1842 Dorr was elected governor by the reformers, while Samuel King was chosen at the regular elections; thus the state had two separate governments, Dorr basing his authority on the power of the people. The movement collapsed after Dorr's attempt to seize the state arsenal was frustrated by King, who had declared martial law. A constitution providing for nearly universal suffrage was adopted in 1843.

Dos Passos, John (1896– ). American novelist. Best known for his trilogy U.S.A. (q.v.), Dos Passos was one of the group of Harvard writers who graduated shortly before World War I. With E. E. Cummings, who had also gone to Harvard, and Ernest Hemingway, who had not, Dos Passos joined the Norton-Harjes Ambulance Service during the war. From this experience came his first important novel, Three Soldiers.

After the war he was a newspaperman and freelance writer. His next novel, Manhattan Transfer, was a major step toward the technical perfection of his later trilogy. The work also reveals the conflict between Dos Passos' concern for individual liberty and his social conscience which was to remain characteristic of his work as a writer. In the late 1920's, he turned to the theater with three plays noted for their "movie" technique: The Moon Is a Gong (1926), Airways, Inc. (1928), and Fortune Heights (1933). In 1930, Dos Passos published The 42nd Parallel, the first novel of his trilogy, 1919 (q.v.) and The Big Money completed the series, which was published as U.S.A. in 1938. A massive achievement, the trilogy is noted for its technical brilliance and mastery of language. Combining such special devices as the "newsreel" and the "camera eye" with many short, well-written biographies and the narrative proper, U.S.A. is a vast panorama of American life; indeed, the country itself is its subject and protagonist.

Dos Passos began a new trilogy, which was later published under the single title District of Columbia (1952), with Adventures of a Young Man. This saga of the Spottswood family also includes Number One (1943) and The Grand Design (1949). This trilogy and The Ground We Stand On mark a change in Dos Passos' social and political attitudes; always concerned with the freedom of the individual, he became much more conservative during this period. His books of nonfiction include State of the Nation (1944), Tour of Duty (1946), The Prospect Before Us (1950), Chosen Country (1951), The Theme Is Freedom (1956), The Great Days (1958), Prospects of a Golden Age (1959), and Midcentury (1961).

Dostoevski, Feodor Mikhailovich (1821–1881). Russian novelist. One of the most outstanding and influential writers of modern literature, Dostoevski was born in Moscow, the son of a doctor and the second of eight children. When he was 16 years old, Dostoevski's mother died. A year later, he was enrolled in the Military Engineering School in St. Petersburg. His elder brother Mikhail had also applied, but was turned down by the medical examiners. Young Dostoevski was left alone, in an atmosphere uncongenial to his nature, without Mikhail, his closest friend, and with what he considered an insufficient allowance. His letters to his father begin to sound a note that is to be heard often in his later correspondence: his desperate need for more money. Another problem was his work at the school; drawing plans for military fortifications interested him far less than reading literature. Before his graduation (1843), Dostoevski had already decided that his career would not be that of a military engineer. He remained in the army's service just a little over a year after graduation; he then resigned and took up his lifelong occupation as a writer.

Dostoevski's first publication (1844) was a translation of Balzac's novel Eugénie Grandet. Meanwhile, he was working on a novel of his own, a work in epistolary form entitled Poor Folk. The manuscript reached the leading critic of the day, Vissarion Belinski, probably by way of Dostoevski's friend Dmitri Grigorovich and the poet Nikolai Nekrasov. Belinski read the work and launched into ecstatic praise of it. Poor Folk perfectly fulfilled his idea of what literature should be; it showed compassion for the poor and downtrodden and succeeded in stirring the reader's humanitarian feelings. Belinski's approval was enough to insure Dostoevski's reputation as a talented new writer. The novel was published (1846) in the Petersberg Miscellany (Petersburgski sbornik), edited by Nekrasov. A few weeks later Dostoevski's second work, The Double, appeared. This short novel, a study of a poor clerk's mental disintegration, was less pleasing to both critics and public. In 1846, Dostoevski also published a short story, Gospodin Prkharchin (Mr. Prkharchin). The critical acclaim at first given Dostoevski's work was not sustained; The Double, Mr. Prkharchin, and Khosayka (The Landlady, 1847) were all failures in Belinski's estimation. The adverse criticism strained Dostoevski's relations with Belinski and the circle of young writers surrounding him, including Nekrasov and Ivan Turgenev—the feud with Turgenev becoming a lifetime preoccupation of Dostoevski.

A more serious problem than bad reviews or literary feuds began at about this time for the young author: the onset of the epileptic attacks that were to plague him throughout his life. Some writers, including Sigmund Freud, have speculated that these attacks actually began earlier, about the time Dostoevski’s father was murdered by his serfs (1844). This theory holds that the attacks were a form of self-punishment for Dostoevski’s supposed wish for his father’s death and that his later gambling mania was similarly caused. The preoccupation with the theme of paricide in Dostoevski’s last novel, The Brothers Karamazov, is also evidence of Dostoevski’s feeling of guilt, according to this view.

In 1848, Dostoevski published three short stories: Slabyye serdaсhe (A Faint Heart), Chestnyi vor (The Honest Thief), and Belye nochi (White Nights). In the last of these stories, the emphasis on the unreal, miragelike quality of St. Petersburg foreshadows a theme that was developed further in some of his later works. At this time, Dostoevski was also working on a novel, Netochka Nesvanova, but he never completed it. It was during this year that he became involved with a group of young intellectuals headed by Mikhail Vasilevich Petrashevski (1819–1867). The Petrashevski circle, as the group was known, met to read and discuss the works of the French Utopian socialists and other political and social topics forbidden open discussion by the Czarist regime. In 1849 the members of the group were arrested. They were charged, among other things, with having read the banned Belinski letter to Nikolai Gooor and of having conspired to set up a secret printing press. After eight months in prison, during which time he wrote another short story, Malenkiy gorod (The Little Hero), Dostoevski was taken with his alleged fellow conspirators to the site of their execution. At the very last moment, they were informed that their sentence was actually to be exile and imprisonment in Siberia. The shattering experience of the near execution never left Dostoevski. He used the episode in his novel The Idiot, and mentioned it in his journalistic writings.

Dostoevski was sentenced to four years in the labor camp at Omsk, after which he was obliged to enlist for a four-year term in the army, most of which time he served at Semipalatinsk. These years have been described by Dostoevski as vitally important ones for his development as a writer. His enforced contact with the convicts at Omsk gave him a knowledge of the Russian lower classes, possessed by no other Russian author. During his prison term the only book allowed him was the New Testament, which he read constantly and which directed his thoughts toward the religious view of life so prominent in his novels. The fruits of his observations and thoughts in the Omsk prison were contained in his The House of the Dead.

While serving his army term, Dostoevski met and, after hectic courtship, married (1857) the widow Marya Dmitrievna Isyeyeva. In 1859 he was allowed to resign from the army and to return to European Russia, settling first in Tver and then returning to St. Petersburg. While still in Siberia, he had begun writing again, and he arrived in St. Petersburg with two short novels: Dyadushkin son (Uncle’s Dream) and A Friend of the Family, both published in 1859. In 1861 his brother Mikhail began to publish the journal Vremya (Time). In this periodical Dostoevski published the novel The Insulted and Injured in which one of his major ideas, the beneficial effects of suffering, was first enunciated. He also serialized his House of the Dead in the journal. In the summer of 1862, Dostoevski made his first trip to Europe, visiting Paris, London, and Geneva. His impressions of what he saw were contained in Zametki o letnikе upechatleniyakh (Winter Notes on Summer Impressions, 1863).

The journal Vremya was suppressed by the government in 1863, because of an unfortunate article on the Polish rebellion of that year. Dostoevski, who had been editing the publication, made his second trip abroad at this time. This time, however, he had a companion, Apollinariya (Polina) Suslova, a young woman who had contributed a short piece to Vremya in 1861. Dostoevski’s relations with his wife had been strained for some time. Whether Polina was a cause or a result of this situation is unclear. It is certain, however, that Polina was a torment to him. She was reputedly Dostoevski’s model for “the infernal woman” whom he depicted in his later novels. On the trip through Europe, Dostoevski visited the gambling houses at Wiesbaden, Germany, where he gave in to the mania that, for some years, it was to continue to trouble him.

Returning to Russia (1864), Dostoevski became editor of the new journal published by his brother. In this periodical, Epokha (Epoch), appeared Notes from Underground, the work that is generally cited, because of its artistic excellence and psychological acuteness, as the first of Dostoevski’s mature writings. Dostoevski wrote the work while tending his dying wife, who was, at last, succumbing from consumption which had long afflicted her. Shortly after her death, Dostoevski had another blow: the death of his brother Mikhail. Left with the care of Mikhail’s family as well as with that of his own stepson, he labored desperately to make Epokha a successful publication. The conservative political slant he gave the journal lessened its popularity, however, and in 1865 the venture had to be abandoned. Dostoevski made another trip to Europe where he again met Polina, did some gambling, and worked on a novel he hoped would pull him out of his financial predicament. This work, Crime and Punishment, was published in 1866. In the same year Dostoevski published a short novel, The Gambler. The deadline for this work was fast approaching, and the novelist had to hire a stenographer to take down the work in shorthand and transcribe it. The girl hired for this job, Anna Grigoryevna Shitkina, became Dostoevski’s second wife in 1867. The couple went abroad again, this time to Dresden, Baden-Baden, and Geneva, always in financial straits made worse by Dostoevski’s intermittent gambling sprees. On the trip to Geneva, they stopped off in Basle where Dostoevski saw Holbein’s painting Dead Christ in the museum. The strong impression of the work prompted Dostoevski to include a discussion of it in the novel he was then writing. This work, published in serial form in 1868, was The Idiot. The effort involved in attempting to portray the saintly Myshkin in the novel was made more agonizing by the death of his infant daughter Sonya, who died at the age of three months.

During 1869, Dostoevski and Anna moved restlessly about Europe, from Switzerland, to Italy, to Austria, and finally to Dresden again. There a second daughter, Lyubov, was born. Dostoevski was at work during this period on one of his best short novels, The Eternal Husband. At the same time he was making preliminary notes for a massive work, to be contained in several novels, that would deal with the religious problems which had been the center of his thought for some years. The work was to be "the life of a great sinner," tracing his early growth, his falling away from faith, and his ultimate redemption. The broad scope of ideas contained in the plan was to include all of Dostoevski's late novels.

Stavrogin, the sinister hero of The Possessed, could be taken as a depiction of the great sinner who had lost his faith, as could Ivan Karamazov, Arkadi, the young hero of A Raw Youth, in some respects resembles the nascent sinner, who has not yet set out on the journey through the "furnace of doubt" that leads to religious faith. The idea of the movement into the world and back to faith is also present in The Brothers Karamazov.

After his return to Russia (1871), Dostoevski again entered journalistic work, editing the weekly Grazhdanin (The Citizen), in 1873-1874. In 1876 he published the first part of his Diary of a Writer. This publication, which was also issued in 1877 and in 1880-1881, contained articles on political, social, and literary topics, as well as some original short stories, including Krolyaya (A Gentle Spirit, 1876) and Son smeshnogo cheloveka (The Dream of a Ridiculous Man, 1877). These last years of Dostoevski's life were financially the easiest ones he had known. Professionally he was also at his peak, especially after the publication of The Brothers Karamazov. The climax of his long career came with his speech at the Pushkin celebration in Moscow in 1880, in which he cited the poet as a model of his own ideas about the unique, all-embracing universality of the Russian character. In January, 1881, Dostoevski died in St. Petersburg.

Since his death Dostoevski's reputation has steadily grown as one the greatest writers in literary history. The acuteness of his psychological perceptions and analyses have amazed later experts in psychology, including Freud. Dostoevski's philosophical profundity has provided a rich field of investigation and imitation for writers and philosophers. His range of philosophical ideas and approaches has led to his being acclaimed as a forerunner by such diverse groups as Russian Orthodox thinkers and atheistic existentialist writers. With Tolstoj Dostoevski ranks as a supreme master of the realistic novel which is Russia's major contribution to literature. Dostoevski's artistic methods have until recently received less attention than his psychological and philosophical ideas. That he was above all a master artist has been attested by readers the world over and, perhaps more convincingly, by other great novelists who have an intimate knowledge of the craft of fiction.

In his own country, Dostoevski has less public recognition than he has in other countries. His well-known animus toward socialism, his emphasis on religion and on the irrationalism in the psychological processes of the individual mind have made him unattractive to the rulers of Soviet literary opinion, particularly during the most rigid periods of intellectual censorship under Stalin. As better ways are found to explain away embarrassing aspects of Dostoevski's work, Soviet publishers will undoubtedly tend to reprint his novels more often.

Double, The (Dvoinik; 1846). A short novel by Feodor Dostoevski. The Double is a fantastic tale, similar in style and manner to some of Gogol's work, particularly to Diary of a Madman, which also depicts the mental disintegration of the hero. Yakov Petrovich Golyadkin, the hero of The Double, is a lowly civil servant who awkwardly and unsuccessfully pursues the daughter of his employer. After some cruel rebuffs, a strangeness enters Golyadkin's world and another Golyadkin, his absolute double, appears on the scene. Where the old Golyadkin had fumbled, the young Golyadkin is adroit. He is soon a favorite in exactly the way the first Golyadkin yearned to be. The nightmare ends when Golyadkin is taken away from his phantoms to the madhouse.

At the time of its publication, The Double aroused no enthusiasm in the critics. They were more interested in work which made some kind of social comment, such as Dostoevski's Poor Folk, than they were in depictions of the processes of psychological breakdown. The influential critic Belinski was especially displeased with the work and began to rue his earlier high praise of the author.

Doughty, Charles Montagu (1843-1926). English traveler and writer. He is best known for his Travels in Arabia Deserta (1888), an account of two years of tribulation and wandering in Arabia notable for its vivid picture of Bedouin life and its curious, intriguing style, which combines English words and phrases with many Arabic expressions. Doughty also wrote a number of poems—which share some of the peculiarieties of his prose—of which the best known is the lengthy The Dawn in Brittain (1906).

Douglas. A family in Scottish history, legend, and romance. There were two branches: the Black Douglases, or senior branch, and the Red Douglases, who came to the fore later. They are prominent in Sir Walter Scott's novels, notably the following:

(1) Sir James, the first of the Black Douglases. See James Douglas.

(2) Archibald the Grim, natural son of "the Good Sir James." He is prominent in The Fair Maid of Perth.

(3) James Douglas, earl of Morton, one of the Red Douglases. He figures prominently in The Monastery and The Abbot.

Douglas, Lord Alfred (1870-1945). English poet, noted as a sonnet writer. His relationship with Oscar Wilde provoked his father, Lord Queensberry, to action that led to Wilde's conviction for homosexual practices. See De Profundis.

Douglas, Gawain or Gavan (1474-1522), Scottish poet, bishop of Dunkeld. He was the author of The Palace of Honor (printed c. 1553) and King
Dowland, John

Hart (first printed in 1786), two allegorical poems, and a translation of the Aeneid (completed 1513), which is called the earliest translation of a Latin classic into English. Dowland was a member of the group called the Scottish Chaucerians.

Douglas, James. Called Black Douglas (1286–1330). In the days of Robert Bruce and Edward II, Douglas invaded England and plundered many towns and villages in the North. In his History of Scotland, Scott writes: "It was said that the name of this indefatigable and successful chief had become so formidable that women in the northern countries, used to still their forward children by threatening them with the Black Douglas." He destroyed an English garrison three times, and it is on one of these incidents that Scott based his novel Castle Dangerous.

Douglas, Lloyd C[assell] (1877–1951). American novelist. A clergyman, Douglas was over 50 when he published his first book, Magnificent Obsession (1929), and thereafter he published several best-selling novels of a piously didactic, inspirational character. Perhaps the best known of these is The Robe (1942), the story of what happened to Christ's robe after the Crucifixion. Other novels are Precious Jeopardy (1933), Green Light (1935), White Banners (1936), Disputed Passage (1939) and The Big Fisherman (1948).

Douglas, [George] Norman (1868–1952). English novelist and travel writer. Best known for the novel South Wind, Douglas lived for many years on the island of Capri and in Italy and other Mediterranean countries, and made these the settings for his books. An art lover and a scholar (biologist, geologist, archaeologist, and classicist), he was also a hedonist and a skeptic. His interests are uniquely blended in his books. In Siren Land (1911), his first book, he established his style. It is a traveler's lively description of Sorrento and Capri, interspersed with learned, fantastic, and lightly satirical essays. Fountains in the Sand (1912) is about Tunisia, and Old Calabria (1913), considered his best travel book, is about southern Italy. The novels They Went (1920) and In the Beginning (1927) are fantasies about mankind's early history. Among Douglas's other books are London Street Games (1916); Birds and Beasts of the Greek Anthology (1927); Some Limericks (1928); How About Europe? (1929), a claim that Christianity is causing the decay of our society, and Looking Back (1933), a fragmentary autobiography.

Douglas, Stephen A[rnold] (1813–1861). American statesman, known as the "Little Giant." After holding several state offices in Illinois, Douglas was elected to Congress in 1843 and to the U.S. Senate in 1847. He introduced the Kansas-Nebraska Act, which incorporated the principle of popular sovereignty, but lost the support of Southern Democrats when he opposed the proslavery Lecompton constitution for Kansas, which he claimed violated popular sovereignty. During his famous debates (1858) with Abraham Lincoln when both were candidates for the Senate, Douglas formulated his "Freeport doctrine," maintaining that the people of a territory might admit or exclude slavery because slavery could not exist unless it was supported by local police regulations. Although Douglas won the Senate seat, the Freeport doctrine further alienated Southerners and probably cost him their backing for the 1860 Democratic nomination. In 1860 Douglas was the presidential candidate of Northern Democrats and lost to Lincoln.

Douglas, William O[ville] (1898– ). American jurist and author. Beginning as a high-school teacher in Yakima, Wash., Douglas then studied law, practiced in New York City, and taught at Columbia and Yale universities. He entered government service in 1929 and was appointed to the U.S. Supreme Court by President Roosevelt 10 years later.

Several of his books, based on trips abroad, give expert reports on political conditions and vivid depictions of foreign scenes; these include Strange Lands and Friendly People (1951), Beyond the High Mountains (1952), and North from Himalaya (1953). Douglas, an outdoor man and a lover of nature, also wrote My Wilderness: The Pacific West (1960). Among his other works are An Almanac of Liberty (1954), America Challenged (1960), A Living Bill of Rights (1961), and Mr. Lincoln and the Negroes (1963).

Douglass, Frederick (1817–1895). American abolitionist, orator, and journalist. The son of a Negro slave and a white father, Douglass escaped to the North in 1838. A speech he delivered at an antislavery convention in Nantucket in 1841 made such an impression that he was soon in great demand as a speaker. Mobbed and beaten because of his views, he described his experiences in an outspoken Narrative of the Life of Frederick Douglass (1845). After a two-year stay in Great Britain, where he earned enough money to buy his freedom, he founded The North Star, a newspaper which he published for 17 years, advocating the use of Negro troops during the Civil War and civil rights for freedmen. He held various public offices after the war.

Doukhobors. See Dukhobors.

Dove Cottage. The house where Dorothy and William Wordsworth made their home, from 1799 to 1807, at Grasmere in the English Lake District. See LAKE POETS.

Dover Beach (1867). A poem by Matthew Arnold expressing his pessimism with regard to the future of the modern world and advocating personal fidelity and love as the rather desperate substitute for the ebbing "sea of faith":

Ah, love, let us be true
To one another for the world, which seems
To lie before us like a land of dreams,
So various, so beautiful, so new,
Hath really neither joy, nor love, nor light... .

Dowden, Edward (1843–1913). Anglo-Irish essayist, poet, and critic. He is known chiefly for his numerous books on Shakespeare such as Shakespeare, His Mind and Art (1873), A Shakespeare Primer (1877), and Introduction to Shakespeare (1893). He was also the author of a notable Life of Shelley (1860).

Dowland, John (1563–1626). Composer and lutenist. Dowland was born in Ireland and died in London, but spent much of his life in France, Germany, and Denmark. He ended his days as lutenist to the King of England. A man of melancholy temperament, Dowland is accounted the greatest lutenist the world has ever known, and his compositions for lute, and for voice and lute, are the finest of their type.
Downing Street. A name often given to the heads of the British Government collectively, from No. 10 Downing Street (Westminster), the official town residence of the Prime Minister, where the meetings of the Cabinet are usually held.

Downsall. A common name for a sweetheart, especially an unsophisticated country girl, in poems of Elizabethan times. It is from the French douce et belle, sweet and beautiful. Michael Drayton wrote a poem called The Ballad of Downsall (1606).

Dowson, Ernest [Christopher] (1867–1900). English poet. Dowson is best known for his poem Cynara, properly entitled Nom Sum Qualis Eram Bonae Sub Regno Cynarae.

Doyle, Sir Arthur Conan (1859–1930). English novelist, known chiefly for his series of tales concerning Sherlock Holmes. Also noteworthy are his historical novels, Michah Clarke (1888) and The White Company, and his imaginative fantasy The Lost World (1912). The Holmes stories, conceived to augment Doyle's income from an unsuccessful medical practice, quickly made their author famous. At one point, tiring of the detective, Doyle attempted to exterminate him in The Memoirs of Sherlock Holmes (1894), but the clamor of his admirers forced him to resurrect Holmes for several further volumes, and his popularity has waned little since. Doyle was much interested in the occult, and wrote a History of Spiritualism (1926). Among his finer characters are Professor Challenger and Brigadier Gerard.

Drachenfels (Ger. dragon-rock). The home of the dragon slain by Siegfried in the Nibelungenlied.

Drachman, Holger (1846–1908). Danish poet. At first, Drachman joined the "Modern Awakening" movement led by Georg Brandes and wrote poems of passionate sympathy for suffering laborers. Among his early collections are Doempede Melodier (1875), Ungdom i Dig og Sang (1879), Ranker og Roser (1879), and Prinsessen og det halve kongerige (1878). In the 1890's, however, he turned his lyric gifts to new ends and produced the romantic, patriotic verse of such collections as Dybe Streng (1884), Sangenes Bog (1889), and Unge Viser (1892).

Draco (Draken; fl. 650 n.c.). An Athenian legislator. In 621 n.c. he was given extraordinary power to codify the laws of Athens for the first time. His work was designed to replace individual revenge with public justice. His code was known for its severity, and was said to have been written in blood, rather than ink. The death penalty was prescribed for several crimes, and cases of murder were to be tried by the Areopagus. Under Draco's Code, debtors could be claimed as slaves. Solon abolished the Code except for the law relating to murder.

Drakon. A mythical beast. Found in the mythology and folklore of innumerable peoples, it was commonly conceived of as a kind of large serpent of hostile disposition. In its earliest forms, it was a monster sea serpent, perhaps suggested to the primitive mind by the undulating surface and unruly habits of rivers and seas. The first known example is the Sumerian Kur, though its precise appearance is not clear from the three extant myths in which he or she appears. Kur, like all dragons, seems to have existed mainly to be killed by a hero; the Sumerian champions who accomplished this feat were Enki, Ninurta, and the goddess Inanna.

The basic theme of the sea dragons slain by a hero was developed further by the Babylonian conquerors of Sumeria in the story of the War of the Gods, in which the primeval sea, Tiamat, the mother of the gods, is regarded as a dragon; she is killed by the hero Marduk. Among the Canaanites it is Baal, the storm god, who subdues Yam, the dragon of the sea. The Hebrew Yahweh is similarly credited with the destruction of the leviathan, of Rahab, and of simply "the dragon." Several Greek heroes slay dragons that are also associated with water and with the Near East. Perseus rescued Andromeda from a sea monster in Canaan; the Canaanite Cadmus killed a dragon that guarded a spring at Thebes. The Hydra, as the name implies, was also a water creature, and Heracles had many Near Eastern connections. Even the famous feat attributed to St. George is an echo of the Perseus myth, for George killed his dragon at Lydda very near to Joppa, where Perseus' dragon ravaged the land.

Another common class of dragons guarded sacred places. This notion may have sprung from the widespread belief that the dead returned as serpents (Cadmus, himself, became one) and were often venerated as such. Sacred snakes were associated with many oracles, including that at Delphi, and for such religious festivals as the Thesmophoria at Athens. Dragons (Gr. drakon, snake) guarded the apples of the Hesperides and the Golden Fleece. The less benevolent dragons of northern Europe guarded hoards of treasure, which were wrested from them by such heroes as Beowulf and Sigurd (Siegfried).

The dragons of the Chinese and Japanese mythology are totally different from the hostile varieties. Powerful spirits of air, sea, and earth, they are generally benevolent and are responsible to a considerable degree for the orderly functioning of natural phenomena.

Among the many Christian saints who are usually pictured with dragons may be mentioned St. Michael; St. Margaret; St. Sylvestre, the pope; St. Samson, archbishop of Dol; St. Donatus; St. Clement of Metz; St. Romain of Rouen, who destroyed the huge dragon, La Gargouille, which ravaged the Seine; St. Philip the Apostle, who killed another at Hierapolis, in Phrygia; St. Martha, who slew the terrible dragon, Tarasque, at Aix-la-Chapelle; St. Florent, who killed a dragon that haunted the Loire; St. Cado, St. Maudet, and St. Pol, who did similar feats in Brittany; and St. Keyne of Cornwall.

Among the ancient Britons and Welsh the dragon was the national symbol on the war standard; hence the term, Pendragon for the duell bellorum, or leader in war (pen = head or chief). See Fafner; Grendel.

Dragontina. In the Orlando Innamorato of Boiardo, an enchantress who rules the Island of Forgetfulness. At one point in the story, Orlando is her prisoner until rescued by Angelica, who needs him to defend her fortress at Albacca.

Drake, Sir Francis (1540?–1596). First English circumnavigator of the globe. After sailing as a privateer against Spanish vessels in the West Indies, Drake in December, 1577, set off on his round-the-world voyage. He passed through the Straits of Magellan, up the coast of South America, and as far as 48° north latitude along the North American coast, which he named New Albion and claimed in the name of Elizabeth. He then sailed to Celebes, around the Cape of Good Hope, and back to England, returning in October of 1580. He fought against the Spanish Armada in 1588, and died in the course of an expedition to the West Indies.

Drake, Joseph Rodman (1795–1820). American poet and satirist. Drake studied medicine but after obtaining his degree opened a pharmacy in New York City. His early death from tuberculosis prevented his full development as a poet. With Fitz-Greene Hall, Drake composed the witty Crooker Papers; he is best known for the posthumously published tale in verse called The Culprit Fay (1835). A nature fantasy, the poem tells the story of a fay who loved a mortal maiden. Another well-known poem is the eulogy, The American Flag (1819). Drake is buried in the New York City park that was named in his honor.

Drake, Temple. A character in William Faulkner's Sanctuary and Requiem for A Nun. A 17-year-old college student in Sanctuary, Temple is a provocative and irresponsible girl who invites by her actions the rape she half fears and half desires. Playing the part of the victim, she subsequently allows herself to be kept at a brothel by Popeye and purges herself at the murder trial of an innocent man, less out of malice toward the accused than out of indifference. In Requiem for A Nun, she persists in her former attitudes by refusing, until the very end, to see herself as anything but a respectable woman wronged by circumstance.

dramatic irony. A theatrical device, consisting in the conscious production by the author of an ironical situation, i.e., a marked incongruity between a character's words and the action; as for instance in Schiller's Wallenstein when the hero (not aware of the plot on his life of which the audience has been informed) says before going to bed: "I intend to take a long rest." The understanding of the unintentional play on words imparts to the audience for a moment the role of "an omniscient god of the drama."

dramatic unities. See unities.

Draper's Letters (1724–1725). A series of pamphlets by Jonathan Swift, purporting to be from the pen of a linen draper, "M. B. Draper." They attack a patent for coining halfpence granted to William Wood by King George I and Sir Robert Walpole without the consent of the Irish Parliament, and advise the Irish not to accept the coinage. Although Wood's halfpence were certified a sound coinage, the scheme was defeated after severe riots by the Dublin mob.

Draupadi. In Hindu legend, daughter of king Drupad and wife of the five Pandava brothers (in the Mahabharata). In the epic, she is a strong-willed, proud character, whose outrage at being disrobed in the palace hall by Duryodhana is one of the major factors in leading up to the battle of Kurukshetra, when the Pandavas take revenge on Duryodhana.

Draupnir. In Scandinavian mythology, a magic ring, the symbol of fertility, made for Odin by the dwarfs. Every ninth night it dropped eight rings equal in size and beauty to itself.

Drayman Henschel (Fuhrmann Henschel; 1898). A drama by Gerhart Hauptmann. A man has promised his late wife to be faithful to her memory. However, he is trapped into marriage by the machinations of his ambitious housekeeper. Oppressed and bullied by her, he finally commits suicide.

Drayton, Michael (1563–1631). English poet. Born in the same county (Warwickshire) as Shakespeare, he matched the master in the range, if not the quality, of his poetic achievement. Always experimenting and continually revising, Drayton wrote sonnets, dramas, odes, mythological poems, satires, pastoral, and historical verse narratives. His works include Idea, the Shepherd's Garland (1593); Idea's Mirror (1594), a sonnet sequence; England's Heroical Epistles (1597); Polyalbion, a poetical survey of the topography of England; Nymphidia, a charming minor epic set in a fairy atmosphere; Idea, a completely revised version of his earlier sonnet sequence; and The Muses Elyzium (1630). Drayton also wrote a number of plays that have not survived. According to one tradition, it was as a result of a "merry meeting" with Drayton and Ben Jonson that Shakespeare contracted the illness that resulted in his death.

Dream Children: A Reverie (1822). One of the best-known essays of Charles Lamb, prompted by the death of the author's brother James. In it, Lamb describes an imaginary conversation held with the children he has never had. See Alice W-N.

Dream of Gerontius. A. A poem by John Henry Newman in which Gerontius makes his last journey to God, carried by his guardian angel through a world of good and evil spirits. A Dream of Gerontius has been set to music in the form of an oratorio by Sir Edward Elgar (1900).

Dream of the Red Chamber. See Hung Lou Meng.

Dream of the Rood, The. Old English religious poem, one of the finest, of 156 lines in alliterative verse. A fragment of it is inscribed (early eighth century) on a stone cross in Scotland, and the Verceilli Book has a complete version (late ninth century). The poem lyrically describes dreaming that the Rood, or True Cross, speaks to him about its own history and urges him to promote its cult. Then he tells how the dream has changed his life, alluding to Christ's life in his own prayer for heavenly reward.

Dreams, the gates of. Two gates in Hades, one of ivory and one of horn. Dreams that delude pass through the ivory gate, those that come true pass through the gate of horn. This fancy depends upon two puns: ivory in Greek is elephas, and the verb eliphairo means to cheat with empty hopes; the Greek for horn is keras, and the verb karanoo means to accomplish. Anchises dismissed Aeneas through the ivory gate, on quitting the infernal regions, to indicate the unreality of his vision.

Dreamy Story, A (Skuchnaya istoriya; 1889). A story by Anton Chekhov submitted From the Notebook of an Old Man. The story is usually regarded as the starting point of Chekhov's mature writings. In it he introduces the theme of the difficulty of real communication between people, which he was to take up in many of his later works. The old man of the tale, Professor Nikolai Stepanovich, realizes as his life draws to a close that he has lived his years without a unifying ideal to make a whole of his personal, professional, and social relationships. As he reviews it, his life seems fragmented, aimless, and worthless. The same kind of despair is experienced by his young ward Katya. Because neither can really communicate with the other, both the professor and Katya are left to endure their agonies singly.

Dred Scott decision (1857). A U.S. Supreme Court decision in the case of Dred Scott (1795–1858), a Negro slave who had been taken by his master from Missouri to Illinois and Wisconsin, where slavery was prohibited. After his return to Missouri, Scott sued for his liberty on the basis of his residence in free territory. Deciding against Scott, the court held that he was not a citizen of the U.S. and therefore could not bring suit in a federal court, and that the Missouri Compromise, which forbade slavery in Wisconsin, was unconstitutional because it deprived persons of their property (i.e., their slaves) without due process of law. The decision was bitterly attacked by Northern abolitionists because it declared in effect that slavery could not be barred from the territories.

Dreigroschenoper, Die. See Threepenny Opera, The.

Dreiser, Theodore [Herman Albert] (1871–1945). American novelist. Dreiser is known as one of the principal exponents of American naturalism; though many critics have inveighed against the clumsiness and crudeness of his style, the power and importance of his work cannot be denied. The son of a highly religious father and a sensitive and loving mother, Dreiser knew poverty from an early age and was later to react strongly against organized religion. After a year at the University of Indiana and a career as a newspaperman in Chicago, St. Louis, Pittsburgh, and New York, he submitted his first novel, Sister Carrie, to Doubleday, Page & Co. Read by Frank Norris, who was very enthusiastic, the novel was accepted for publication, only to be withdrawn later after only 1,000 copies had been printed (but not distributed) when Doubleday himself objected to the book's frankness and its lack of conventional moral viewpoint.

Dependent about Sister Carrie, Dreiser contemplated suicide, but was guided by his brother Paul into a very lucrative position with the Butterick publications; in a few years he had become head of the firm. After a 10-year interval, Dreiser published Jennie Gerhardt. Like Sister Carrie, it is an absorbing study of a fallen woman. The Financier began "the trilogy of desire," the story of a captain of high finance, Frank Cowperwood. Influenced by the evolutionary theories of Herbert Spencer and by Nietzsche's concept of the superman, Dreiser still managed to combine with these ideas a poetic sense of the mystery and beauty of the universe. While these ideas are subordinate in The Financier and The Titan, in the final work of the trilogy, The Stoic (1947), they assume great importance.

The "genius," the most autobiographical of all Dreiser's novels, is generally considered one of his least successful works. During this period Dreiser also published three autobiographical books: A Traveler at Forty (1913), A Hoosier Holiday (1916), and A Book About Myself (1922; later republished as Newspaper Days). Hey-Rub-a-Dub-Dub: A Book of the Mystery and Terror and Wonder of Life was published in 1919.

In 1925 came An American Tragedy, a book based on the famous case of Chester Gillette's murder of Grace Brown. In 1927, Dreiser visited Russia, publishing after his return the two books that marked his acceptance of socialism and the rejection of his former despairing emphasis on fate and determinism: Dreiser Looks at Russia (1928) and Tragic America (1931). From this point on Dreiser concerned himself more and more with socialism and left-wing politics.

The Bulwark, which was begun as early as 1910, was published posthumously in 1946, and The Stoic, the last of the Cowperwood trilogy, in 1947. Both show the influence of the mystic strain which, although present in Dreiser's character from the beginning, became pronounced in his last years. Other works include Plays of the Natural and Supernatural (1916), Free and Other Stories (1918), The Hand of the Potter (1919), Twelve Men (1919), The Color of a Great City (1923), Moods (1926), A Gallery of Women (1929), Fine Furniture (1930), and Epitaph (1930).

Drepiane. See Phaeacians.

Dressler, Marie (1873–1934). The stage name of Lelia Koerber, a Canadian-born American comedienne. She had great success on the stage and in motion pictures, mainly in broad comic roles that were lifted out of mediocrity through the honesty and warmth of her personality. She made famous a song, Heaven Will Protect the Working Girl.
Dreyfus, Alfred (1859–1935). Central figure in the famous Dreyfus case which divided France for almost four years. An officer in the French artillery of Jewish descent, Captain Dreyfus was accused and convicted of having betrayed military secrets. In 1894 he was sent to Devil's Island to serve a life imprisonment sentence. Evidence attesting to the innocence of Dreyfus and to the guilt of a Major Esterhazy was uncovered but suppressed by the military. Dreyfus was finally pardoned in 1906 by the Cour de Cassation. He transcended, however, his individual significance, becoming a symbol of injustice for liberal intellectuals who vigorously opposed right-wing reactionary forces such as the military and the church. Emile Zola wrote the letter J'accuse, and many other men of letters were ardent Dreyfus supporters. In A la recherche du temps perdu, Marcel Proust gives an excellent picture of the alignment of French opinion on the controversial case.

Dr. Faustus, The Tragic History of (first performed in 1588; first published in 1604). A play by Christopher Marlowe. The yearning for the infinite that characterizes Marlowe's heroes is embodied in Dr. Faustus, the seeker after power and knowledge. The legend of the scholar who sells his soul to the Devil becomes a powerful portrait of a man torn by conflicting desires. In a scene that borrows from earlier morality drama, a good and bad angel, external representations of internal conflict, battle over the soul of Faustus. Despite the moral at the end, which advises the wise to heed the awful fate of Faustus, Marlowe's attitude throughout is one of sympathy and understanding for the boundless longings of his hero. See Faust.

Drinkwater, John (1882–1937). English poet, dramatist, and biographer. His poetry belongs to the Georgian school. He wrote historical and biographical plays, such as Abraham Lincoln (1918) and Mary Stuart (1921). Inheritance (1931) and Discovery (1932) are autobiographical volumes. Drive of Europe (Fr., cocher de l'Europe). The designation the empress of Russia used for the duc de Choiseul (1719–1785), minister of Louis XV, because he had spies all over Europe, and thus ruled its political cabals.

Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. See Strange Case of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde, The.

Dromio of Ephesus and Dromio of Syracuse. In Shakespeare's Comedy of Errors, the merry identical twins who are the servants of the identical twins Antipholus of Ephesus and Antipholus of Syracuse. The twin Dromios are roundly beaten and sent hither and yon in the confusion which results when they and their masters, unbeknownst to each other, end up in the same city.

Dropping the Pilot. The title of a political cartoon in the English magazine Punch by Sir John Tenniel. It dramatized the resignation of Bismarck after his disagreement with Kaiser Wilhelm II in 1890. Bismarck, as the old pilot, solemnly leaves his ship while the youthful emperor, now in sole command, watches.

Droste-Hülshoff, Annette von (1797–1848). German poetess. She is remembered especially for ballads in which she combines vivid renderings of natural scenes from her Westphalian homeland with a swift, subtle narrative gift and a compact use of language. Another side of her nature, deeply religious, is seen in the collection Das geistliche Jahr (The Spiritual Year, 1851). Her famous novella, Die Jüdenbuche (The Jews' Beech Tree, 1842), though set in a simple rustic atmosphere, is psychologically deep and succeeds in evoking a powerful sense of mystery about the workings of fate.

Drugger, Abel. A character in Ben Jonson's comedy The Alchemist (1610). A seller of tobacco, he is artless and gullible in the extreme. He is building a new house, and comes to Subtle the “alchemist” to know on which side to set the shop-door, how to dispose the shelves so as to ensure most luck, on what days he may trust his customers, and when it will be unlucky for him to do so.

Druid. A member of the ancient Gaulish and British order of priests, teachers of religion, magicians, or sorcerers. The word is the Lat. druidae, or druides (always plural), which was borrowed from the Old Irish drui and Gaelic draoi. Practically our only literary sources of knowledge of the druidic cult are Pliny and the Commentaries of Caesar, which say that the rites of the Druids were conducted in oak groves and that they regarded the oak and the mistletoe with peculiar veneration; that they studied the stars and nature generally; that they believed in the transmigration of souls, and dealt in “magic.” Their distinguishing badge was a serpent's egg (see Daumr's egg), to which powerful properties were credited. The order seems to have been highly organized, and, according to Strabo, every chief had his druid, and every chief druid was allowed a guard of thirty men.

In Samuel Butler's Hudibras there is an allusion to the Money by the Druids borrowed,
In t'other world to be restored.

This refers to a legend recorded by one Patricius (St. Patrick?) to the effect that the Druids were wont to borrow money to be repaid in the life to come.

Druid's egg. A fabled egg hatched by the joint labor of several serpents, and buoyed into the air by their hissing. The person who caught it had to ride off at full speed, to avoid being stung to death; but was sure to prevail in every contest, and to be courted by those in power. Pliny says he had seen one of them, and that it was about as large as a moderate-sized apple.

Drummond, William Henry (1854–1907). Irish-born Canadian poet and physician. Drummond is best known for his verse in French-Canadian dialect about rural life in Quebec. These poems are a mingling of humor and sentiment, at times slightly satirical. Collections of his work include The Habitant and Other French-Canadian Poems (1897) and Johnnie Courteau and Other Poems (1901).

Drummond of Hawthornen, William (1585–1649). Scottish poet. Owner of an extensive library and ardently Royalist in politics, he translated French and Italian lyric poetry, especially the works of Ronsard, Passerat, and Desportes. His own verse, which includes Flowers of Zion (1623), is known for its grace and smoothness. He also left interesting notes on Ben Jonson's conversation during the latter's visit to Hawthornen in 1618.
Drums Along the Mohawk (1936). A historical novel by Walter D. Edmonds. The bitter struggle in the Mohawk Valley between the supporters of the American Revolution and their British foes is vividly portrayed. Stress is laid on the destructiveness of the Tories and their Indian allies. The novel is based on the kind of careful research that Edmonds describes in How You Begin a Novel (Atlantic Monthly, Aug., 1936).

Drury Lane. A street in London named after Drury House, which was built by Sir William Drury in the time of Henry VIII. The street has been the site of several theaters of the same name, the first of which was built by Thomas Killigrew in 1663 as the Theatre Royal and was described by Samuel Pepys. After it was destroyed by fire in 1672, a new theater, designed by Christopher Wren, was erected on the site of the present Drury Lane Theatre and was opened in 1674.

Druses. A people and sect of Syria living south of Damascus near the mountains of Lebanon and Anti-Libanus. Their unitarian faith combines Moslem, Christian, Jewish, and Sufist ideas. They offer devotions both in mosques and churches, worship the images of saints, and observe the fast of Ramadan. Their name is probably derived from that of their first apostle, Ismail Darazi or Durzi (11th century A.D.).

Browning wrote a tragedy, Return of the Druses (1841).

Dryad. In Greek mythology, a tree nymph. Originally, the dryads were specifically oak-nymphs (dryas, oak), but the name came to be applied to all tree nymphs. Nature spirits who died with the trees they inhabited, they were also called hamadryads. The most famous of them, perhaps, was Eurydice, the wife of Orpheus.

Dryden, John (1631–1700). English poet, dramatist, and critic. He was the outstanding figure in letters during the Restoration and literary dictator of his age.

Dryden came from a good, but imperious, country family with a Parliamentary and Church of England background. In his middle 20's he went to London, where his gifts were quickly recognized in intellectual circles, though he had to struggle for years to earn a respectable living by means of his plays and translations. Dryden made several radical shifts in his religion and politics: in 1659 he eulogized Cromwell in the Heroic Stanzas; a year later he celebrated Charles II in Astraea Redux; in 1682 he published Religio Laici, a defense of Anglicanism; five years later The Hind and the Panther revealed him as an ardent partisan of Catholicism and Catholic James II. In 1688, however, he refused to take an oath of allegiance to William and Mary, remaining loyal to James II at the cost of important offices, including the laureateship of England.

Dryden's earliest work, such as his elegy Upon the Death of Lord Hastings (1650), is in the extravagant late metaphysical vein of Cowley. Soon he developed a more restrained and natural style, close to normal cultivated speech and employing the heroic couplet to emphasize its finish and point. This was to be the dominant poetic style for a century, though perhaps never again more forceful and various than it was in Dryden's hands. It was partly used by Charles II, and particularly well-adapted to satirical and didactic works, such as the Religio Laici, Religio Laci, and The Hind and the Panther. Dryden also used it in his translations of Virgil and other Latin poets and in a number of his plays, although his greatest play, All for Love, is written in blank verse. His prose writings are also of great importance: the orderly, lucid, and masculine style which distinguishes his prefaces and critical essays, such as the Essay of Dramatick Poesy, became one of the chief models for modern prose. These works reveal Dryden as an acute and extraordinarily sensible critic.

In addition to those referred to above, the following poems by Dryden also deserve mention: the lyrics To Mrs. Killigrew (1686), A Song for St. Cecilia's Day (1687), and Alexander's Feast (1697); a number of longer poems, such as Annus Mirabilis; and his paraphrases and translations of Chaucer, Boccaccio, Ovid, Juvenal, Lucretius, and Homer. Other memorable plays by Dryden are The Indian Emperor (1665), Almanzor and Almahide, or The Conquest of Granada (1670), Aurenzebee (1675), and Don Sebastian (1690). See John SHEFFIELD.

Dryope. In Greek legend sister of Iole and wife of Andraemon. For having plucked inadvertently the lotus into which the nymph Lotos had been changed, Dryope herself was changed into a lotus.

Dry Salvages, The. See FOUR QUARTETS.

Du. In Egyptian mythology, one of the abodes of the dead in the underworld through which the sun passed by night.

Du Barry, Comtesse. Marie Jeanne Bécu (1743–1793). Adventuress and mistress of Louis XV from 1768 to his death (1774). She ruled both king and court, and was famous for her prodigality as a patron of artists and men of letters. She was guillotined on Dec. 7, 1793.

Du Bellay, Joachim (1522–1560). French poet. A companion of Ronsard at the Collège de Coqueret in Paris, Du Bellay was one of the founders of the Pléiade and author of its poetic program: DÉFENSE ET ILLUSTRATION DE LA LANGUE FRANÇAISE. His melancholy nature easily lent itself to the Petrarchan type of idealized love then in vogue, a tendency reflected in his first work, L'Olive (1549), the first French collection of sonnets. Yet the following year he produced A une Dame, a biting satire of this very convention. In 1553, illing and downcast at his failure to win royal favor, he accompanied his cousin Cardinal Du Bellay to Rome as his secretary. He approached Rome with the reverence of a confirmed Latinist and left it four years later greatly disillusioned. Upon his return to France in 1558, he published four volumes of Poëmata, written in Latin in the style of the Italian humanists; Les Antiquités de Rome, in which he exalted ancient Rome; Les Regrets, in which he bitterly satirized the mediocrity of contemporary Rome and expressed his regrets over his self-imposed exile; and the Divers jeux rustiques, in which he freed himself from his cares and relaxed into pastoral pieces and sensual love poems. The Poète courtisan (1559) was a last embittered satire on the court poets. Second only to Ronsard in the eyes of his contemporaries and posterity, Du Bellay could not reconcile himself to this position and harbored a jealousy which he did not always attempt to hide.

Dubliners (1914). A collection of short stories by James Joyce. By dealing successively with incidents in the childhood, adolescence, maturity, and public life of Dubliners, Joyce provides a picture of the paralyzing world from which he fled. Most of the characters and scenes are mean and petty, sometimes tragic; they are drawn from ordinary Catholic middle-class life. The style simple and moving, more in the manner of Antonio Chekhov than in that of the author's more famous works. In all the stories, Joyce uses a device he named the EPHEPHANY, having a sudden remark, symbol, or moment that epitomizes and clarifies the meaning of a complex experience. Among the best known of the stories are These Sisters, Counterparts, Clay, Ivy Day in the Committee Room, and The Dead. Several of the characters introduced in Dubliners reappear in Ulysses.

Joyce had difficulty in finding a publisher for his book, and it did not appear until many years after it had been written. It was severely attacked because the names of actual persons and places in Dublin are mentioned in it.

Du Bois, William Edward Burghardt (1868–1963). American writer, editor, and teacher. The descendant of a French Huguenot and an African slave, Du Bois was trained as a sociologist and did much to promote greater understanding of Negroes. The Souls of Black Folk (1903), a collection of essays, is his best-known work. He wrote many other works, among them The Negro (1913), Black Folk: Then and Now (1930), Color and Democracy (1945), In Battle for Peace (1952), and The Black Flame, A Trilogy, which consists of The Ordeal of Mansas (1957), Mansas Builds a School (1959), and Worlds of Color (1961).

Du Bos, Charles (1882–1939). French critic. Du Bos combined Catholicism with the influence of Walter Pater to become a leading commentator on the literary production of his time. Much of his thought is collected in Approximations (7 vols., 1922–1937) and his Journal Intime (8 vols., 1946–). Duccio di Buoninsegna (c. 1260–1319). Italian painter. He was the founder of the Sienese school of painting and is noted for the refinement and delicacy of his style. His masterpiece is the Virgin in Majesty, (1311), a panel in the cathedral of Siena; equally celebrated scenes from the life of Christ are to be found on its reverse side.

Duchamp, Marcel (1887–1968). French painter of the Dada movement. His Nude Descending a Staircase (1912) caused a sensation at the Armory Show. His brother, Raymond Duchamp-Villon (1876–1918), was a cubist sculptor.

Duchess, the. A character in Lewis Carroll's Alice's Adventures in Wonderland. The duchess wallops her baby till it howls and sings this lullaby to it:

Speak roughly to your little boy,
And beat him when he sneezes;
He only does it to annoy,
Because he knows it teases.

Duchess of Malfi, The (c. 1613). A tragedy by John Webster. The last of the great Elizabethan dramas, it deals movingly with the disastrous marriage of a noblewoman and a commoner. The duchess, the widowed sister of Ferdinand, duke of Calabria, and of the cardinal, offends them by marrying her steward, Antonio. The lovers are forced to separate: Antonio flees, and the duchess is kept prisoner in her house, where she is subjected to mental torture. Bosola, the cardinal's henchman, strangles the duchess and her children and later murders Antonio. The play is based on William Painter's The Palace of Pleasure (1566–1567).

Duclos, Charles Pinot (1704–1772). French historian, moralist, and man of letters. On succeeding Voltaire as historiographer of France in 1750, he wrote Mémoires pour servir à l'histoire des moeurs du XVIIIe siècle (1751). He also wrote novels and short stories, including Histoire de la baronne de Luxembourg (1741), and Les Confessions du comte de . . . (1741). As secretary of the French Academy, he supervised the 1762 edition of its famous dictionary.

Du côté de chez Swann. See Remembrance of Things Past.

Dudintzhev, Vladimir (1918– ). Russian novelist. His novel, Not By Bread Alone, created a sensation with its criticism of the Soviet bureaucracy. Dudintzhev was attacked by Soviet critics in violent terms until Khrushchev, in May, 1959, finally put an end to the prolonged controversy by declaring that Dudintzhev was not an enemy of the regime, but had merely erred in his efforts to criticize some aspects of Soviet society. Since that time Dudintzhev has issued only a short work entitled A New Year's Tale (Novogodnaya skazka), which Western critics have hopefully interpreted as another anti-Soviet jibe. The work, however, is obscure, and Dudintzhev's intention cannot easily be discerned.

Dudley, John, duke of Northumberland (1502–1553). Protector of Edward VI. In an attempt to transfer the crown from the Tudor dynasty to his own family Northumberland persuaded the dying Edward VI to will the succession to Lady Jane Grey, Northumberland's daughter-in-law. After the attempt to place Queen Jane on the throne failed, he was executed.

Dudley, Robert, earl of Leicester (1531–1558). Favorite of Elizabeth I. The brother of Guildford Dudley (the husband of Lady Jane Grey), Robert Dudley was condemned to death after the attempt to place Lady Jane on the throne had failed. He was pardoned by Elizabeth I and became Master of Ordnance and one of her chief favorites at court. She made him a Knight of the Garter, created him Earl of Leicester, and gave him a castle at Kenilworth. His wife, Amy Robsart, died under somewhat suspicious circumstances, but there is no proof that her death—which freed Leicester to marry Elizabeth if she would have him—was anything but accidental. He is a main character in Sir Walter Scott's novel Kenilworth.
Dudone. On of the paladins of Charlemagne in the Carolingian stories centered about Orlando. He also appears in the Morgante Maggiore of Pulci and the poems of Orlando of Boiardo and Ariosto. In the latter’s Orlando Furioso he is given the command of a complete navy magically created by Astolfo. Dudone’s new fleet then routs the pagan army sailing with Agramante their leader to fight the Christians. In the Gerusalemme Liberata of Tasso, he is Dudone of Consa (Conte), one of the adventurers among the crusading knights. When he is killed by the pagan warrior Argente, the Crusaders withdraw from battle to honor his corpse.

Dudu. In Lord Byron’s narrative poem Don Juan, one of the beauties of the harem into which Juan has been admitted in female attire. Next day, the sultana, out of jealousy, orders that both Juan and Dudu be stitched in a sack and cast into the sea; but, by the connivance of Baba, the chief eunuch, they effect their escape.

Duessa. An evil enchantress in Spenser’s Faerie Queene (Books I, II, and V), representing variously the Roman Catholic Church, Mary Tudor, and Mary, Queen of Scots.

Dufay, Guillaume (c. 1400-1474). Flemish (Belgian) composer. He lived and worked in Italy, Savoy, Burgundy, and Flanders. At the end of his life, Dufay was the most highly regarded composer in Europe. His finest music was written for the church. It was he who first established the practice of having polyphonic music sung by a chorus; hitherto each part had been performed by a single voice or instrument.

Dufresny, Charles Rivière (1648-1724). French playwright and novelist. His Amusements sérieux et comique d’un Siameux (Serious and Comic Amusements of a Siamese, 1699), which criticized French institutions by the then novel device of recounting the reactions to Paris of a visiting Siamese, did much to set the fashion and establish the pattern for similar works, notably Montesquieu’s Lettres Persanes. Among his plays, Le Chevalier Joueur (The Gambling Knight, 1697), which dealt realistically with the gambling mania, and the comedies L’Esprit de Contradiction (The Spirit of Contradiction, 1700) and Le Double Veuve (The Double Widow, 1702) were the most successful.

Dufy, Raoul (1877-1952). French artist, painted still lifes, harvest, street, and racetrack scenes. He developed a distinct style of briefly drawn details and fresh colors.

Duhamel, Georges. Pen name Denis Thévenin (1884-1924). French dramatist, novelist, critic, and poet. A leading member of the Abbaye Group, Duhamel then turned to the theater and wrote The Light (1911), In the Shadow of Statues (1912), and Combat (1913). He also published The New Book of Martyrs (1917) and Civilisation, stories of World War I. Duhamel’s works also include two long novel series, the cycle of Salavie (3 vols., 1920-1933) and the Pasquier Chronicles (10 vols., 1933-1945). His essay The Heart’s Domain (La Possession du monde; 1919) urges, as do his novels, the cultivation of the inner life on which is based the fraternity of mankind. He won the Prix Goncourt in 1918 for Civilisation.

Duino Elegies (Duineser Elegien; 1923). A series of poems by Rainer Maria Rilke. They are elegiac in mood, though not, strictly speaking, in form and meter. In them, Rilke develops his own, highly personal solution to some of the human problems posed by Existentialism, without, however, committing himself as a follower of that school of philosophy and poetry. “Duino” is the name of a castle near Trieste where Rilke, in 1911-1912, was a guest of the Princess Marie von Thurn und Taxis, to whom he presented the poems.

Dujardin, Edouard (1861-1949). French writer. A poet and a distinguished editor, he allied himself with the symbolists. He is known for his influential novel Les Lauriers sont coupés, the first example of interior monologue.

Dukhobors or Doukhobors (Russ. Dukhobortsi, “spirit wrestlers”). A religious sect that arose among Kharkov peasants in the mid-18th century. Guided by “inner light,” they rejected the authority of Church and State, and led communal lives under “inspired” leaders. Their beliefs have been compared to those of Quakers. Internal dissensions and resistance to military service subjected them to a series of forced migrations and dispersals.

Thousands removed to western Canada in 1898, where they founded prosperous if turbulent settlements as the “Christian Community of Universal Brotherhood.” Their sporadic protests against taxes and compulsory education (especially those led by the violent “Sons of Freedom”) have taken the form of fires, bombings, and marches in the nude, which abated in the late 1950’s after a new threat of expulsion.

Dulce et Decorum Est (1920). A poem by Wilfred Owen, bitterly denouncing war. The title is ironic, being a quotation from Horace: Dulce et decorum est pro patria mori (It is sweet and fitting to die for one’s country).

Dulcinea del Toboso. The lady love of Don Quijote in Cervantes’ novel. Her real name is Alondza Lorenzo, but the knight dubbed her Dulcinea del Toboso. “Her flowing hair,” says the knight, “is of gold, her forehead the Elysian fields, her eyebrows two celestial arches, her eyes a pair of glorious suns, her cheeks two beds of roses, her lips two coral portals that guard her teeth of Oriental pearl, her neck is alabaster, her hands are polished ivory, and her bosom whiter than the new-fallen snow.” According to Sancho Panza, she is “a stout-built sturdy wench, who could pitch the bar as well as any young fellow in the parish.”

Duley (1921). A comedy by George S. Kaufman and Marc Connelly. It is based on a character created by the columnist Franklin P. Adams. In the course of her well-meaning, self-appointed task of helping her husband put through an important business deal, Duley makes one blunder after another, but her efforts unexpectedly turn out all right.

Dull, Anthony. A dull-witted constable in Shakespeare’s Love’s Labour’s Lost. He becomes the butt of the pedantic wit of Holofernes and Sir Nathaniel and understands absolutely nothing of what they say.

Dullin, Charles (1885-1949). French actor, director, and producer. Associated with Jacques Copeau in the Théâtre de Vieux-Colombier, Dullin founded his own company at the Théâtre de l’Atelier in 1921. He stressed poetry and fancy on the stage, rather than a naturalistic portrayal of reality. Dullin produced plays by a wide variety of playwrights, among them Marcel Archard, Stéve Passeur, Armand Salacrou, Jules Romains, and Pirandello.

Duma. Russian parliamentary body created in 1905. Its function was to advise Czar Nicholas II in matters of legislation. It was overthrown by the Russian Revolution (1917).

Duma. See DUMAS.

Dunain. In Shakespeare's Love's Labour's Lost, one of the three young lords who join the king of Navarre in an oath of celibacy and study. He becomes enamored of Katherine.

Dumas, Alexandre. Known as Dumas fils, or the younger (1824-1895). French dramatist. The natural son of Alexandre Dumas the novelist, the younger Dumas became an extremely popular playwright during the Second Empire. In technique his plays were realistic; for subjects he chose moral and social problems, depicting the adulterous intrigues and financial scandals of the upper social classes. Among Dumas's most successful works were: La Dame aux Camelles, Le Demi-Monde (1855), La Question d'argent (1857), Un Père Prodigue (1859), L'Ami des Femmes (1864), Les Idées de Mme Aubray (1867). Heavy-handed didacticism characterized his later dramas.

Dumas, Alexandre. Known as Dumas père (1802-1870). French novelist and dramatist. Alexandre Dumas has become almost legendary for his prolific literary output (almost 300 volumes), and the rollicking gusto with which he lived and wrote. Dumas maintained a corps of collaborators—whom he termed his factory—who were engaged in searching through earlier memoir writers for suitably exciting plots. Accused of altering historical fact to suit his fictional purposes and of pilfering unscrupulously from other writers, Dumas remained supremely indifferent to such charges. His historical romances, all of the swashbuckling variety, include such favorites as The Count of Monte Cristo, The Three Musketeers, The Black Tullip, The Viscount of Bragelonne, and Twenty Years After. Critics point quickly, and rightly, to the excessive melodrama of Dumas's work, to his lack of psychological perception, and to his careless style, but the color and drama of his novels continue to insure their popularity. In France Dumas is noted for his plays: Henri III et sa cour (1829), Napoléon Bonaparte (1831), Antony (1831), and La Tour de Nesle (1832).

du Maurier, Daphne (1907— ). English novelist and short-story writer. Her popular novels, composed of melodrama, romance, the scenery of Cornwall, and some history, include Jamaica Inn (1936), Rebecca (1938), Frenchman's Creek (1942), Hungry Hill (1943), The King's General (1946), My Cousin Rachel (1951), and The Glass-Blowers (1963). She is a granddaughter of George du Maurier and daughter of the actor Sir Gerald du Maurier (1873-1934). Her Gerald, A Portrait (1934) is a biography of her father.

du Maurier, George [Louis Palmella Busson] (1834-1896). English novelist and illustrator. He illustrated the work of Thackeray, Hardy, James, and Meredith, and was famous for his caricatures in Punch. His novels, Peter Ibbetson, the highly successful Trilby, and The Martian (1896), are tinged with social satire and colored with the memories of the author's days as an art student in Paris. He also wrote light verse in English and French, which was popular in its day.

Dumbwaiter, The (1960). A one-act play by Harold Pinter. The two characters are assassins waiting in a hotel room for their victim to arrive. When an order for a Chinese meal is sent to them on the dumbwaiter they assume that their room was once a restaurant. They fill the order as best they can with candy and biscuit. They are deluged with orders for food from an unknown person who they feel is testing them. As the time approaches for the killing one of the assassins, a questioning, childish person, starts to feel remorse for their other victims. He leaves the room; when he returns, his partner kills him.

Dumuzi. A Sumerian shepherd-god, known elsewhere as Tammuz. He was loved by Inanna (Ishtar). Although he does not appear in the extant Sumerian myth of her descent into the underworld, the close parallel with Ishtar’s search for Tammuz makes it highly likely that that was the purpose of Inanna’s descent.

Dumuzi also is a central figure in a myth in which he, a shepherd, disputes with the farmer god Enkimdu for the favor of Inanna. Although Dumuzi is elsewhere her lover, she here prefers the farmer. This is one of several Sumerian myths with an obvious parallel to the story of Cain and Abel.

Dunbar, Paul Laurence (1872-1906). American poet. Dunbar is noted for his highly skilled use of Negro themes and dialect. Writing at a time when literary regionalism was in vogue, he was undoubtedly influenced by Thomas Nelson Page. Although he was the son of a slave, his poetry is sentimental and lacks the bitterness of the work of later Negro writers. Lyrics of Lowly Life (1896) is his most famous collection. It was followed by Lyrics of the Hearthside (1899), Lyrics of Love and Laughter (1903), and Lyrics of Sunshine and Shadow (1905). He also wrote novels, including The Uncalled (1898) and The Sport of the Gods (1902).

Dunbar, William (1465?-1530). Scottish poet. For a time he was a Franciscan friar and later a diplomatic agent for James IV of Scotland. His works include The Thistle and the Rose (The Thistle and the Rose, 1503), a political allegory; The Dance of the Seven Deadly Sins (1503-1508), a religious dream vision; The Goldyn Targe (c. 1508), an allegory in the tradition of The Romance of the Rose; Lament of the Makaris (i.e., poets; c. 1508), an elegy on the death of great poets of the past that has been compared to the poetry of François Villon; and The Two Marryt Women and the Wedo (c. 1508), a satire on women. Dunbar is considered one of the greatest of the Scottish Chaucerians.

Dunbar. In Shakespeare's Macbeth, the generous and gracious king of Scotland whom Macbeth murders to attain the crown. When prodded by his wife to do the deed, even Macbeth protests against it, extolling Duncan's virtues:

Besides, this Duncan Hath borne his faculties so meek, hath been
So clear in his great office, that his virtues
Will plead like angels trumpet-tongued against
The deep damnation of his taking-off.
Duncan, Isadora (1878-1927). American dancer. She was acclaimed in London, Paris, and on the Continent, and established a German school of dancing near Berlin in 1904 and later one in Moscow. In 1926-1927, she wrote her autobiography, entitled My Life. She choreographed compositions by Tchaikovsky and Chopin. She was strangled in an automobile accident when her scarf was caught in a wheel.

Duncan, Robert [Edward] (1919- ). American poet. At one time an editor of the Experimental Review and of Phoenix, Duncan has been influential among the younger poets both as an artist and a theorist. His work is highly distinctive and is characterized by lyricism, irony, and intensity. Collections of his poetry include Selected Poems (1959) and The Opening of the Field (1960).

Dunciad, The (1728: final version, 1743). The "dunce-epic," a satire in heroic couplets by Alexander Pope. The first version, in three books, was written under the influence of Swift; it attacked all critics of Pope's works, poetasters, publishers, and pedants. In 1729 this version, with changes, was republished as The Dunciad Variorum. A fourth book, The New Dunciad, appeared in 1742 and the final version, The Dunciad in Four Books, was published a year later. In the first book, the leading role was initially given to Lewis Theobald, but in the final version it is Colley Cibber who is named king of the Dunces, his rule extending over the empires of Empines and Dullness. The second book, a burlesque of the account of funeral games for Anchises in Vergil's Aeneid, depicts Cibber's coronation; it is celebrated with games and contests, and as everyone drowses off to sleep, poetry-reading. In the third book, Cibber fails asleep and sees, in his dreams, the past, present, and future; in all three, Dullness prevails. In the fourth book, Dullness reigns supreme over scholarship, art, and science. The goddess of Dullness, thus firmly entrenched, gives directions to her several agents to encourage foolish and trifling pursuits and to discourage thought, and night and chaos are finally restored. The Dunciad is considered by many to be among Pope's crowning achievements, and, in spite of its topicality, its satire is still fresh and biting.

Dunne, Finley Peter (1867-1936). American journalist and humorist. Dunne worked for several newspapers in his native Chicago, writing his first "Mr. Dooley" essays for the Evening Post. Later he became part owner of the American Magazine, to which he contributed a pungent department entitled "In the Interpreter's House," and was editor of Collier's (1918-1919).

Dunne's fame rests entirely and solidly on his creation of Martin Dooley, an imaginary Irishman who presided over a small saloon on Chicago's West Side. Dooley was modeled, Dunne said, on a saloon-keeper named James McGarry. In his earlier pieces Dunne called his philosophic barkeeper Col. McNeevy, but when McGarry objected to the too-ready identification, Dunne changed the name to Dooley.

From the days of the Spanish-American War to World War I, Mr. Dooley reviewed public men and affairs with a wit and wisdom that made him a national institution. He made his remarks to his faithful friend and customer, Malachi Hennessey. Possibly Mr. Dooley's most famous utterance was, "Whether th' Constitution follows th' flag or not, th' Supreme Court follows th' illiction returns." "There's only one thing," said Dooley elsewhere, "that would make me allow meself to be a hero to the American people, and that is it don't last long."

Dunne wrote more than 700 essays about Mr. Dooley, some of which were collected in Mr. Dooley in Peace and War (1899), Mr. Dooley in the Hearts of his Countrymen (1899), and other books. Mr. Dooley Remembers: The Informal Memoirs of Finley Peter Dunne (1963) was edited by his son Philip Dunne.

Dunne, John William (1875-1949). English author of An Experiment with Time (1927) and The New Immortality (1938). These books of popular philosophy purported to demonstrate, through mathematics, the immortality of the soul and the principle of serialism (that the individual passes through a single sequence of time as he lives, but all other times and places exist simultaneously always). His books influenced J. B. Priestley and others.

Dunsany, Lord. Edward John Moreton Drax Plunkett (1878-1957). Irish dramatist and poet. A member of the Anglo-Irish gentry, he was educated at Eton. After service in the Boer War (1899-1902), he became active in the newly founded Abbey Theatre. In 1909 his play The Glittering Gates was produced at the Abbey by William Butler Yeats and won quick acclaim. This was followed by a number of other successes, many of them one-act plays, the best known of which are A Night at an Inn (1916), his finest play; The Laughter of the Gods (1916); and If (1922). Superficially his work appears to be merely the naive expression of Celtic whimsy with the usual assortment of fairies and other supernatural creatures. Dunsany, however, employed this background to satirize human behavior with a dismaying simple, seemingly unconscious, wit.

Duns Scotus, John (c. 1265-c. 1308). Scottish scholastic theologian, known as the "Doctor Subtilis." He joined the Franciscans and was a teacher at Oxford, Paris, and Cologne, becoming famous for his defense of the dogma of the Immaculate Conception, and his description of man's free will as a horse capable of throwing off grace, its rider. Declaring that the existence of God or the immortality of the human soul cannot be proved by human reason, he thus challenged the harmony of faith and reason, of theology and philosophy, so important in the system of St. Thomas Aquinas. For centuries his followers, called Scottists, disputed with the Thomists over this and other doctrinal questions. Eventually Scotism was modified until it resembled Thomism on most issues.

Duns Scotus' theories are formulated in his metaphysical treatises De Rerum Principio, Questiones, Opus Oxoniense, and the commentaries on the Sentences of Peter Lombard. Although he had tried to urge philosophy's greater dependence on divine revelation by showing the limitations of human reason, the controversy had the opposite effect of lessening philosophy's concern with theology. His opposition to classical studies led in the Renaissance to the use of his name (Duns, Dunse, or Dunce) for a pedantic sophist incapable of real learning, and thence to the current meaning of dunce as a stupid, dull-witted person.

Dunstable, John (c. 1370-1453). The most important English composer of the 15th century; also a mathematician and astronomer. He infused beauty and grace into the rigid and angular English music of the 14th century, and had an influence on French music.

D'Urfey. See Giotto's Tower.

Duper, Day of (Journée des Dupes)

No. 11, 1638, when Marie de Médicis and Gaston, Duc d'Orléans extracted from Louis XIII the promise that he would dismiss his minister Cardinal Richelieu. The cardinal went immediately to Versailles, the king repented, and Richelieu became more powerful than ever. Marie de Médicis and Gaston, the dupes, paid dearly for their short triumph.

Dupin, Aurore Amantine Lucille. See George Sand.

Dupin, C. Auguste. An amateur detective created by Edgar Allan Poe. Appearing in the three stories Poe called his ratiocinative tales, Dupin works solely by deductive method. His unofficial status, bewildered friend, and cold logic have become familiar characteristics of the literary detectives modeled on him. See Murders in the Rue Morgue, The; Purloined Letter, The.

Du Pont, Éléuthère Irénée (1771-1834). American gunpowder manufacturer, son of Pierre Samuel Du Pont de Nemours. He came to the United States in 1799 and founded, in Wilmington, Del., the gunpowder and textile firm of E. I. du Pont de Nemours & Co. (1802-1804). In 1822, he was appointed director of the Bank of the United States.

Du Pont de Nemours, Pierre Samuel (1739-1817). French economist, friend and disciple of François Quesnay, the Physiocrat. He was imprisoned during the French Revolution and emigrated to the United States in 1799. At Jefferson's request he prepared a scheme for national education which, although never adopted in the U.S., influenced the French educational code. He returned to France (1802-1815), but again emigrated to the U.S. two years before his death.

Durandal, Durendal, Durandana, or Durindana. The magic sword of Roland (Orlando). Once used by Hector, it was given to Roland by Charlemagne in some stories, by Malachie the magician in others.

Durant, Asher. See Hudson River School.

Durant, William James (1885- ). American teacher, philosopher, and historian. Durant, perhaps the greatest popularizer of philosophic ideas in American publishing history, originally wrote The Story of Philosophy (1926) as a lecture series; the book was so popular that it was translated into a dozen languages and soon sold over a million copies. Durant then began a series on The Story of Civilization: Our Oriental Heritage (1935), The Life of Greece (1939), Caesar and Christ (1944), The Age of Faith (1950), The Renaissance (1953), The Reformation (1957), and The Age of Reason Begins (1961) and The Age of Louis XVI (1963), both written with his wife, Ariel Durant.

Duras, Marguerite (1914- ). French novelist who usually presents events in terms of their psychological significance, most often to a woman, as in Sea Wall (Un Barrage contre le Pacifique: 1950), Le Marin de Gibraltar (1952), and The Square (1955). Other works include the film scenario Hiroshima mon amour (1959) and the novels La Vie tranquille (1944) and Moderato Cantabile (1958). She adapted Moderato Cantabile for the screen.

Durbeyfield, Tess. See Tess of the D'Urbervilles.

Dürer, Albrecht (1471-1528). German painter and engraver. Travels in Italy in 1494 and 1505 familiarized him with Italy's search for clarity in art. At first he followed the German Gothic tradition of linear unrest and vehemence, but this style gradually gave way to greater breadth and simplicity, until he achieved a classical art of great expressiveness. Acutely aware of his own importance as an artist and increasingly interested in the teachings of Martin Luther, he sought to reconcile the strictness of the Reformation with the humanistic aspects of the Renaissance and its classical concern with ideal beauty. In the process he created the greatest expression of German Renaissance art. He painted a number of famous religious works and self-portraits, but he is particularly renowned for his numerous woodcuts and engravings depicting Apocalyptic visions, allegories, the Passion of Christ, and the life of the Virgin. The delicacy and strength of his hand is also demonstrated by portrait and landscape drawings and by minute studies of animals and details of nature. During his last years he wrote theoretical works on geometry and perspective, and on anatomy and human proportion.

D'Urfey, Thomas or Tom (1653-1723). English dramatist and song writer. He is known for such comedies as Love for Money (1691), The Marriage...
Hater Matched (1692), and The Comical History of Don Quixote: Parts I, II, and III (1694-1696). There is also a six-volume collection of his songs: Wit and Mirth (1719-1720).

Durga. The wife of Shiva. She is also known as Uma, Parvati, and Kali. The Durga Puja is Bengal’s greatest religious festival, usually taking place in September or October.

Durrell, Lawrence [George] (1912- ). Anglo-Irish novelist, poet, and playwright. He is best-known for The Alexandria Quartet, a series of novels set in Egypt. Most of Durrell’s other works are set on Mediterranean islands or in Europe, where he has spent most of his life. Henry Miller helped him to publish his first prose work, The Black Book, in France in 1938. Employed by the British Council and the British Foreign Office in Egypt, Argentina, Belgium, and Cyprus, Durrell wrote boys’ adventure stories, humorous sketches of diplomatic life, and novels and travel books about Mediterranean islands. His Aegean books are Prospero’s Cell (1945), The Dark Labyrinth (1947), Reflections on a Marine Venus (1953), and Bitter Lemons (1957), about life in Cyprus during the Turkish-Greek-British struggles. Like Norman Douglas, Durrell compares Anglo-Saxons unfavorably with Southern Europeans, who have, he thinks, a better sense of history and art, and more sexual freedom.

Durrell’s poems have been appearing consistently since 1938. Usually on Mediterranean and classical subjects, they are romantic, taut, and sometimes humorous. The Death of General Unkebuske (1938) is an ironic biography. Durrell’s Collected Poems appeared in 1956. His poetic dramas are Sappho (1950) and Acte (1961).

Dürrenmatt, Friedrich (1921- ). Swiss playwright. Dürrenmatt, who writes in German, is especially known for his mastery of the bizarre and for the penetrating irony with which he comments on both the contemporary world and the helplessness of the human situation in general. His two most significant works are both tragicomedies: Die Ehe des Herrn Mississippi (The Marriage of Mr. Mississippi, 1952), a grotesque depiction of what has happened to moral and social values in our day, and the famous The Visit of the Old Lady, which is an ironic modern counterpart to classical tragedy, treating the theme of the death of one man for the sake of the community. His other better-known plays include Romulus der Grosse (Romulus the Great, 1949) and Ein Engel kommt nach Babylon (An Angel Comes to Babylon, 1954). In his stage technique Dürrenmatt, like his countryman Max Frisch, follows Brecht’s lead by frequently disrupting the stage-illusion in order to make the audience think in a more direct way about the ideas being presented. Besides his plays he has also written several detective stories with overtones of deeper meaning, including Der Verdacht (Suspicion, 1953), and a well-known essay entitled Theaterprobleme (Problems of the Theater, 1955), treating the subject of modern drama.

Durtain, Luc. See Abbey Group, The.

Durvasas. In Hindu legend, one of the 7 great sages. In Kalidasa’s play Shakuntala, he is an ancient ascetic who curses Shakuntala because she neglects to serve him when he visits Kashyapa’s ashram (hermitage).

Du Ryer, Pierre (c. 1600-1658). French playwright. Du Ryer’s output was of wide range and included the pastoral Les Vendages de Suresne (The Grape Harvests of Suresnes, 1635), unorthodox in the realism of its setting, the Seine of his own day; the romantic tragedy Alcionées (1640); the biblical tragedies Saul (1642) and Esther (1644); and historical tragedies, which are considered his best work. Of these, Scévole (1647), based on the legend of Mucius Scaevola, is generally reckoned his masterpiece.

Duse, Eleonora (1859-1924). Italian actress. Descended from a theatrical family, she scored her first great success when, aged 14, she played Juliet in Verona. Later she was acclaimed in her Camille and her interpretations of Ibsen’s heroines. In 1894, she and Sarah Bernhardt, both appearing in London in Sudermann’s Magda, invited the critics to choose between them; George Bernard Shaw was among those who preferred Duse. When she was in her late 30s, she entered into an artistic and romantic liaison with Gabriele D’Annunzio, playing the title roles in his La Giocconda and Francesca da Rimini. An actress of great emotional power, she was noted for her great simplicity and lack of theatrical artifice.

Dutch Courtezean, The (1603). A drama by John Maeston. Freevil, in love with the gentle Beatrice, wishes to break off his old relationship with Franceschina, the Dutch countess. To twist his upright friend Malheureux, he takes him to Franceschina’s house where the young man falls under the countess’s spell. Discovering the facts about Freevil’s forthcoming marriage, Franceschina turns to Malheureux and promises to give herself to him when he brings her Freevil’s ring as a token that the latter is dead. Malheureux informs Freevil of her offer, and the two stage a mock quarrel. Malheureux hurry to Franceschina with the ring and then finds that she has betrayed him to the authorities. As Malheureux is about to be executed, Freevil appears and reveals the subterfuge.

Dutchman’s Fireside, The (1831). A novel by James Kirke Paulding. A faithful depiction of Dutch life in 18th-century America, the book follows the adventures of Sybrant Nestbrook in the French and Indian Wars. The hero, reported dead, returns in time to win the hand of Catalina Vancour.

Dutch Wars. Three wars fought between England and the United Provinces (Holland) in 1652-1654, 1664-1667, and 1672-1674. The first two were inspired by commercial rivalry and consisted largely of naval engagements and raids upon shipping and colonies. Among these was the British raid on New Amsterdam in 1664 which brought about the cession of that colony. The third war, very unpopular in England, was brought about by the desire of Charles II’s ally, Louis XIV of France, to seize the Spanish Netherlands, and French land campaigns were important. Overall the wars were to England’s advantage, but the Dutch were able to preserve the integrity of their home territory and government.
Doutourd, Jean (1920- ). French novelist and essayist. Dutourd is the satirical humorist of such works as A Dog's Head (Une tête de chien; 1950), The Best Butter (Au bon Beurre; 1952, also translated as The Milky Way), and Five A. M. (Douxin; 1955). The Taxis of the Marne (1956) is an autobiographical and political essay.

Duun, Olav (1876–1939). Norwegian novelist. In both subject and style Duun is a regionalist writer. Juvikfolk (The People of Juvik, 6 vols., 1918–1923), a novel series and his finest work, is set in his native Namdalen. He writes in landsmål, the spoken language of Norway, and not in the traditional literary Dano-Norwegian riksmål.

Duval, Claude. A highwayman, famed in legend and ballad. He was hanged at Tyburn in 1670 and provided with an epitaph beginning: "Here lies Du Vall: Reader, if male thou art look to thy purse, if female, to thy heart."

Duveneck, Frank (1848–1919). American portrait painter and etcher. The Ashcan School was influenced by his direct presentation and by the vigorous brushwork, learned in Munich, Germany, with which he defined the planes of a face on the canvas.

Du Vergier de Hauranne, Jean. Abbé de Saint-Cyran (1581–1643). French theologian. A man of austere and unshakable religious conviction, Du Vergier defended the rights of bishops against the Jesuits in his pamphlets Petrus Aurelius (1632–1633). Appointed director of Port-Royal in 1635, he introduced into the convent the moral and theological convictions of Jansenism, which he had acquired from his teacher and friend Cornelius Jansen. In 1638, Richelieu became uneasy at Du Vergier's enormous religious influence and ordered him sent to prison where he remained till the year of his death.

Dvořák, Antonín (1841–1904). Czech composer. He was director of the National Conservatory of Music in New York City (1892–1895), and head of the Conservatory in Prague (1901). He wrote many operas and symphonies (among these the New World Symphony), symphonic poems, overtures, rhapsodies, nocturnes, scherzos, concertos, and choral works.

dwarf. A tiny, often misshapen person. Dwarfs have figured in the legends and mythology of nearly every race, and Pliny gives particulars of whole races of them, possibly following travelers' reports of African Pygmies. Among the Teutonic and Scandinavian peoples, dwarfs held an important place in mythology. They generally dwelt in rocks, caves, and recesses of the earth, were the guardians of its mineral wealth and precious stones, and were very skillful in the working of these. They had their own king, as a rule were not inimical to man, but could, on occasion, be intensely vindictive and mischievous. They play an important role in Wagner's Ring des Nibelungen.

Dwight, Theodore (1764–1846). American lawyer and writer. Like his brother Timothy, he was one of the Hartford Wits and wrote satirical verse in collaboration with Richard Alsop. He also wrote a pro-Federalist History of the Hartford Convention (1833).

Dwight, Timothy (1752–1817). American poet and educator, a grandson of Jonathan Edwards, and leader of the Hartford Wits. A Calvinist in religion and Federalist in politics, Dwight was president of Yale (1795–1817), whose staff and curricula he brilliantly developed. His most popular poems were The Conquest of Canaan, The Triumph of Infidelity (1788), and Greenfield Hill (1794). A derryman as well, Dwight served as a chaplain in the Revolutionary army and wrote many sermons, 173 of which were collected as Theology, Explained and Defended (1818–1819).

Dyer, Sir Edward (1540–1607). English poet of the Elizabethan period. A friend of Sir Philip Sidney, Fulke Greville, and Edmund Spenser. He was best known for his lyric beginning "My mind to me a kingdom is."

Dyer, John (1699–1757). English poet and painter. He was a member of a literary coterie which included James Thomson and Richard Savage, and studied painting with Jonathan Richardson. His first major poem Grongar Hill is in Pindaric form and deals with the tradition of evening contemplation which was popularized by Milton's Il Penseroso. Other important poems are The Ruins of Rome (1740) and The Fleece (1757), a didactic account of sheep-raising and the wool trade in supposed imitation of the pastoralists of Vergil and Alexander Pope.

dynastic histories. Chinese historical works detailing the history of the various ruling houses. They begin with the Han Dynasty (202 B.C.–A.D. 220) and continue until the Ch’ing or Manchu (1644–1912). There are altogether 24 such histories, each composed by writers of the dynasty following one which had fallen.

Dynasts, The. See Thomas Hardy.

Dysmas. See DISMAS.

Dzhugashvili, Iosef Visarionovich. See Joseph Stalin.
Ea. The Babylonian god of water and of wisdom. Developed from the Sumerian Enki, he was one of the most important gods in the pantheon. It was he who, to a considerable extent, established the orderly functions of earth, sky, and sea, especially as they affect man, though specific functions such as irrigation or the growth of grain were in the hands of lesser gods. It was he whose wisdom or cunning often saved the universe and the other gods from disaster. He disposed of the stone monster of Kisharri when it threatened heaven; he alone of the gods found the means to save Ishtar from the underworld; and he saved mankind from the flood by warning Utanapishtim to build his ark, as explained in the Epic of Gilgamesh.

Each and All (1839). A poem by Ralph Waldo Emerson. Written on the occasion of a seashore walk, it is an expression of faith in the oneness of the universe. The poet praises the “perfect whole” in which all parts are interdependent. Each and All was later collected in Emerson's Poems (1847).

Eagle. A large, powerful predatory bird. It is used in many lands and ages as an emblem symbolizing strength and swiftness. The Romans used it from the time of Marius as the ensign of a legion. The French under the Empire assumed the same device. The golden eagle and the spread eagle, devices of the emperors of the East, adapted from the ensigns of the ancient kings of Babylon and Persia, of the Ptolemies and the Seleucides, came to commemorate the Crusades. In Christian art, the eagle is emblematic of St. John the Evangelist, because, like that bird, he looked on “the sun of glory.” St. Augustine, St. Gregory the Great, and St. Prisca are also often shown with an eagle.

When Charlemagne was made leader of the Holy Roman Empire, he joined the German eagle, which faces right, to the Roman eagle, which faces left. The resulting double-headed eagle thus became the emblem of the Holy Roman Empire and of the Austrian Empire which regarded itself as its successor. In Russia, the same emblem symbolizes the Eastern or Byzantine Empire and the Western or Roman Empire, supposedly combined under the Russian Ivan Vasilyevich when, in 1472, he married Sophia, the niece of Constantine XIV, the last emperor of Byzantium. The phrase in Psalm 103, “Thy youth is renewed like the eagle’s,” refers to an ancient superstition that every ten years the eagle soars into the fiery region and plunges thence into the sea, where, molting its feathers, it acquires new life. See Phoenix.

Eakins, Thomas (1844-1916). American painter. He studied anatomy in Philadelphia, where he settled, making dissections and taking casts. A realistic painter, he made full use of this knowledge in scenes of sports, especially rowing. Experimenting in various directions, he painted genre scenes, did some sculpture, and is known for penetrating, uncompromisingly objective portraits such as The Clinic of Dr. Gros.

Earhart, Amelia (1898-1937). American aviator. She was the first woman pilot to cross the Atlantic Ocean in an airplane (June 17, 1928). She was married to George Palmer Putnam, the publisher, and was herself the author of several books, notably Last Flight (1938), edited by her husband. In July, 1937, she was lost in an attempt to fly across the Pacific.

Earle, John (1601-1665). English prose writer and prelate. His Microcosmography (1628) is considered one of the best works by the 17th-century character writers; it is a miniature human comedy, both witty and contemplative.

Earnshaw, Catherine. See Wuthering Heights.

Earthly Paradise, the. A place of perfect beauty, peace, and immortality, widely believed in the Middle Ages to exist on earth in some as yet undiscovered land or island. It was sometimes identified with the Biblical Garden of Eden and located in the Near East; sometimes it was situated in the Far East, as in a legendary letter from Prester John, which locates it within three days' journey of his kingdom, or in The Travels of Sir John Mandeville; other maps and reports place it variously in the Atlantic, Pacific, and Indian Oceans. See St. Brandan.

William Morris' The Earthly Paradise (4 vols., 1868-1870) is a long collection of narrative poems modeled on Chaucer's. The prologue tells how a band of Norse sailors flee the Black Death and go in search of the Earthly Paradise. They finally come to rest in "a nameless city in a distant sea." Then follows a series of banquets at which 24 tales are told; each month one of the Norsemen tells a medieval saga or romance, and one of the hosts relates a classical myth. In between are lyric interludes describing the changing landscape, a poem for each month.

Earwicker, Humphrey Chimpden. The protagonist of James Joyce's novel Finnegans Wake. Literally a middle-aged Irish tavern keeper with a guilty conscience, he represents all sinful mankind. His initials, HCE, are interwoven throughout the book.

East Coker. See Four Quartets.

Easter. The Christian Paschal festival. The name was adopted from A.S. easter, a heathen festival held at the vernal equinox in honor of the Teutonic goddess of dawn, called Bede Eostre (cognate with Lat. aurora and Sanskrit ushas, dawn). On the introduction of Christianity it was natural for the name of the heathen festival to be transferred to the Christian, since the two fell at about the same time.

Easter Day is the first Sunday after the 14th day of the Paschal moon. The Paschal moon is the first moon whose 14th day comes on or after the vernal equinox (March 21). Consequently, Easter Sunday cannot be earlier than March 22, or later than April 25. This was fixed by the council of Nicea, A.D. 325. It was formerly a common belief that the sun danced on Easter Day.

Easter Rebellion (1916). An abortive revolution staged on Easter Monday, 1916 in Dublin by the revolutionary Fenian organization attempting to secure Irish independence from England. Frustrated by the English delay in granting home rule, the Fenians—under the leadership of Patrick Pearse (1879–1916) and James Connolly (1870–1916)—seized the general post office and a number of other locations in Dublin, proclaiming an Irish republic. The rebels, about 2000 in number, held their positions for six days before succumbing to the overwhelming superiority of the English forces. The ruthless behavior of the British soldiers, coupled with the execution of all the rebel leaders, led to a wave of violent anti-English sentiment, and the rebellion became a rallying point for all Irishmen. The events were celebrated in a number of literary efforts, notably in Yeats's Easter Sunday and, with considerable irony, in O'Casey's play The Plough and the Stars.

Easter Wings (1865). A poem by George Herbert. The two stanzas of the poem are composed of lines that become progressively shorter, then longer, creating a shape resembling a pair of wings. The sense of the poem, which deals with the Fall and man's participation in Christ's Resurrection, fits perfectly in this form.

Eastlake, Sir Charles Lock (1793–1865). English painter and art critic. He made sketches of Napoleon as a prisoner aboard H.M.S. Bellerophon, from which he developed two large portraits. He served as keeper of the National Gallery (1843–1847) and became its director in 1855. He is known for his pictures of Italian banditti and for several paintings of episodes in the life of Christ.

East Lynne (1861). A novel by Mrs. Henry Wood which was immensely popular, particularly in a dramatic version. Its heroine, Lady Isabel Vane, after running off with another man, returns to her remarried husband disguised as a nurse to care for her own children. After keeping up this pretense for a considerable time, she is at last reconciled to her husband.

Eastman, Max [Forrester] (1883–?). American critic, poet, and essayist. Eastman began his career as a teacher of philosophy and psychology at Columbia University. During this period he was occupied with aesthetics and wrote The Enjoyment of Poetry (1913). When the First World War broke out, Eastman turned to political and social controversy. He became a Marxist, but opposed the Stalinist development of Soviet Russia. Eastman helped to found two important magazines, The Masses and The Liberator (1917); he was tried for sedition when The Masses was suppressed for antiwar writings in 1917. Some of Eastman's other books are Marxism: Is It Science? (1940); Heroes I Have Known (1942); Lot's Wife (1942), a narrative poem; Enjoyment of Living (1948); Poems of Five Decades (1954); Reflections on the Failure of Socialism (1955); and Great Companions—Critical Memoirs of Some Famous Friends (1959).

East of Eden (1952). A novel by John Steinbeck. Based on the biblical story of Cain and Abel, the book centers on the lives of Adam Trask and his two sons, Cal and Aron. Adam settles in the Salinas Valley in California with his wife, Cathy, who bears the two boys, leaves her husband, and becomes a prostitute. Adam, who favors Aron, is at first unable to forgive Cal when he drives Aron to his death by telling him that their mother is a prostitute.

Eaten Heart, The. A tale from The Decameron of Giovanni Boccaccio. In this story, William of Roussillon gives to his wife the heart of her lover. When she discovers that she has eaten the heart, she kills herself and is buried with her lover.

Eaton, Margaret or Peggy O'Neale (1796–1879). Wife of John H. Eaton, U.S. secretary of war (1829–1831). The daughter of a Washington tavern-keeper, Peggy was the wife of John B. Timberlake, a navy purser, when Andrew Jackson and his friend Eaton lodged at her father's inn in 1823. After Timberlake's death, Eaton married the pretty widow in 1829 amid rumors that he had been overly familiar with her while her husband was alive. When Jackson named Eaton secretary of war in 1829, the wife of Vice President Calhoun and the wives of other Cabinet members refused to call on her. The president, however, remained loyal to his friends, perhaps remembering the social abuse to which the recently deceased Mrs. Jackson had been subjected. The feud eventually turned into a political issue, resulting in the resignations of Eaton, Secretary of State Van Buren, and other Cabinet members, and widened the growing rift between Jackson and Calhoun.

Ebers, Georg (1837–1898). German novelist and Egyptologist. He is known for his pedantic "professorial novels," such as Eine ägyptische Königstochter (An Egyptian Princess, 1874) and Kleopatra (1894).

Ebert, Friedrich (1870–1925). German statesman. He was the first president of the Weimar Republic (1919–1925) and leader of the Social Democrats.

Eblis. In Muslim legend, the Devil, called Azazel before the fall, who rules over the evil genii or jinn. When Adam was created, Allah commanded all the angels to worship him, but Azazel replied, "Me thou hast created of smokeless fire, and shall I reverence a creature made of dust?" Allah was angry at this insolent answer, and turned the disobedient angel into a Sheytan (devil) and he became the father of devils. Another Muslim tradition has it that before life was breathed into Adam, all the angels came to look at the shape of clay, among them Azazel, who, knowing that Allah intended man to be his superior, vowed never to acknowledge him as such and kicked the figure until it rang.

Eblis had five sons: Tir, author of fatal accidents; Awar, the demon of hribcity; Dasm, author of discord; Sut, father of lies; Zalambur, author of mercurial dishonesty.

Ebudah. In the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto an island of the Hebrides, west of Scotland. Here Angelica and later Olimpia are exposed to the cruel sea monster called the Orc. Ruggiero rescues Angelica and Orlando rescues Olimpia from the beast.

Ega de Queiroz, José Maria (1845-1900). Portuguese novelist and short-story writer. Considered Portugal's greatest novelist, he is best known for O Crime Do Padre Amara (The Sin of Father Amara, 1876), a naturalistic satire directed against clerical corruption which was based on his observations as a municipal official in the province of Leiria. His gift for ironic social criticism was further revealed in O Primo Basilio (Cousin Basilio, 1878), a study of a middle-class Lisbon family, and Os Maiais (1880), about upper-class life. He also wrote a fanciful short novel, O Mandarin (1880); the novel A Relíquia (The Relic, 1887); A Cidade e as Serras (The City and the Mountains, 1901), short stories; Prosos Bárbaras (1905), a collection of articles and stories; and Cartas de Inglaterra (1945), letters about Victorian England, where he lived from 1874 to 1888.

Ecsbasí Captivi. Full title Ecsbatis cuiusdam Captivi, per Tropologiam (The Escape of a Certain Captive, with Allegorical Significance, usually called The Escape of the Calf, c. 940). A Latin tale about a calf running away from his stable, only to be threatened by a wolf until rescued by a fox. It probably represents a monk running from his vows and his monastery, and in danger of great sin until rescued by discipline. Its importance, however, is in the development of the beast-epic, for some of the animals and events reappear in the clerical satire Ysengrimus (1148), direct ancestor of REYNARD THE FOX.

Ecclesiastes. A book of the Old Testament. It was formerly ascribed to Solomon because of its opening verse, “The words of the Preacher, the son of David, king in Jerusalem,” but it is now generally assigned to an unnamed author of the third century B.C. The book's refrain is “vanity of vanities; all is vanity.” (Eccl. 1:2).

Ecclesiastical History of the English People. See BEDE.

Eceleisazusae (Ekklésiazusai). See ARISTOPHANES.

Echegaray y Eizaguirre, José (1832-1916). Spanish dramatist. His works, which enlarge upon the romantic theme of melancholic passion, are noted for their high degree of technical skill. The best known of his fustian compositions are O locura o santidad (1877), in which a Quixotic hero is accused of folly for attempting to pass along his fortune to its rightful owners, and El gran Galeoto. This last mentioned work relates the transformation of the three virtuous and honorable members of a triangle situation, society being blamed for their corruption. In 1904 Echegaray received the Nobel Prize.

Echeverría, Esteban (1805-1851). Argentine poet. During a five-year stay in Paris, Echeverría absorbed the tenets of French romanticism which permeated his works of poetry, especially Elvira, o la novia del Plata (1832), Consuelos (1834), and La cautiva (1837), notable for its depiction of the Argentine pampa and its inhabitants. Echeverría's opposition to dictator Juan Manuel de Rosas led him and other idealistic youths to form the Asociación de Mayo, a secret revolutionary group dedicated to liberal, democratic principles. His hatred for Rosas also inspired him to write El Matadero, the work for which he is probably best known today.

Echidna. A monster of classical mythology, half woman, half serpent. By Typhon she was mother of the Chimaira, the man-headed dog Orthos, the hundred-headed dragon of the Hesperides, the Colchian dragon, the Sphinx, Cerberus, Scylla, the Gorgons, the Lernaean Hydra, the vulture that gnawed away the liver of Prometheus, and the Nemean lion.

Spenser makes her the mother of the Blatant Beast in The Faerie Queene (1596).

Echo. A nymph of Greek mythology. There are several stories of why she seemed to be merely a disembodied voice. Perhaps the commonest is that she pinned away from unrequited love for Narcissus until only her voice remained. According to another story, Hera, annoyed at Echo's babbling while she was trying to spy on Zeus, took away the nymph's speech, allowing her only to echo others. Yet a third version explains that Pan, furious that she could not love him, maddened some shepherds until they tore her into such tiny pieces that nothing was left but her voice.

Eckermann, Johann Peter (1792-1854). A friend and literary assistant to Goethe. He helped Goethe prepare the Ausgabe letzter Hand (final edition) of his works. His Gespräche mit Goethe (English edition, Conversations with Goethe, in 3 vols., 1836-1848) are daily records of Goethe's personal talks with Eckermann and constitute in their remarkable authenticity a monument to the ideal amanuensis.

eclectic (from Gr. “ek-legein,” to choose, select). Selectiveness as a way of living. The name given to those who do not attach themselves to any special school (especially philosophers and painters), but pick and choose from various systems, selecting and harmonizing those doctrines and methods that suit them.

eclogue. Specifically, a pastoral dialogue in verse. The speakers, usually two shepherds or a shepherd and his mistress, discuss topics ranging from the state of their hearts to that of the nation, from the management of sheep to that of verse. Loosely, any short poem with pastoral elements may be called an eclogue. See BUCOLICS.

Ecole des femmes [L’ (The School for Wives, 1662). A verse comedy by Molière. Arnolphe has arranged for his beloved Agnès to be raised in total innocence, in order that she may never prove unfaithful when he marries her. Because of her unsophistication, Horace is able to win her affections and persuades her to run away with him. Unaware of Arnolphe's relation to the girl, Horace asks him to hide her. Arnolphe is about to spirit her away to a convent when it is revealed that Agnès' father, the rich Enrique, has arranged with Horace's father for their children to be married. The play was criticized for supposed moral as well as literary flaws, and Molère replied to his critics in two works: La Critique de l'Ecole des Femmes (1663) and L'Impromptu de Versailles (1663).

Ecole des femmes, L'. A novel trilogy by André Gide about the position of women in the modern world. It includes The School for Wives (1929), Robert (1929), and Genèviève (1936).

Ecole des maris, L '. See Saunabelle (2).

Ector, Sir. In Malory's Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469), the foster father of King Arthur and father of Sir Kay.

Edda. The name given to two Icelandic collections of early Scandinavian mythology. The manuscripts comprising the Elder or Poetic Edda (written 9th to 12th century) were discovered about 1643 by the Icelandic Bishop Brynjolf Sveinsson (1605-1675), who erroneously attributed them to Saemund Sigfusson (1056-1133) and called the work The Edda of Saemund. The 34 lays, or poems, tell the mythological stories of the Old Norse gods and heroes.

The Younger or Prose Edda, also called the Snorra Edda (early 13th century), was written by Snorri Sturluson. In five parts, it includes a preatory account of the creation of the world and of pagan poetry; the stories of early Scandinavian mythology; further legends of the gods, given as the "sayings of Bragi," god of poetry; the Skalda, a detailed account of the rules of ancient prose; and the Hattatal, a technical analysis of meters. Other linguistic treatises and a list of poets were added after Sturluson's death.

Eddy, Mary Baker (1821-1910). American religious leader, editor, and author. The founder of Christian Science, Mrs. Eddy published Science and Health (1875) as an exposition of her ideas and as the official statement of the organization she headed.

In this book and others of her Miscellaneous Writings (1896) she taught that pain, disease, old age, and death were "errors." She founded the Church of Christ, Scientist, in Boston (1879), and the newspaper, The Christian Science Monitor (1908). Mrs. Eddy was influenced by Transcendentalism, and particularly, by the work of Ralph Waldo Emerson. Toward the end of her career, she was attacked by the New York World, McClure's Magazine, and Mark Twain, who wrote a book on Christian Science (1907) ridiculing her beliefs. The doctrines of Christian Science are summarized in the first sentence of Mrs. Eddy's Science and Health: "The Prayer that reforms the sinner and heals the sick is an absolute faith that all things are possible to God."

Eden. Paradise, the country and garden in which Adam and Eve were placed by God (Gen. 2:5). The word means delight, pleasure; it has often been used metaphorically to describe a place of charming scenery.

Edgar. In Shakespeare's King Lear, the legitimate son of the earl of Gloucester. He is disinherited because of his bastard brother Edmund's lies. After Gloucester has been blinded and ousted from his castle by Regan and Cornwall, Edgar finds him and saves him from suicide. He then kills the treacherous Edmund.

Edgar Huntly; or, Memoirs of a Sleep-Walker (1795). A novel by Charles Brockden Brown. Really a detective story, the plot involves a supposed murder, an attempted murder, and a real murder. The Indians, who turn out to have committed the crime, are not idealized; the novel had a great influence on James Fenimore Cooper.

Edgeworth, Maria (1767-1849). An Irish novelist, best known for her novel Castle Rackrent. Many of her other works have their setting in Irish life, among them Belinda (1801), The Absentee, Vivian (1812), and Ormond (1817). She wrote in the tradition of the novel of manners in which Jane Austen excelled, but was also very sensitive to local atmosphere, and portrayed national character with great sympathy. In this respect she exercised a fair influence on her friend Sir Walter Scott. Her letters as well as her novels are still highly readable.

Edict of Nantes. See Nantes, Edict of.

Edison, Thomas A[Iva] (1847-1931). American inventor. Born in Ohio, Edison was educated at home by his mother and at the age of 12 was a newsboy on the railroad; later he became a telegraph operator. Edison patented over 1000 inventions, including the incandescent electric lamp, the microphone, the phonograph, and the Edison accumulator. In 1913 he produced talking motion-pictures. He is credited with the definition of genius as 2% inspiration and 98% perspiration.

Edmonds, Walter D[umaux] (1903- ). American historical novelist. Edmonds made his native region of northern New York as much his own literary property as it is possible for an author to do. The Black River, the Black River Canal, and the Erie Canal dominated his imagination. His books are authentic in research and setting, vivid in their style and narrative. They include Rome Haul (1929), Erie Water (1933), Drums Along the Mohawk, Chad Hanna (1940), In the Hands of the Senecas (1947), and The Wedding Journey (1947). He has also written The First Hundred Years (1948), They Fought With What They Had (1951), Uncle Ben's Whale (1955), and a number of juveniles.

Edmund. In Shakespeare's King Lear, the bastard son of the earl of Gloucester. He instigates the disinheritance of his half-brother Edgar, betrays his father, and schemes with Lear's daughter Goneril to poison her husband, Albany. Mortally wounded by Edgar, the repentant Edmund tries unsuccessfully to save Cordelia, Lear's youngest daughter, from execution.

Education of Henry Adams, The (privately printed, 1907; posthumously published, 1918). An autobiographical work by Henry Adams. Subtitled A Study in 20th-Century Multiplicity, it complements Mont-Saint-Michel and Chartres. Adams' book, written in the third person, might have been an account of the experience of any sensitive man; he uses himself as a model of modern man, searching for coherence in a fragmented universe. Adams considers his education a failure, for it had not prepared him for the conflicts to be faced.

The book is not a complete autobiography; it omits any mention of the 13 years of Adams' marriage, and the seven years following his wife's suicide. It does, however, present a vivid picture of places and people the author knew. In the chapter, "The Virgin and the Dynamo," Adams compares two eras; the dynamo, symbol of mechanistic force, acts on passive man in the 20th-century "multiverse," while the Virgin, symbol of unity, correspondingly stands for the 13th-century concept of an ordered universe.

Education sentimentale, L' (Sentimental Education, 1869). A novel by Gustave Flaubert. Flaubert presents a picture of life among French dilettantes, intellectuals, and revolutionaries at the time of the decline and fall of Louis Philippe's monarchy and the Revolution of 1848. The events of the Revolution and the establishment of the Second Empire, carefully documented, provide a further background for the main action. The novel's protagonist, Frédéric Moreau, is an egotistical and ambitious young man who comes to Paris from the provinces determined to pattern his life upon literature's romantic hero. He undergoes the romantic passion of unrequited love for Mme Arnoux, but does not forego involvement in several less ideal and ultimately disillusioning affairs. Like the desires of Emma Bovary (see Madame Bovary), his dreams are pathetic and sometimes contemptible. Like Emma, too, Moreau is a wholly real person, whom Flaubert draws with truly objective detachment and complete artistic mastery.

Edward. A medieval English ballad which has many versions. In most of these, a young man named Edward explains to his mother that he has killed his father in some variations, there is the suggestion that the mother encouraged the murder. A modern version of this "domestic tragedy" ballad may be found in a poem by Robinson Jeffers: Such Counsels You Gave To Me (1937).

Edward II (1284-1327). King of England (after 1307). He is the subject of a play by Christopher Marlowe.

Edward VI. Edward Tudor (1537-1553), King of England (1547-1553). The son of Henry VIII and his third wife, Jane Seymour, Edward became king when he was only nine years old. He was under the Protectorate first of his uncle, Edward Seymour, lord Somerset, and then of John Dudley, duke of Northumberland. Largely through Northumberland's machinations, Edward signed a deposition willing the crown to his second cousin, Lady Jane Grey, who was also Northumberland's daughter-in-law.

Edward VII. See duke of Windsor.

Edwardian. Pertaining to English life and letters in the early years of the 20th century, a period corresponding roughly to the reign (1901-1910) of Edward VII. In general, the era witnessed a relaxation of Victorian conservatism and complacency, together with a questioning and criticism of authority and accepted social values. G. B. Shaw, Arnold Bennett, and H. G. Wells were among the writers who reflected these tendencies. The term is also used to refer to the opulence and elegance of the period. Victoria Sackville-West described the era in her novel The Edwardians (1920).

Edwards, Harry Stillwell (1855-1938). American lawyer, editor, public official, and writer. Edwards won the Chicago Record $10,000 prize (1896) for his novel, Sons and Fathers. When he was 64 years old, he wrote the book for which he is well known: Eneas Africanaus (1919). It is the story of a Negro slave who becomes separated from his master in 1865; for eight years he wanders through the South on a horrid pilgrimage in the wilderness until he and his master are reunited. Edwards also wrote Eneas Africanaus, Defendant (1921).

Edwards, Jonathan (1703-1758). American theologian and philosopher. In his early youth Edwards was a precociously brilliant scholar, showing a keen interest in scientific observation. His early philosophical thought tended toward Idealism under the influence of Locke, and many of his ideas resembled those of George Berkeley, whose work at that time he did not know.

Edwards' theology was more basically Calvinistic than that of earlier Puritan divines, who emphasized the covenantal relation between God and man, rather than the absolute supremacy of a God bound by no contract. He believed "that the essence of all religion lies in holy love" and that sin was a "property of the species," which both justified God's punishment of man and made possible mercy and redemption. His sermon on Sinners in the Hands of an Angry God (1741), so horrifying to later readers, was in fact an exhortation on the necessity of salvation, as well as a reminder of the torments that awaited the unregenerate. His beliefs on the place of the emotions in religious experience led him to champion the "Great Awakening," in which he saw dramatic conversions as evidence of the "peculiar and immediate" manifestation of God. Among his works are A Faithful Narrative of the Surprising Work of God in the Conversion of Many Hundred Souls (1737) and A Careful and Strict Enquiry into Freedom of the Will (1754).

Edwin Drood, The Mystery of (1870). An unfinished novel by Charles Dickens. The orphans Edwin Drood and Rosa Bud have been betrothed by their fathers, and are to marry when Edwin is 21, though the obligatory nature of the agreement has in fact made love between them impossible. Rosa arouses the admiration of two men: Edwin's ostensibly devoted Uncle Jasper, a disagreeable hypocrite who loves her passionately, and Neville Landless, a youth who detests Edwin for his mistreatment of the young girl. At their last meeting, Edwin promises to marry Rosa. Edwin and Rosa acknowledge that they can never be happy together and break their engagement. The same night Edwin mysteriously disappears, and Jasper, who has done all he can to aggravate the enmity between Edwin and Neville, accuses the latter of murdering his nephew. Rosa's guardian notices
Eichendorff, Joseph Freiherr von

Jasper's displeasure on learning that the engagement had been broken before the disappearance. Neville is arrested, but, since no body can be found, he is released untried. Jasper, however, continues to connive against Neville and to pursue the terrified Rosa, while a mysterious Mr. Datchery appears on the scene to frustrate Jasper's intrigues. At this point the novel breaks off. In the absence of any solution left by Dickens, it has been a favorite puzzle of literary detectives to attempt to solve the mystery. The most convincing proposed solutions generally hinge on two questions: whether or not Edwin is actually dead, and what Mr. Datchery's true identity is. Some have held that Datchery is actually Edwin.

Egeria. In Roman legend, the nymph who instructed Numine Pompilius, 2nd king of Rome, in his wise legislation. Hence, a woman counselor, especially a woman who advises and influences a statesman.

Egeus. In Shakespeare's Midsummer Night's Dream, the stern father of Hermia. He forces her betrothol to Demetrius despite her love for Lysander, who is just as desirable a suitor.

Eggleston, Edward (1837–1902). American novelist and clergyman. He is known for regional fiction dealing with Indiana, and especially for The Hoosier Schoolmaster. An ardent reformer, Eggleston wrote several other novels of importance, including The Circuit Rider (1874), a book describing the impact of Methodism on the frontier; Roxy (1878), the story of the trials of a young woman in frontier Indiana; and The Graysons (1887), a novel introducing Lincoln as a young lawyer.

Egil. The brother of Wieland or Volund, the Vulcan of Norse mythology. Egil was a famous archer; in the Saga of Thidrik there is a tale about him which is the counterpart of the famous story of William Tell and the apple.

Eglamour, Sir. In Shakespeare's Two Gentlemen of Verona, a chivalrous old knight who helps Silvia escape from Milan to find her beloved Valentine.

Egmont (publ. 1788). A tragedy by Johann Wolfgang von Goethe. It is based on the downfall of a historical Count Egmont (1522–1568) who was executed in connection with the Netherlandic revolt against Spain. Like Goethe's earlier Götz von Berlichingen, Egmont is upright and straightforward in his striving for freedom, but unable to survive in an atmosphere of subtle political machinations. Though Goethe was already working on the play in 1776, in his Sturm und Drang period, he did not finish it until his second year in Italy, when his ideas had already taken a strong turn toward the classical. This change is reflected in the play's relative polish of form and language as compared with Götz. Beethoven wrote his famous Egmont music for Goethe's play. See Harmonic.

Egoist, The (1879). A novel by George Meredith. The "egoist" is Sir Willoughby Patterne of Patterne Hall, possessed of good looks, wealth, and all the virtues except humility and a sense of humor. He invites his fiancée, Clara Middleton, and her father, a clergyman who loves good food and wine, to spend a month at the Hall, where he is the idol of his two old aunts. Clara—"a rogue in porcelain" as Mrs. Mountstuart Jenkinson, the clever widow who regulates the social life of the countryside, pronounces her—is soon longing to extricate herself from the attentions of her self-centered lover. She is thankful for the diversion of Patterne's gay Irish guest, De Craye, who makes violent love to her, but gives her confidence to Vernon Whiford, Patterne's cousin and secretary. Patterne, who has had a sad experience previously, is in mortal dread of being jilted by Clara, and to preserve his dignity he proposes to his former worshiper Laetitia Dale, whom he had made use of for this same purpose before. Many complications arise, but Vernon and Clara finally confess their love, and Patterne is forced to plead with the now thoroughly disillusioned Laetitia to become the mistress of Patterne Hall.

Egoist, The. An English little magazine. Originally founded as a feminist periodical in 1911, it became the chief organ of imagist poetry (see IMAGISM). Ezra Pound, T. S. Eliot, Hilda Doolittle, Richard Aldington, Rebecca West, and Harriet Weaver were associated with its publication.

Egyptian, The. See Mika Tolmí WALTARI.

Ehrenburg, Ilya Grigoryevich (1891– ). Russian novelist, poet, and journalist. Much of his early life was lived in Paris where he published his first book of poems (1911). He covered the Spanish Civil War for Soviet papers in 1936–1937 and during World War II spent some years in Paris. His first important novel, The Extraordinary Adventures of Julio Jurenito (Neobyknovennuye priklyucheniya Julio Jurenito; 1922), is a satire on modern European civilization. His other novels include The Fall of Paris (Padeniye Parizha; 1941), dealing with the war in Western Europe before Stalin's involvement; The Storm (Burya; 1948), a war novel; and The Thaw (Ottepel'; 1954, 1956), an outspoken work about shortcomings under Stalin's regime which gave its name to the period of greater relaxation after Stalin's death.

In installments during 1961–1963, Ehrenburg published his memoirs, entitled People, Years, and Life (Lyudi, gody, zhizn'), which contain interesting revelations about the maneuverings of Soviet intellectual life. Ehrenburg himself has often been accused of being an opportunist who knew too well how to avoid purges in the literary world. He has, however, been a fairly persistent advocate of greater intellectual freedom in Soviet letters and has been a rallying point for Soviet admirers of Western culture.

Eichendorff, Joseph Freiherr von (1798–1857). German romantic poet. He is most famous for his many poems that treat idyllically the unspoiled woods of his Silesian homeland, and for the long story Aus dem Leben eines Tagenichts. His novel Ahnung und Gegenwart (Presentiment and the Present, 1815), a Bildungsroman, reflects Eichendorff's Catholicism in that the hero ends by renouncing this world and entering a monastery. During his career, Eichendorff was a friend of many of the German romantics (see GERMAN ROMANTICISM), including F. Schlegel, Arnim, and Brentano, and later in life he wrote a number of works on literary history, for example, Über die ethische und religiöse Bedeutung der neuen romantischen Poesie in Deutschland (On the Ethical and Religious Importance of Recent Romantic Poetry in Germany, 1847).
Eichmann, Adolf (1906-1962). German Nazi, in charge of the execution of Jews (1942-1945). He escaped capture after the war, but in 1960 was apprehended by Israeli security forces in Argentina. Worldwide controversy was aroused during his trial (1961) by an Israeli court, which condemned him to death for crimes against humanity.

Eiffel Tower. An iron tower 984.25 feet high. It was built for the Paris Exposition of 1889 on the Champ de Mars. It was named for the engineer Alexandre Gustave Eiffel (1832-1923) who also built the framework for the Statue of Liberty and designed the locks for the Panama Canal. Its sections were prefabricated and assembled on the spot.

Eikon Basiliké (Gr., "royal image"; 1649). A book purporting to be the spiritual autobiography of Charles I. Published at the time of Charles's execution, it contains his meditations and prayers during his political trials as well as his advice to his son. Its authorship is often attributed to John Gauden (1605-1662), an Anglican clergyman who became bishop of Worcester. The book was so popular that Parliament authorized Milton to write an official reply, his Eikonoklastes (Gr., "image-breaker"); 1649.

Elín (1933). A narrative of travel in Russia by E. E. Cummings. Written in a stream-of-consciousness style, including puns, parodies, and typographical innovations, the book is an impressionistic study of what Cummings himself had seen, heard, and felt. The title (pronounced to rhyme with Mamie) is Greek and means I am.

Ein' feste Burg (Ger. A mighty fortress). The first words of Martin Luther's metrical version of Psalm 46. It is used in the opera Les Huguenots by Meyerbeer.

Einstein, Albert (1879-1955). German-Swiss-American physicist. Einstein is best known for his theory of relativity, first enunciated in 1905, which made possible the modern concept of the atom. In 1921 he won a Nobel Prize. Einstein left Germany after the rise of the Nazis and settled in the U.S., where he worked at the institute for Advanced Study in Princeton, N.J., until 1945.

Eisenhower, Dwight D[avid] (1890- ). American general and 34th president of the U.S. (1953-1961). Born in Denison, Texas, Eisenhower graduated in 1915 from the U.S. Military Academy at West Point. In 1942 he was made commander of the Allied forces landing in North Africa. He became a full general in February 1943, was appointed Supreme Commander of the Allied Expeditionary Forces in Europe, led the Normandy invasion, and directed the overthrow of the Nazis (1944-1945). He later became chief of staff in Washington and told his own story of the European war in Crusade in Europe (1948). He was president of Columbia University from 1948 to 1952, taking a leave of absence to serve as Supreme Allied Commander in Europe and to set up the forces of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization.

Eisenhower was eyed by both Republicans and Democrats for the presidential nomination in 1952. He accepted the Republican bid and defeated Adlai E. Stevenson in the election. As president he generally took a middle road in his policies, continuing foreign aid and advocating a balanced budget while he opposed government control in private enterprise. He was reelected in 1956, again defeating Stevenson. Mandate for Change, 1953-1956, the first volume of Eisenhower's account of his administrations, The White House Years, appeared in 1963.

Eisenstein, Sergei M[ikhailovich] (1898-1948). Russian motion-picture director. Acclaimed as one of the greatest of all film directors, whose methods of cutting and mounting film to gain the effects of montage and dynamic progression have been widely imitated, Eisenstein was trained as a civil engineer and as an architect, then served in the Bolshevik army as a volunteer (1918-1920). His first film, Strike (1924), was notable for its skillful handling of crowd movement. Several remarkable scenes in Potemkin (1926) were even more significant as milestones in the development of cinematic technique. Among his other famous films are Ten Days That Shook the World (1928), the never-completed epic Que Viva Mexico (1931-1932), Alexander Nevsky (1928), and Ivan the Terrible (Part I, 1941; Part II, 1946), which was originally planned as a trilogy.

Eisteddfod. The Welsh national congress of bards. It had its origin in an extremely old Welsh assembly called the Gorsedd; in its present form it probably began in the twelfth century. Eisteddfod means literally "a session." Minstrelsy has been an important part of Welsh culture from the earliest days, and the present purpose of the Eisteddfod is to maintain an interest in the ancient traditions.

El. The supreme god of many ancient Semitic races in the Near East. He was represented in the form of a bull. The golden calf of the Old Testament probably was sacred to one of his offspring. See The FORM OF BAAL AND THE POEM OF AHA\.

Elaine. In Arthurian romance, the name given to two ladies, both of whom love Lanlcelot. In Malory's Morte d'Arthur (c. 1469), the first Elaine is the daughter of King Pelles. Falling in love with Sir Launcelot, she takes on for a night the likeness of Queen Guinevere, in order to deceive him. As a result, a son is born to them, and he is given the name of Galahad.

The second Elaine, known as the "lily maid of Astolat" is the Elaine of Tennyson's Lancelot and Elaine in his Idylls of the King, in which he recasts Malory's version of the story. This Elaine loved Launcelot "with that love which was her doom." Her love is so great that she dies of it. According to her request, her dead body is then placed on a barge, a lily in her right hand and a letter, avowing her love and showing the innocence of Launcelot, in her left. The barge, steered by an old servitor, moves down the river, and, when it stops at the palace entrance, Arthur orders the body borne in. The letter is read, and Arthur directs that the maiden shall be buried like a queen, with her sad story blazoned on her tomb. Tennyson has also told her story in his The Lady of Shalott.

Elba. An island in the Mediterranean to which Napoleon Bonaparte was banished when he abdicated power in 1814. After 10 months he escaped from Elba and returned to France for the Hundred Days that ended at Waterloo.

El Dorado (Sp., the gilded). A legendary king. El Dorado was the supposed King of Manoa, a fabulous city of immense wealth localized by early explorers on the Amazon. He was said to be covered with oil and then powdered with gold dust. This operation had been performed so many times that he was permanently, and literally, gilded. Many expeditions, from both Spain and England (two of which were led by Sir Walter Raleigh), tried to discover El Dorado, and the name was later transferred to his supposed territory. Hence, the term refers to any place or realm of fabulous richness.

Eleonora of Aquitaine (c. 1122–1204). Queen of Louis VII of France (1137–1151), then of Henry II of England (1152–1204), mother of Richard I and King John. Because she was heiress of Aquitaine, about half of southern France, England claimed possession of the region, thus precipitating about 400 years of wars between France and England. She backed the rebellion of her sons against Henry II (1173), for which she was imprisoned (1174–1189). Richard released her after his accession to the throne, and when he went on his crusade, she protected his interests against John. Later she reconciled the brothers and continued to be politically important during John's reign. An ardent patron of the Provencal Troubadours, she was influential in bringing them and their works to her courts.

Elective Affinities, The. See WäHLerWandtSchaften, Die.

Electra (Elektra). (1) In Greek mythology, a daughter of Agamemnon and Clytemnestra, and sister of Orestes. Her tragic story (see House of Atreus) was told by each of the three great Athenian dramatists, Aeschylus in his Orestes trilogy, Sophocles and Euripides in their plays called Electra. Richard Strauss wrote an opera of a version of Sophocles' play by Hugo von Hofmannsthal (1903). Mourning Becomes Electra (1931), a trilogy of plays by Eugene O'Neill, is a retelling of the Orestes story set in 19th century New England. Jean Giraudoux also adapted the story for his play Electre (1937).

(2) One of the Elekades, daughter of Atlas, mother of Dardanus. She is known as "the lost Pleiad," for it is said that she disappeared a little before the Trojan war, that she might be saved the mortification of seeing the ruin of her beloved city. She showed herself occasionally to mortals, but always in the guise of a comet.

Electra (Elektra; 414? B.C.). A tragedy by Sophocles (414? B.C.). It deals with the return of Orestes to Argos and the murder of Clytemnestra. Electra is the heroine; as in the Philoctetes and the Oedipus at Colonus, Sophocles isolates his tragic hero in order to emphasize the qualities of heroism and tragic endurance. As a consequence, the murder of Clytemnestra and Aegisthus is left to the very end; the climax of the play is the long recognition scene between Orestes and Electra. Also, in order to develop the character of Electra to the fullest extent, Sophocles leaves Orestes almost blank; he is the avenger, a paragon of virtue, and nothing more. Thus the recognition scene is the fitting climax, since Electra's trials are now over. Clytemnestra is the real enemy, and Aegisthus is no threat. Euripides reverses emphasis in order to make Clytemnestra's death more unnecessary and more horrid; Sophocles' determination to represent the murder as an example of "natural recoil" necessitates a strong character for the queen.

Electra (Elektra; 413 B.C.). A drama by Euripides (413 B.C.). Aegisthus has forced Electra to marry a kindly old farmer so that she cannot enter into a dangerous marriage with some great prince. Electra has no power to avenge her father as the wife of a peasant; her only hope is Orestes. The play opens in the peasant's small hut in the mountains. The peasant speaks the prologue, after which Orestes and Pylades enter furiously. Various devices lead gradually to the recognition of brother and sister, which comes about through the summoning of the old servant of Agamemnon who rescued Orestes as a baby. In this play the murder of Aegisthus precedes that of Clytemnestra. Aegisthus is portrayed as the real force behind the usurpation; Clytemnestra is represented as being to some degree the victim of circumstances. In this way the play leads up to the murder of Clytemnestra, who is summoned to the peasant's hut on the pretext that Electra has just had a child. Clytemnestra goes inside, to be met by Orestes and Electra. Euripides' presentation is designed to inspire the utmost horror at the act and great pity for the victim. The play ends with the beginning of the madness of Orestes, brought on by the Erinyes.

Elegies of Ch'u (Ch'u Tzu'). Chinese poetry anthology attributed to Ch'ü Yüan of the Chou Dynasty (1027–256 B.C.). It contains 17 poem cycles, dealing with the virtues, largely unrecognized, and the misfortunes of the poet. Also included are nine poems of shamanistic import. The text is corrupt and contains many Han Dynasty accretions. See Arthur Waley, The Nine Songs: a Study of Shamanism in Ancient China (1956); David Hawkes, Ch'u Tzu: The Songs of the South (1959).

Elegy. In classical prosody, a poem in elegiac distichs, in modern prosody a lyric poem of plaintive content and mood, especially a poem of lament for someone or something departed. Thought to be among the greatest elegies in English are Milton's Lycidas, Shelley's Adonais, Tennyson's In Memoriam, and Matthew Arnold's Thyrsis, all poems of mourning, and Gray's Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard in a more general plaintive vein.

Elegy Written in a Country Churchyard. A poem by Thomas Gray (1742–1750, pub. 1751), probably the most popular—and often considered the greatest—poem written in the eighteenth century. Its familiar theme deals with rural life combined with the tragic dignity inherent in man. This pastoral idealization and meditation on death is made even more subjective at the end by the introduction of "The Epitaph."

Elephant in the Moon, The. A satire on the Royal Society by Samuel Butler. In it, an elephant discovered on the face of the moon is revealed to be only a mouse imprisoned in the telescope. The work was first published in a posthumous collection of Butler's Genuine Remains in Verse and Prose (1759).

Eleusinian Mysteries. Ancient Greek religious rites. They were performed in honor of Demeter and her daughter Persephone (Kore) at Eleusis in Attica. Begun probably in late Mycenean times, with the introduction of the worship of Demeter to Eleusis, these rites became the most famous mysteries in the Greek or Roman world, and continued to be celebrated well into the Christian era. The secret of the rites was so successfully guarded that, in spite of their tremendous importance, no one can say precisely what they were. It is known, however, that they centered about the abduction of Persephone by Hades, her return, and the subsequent reconciliation of Demeter and Hades. In short, they celebrated the revival of corn in the springtime. Also connected with the rite in some way was a youthful godling Iacchus, about whom almost nothing is known, except that he was later identified with Dionysus.

Elgar, Sir Edward (1857–1934). English composer. His most notable compositions include the oratorios Dream of Gerontius (1900), The Apostles (1903), and The Kingdom (1906); Pomp and Circumstance, a march (1902); Enigma Variations (1899). He also wrote symphonies, songs, and sonatas.

Elgin marbles. A collection of Greek sculptures, mainly of the Phidian school (see Phidias). It includes the bulk of the surviving sculptural decoration of the Parthenon. The works were removed from Athens (1803–1812) by Lord Elgin and were purchased by the British government in 1816. The collection now resides in the British Museum in London.

Elia. See Charles Lamb.

Elidure. Legendary king of England. According to Geoffrey of Monmouth he became king after his elder brother Artegal (or Arthgal) was presumed dead. When Artegal returned after a long exile, Elidure nobly resigned the throne to him. The story appears in John Milton's History of Britain and William Wordsworth's poem Artech and Elinure.

Elihu. A name given to several Old Testament characters, the most notable being found in the book of Job. Here, Elihu attempts to reason with Job about his troubles, after the three false comforters have spoken (Job 32).

Elijah. In the Old Testament, a Hebrew prophet who lived during the ninth century B.C. in the reign of Ahab. During the great drought which he foretold, he was fed miraculously by ravens near the stream Cherith, and by Zarephath's widow whose dead son he restored to life. He opposed the prophets of Baal and challenged them to a dramatic contest on Mount Carmel where two altars were built, one to Baal and one to Jehovah. Baal was deaf to the repeated cries of his prophets, but Jehovah answered Elijah by sending fire from heaven. The story of Elijah's discouragement under the juniper tree is well known (see 1 Kings 19:4). He did not die but was carried up to heaven in a whirlwind (2 Kings 2:11). He cast his mantle on Elisha whom he had anointed prophet in his stead; hence, the phrase Elijah's mantle signifies succession to any office.

Eliot, Charles William (1834–1926). American teacher and chemist. President of Harvard from 1869 to 1909, he helped to make that school one of the best known in the world. In 1894, Eliot helped to establish Radcliffe College for women. Introducing the elective system, he influenced college education everywhere in the U.S. He improved the graduate and professional schools at Harvard, attracting great scholars to the faculty. Believing that "All the books needed for a real education could be set on a shelf five feet long," he was persuaded to edit the famous Harvard Classics, a 50-volume set.

Eliot, George. Pen name of Mary Ann or Marian Evans (1819–1880). English novelist. Of the first rank among Victorian novelists, George Eliot was the daughter of a Warwickshire land agent, a man of strong Evangelical Protestant feeling. Her severance from her father's religion was a great source of conflict for her and distress for him. Early in the 1840's she became acquainted with the new and "advanced" biblical and theological scholarship of Germany and translated D. F. Strauss's Leben Jesus (Life of Jesus, 1846). After her father's death, she began to associate with a group of rationalists in London; one of them, John Chapman, took her on as assistant editor for the Westminster Review, a post she held from 1851 to 1854. She became a friend of Herbert Spencer and through him met George Henry Lewes. Although Lewes was separated from his wife, he could not obtain a divorce, and, in 1854, George Eliot entered into an irregular union with him that lasted until his death (1878); they lived as man and wife and were accepted as such by their friends.

George Eliot was on the verge of middle age before she wrote her first fiction. In 1857 (when she assumed her pen name) her first works of fiction—three short stories—appeared in Blackwood's and were published later that same year as the volume Scenes of Clerical Life. Adam Bede, her first full-length novel, followed soon after, and in 1860 came two more novels: The Mill on the Floss and Silas Marner. Inspired by a trip to Florence, she did a great deal of painstaking research in the Italian Renaissance and produced her only historical novel, Romola in 1863. Turning again to the contemporary scene in England she wrote Felix Holt, the Radical and Middlemarch, generally considered her finest work. Her last novel, Daniel Deronda, is peopled with characters who illustrate her moral philosophy. In 1880, two years after Lewes's death, she married J. W. Cross, a clergyman; she died later that same year.

George Eliot's fiction is a vehicle for the serious discussion of social and moral problems of her time; her purpose is primarily didactic. She presents, on a vast scale and crowded with detail, a beautifully observed world of peasants and townsfolk. Her greatest preoccupation is with moral problems, and, more particularly, with the moral development of her characters, many of whom strive with the difficulty of arriving at an individual and mature view of life. See Spanish Gypsy, The.

Eliot, John (1604–1690). English-born American teacher, missionary, and linguist. Emigrating to Massachusetts in 1631, Eliot devoted himself to converting the Indians to Christianity; he established 14 colonies of "Praying Indians" and translated the Bible into the dialect of the Naticks, an Algonquian tribe, in 1663. Most of his work was destroyed during King Philip's War. Eliot also wrote The Christian Commonwealth (1659), in which he advocated a society based entirely on obedience to the Scriptures. The book was suppressed by Massachusetts authorities for fear of angering the restored monarchy in England. See Bay Psalm Book.

Eliot, Lewis. The hero and narrator of the Strangers and Brothers novels by C. P. Snow.

Eliot, T[Thomas] S[teamans] (1888-). American-born English poet, critic, and dramatist. He lived in England from 1914 and became a British subject in 1927. Universally recognized as one of the major institutions of the English language, Eliot wrote in his early years: "As a child, I was taught to regard myself as an American, but that is not the whole story. I was born in St. Louis, Missouri, and my early life was passed in the United States." He was awarded the Nobel Prize in Literature in 1948. Eliot's work includes several poetry collections, novels, plays, and essays. His most famous works include The Waste Land (1922), Four Quartets (1937), and Ash Wednesday (1925). He was a member of the Eliot family, which has produced several notable figures in literature and music, including his brother, the poet and composer Charles Williams Eliot, and his cousin, the composer Edward Elgar.
quickly grew. By the time The Waste Land appeared in 1922, his position was firmly established among the avant garde, and he had become the recognized leader of younger poets.

In technique, as in subject matter, Eliot's poetry broke with the literary conventions of his day, conventions that he felt were inadequate to express the experience of the modern world. In order to capture the spirit of a new age he believed it was necessary to create new poetic forms and a new poetic language, which, in turn, might break up current modes of perception and change contemporary attitudes. Perhaps his most important technical innovations were twofold: instead of "poetic diction" Eliot used the idiom and natural rhythms of speech, and instead of relying on abstractions he expressed himself solely through sense impressions (see Objective Correlative and Dissociation of Sensibility). The subject matter of his early poems also reflected the world about him. For material, he drew upon his own social background as well as the surrounding squalor of an industrial age. In such poems as Prufrock, Portrait of a Lady, Gerontion, the Sweeney poems, The Waste Land, and The Hollow Men, he depicts the emotional impoverishment, boredom, and spiritual emptiness common to both the dying genteel world of devitalized social rituals and the new urban materialistic world. Eliot's later poetry reflects his conversion to the Anglican Church in the late 1920's. In poems such as Ash Wednesday, The Journey of the Magi, and Marina, he portrays alternating stages of despair, skepticism, hope, and joy in the soul's struggle for renewal. Four Quartets is generally acknowledged to be the major work of this latter period. It is a series of four long meditative poems in which Eliot weaves together his complex thoughts on the irreconcilable tension between man's position in the space-time world and his desire to escape its dimensions. He has also written poems in a lighter vein, such as The Hippopotamus and Old Possum's Book of Practical Cats (1939).

In an early essay, Tradition and the Individual Talent, Eliot propounded the doctrine that poetry should be impersonal, transmuting private feelings into general truths. This view is closely connected with his belief in the indebtedness of the poet to the tradition of the past and the necessity for incorporating the experience of the past into the poetry of the present. His early critical essays were collected in The Sacred Wood (1920), a volume that established his reputation as a critic and had an enormous impact on contemporary literary taste. By exalting the Elizabethan dramatists, metaphysical poets, Dante, and the French poets of the 19th century, and attacking Milton and the Victorian and Romantic poets, he effected a general change in literary values. Among his critical works are The Use of Poetry and the Use of Criticism (1933) and The Classics and the Man of Letters (1942). After joining the church, Eliot devoted much of his prose writing to cultural problems, particularly the place of religion in society. After Strange Gods: A Primer of Modern Heresy (1934), The Idea of a Christian Society (1939), and Notes Towards a Definition of Culture (1948), are books of social criticism. In For Lancelot Andrewes, a collection of essays published in 1929, Eliot declared himself "an Anglo-Catholic in religion, a classicism in literature, and a royalist in politics," and the labels have stuck, despite his changing views. For from his earlier exploratory essays in literary values to his later essays, in which he frequently reversed or modified his previous positions, Eliot's judgments have often been taken to be dogmatic, though in fact he has always viewed them as tentative.

In Poetry and Drama (1951) Eliot discusses the problems he faced in attempting to revive poetic drama for the modern stage. His first play, MURDER IN THE CATHEDRAL, is generally considered to be his best. It was followed by THE FAMILY REUNION, THE COCKTAIL PARTY, The Confidental Clerk (1954), and The Elder Statesman (1958).

Long associated with Faber and Faber, Ltd., British publishers, of which he is currently a director, Eliot received the Nobel Prize for literature in 1948.

Elise. The illicit queen of Tyre in Quinault's tragedy ASTRAE, Ros De Tyr. Elise is also the name of the miser's daughter in Molière's comedy L'AVARE.

Elisia. In the Old Testament, a Hebrew prophet. He was selected by Elijah to be his successor. In contrast to his predecessor, Elisha was urbane and sophisticated. His ministry lasted for 50 years during which time he was counselor to four kings of Israel (c. 850-790 b.c.). His work (which included many civic projects) and his prophecies are recorded in II Kings.

Eliss. See Dido; Faerie Queene, The.

elixir of life. The potion of the alchemists to prolong life indefinitely. It was imagined sometimes as a dry drug, sometimes as a fluid. Elisor (Arabic, a powder for sprinkling on wounds) also meant among alchemists the philosopher's stone, the tincture for transmuting metals, and the name is now given to any sovereign remedy for disease, especially one of a quack character.

Eliza. A character in Harriet Beecher Stowe's Uncle Tom's Cabin.

Eliza. Eliza Draper, wife of an official of the East India Company, to whom Laurence Sterne addressed The BRAMINE'S JOURNAL and the Letters of Yorick to Eliza (1775). The letters are a sentimental account of their passionate but Platonic love affair in 1766. The Letters of Eliza to Yorick (1775) and Letters supposed to have been written by Yorick and Eliza (1779) are forgeries.

Elizabeth I. Elizabeth Tudor (1533-1603). Queen of England (1558-1603), daughter of Henry VIII and Anne Boleyn. Elizabeth was proclaimed queen by Parliament on the death of her elder half-sister, Mary Tudor. She re-established Protestantism and the supremacy of the English ruler over the Pope, ended foreign religious and political domination, and helped, with her claim of being "mere English" as his refusal to take a foreign consort, to strengthen England's growing sense of nationality and unity. Among the major political events of her reign was the execution of Mary, Queen of Scots, for complicity in a Catholic plot against the life of Elizabeth. The death of the Catholic queen may have been the final stroke that moved Philip of Spain to action; the following year, in 1588, he sent the "invincible Armada" against England, and was soundly defeated.

Elizabeth's long reign was marked by domestic peace and prosperity, by the growth of England as a naval power, by the beginnings of what was to be come a great colonial empire, and by a general spirit of expansion that was reflected in both geographical and literary exploration; it was an age that produced perhaps more "firsts" and more "greats" in English literature than any other. Elizabeth's Court was the source of much of the lyric poetry of the time, and she numbered among her courtiers such men as Sir Philip Sidney. Edmund Spenser honored her as Gloriana, Queen of Fairyland, in his allegory The Faerie Queene. She was fond of plays and poems, and many of Shakespeare's plays were presented at her Court. See Elizabethan.

Elizabeth is a central character in Sir Walter Scott's Kenilworth. She is the subject of Lytton Strachey's biography Elizabeth and Essex, and Maxwell Anderson's drama Elizabeth the Queen.

Elizabetli. Pen name of Countess Russell, born Mary Annette Beauchamp (1866-1941). English novelist. She is best known for Elizabeth and Her German Garden (1896), a semiautobiographical novel in diary form; it is a meditative, sensitive, sometimes satirical account of the author's trying life in Prussia as wife of Count von Arnim. Her second husband was a brother of Bertrand Russell.

Elizabethan. Pertaining to the 45-year period (1558-1603) of the reign of Elizabeth I of England, sometimes considered the English renaissance. In both literary and political history her reign divides itself into two distinct phases: an early, seemingly undistinguished period in which Elizabeth's tenuous hold on royal authority and the Elizabethan writer's experimental probing of his language (which had hitherto been regarded as an inferior, even barbaric tongue) were gradually becoming consolidated; and a later, dazzlingly brilliant and enormously successful era. This began, in the political realm, with the execution of Mary Stuart (Mary Queen of Scots) in 1587, and in literature with the publication of Edmund Spenser's The Shepheard's Calendar (1579). It is this latter quarter of a century that is generally identified as Elizabethan. (In drama the term is often used to embrace all activity relative to the stage until the closing of the theatres in 1642.) Nevertheless, it was in the early period that the groundwork was laid for the later, great achievements.

The first two years of Elizabeth's reign were marked by two events in literature, insignificant in themselves but representative of interests, attitudes, and linguistic developments that were to bear fruit near the close of the century. These were the publication of the first full translation of Vergil's Aeneid into English and of the first extant edition of A Mirror for Magistrates. These two works, both of which were extremely popular throughout the reign, reflected the chief sources of the Elizabethan inhertance: classical humanism, with its grand and noble conception of the dignity of man, and in the case of A Mirror for Magistrates, the medieval tragic sense of life, with its intense concentration on the fact of death. From these diverse sources, the later Elizabethans managed to fuse a picture of man and the universe that was sweeping and heroic, and at the same time circumscribed by the overwhelming sense of human mortality. One of the most comprehensive portrayals of this conception is Christopher Marlowe’s Dr. Faustus. Surely the finest expression of this vision is Hamlet’s apostrophe on man:

What a piece of work is a man! how noble in reason! how infinite in faculty! in form and moving how express and admirable! in action how like an angel! in apprehension how like a god! the beauty of the world! the paragon of animals! And yet, to me, what is this quintessence of dust?

Although the greatest literary achievement of the Elizabethans lies in drama, their accomplishments in the other genres are only slightly less substantial. To the development of English the Elizabethans contributed, on one level, the ornate, rhetorical, expansive prose derived from Cicero and culminating in the massive dignity of Richard Hooker’s Laws of Ecclesiastical Polity. On another level, the Elizabethans enriched the language through the racy colloquialism that characterizes the prose pamphlets of the period, written by such men as Robert Greene, Thomas Nashe, and the pseudonymous “Martin Marprelate.” (See Marprelate Controversy.) Probably the finest prose achievement in this latter category is John Florio’s magnificent translation of the Essays of Montaigne.

In poetry the great monument of the Elizabethan era (as well as being in tone and style a very representative poem) is Edmund Spenser’s The Faerie Queene. In the six elaborately constructed, enormously detailed allegorical books comprising the poem, he attempted to write a great moral epic that would glorify Elizabeth and England as Vergil had glorified Augustus Caesar and Rome. Spenser also contributed to another significant Elizabethan poetic development: the sonnet sequence. But here both Spenser, in his Amoretti, and Sir Philip Sidney, in his pioneering sequence Astrophel and Stella, were overshadowed by the mysterious, unorthodox, untitled collection we know as the Sonnets of Shakespeare. Other well-known sequences were Samuel Daniel’s Delia and Michael Drayton’s Idea.

It is in the drama of the period, however, that the vitality, splendor, and diversity we identify as Elizabethan is exuberantly displayed. Emerging from the primitive morality plays and interludes of the earlier part of the century, Elizabethan drama, possibly as a result of the new upsurge of national identity and patriotic fervor that followed the victory over the Spanish Armada, began to attract a new school of playwrights. Chief of these was the titanic figure of Christopher Marlowe, defying all moral and metrical conventions as he attempted to capture the spirit of the age in his portraits of the “overreachers” in such plays as Tamburlaine, The Jew of Malta, and Dr. Faustus. The instrument of Marlowe’s expression was blank verse, a new and staid meter that he transformed into a thundering drum roll, later characterized by Ben Jonson as “Marlowe’s mighty line.” At the same time the drama was developing in lesser keys. George Peele and John Lyly experimented to combine light fantasy and romantic comedy in such plays as The Arraignment of Paris and Endymion to the delight of the Court, the agency which stood as a buffer between the acting companies and the growing militance of the Puritan opposition to the stage. This opposition forced the players to set up their theaters outside London proper in a suburb on the south side of the Thames. Playgoing became increasingly popular among the non-Puritan population. Plays such as Thomas Kyd’s The Spanish Tragedy enjoyed an unparalleled success and the Theatre (the first public theater, built in 1576 by James Burbage) became so popular that by 1585 a second playhouse, the Curtain, was being used to accommodate the overflow.

Into this heady atmosphere stepped the man whom many regard as the supreme literary artist of all time. In 1588 William Shakespeare was 24 and, like the nation itself, newly conscious of his powers and of the capacity of the English language as a fit vehicle to serve those powers. He capitalized on the revolutionary treatment that Marlowe had given blank verse, achieving a greater range and flexibility than his predecessors had been capable of, and he responded to the newly developing national mood with a series of chronicle plays (the Histories). These plays helped to articulate a sense of national self-identity best epitomized by John of Gaunt’s speech in Richard II:

This royal throne of kings, this sceptred isle,
This earth of majesty, this seat of Mars,
This other Eden, demi-paradise,
This fortress built by Nature for herself
Against infection and the hand of war,
This happy breed of men, this little world,
This precious stone set in the silver sea,

This glorification of the nation proved, however, to be the least of his contributions. He managed to run the gamut of comic potential, ranging from the slapstick farce of The Merry Wives of Windsor through the romantic fantasy of A Midsummer Night’s Dream to the dark satire of Measure for Measure. Finally he produced in his tragedies those explorations of the human condition that are familiar to everyone.

By 1600, three years before the death of Elizabeth, the Elizabethan vision had begun to fade, and the literature that mirrored the life of its time underwent a change (see Jacobean). The literature of the 1590’s, a literature rich in harmony, profuse and expansive in detail, and essentially affirmative in its vision of life, had lost its vitality and splendor and had already begun to be parodied. The old queen, now almost 70, and childless, had not designated an heir. The earl of Essex, whose brilliance and daring epitomized the era, had suffered a humiliating defeat in the Irish campaign, and insurrection was in the air. The Renaissance in England was over and the “counter-Renaissance” had begun.

Elizabeth of Hungary, St. Patron saint of queens, being herself a queen. She died in 1231 at the age of 24, and her day is November 19. She gave so bountifully to the poor that she starved her own household. One day her husband met her going out with her apron filled with something heavy, and demanded of her what she was carrying. “Only flowers, my lord,” said Elizabeth, and to save the lie God converted the loaves of bread into flowers. She is the heroine of Kingsley’s dramatic poem The Saint’s Tragedy (1846).
Elle et Lui (He and She, 1839). A novel by George SAND. The author describes in retrospect her version of the love affair with Alfred de Musset. Musset had died two years earlier, but his brother Paul published Lui et Elle as a protest against Miss SAND's interpretation of the affair and its complexities.

Elliott, Anne. See Persuasion.
Elliott, Ebenezer (1781–1849). English poet called the Corn-Law Rhymers because much of his verse consisted of invective against the corn laws, so ruinous to England's laboring classes. These poems were forceful and cogent enough to play a significant part in the repeal of the laws. He wrote The Village Patriarch (1829); Corn Law Rhymes (1831); The Splendid Village (1833–1835); and many miscellaneous poems.

Ellis, [Henry] Havelock (1859–1939). English psychologist, essayist, and art critic. He is best known for his pioneering and at that time scandalous studies in sexual psychology, including Man and Woman (1894), Studies in the Psychology of Sex (6 vols., 1897–1910), and The Erotic Rights of Women (1918). The Dance of Life (1923), in which the dance is made to symbolize the vital rhythm of the universe, was his most popular book. He also wrote essays on art and literature, Little Essays of Love and Virtue (1922, 1931), and My Life (1939), a revealing autobiography. He was a close friend of the novelist Olive Schreiner.

Ellison, Ralph [Waldo] (1914- ). American writer. Ellison, who studied at Tuskegee Institute, has lectured at a number of colleges and published work in various periodicals in both the essay and short-story form. His impressive first novel, Invisible Man, which won a National Book Award, was hailed as an outstanding work on the Negro in America.

Ellwood, Thomas (1639–1714). English Quaker and writer. Milton's friend and Latin reader, he is said to have suggested the writing of Paradise Regained (1671). His books include a Sacred History of the Old and New Testaments (1705–1709) and an Autobiography (1714).

Elmer Gantry (1927). A novel by Sinclair Lewis. It deals with a brazen ex-football player who enters the ministry and, through his half-plagiarized sermons, his physical attractiveness, and his unerring instinct for promotion, becomes a successful evangelist and later the leader of a large Middle Western church. Carefully researched, the novel was realistic enough to shock both the faithful and unfaithful.

Elmire. In Molière's comedy Le Tartuffe, the wily wife of Orgon. By a clever ruse she unmask the hypocrite Tartuffe and finally convinces her husband of his duplicity.

Elm Tree on the Mall, The (L'Orme du Mail; 1897). A novel by Anatole FRANCE. The tale centers about the actions of its protagonist M. BERGERET.

Elohim. See Jehovah.

Elohistic and Jehovahist Scriptures. Elohim and Jehovah (Yahwe) are the most common of the many names given by the ancient Hebrews to the Deity. The fact that they are both used with interchangeable senses in the Pentateuch gave rise to the widely held theory that this group of five books as written in two different periods. The Elohist paragraphs, being more simple, more primitive, more narrative, and more pastoral, are held to be the older. The later Jehovahistic paragraphs, which indicate a knowledge of geography and history, seem to exalt the priestly office, and are of a more elaborate character, were subsequently woven into the Elohist narrative.

This theory was originally stated by Jean Astruc, the French scholar, in his Conjectures sur les mémoires originaux, dont il paraît que Moses s'est servi pour composer le livre de la Genèse (1753), a book that formed the starting point for all modern criticism of the Pentateuch.

Elpenor. In Homer's Odyssey, a member of Odysseus' crew. He falls from a roof during their stay with Circe and is killed. He is the first man Odysseus meets when visiting Hades, and he asks that his body be buried.

Elsie Dinsmore. Title of one of the 26 Elsie Books by Martha Finley (real name, Martha Farquharson, 1828–1909). The books deal with the trials and adventures of Elsie Dinsmore. Elsie is a pious little prig who remains a paragon of all the virtues, although she is persecuted by associates, relatives, and even her father. Her story proved so popular with 19th-century girl readers that the series was continued until long after Elsie had become a grandmother.

Elsie Venner: A Romance of Destiny (1861). A novel by Oliver Wendell Holmes. Elsie, whose mother was bitten by a snake while carrying her, has distinctly serpentine qualities. Isolated from other human beings, she never removes the heavy gold necklace that presumably hides an unsightly and revealing mark. Although she falls in love with Bernard Landgon, the young schoolteacher, her strange and repellant nature forbids the return of affection. Only her Negro mammy understands Elsie's mystery. In the attempt to humanize herself, the girl dies. Through Elsie Venner, Holmes opposes the Calvinist belief that a human being may be held morally responsible for an inherited flaw. He considered the doctrine of Original Sin a barbarism. For Holmes, the physician or psychologist, not the preacher, should treat the morally diseased.

Elsinore. The English name of Helsingor, a city in Denmark on the island of Zealand, It is the site of Kronberg Castle, the traditional scene of Shakespear's Hamlet.

Elsir. A great painter in Marcel Proust's Remembrance of Things Past. His work is an idealized composite of that of a number of French impressionist painters, particularly of Claude Monet's.

Eluard, Paul. Pen name of Eugène Grindel (1895–1952). French poet. After his interest in Dadaism Eluard became, with André Breton, one of the founders of surrealism. Les Nécésités d'une vie et les conséquences des rêves (1921) gave flashes of the "living reality" of dreams; Mourir de ne pas mourir (1924) built a bridge of pure and passionate poetry between dream and reality. Then Eluard became the poet of the couple, of loving communion with the other as well as with the universe of nature: Capitale de la douleur (1926), L'Amour, la poésie (1929), La Rose Publique (1934) and Les Yeux fertiles (1936). Deeply moved by the Spanish Civil War and World War II, Eluard extended this communion to the fraternity of mankind in Livre ouvert.
Elzevir. A family of Dutch publishers and printers flourishing in the 17th century. A style of type was named Elzevir after this family. Books of their printing are of special value. The best are editions of classical and French authors. The Elzevir imprint is found in 1213 books: 968 Latin, 44 Greek, 126 French, 32 Flemish, 22 Oriental, 11 German, 10 Italian.

Emancipation Proclamation (Jan. 1, 1863). A proclamation issued by President Abraham Lincoln declaring that all slaves in areas still in rebellion against the U.S. were henceforth to be free. The proclamation did not affect slaves in the border states nor in territory under U.S. military occupation. A preliminary proclamation had been issued on Sept. 22, 1862 after the Union success at Antietam had bolstered the likelihood of ultimate victory over the Confederacy. Slavery was not completely abolished until the adoption of the 13th amendment to the Constitution in 1865.

Embla. The first woman, in Norse mythology, created out of an elm by the gods Odin, Vili, and Ve. The first man was Ask.

Emblem books. Originally a symbolic picture illustrating a moral idea, but during the Renaissance and baroque periods, when emblems were immensely popular, the picture was always accompanied by a motto or pungent phrase and a short poem (epigram, sonnet, etc.) expanding upon the moral significance of the scene depicted (see IMPRESA). The illustration is commonly called the cor (heart), and the accompanying poetry the anima (soul) of the emblem. An example would be a depiction of Hercules standing between a bearded sage representing wisdom and a satanic figure representing vice. The motto above says, "When Vice and Vertue Youth shall woe/ Tis hard to say, which way 'twill go." Below the picture is a stanza in which the idea is treated at greater length (from George Wither's A Collection of Emblems, 1635). A famous European collection, or emblem book, was that of the Italian Andrea Alciati; in England, Francis Quarles' Emblems, Divine and Moral (1635) was immensely popular. Emblems and emblem books, the latter's appeal boosted by the development of engraving, influenced many poets in their choice and treatment of subject matter and descriptive detail.

Emerald Isle. Ireland. This term was first used by Dr. William Drennan (1754-1830), in the poem Erin. It refers to the bright verdure of the island.

Emerson, Ralph Waldo (1803-1882). American poet, essayist, and philosopher. After a studious but undistinguished career at Harvard, and a brief period of teaching, Emerson entered the ministry. He was appointed to the Old Second Church in Boston, his native city, but soon became an unwilling preacher. Unable in conscience to administer the sacrament of the Lord's Supper, he resigned his pastorate at the death of his young wife, Ellen Tucker. The following year, 1832, he sailed for Europe. Visiting Landor, Carlyle, and Coleridge, he began to formulate his own philosophy. Emerson's friendship with Carlyle was both lasting and significant. The insights of the British thinker helped him to reconcile some of his own confusions. Two other trips to England followed, in 1847 and 1872, but neither was as vital as the first.

On his return to New England, Emerson became known for the challenges to traditional thought in his essays and lectures. His first book, Nature, summarized his major ideas. In 1835, he married Lydia Jackson and settled in Concord, Mass. The center of a literary circle, "the sage of Concord" became the... chief spokesman for Transcendentalism. Other members of his group included Margaret Fuller, Bronson Alcott, Henry Thoreau, and W. E. Channing.

Among Emerson's best work are Essays, First and Second Series, Poems (1847), Representative Men, English Traits, and The Conduct of Life (1860). His best-known addresses are The American Scholar and The Divinity School Address. For two years, 1842-1844, Emerson edited the Transcendentalist journal, The Dial.

Emerson's philosophy is characterized by its reliance in intuition as the only way to comprehend reality. His conception of life as "spiritual vision" owes much to the work of Plotinus. He was influenced, too, by Swedenborg and Boehme. Like Thoreau and Whitman, he was attracted to mystical Indian literature and philosophy.

Emerson's unit of thought is the epigrammatic sentence. His prose style is not clearly organized or easy to follow, but has moments of great brilliance. Emerson wrote a poetic prose; intuitive rather than logical in form, the essays are ordered by recurring themes and images. His poetry, on the other hand, is often called harsh and didactic; he knew himself to be a "husky singer."

A believer in the "divine sufficiency of the individual," Emerson was a steady optimist. His refusal to grant the positive existence of evil caused Melville, Hawthorne, and Henry James, Sr., among others, to doubt his judgment. In spite of skepticism, Emerson's beliefs—that each man shares in the Over-Soul, or God; that Nature is a manifestation of Spirit; and that man possesses, within himself, the means to all knowledge—expressed in his memorable sentences, are of central importance in the history of American culture. See Boston Hymn; Brahma; Concord Hymn; Days; Each and All; Merlin; Threnody; Jones Very.

Emes and Enen. The brothers in Sumerian mythology who were created by the god of the air, Enli. Each was assigned special duties connected with fertility; they quarreled, however, over which was the more important, and Enli decided in favor of Enen, who thereafter was designated the god of farmers. This tale may have been a forerunner of the story of Cain and Abel.

Emilia. (1) In Shakespeare's Othello, Iago's sharp-tongued wife and faithful waiting-woman to Desdemona. When she publicly denounces Iago's villainy, she stabs her, and she dies at her mistress' feet.

(2) Heroine of Boccaccio's Teseida.

Emilia Galotti (1772). A tragedy by Gotthold Ephraim Lessing in which Emilia, a middle-class girl, unwitfully awakes the passion of a prince, who has her bridegroom murdered and hopes to make her his mistress. In the end, to preserve her honor, her father stabs her to death.

Emile, ou l'Éducation (1762). An educational romance by Jean Jacques Rousseau. It describes, in loose, story form, the bringing up of the boy Emile according to what Rousseau calls the principles of nature. He emphasizes character formation, learning by experience and observation, physical exercise, the mastery of useful trades, judgment, and hard work. One of the dominant principles of Rousseau's theory is that the child is not an adult and should not be treated as such until he is ready. Hitherto education was usually inconsiderate of the various psychic stages of a child's development; Rousseau deserves credit for showing that the object and the methods of education should change with these stages. In Book IV, Emile's moral and religious education is summarized in the Profession de foi du vieillard Savoyard. The natural religion that Rousseau advocates in this section led to his persecution by the church authorities. Book V deals with the education of Sophie, a girl intended for Emile's wife. Her unique purpose is to please men, and to be charming, modest, virtuous, and submissive. (Curiously enough, in his sequel Emile et Sophie, Rousseau relates the infidelity of Sophie and the breach of their marriage.) The work had a notable influence on pedagogical theory in France, Germany, and England. It was immediately translated into English. The thinking of educators of the 19th century, Friedrich Wilhelm August Froebel, Johann Heinrich Pestalozzi, and Johann Friedrich Herbart, is derived directly from Rousseau.

Emilie. The "divine Emilie," to whom Voltaire wrote verses, was Marquise du Châtelet, with whom he lived at Cirey from 1734 to her death in 1749.

Emireno (Emirene). In the Jerusalemme Liberata of Tasso, a Christian convert to the Islamic faith and the chief of the allied forces of the infidels against the Crusaders. He is killed by Goffredo, the Christian commander, during the final battle for the holy city.

Emma (1816). A novel by Jane Austen. Charming, willful Emma Woodhouse has no responsibilities other than the care of an indulgent father. To amuse herself she plays with other people's affairs, planning their lives the way she sees fit. Her first project is pretty, vapid Harriet Smith, a parlor-boarder at a nearby school and the natural daughter of an unknown person. Encouraging her to aspire to the hand of Mr. Elton, a young clergyman, Emma prevents Harriet's accepting the offer of the far more appropriate Robert Martin, a young farmer. Emma's plans go awry: the snobbish, ambitious Elton first aspires to Emma's hand, and, haughtily rejected, chooses instead the crass, pretentious daughter of a wealthy family for his bride. Other moves, notably Emma's interference in the courtship of Jane Fairfax and Frank Churchill, are not any more successful. When Harriet shows signs of attachment to Knightly, a somewhat dictatorial but frank and generous gentleman, Emma appreciates the folly and thoughtlessness of her meddling; she discovers that her long friendship with Knightly has grown into love. Propriety and common sense prevail: Emma marries Knightly, Harriet her first love, Robert Martin. The book is much concerned with the themes of self-delusion and notions of class and decorum fundamental to English society. See Miss Bates.

Emmanuel, Pierre. Pen name of Noël Mathieu (1916— ). French poet and essayist. Both the style and the symbolism of much of his poetry were inspired by the Bible and Greek mythology: Tombeau d'Orphée (1942), Sodome (1946), and Babel (1951). The volumes Jours de Colère (1942) and La Liberté guide nos pas (1945) are poetry of the Resistance. Cantos (1944), Chansons du dé à coudre (1947), and Versant de l'age (1958) represent elaborate attempts to express the mystery of existence. Poésie raison ardente (1947), Qui est cet homme? (1947), and L'Ouvrier de la onzième heure (1954) are prose essays.

Emmet, Robert (1778-1803). Irish patriot. The son of a liberal-minded, well-to-do physician, Robert became involved, while still in college, in the cause of the United Irishmen; the latter fought, sometimes with violence, for the rights of Irish Catholics who had been deprived of their land under Cromwell. In 1803, Emmet was part of an insurrection that was put down by the British. Although he could have escaped, he remained in Dublin to protect his followers and the girl he loved, Sarah Curran. He was tried for treason, and executed at the age of 25 by hanging and decapitation.

Empedocles (Empedolcès; fl. 444 B.C.). A Greek philosopher, interested in biology, medicine, and physics. In his work called On Nature, an epic poem in hexameters, Empedolcès identifies four immutable elements in the universe: earth, air, fire, and water. The things of this world are produced by the association and dissociation of these elements. Empedolcès called the two opposing forces love and strife. In another poem, called Purifications, Empedolcès approves of the doctrine of transmigration. According to Greek tradition, Empedolcès threw himself into the crater of Mt. Etna. In his poem Empedolcès on Etna, Matthew Arnold found the philosopher a figure expressive of his own pessimism.

Emperor Jones, The (1920). A play by Eugene O'Neill. Set on an island in the West Indies, the play deals with a former Pullman porter, Brutus Jones, who has set himself up as emperor. When the play begins the natives are beginning to revolt; and Jones is forced to flee. As he rushes through the jungle the tom-toms beat steadily, and he becomes more and more the victim of his own terror. Jones retrogresses on the evolutionary ladder, becoming a participant in a slave auction and finally the victim of his—and mankind's—aboriginal fears. In the end he is killed by the natives who use the silver bullets Jones had said were necessary. A sensation as a play, Emperor Jones was also successful as an opera (1933) by Louis Gruenberg, with a libretto by Kathleen de Jaffa.

empirics. An ancient Greek school of medicine founded by Serapion of Alexandria (2nd century B.C.). He contended that it is not necessary to obtain a knowledge of the nature and functions of the body in order to treat diseases, but that experience is the surest and best guide (Gr. empeirës, experienced, from peirâ, trial). The empirics were opposed to the dogmatic school founded by Hippocrates, which made certain dogmas or theoretical principles the basis of practice. Now, any quack or pretender to medical skill is called an empiric.

empyrean. In Ptolemaic philosophy, the last of the 5 heavens. It was made of pure elemental fire and was the seat of the deity. Called the empyrion from the Gr. empyrêma, deity, it was employed in Christian angelology—for instance, by Dante in his Divine Comedy—as the abode of God and the angels.

Emperor William (1906- ). English poet and critic. A mathematician before he became a poet, Empson wrote verse characterized by scientific references and by wit, ingenuity, and obscurity. The poet's complicated notes on his verse add to the crossword-puzzle effect. His poems are restrained in technique, often being written in such traditional forms as the villanelle and terza rima. They are sometimes humorous. Poems appeared in 1935 and The Gathering Storm, in 1940. Although he has published little poetry, his work had a great effect on the young English poets of the 1950's such as Kingsley Amis, A. Alvarez, Donald Davie, Thom Gunn, and John Wain.

Empson's criticism has also been influential. A leading Cambridge critic, he has been influenced by the ideas of I. A. Richards. His critical works include Seven Types of Ambiguity (1930), Some Versions of Pastoral (1935), The Structure of Complex Words (1951), and Milton's God (1962), a controversial attack on Christianity, denouncing it as a cruel religion.

Emps telegram (1870). The report of an interview between King Wilhelm of Prussia and the French ambassador at the resort of Ems, originally sent to Bismarck. Bismarck condensed the text so that it appeared to report a diplomatic insult, and then released it to the press. The resulting international furor incited declaration of the Franco-Prussian War, just as Bismarck had planned.

Encina or Enzina, Juan del (1468?-1529). Spanish dramatist and poet. Encina took minor orders as a youth, was in the service of the duke of Alba, and later lived in Rome. In 1519 he visited the Holy Land, where he was ordained and said his first mass. Often called "the father of Spanish drama," he is best known for his dramatic pieces, usually called élogos or "elogues," which were published in various editions of his Cancionero (1496). Most of these plays have religious themes and were performed before aristocratic audiences; the characters, however, are usually Spanish peasants, realistically and humorously portrayed, who speak a rustic dialect, sayagües, that became a stock theatrical device. Among his most famous works in this genre are the élogues in which Pascuala, Mango, and the squire Gil appear; the Carnival Élogoa de Antruejo, and the farcical Auto del repelón, dealing with a brawl between peasants and Salamanca students. After his stay in Rome, Encina wrote three plays which reveal the influence of Italian pastoral poetry and represent an attempt to elevate the drama; these are Élogoa de Plácida and Victoriaño, Élogoa de tres pastores, and Élogoa de Cristino y Febea. He also wrote numerous villancicos, or Christmas carols, which were used at the end of most of his plays.

Encyclopédie, ou Dictionnaire raisonné des sciences, des arts et des métiers (Methodical Dictionary of the Sciences, Arts, and Trades, 1751-1780). A French encyclopedia. Based originally on an idea to translate the English Cyclopaedia of Ephraim Chambers, the work's whole scope was greatly expanded by Diderot, and his coeditors d'Alembert and Louis de Jaucourt. The contributions of such famous encyclopédistes (also called philosophes) as Voltaire, Helvétius, Montesquieu, Rousseau, Quesnay, Turgenot, and Diderot himself helped make it the great literary monument of the 18th century, even though many of the articles were written by hack writers under the direction of Jaucourt. The work mirrors that French brand of 18th-century philosophical skepticism and scientific determinism which was derived from Bacon, Locke, and Descartes among others. Its spirit of inquiry led it to combat superstition; the supernatural; religious authority, intolerance, and persecution; unequal distribution of wealth; fiscal privileges; and abuses of justice. Attention was paid to the latest scientific discoveries, particularly in the natural sciences. Reforms in government, education, and commerce were prudently advocated, also. One new feature of the encyclopedia was the inclusion of articles and plates on the mechanical trades (weaving, paper-making, printing, etc.). An ingenious system of cross references often led the reader to another article that ridiculed the contradictions accepted in the theological discussion of the first article; hence, the Jesuits opposed it, causing the encyclopedia to be temporarily suppressed in 1752 and 1759 by the government, and condemned by the pope in 1759. Though the history of the suppression of this work is generally recounted as one of energetic and efficacious persecution by the government and the church, in fact this is not so. The relatively few attempts at suppression were half-hearted on the part of the government and had little or no effect on its final publication. Mme. de Pompadour along with several government officials, among whom was Chrétién-Guillaume de Malesherbes, an enlightened administrator and director of la librairie (the governmental censoring body), did everything in their power to encourage its publication for the public good. Diderot, with the help of Jaucourt, worked tirelessly to bring out the "clandestine" edition in Paris, which appeared in 17 volumes (plus 11 volumes of plates) between 1751 and 1772. Diderot had no hand in the five-volume supplement (1776-1777), or in the two analytical index volumes (1780). Other editions followed. In spite of its imbalance (for example, six lines devoted to Alper and one column to artichoke recipes), errors, and unacknowledged plagiarism, it was a highly successful business venture. At one point there were 4,000 subscribers, and the profit is said to have been 300 per cent.

Endgame (Fin de partie; 1957). A play by Samuel Beckett. The blind chair-bound autocrat Hamm, whose parents Nagg and Nell are confined to ashcans, learns from his servant Clov of the disappearance of objects and the deaths of people in a disintegrating world.

Endicott or Endecott, John (1589?-1665). English-born governor of the Massachusetts Bay Colony. He served as the first governor of the colony (1628-1630) until the arrival of John Winthrop. A zealous Puritan, he persecuted Quakers and the followers of Thomas Morton. He is the title character of Endicott and the Red Cross (1837), a short story by Nathaniel Hawthorne, and of one of Longfellow's New England Tragedies (1868).

End of Summer (1936). A play by S. N. Behrman. Set in a summer home in Maine, it includes a brilliant portrait of a psychiatrist.

Endymion. In Greek mythology, a beautiful youth, sometimes a shepherd. As he slept on Mount Latmus he so moved the cold heart of Selene, the moon goddess, that she came down and kissed him and lay at his side. He woke to find her gone, but the dreams that she gave him were so strong and enthralling that he begged Zeus to give him immortality and allow him to sleep perpetually on Mount Latmus. Other accounts say that Selene herself bound him by an enchantment so that she might come and kiss him whenever she liked. There are, in fact, innumerable explanations in myth of Endymion's sleep. Keats used the story as the framework of his long allegory, Endymion (1817), and it forms the basis of Lyly's comedy, Endimion, the Man in the Moone (1585).

Enfants Terribles, Les (1929; also translated as The Holy Terrors). A novel by Jean Cocteau about the fantasy-world rituals and fierce amoral passions of a group of children.

Engels, Friedrich (1820-1895). German socialist and collaborator of Karl Marx, whom he met in Paris in 1844. Together they wrote The Communist Manifesto, although Engels gave Marx the credit for its theoretical formulation. Engels completed Capital after Marx's death.

England, rulers of. Egbert, originally king of the West Saxons, conquered the other English realms, making himself master of all England.

England's Helicon (1600). One of the miscellanies (see Tottel's Miscellany), or collections of poetry, published in the Elizabethan period. It is distinguished by the good taste shown in the selection of its contents, and unique in that the editors deliberately limited the book to pastoral poetry. It contains work by Shakespeare, Sidney, Spenser, Drayton, Lodge, among others.

English Bards and Scotch Reviewers (1809). A long verse satire by Lord Byron. Neoclassical in flavor and written in heroic couplets, it was occasioned by the harsh reception given to Byron's first book of poems, Hours of Idleness (1807), by the Edinburgh Review. In the poem, Byron not only attacks his critics but the older generation of English romantic poets as well, including Wordsworth, Coleridge, Scott, and Southey.

English Traits (1856). An analysis of the English people by Ralph Waldo Emerson. The book grew out of a series of lectures delivered by Emerson after two visits to England. He discusses some of his English contemporaries, Wordsworth, Carlyle, and Coleridge. Amused by English pomp, the American is impressed by the practical sense of the English and by their writers.

English Woman's Love Letters, An. See Laurence Housman.

Engstrom, Albert (1869-1940). Swedish author and artist. Engstrom's fame rests upon his perceptive cartoons and on the illustrated stories that depict life in Smaland and on the Stockholm archipelago. Among his collections of tales are Samlaede berättelser (1915-1934), and Nationaluppslag (Twelve Tales, 1934). As editor of the comic journal Strix from 1924 to 1940, he revealed a keen but kindly satirical wit.

Enki. The Sumerian god of water and of wisdom. He lived near the ancient city of Eanna in his watery palace in the Aaru—probably the Persian Gulf. This god, like his later Babylonian counterpart Ea, was principally responsible for ordering the functions of the elements that affect life on earth. Cleverest of the gods, he provided the land with sweet water, fathered Utu, the goddess of plants, found a way to rescue Inanna from the underworld, and saved mankind from extermination in the great flood. He was not, however, infallible. While in his cups, he let the seductive goddess slip away with his "divine decrees," which would give supremacy to her favored city of Erech instead of to Eridu. His attempt to create man was a pathetic failure, and it was left to the goddess Ninlil to mold of clay a satisfactory human being.

Enkidu. A friend of Gilgamesh in the Epic of Gilgamesh. Molded of clay, and at first a wild man who lives with the beasts, he becomes a hero who first defeats Gilgamesh in wrestling, then becomes his fast friend. They share various adventures together, but Enkidu is condemned to death by the gods for his part in slaying the storm bull of heaven. Gilgamesh's search for the secret of eternal life is the result of his grief over Enkidu's death. He appears also in Sumerian mythology.

Enkindu. A Sumerian farmer god. He disputed with the shepherd god Dumuzi for the favor of Inanna and won it.

Enlightenment, the. The 18th century. This period is variously called the Age of Reason and, in France, Le Siècle des Lumières because its writers as a whole applied reason to religion, politics, morality, and social life. Aside from purely historical events, the 18th century does not lend itself to a chronological view; its unity lay not in a coherent development of progressions of ideas, but rather in the intellectual energy and enthusiasm which characterized its writers. Intensely aware of their heritage and dependency upon the ancients, these men clarified, sifted, and developed this heritage.

The rule of Louis XIV had been an oppressive one, and the somber religious tone which it took before the Sun King's death caused the reaction to it to be all the greater. The government, continued by the monarchies of Louis XV (1715-1774) and Louis XVI (1774-1793), fell ever deeper into discredit. The failure of John Law's Mississippi Bubble (June, 1720), the increasing national debt due to royal prodigality, and the repeated hiring and dismissal of incapable finance ministers—and even of... capable ones like Cardinal Fleury, Turgot, and Necker—all contributed to the economic instability of France. The necessity for reform became clear. The century culminated in the French Revolution, a crisis that reflected these economic and social ills; the application of reason to the human situation, so typical of the 18th century, perhaps made it clear to the middle class that the old order did not have to prevail. In most aspects of French culture, the influence of the increasingly economically independent bourgeoisie was to replace that of the aristocracy.

The Enlightenment began by breaking down the older forms of metaphysical and philosophical knowledge; Cartesianism, with its spirit of systems (esprit de système), was replaced by a systematic spirit (esprit systématique)—the a priori by the a posteriori. In contrast to the 17th century, in which reason represented tradition, authority, stability, the 18th century saw reason as a tool, a means to authority. Questions were no longer envisaged under the aspect of pure thought, but were examined from a social and practical point of view. This preoccupation with the useful caused men to turn to the physical world writers like Voltaire, Diderot, d’Alembert, and Montesquieu made literature out of the natural sciences, astronomy, law, travel, philosophy, politics, and education. The investigation into natural and social phenomena, what we would today broadly designate as science, was called philosophy in the 18th century. The philosophe represented an ideal, as did the honnête homme in the 17th century, or as the universal man characterized the Renaissance. The philosophers of this age were in search of a concrete anthropology, a knowledge of man in general. This common goal by no means implied a homogeneous point of view: one has only to compare the differences between Voltaire and Rousseau, Buffon and Condorcet, Diderot and Hственные.

It is perhaps Condorcet who, in his Sketch for a historical picture of the progress of the human mind (written in 1793–1794) best summarizes the optimism and faith in human reason so characteristic of the age. In tracing man from the dawn of history, Condorcet first emphasized the liberation of mankind from ignorance, tyranny, and superstition by means of his science and his reason; he then sketched a hopeful future in which mankind would be free, equal in wealth, in education, and with sexual equality; he finally envisaged the moral, intellectual, and physical improvement, indeed perfection, of humanity that would arise through better instruction, laws, and institutions.

Enlil. The Sumerian storm-god of the air. He was born of the union of An (heaven) and Ki (earth), who were regarded as joined together. Enlil separated them—the element air may have been thought to separate the vault of heaven from earth by its own expansion. Enlil married Ninlil, who bore him three gods of the underworld (Nergal, Ninazu, and an unknown god) and Nanna (the moon god) in turn became the father of Utu, the sun. Next Enlil impregnated his mother Ki and produced Nintu, another earth goddess. Enlil became more important in the pantheon than his father An, and in turn he was himself to a degree supplanted from his place as principal god by Enki. Enlil was the chief god of the Sumerian city of Nippur. In the Babylonian period, Marduk took on many of his attributes, and Adad became the storm-god.

Ennead (from Gr. ennea, nine). A group of 9 units, as, for example, the 9 gods found in the pantheon of the ancient Egyptians.

The title The Enneads was given to the works of the neo-Platonist Plotinus because of the six books contains nine chapters.

Ennius, Quintus (239–169 B.C.), Latin poet. The earliest of the great epic poets of Rome, he is regarded as one of the founders of Latin literature. His successful use of Greek meters in his dramas and epic poetry ushered in a new era in the development of literary Latin. As an epic poet, employing the Greek dactylic hexameter in Latin, he is a precursor of Vergil, Rome’s greatest poet.

Enobarbus, Domitius. In Shakespeare’s Antony and Cleopatra, a trusted officer of Antony. He deserts Antony after Actium, but when the latter magnanimously sends him his treasure, he is so remorseful that he commits suicide. His astute and witty observations on the behavior of Antony and Cleopatra make him one of Shakespeare’s most engaging secondary characters.

Enoch Arden (1864). A narrative poem by Alfred Tennyson. Arden is a seaman who has been wrecked on a desert island, and returning home after a long absence finds his wife married to another. Seeing her happy and prosperous, he resolves not to make himself known, so he leaves the place and dies of a broken heart. Hence, any story that involves a long-lost mate returning to discover his spouse remarried is often described as having an Enoch Arden plot.

Enormous Room, The (1922). An autobiographical novel by E. E. Cummings. It describes a period of imprisonment in a French military concentration camp near Paris (1917–1918), where the author was incarcerated on a false charge of treason. Cummings’ own experiences and the personalities of the various other prisoners are presented with their individual psychological reactions to the injustices of their treatment. Ironically structured on John Bunyan’s Pilgrim’s Progress, the book is highly vivid, often even lyrical, in its bitter attack on man’s inhumanity to man.

Enquiry Concerning Political Justice, An (1793). A political and philosophical treatise by William Godwin with the subtitle “its influence on General Virtue and Happiness.” The author examines the systems of government, law, and religion of his day, and concludes that monarchy is corrupt and all government, in fact, an obstacle to the development of mankind. It urges the abolition of all social and political institutions created by man, including government, law, wealth, and marriage, and places total confidence in the fundamental perfectibility of man. This treatise was regarded with horror by the conservative elements of the day, and had a great influence on the English Romantic poets, particularly Shelley.

Enten. See Emesh.

entente; entente cordiale (Fr.). A cordial understanding between nations; not quite amounting to an alliance, but something more than a rapprochement. The term is not new, but is now usually applied to the entente between England and France.
that was arranged largely by the personal endeavors of Edward VII in 1906.

Triple Entente. A friendly alliance between Great Britain, France, and Russia before World War I. During the war Great Britain, France, and Italy were referred to as the Entente.

Little Entente. An alliance between Czechoslovakia, Yugoslavia, and Romania entered into after the signing of the Treaty of the Trianon (1920), with the avowed purpose of defeating any Hungarian plan for a restoration of the Hapsburgs.

Entwicklungsroman. See Bildungsroman.

Enuma elish. See War of the Gods.

Envy (Zavist'; 1927). A novel by Yuri Oliosha. A notable work of fiction, it portrays the struggle of the individual against the encroachments of the growing collectivist society in Soviet Russia. This hackneyed theme is rendered fresh by Oliosha's imaginative use of images and language and by his creation of the memorable characters Ivan Babichev and Nikolai Kavalerov. Both are disaffected with the society, though for different reasons: Babichev because he sees the danger of human feelings being destroyed, and Kavalerov because he yearns for personal glory and envies the less talented people who can adjust and make their way in the new system. Babichev's brother, Andrei, is a representative of the adjusted man. He is a director of a Soviet food combine, briskly going about his business, which consists of planning new, cheap cafeterias to feed the masses. Whether Andrei actually does triumph over his good-for-nothing brother Ivan is, at the book's end, a moot point. This fact apparently began to worry Soviet critics who praised the novel at first and then began to criticize it severely.

Eos. In Greek mythology the goddess of the dawning. She is the daughter of Hyperion and Thea and drives across the sky in a chariot drawn by two horses. It was Eos who asked Zeus to give Tithonus immortality; however, she forgot to have Tithonus made eternally youthful.

Eothen, or Traces of Travel Brought Home from the East. See Alexander William Kinglake.

Epé, Charles Michel de l’ (1712-1789). French abbé. He was a pioneer in the development of a system of mental communication for the deaf and dumb.

Epeios. Builder of the Trojan Horse. He was the principal craftsman with the Greek forces at Troy.

Ephesian letters. Characters assumed to be of a mystical nature by the Ephesians, a people greatly addicted to magic. Magic characters were marked on the crown, cincture, and feet of Diana. At the preaching of Paul in Ephesus, many converts who had used "curious," or magical, books burned them (Acts 19:19).

Ephesians, The Epistle of Paul the Apostle to the. A New Testament book. Traditionally ascribed to Paul, this letter was probably written by some one who used his name and borrowed freely from his epistle to the Colossians for its content. Consisting of two parts, it first explains God's plan to unite all humanity in Christ and then shows the role of the Church in the working of this plan.

Ephialtes. See Orus.

Ephyre. A prehistoric Greek city. It was identified in Classical times with Corinth. Founded by Sisyphus, it was later ruled by Jason. Indeed, since no significant Mycenean remains have been found at Corinth, it is likely that most myths involving Corinth should be referred to Ephyre, which was probably one of the many Mycenean towns unearthed on the Isthmus near the present Corinth.

epic. A very long narrative poem presenting adventures on a grand, heroic scale organically united through a central figure of heroic proportions. The adventures are made up of episodes which contribute to the formation of a race or nation. The earliest epics were formed from various works of unknown poets. Among the best-known of these folk epics are the Iliad and Odyssey (attributed to Homer), the Anglo-Saxon Beowulf, the East Indian Mahabharata, the Spanish Cid, the Finnish Kalevala, the French Song of Roland, and the German Nibelungenlied.

The so-called classical or art epic is distinctly the work of a single author. Influenced largely by Vergil, it developed certain almost universal characteristics. These include beginning in medias res, the invocation of the muse, and the statement of the epic purpose. Other conventions, usually observed by writers of epic, are descriptions of warfare and the use of the supernatural. Familiar classical epics include Vergil's Aeneid, Dante's Divine Comedy, Tasso's Jerusalem Delivered, Spenser's Faerie Queene, and Milton's Paradise Lost.

Epicasta (Epikaste). The name given to Jocasta in the Iliad and some other Greek works. See Oenopis.

Epic Cycle. The name given a series of very early (c. 800-500) epic poems by authors other than Homer or Hesiod, all of which are lost, but which are recounted in later synopses. They deal with events connected with the Trojan War not included in the Iliad or the Odyssey. Poems of the Epic Cycle include Theogonia and Titanomachia, on the creation and early history of the world; Cypris, on the theft of Helen; Aethiopis, Ilias Parva, Iliu Peris, and Nostoi, continuations of the Iliad; and Telegony, on the death of Odysseus. There are other cyclic poems, such as those on Thebes and on heroes such as Hercules, Theseus, and the Argonauts; strictly speaking, however, the term "Epic Cycle" refers to the Trojan stories alone.

Epicene, or The Silent Woman (1609). A comedy by Ben Jonson. A gentleman named Morose has resolved to disinherit his nephew, Sir Dauphine, by marrying and producing an heir. A man who can bear no noise, he has discovered a perfect mate, a woman who "spends but six words a day." But just after the wedding, Epicene, the silent woman, turns into a shrill harpy who belabors her husband mercilessly. Alarmed, Morose tries mightily to break the match, even going so far as to offer Sir Dauphine a generous allowance and his inheritance. Sir Dauphine then goes to the lady off his hands. Sir Dauphine compiles immediately by plucking off Epicene's wig, revealing that "she" is a boy whom Dauphine has carefully trained and employed.

Epic of Creation, Babylonian. See War of the Gods.

Epictetus (Epiktetos; fl. a.d. 100). A Greek Stoic philosopher. An emancipated slave, Epictetus taught in Rome until A.D. 94, when Emperor Domitian banished all philosophers from the city. He moved to Nicopolis, where he established a school. No written works survive, but his pupil Arrian preserved his essential doctrines in a manual. Epicurus counseled men to wish for nothing that is not under their control. He advocated a serene life, free from unfulfilled desires, and calm in the face of death. He said that a man should behave in life as he would at a banquet, taking only a polite portion of what is offered. See STOICISM.

Epic Theater. A term used by Bertolt Brecht to designate his own style of playwriting as opposed to the style of conventional drama. In conventional drama, suspense is created by means of a tightly woven plot, which constantly develops and welds the play together into a unity; in the Epic Theater, suspense is deliberately avoided, and the play consists of a loose sequence of virtually independent scenes (just as the individual scenes of an epic poem are usually less dependent on one another than those of a conventional drama). Conventional drama atttempts to capture the audience's emotions, to create a powerful and continuous illusion in which the audience will become emotionally involved; the Epic Theater, on the other hand, deliberately avoids playing on the audience's emotions, seeks rather to make the audience emotionally detached, and atttempts to convey its meaning entirely on an Intellectual plane. One specific technique often used by Brecht for achieving the effect of the Epic Theater consists in having a character step to the front of the stage and directly addressing the audience, thus breaking the illusion and inviting the audience to regard the play intellectually.

Epicureus (Epinousus; c. 340-c. 270 B.C.). Greek philosopher, founder of the Epicurean School. The school is often referred to as the Garden, after the place in which Epicurus taught in Athens. Only fragments remain of his work, but his biographer Dio-genes Laertius gives the texts of three epistles and forty maxims, which indicate that Epicurus advocated reliance on the senses. In order to reduce man's anxiety, he posited a materialistic physics, in which the universe consisted of Democritan atoms and void. He tried to eliminate superstition and the dread of death. Pleasure, by which Epicurus meant freedom from pain, is the highest good. Serenity, the harmony of mind and body, is best achieved, he said, through virtue and simple living. The current usage of the term epicure to describe one devoted to sensual pleasures, reflects a misunderstanding of the philosophy of Epicurus.

epicycles. See PROLEMY.

Epigoni (Epigonoi). In Greek mythology, the sons of the Seven Against Thebes. They were led by Alcmæon, a son of Amphiarous, who had demanded that his sons avenge his death at Thebes.
Alcmæon might have forgotten this vow, but Therssander, the son of Polyneices, bribed his mother, Eriphyle, to urge him on, as she had earlier urged Amphiarous. Tiresias had warned the Thebans that the city would fall when the last of the Seven died.
The only one to survive the earlier siege had been Adrastus, king of Argos. On learning that his son, Aegialeus, one of the Epigoni, had been killed in the new siege, Adrastus died of grief.

Tiresias then advised the Thebans to flee the city at once, which they did, under cover of night. Tirisias, who had lived through seven generations of Theban rulers, at last died. The escaping Thebans continued as far as Hestiaea, where they founded the city. The Epigoni razed Thebes.

epigram. A brief, pithy, pointed, and witty piece of poetry or prose. The epigram was especially popular as a literary form in classic Latin literature and in European and English literature of the Renaissance and neoclassical periods. Coleridge wrote of it:

What is an epigram? A dwarfish whole,
Its body brevity, and wit its soul.

epilogue. (1) The final part of a work of literature (except a play), completing and rounding it off;
the opposite of preface. (2) After a play, the speech (frequently in verse) addressed by an actor or group of actors to the audience; the opposite of prologue.
(3) In rhetoric, the last of the five divisions of a model oration. (4) In music, the final section of a composition, the coda. A free use of the term occurs in Goethe's Epilogue to Schiller's Bell (Epi log zu Schillers Glocke), written in commemoration of the younger poet's death.

Epimenides (7th century b.c.). A Cretan poet and philosopher. According to Pliny (Natural History) he fell asleep in a cave when a boy, and did not wake up for 57 years, when he found himself endowed with miraculous wisdom.

Epimetheus. In classic myth, the brother of Prometheus and husband of Pandora. The name signifies afterthought, in contrast to Prometheus, forethought.

Epinal, Louise Florence Pétronille de la Live d' (1726-1783). French author. She is well known on account of her friendship with Diderot, d'Alembert, Baron d' Holbach, Baron de Grimm, and others.
For Rousseau she built a cottage in the garden of her château near Montmorency. About her Mémoires et correspondance (1818), Sainte-Beuve has written:
"The memoirs of Mme d'Epinal are not a work, they are an epoch."

Epinicia (Epinikia). Odes of victory in national games, as the Olympic, Pythian, Delphic, Nemean, and Isthmian games. There are among Pindars extant works 44 Epinicia.

Epiphany (Gr. epiphaneia, appearance or mani-estation). The feast on January 6, commemorating the showing of Christ to the nations, at the time of the visit of the Magi. One of the oldest of Christian festivals, it originally was the feast of the birth of Christ, as it still is in the Eastern Churches. In England it was called Twelfth Day, from which comes TWELFTH NIGHT.

epiphany. A term coined by James Joyce for the sudden revelation of the essential nature of a thing, person, or a situation. It is the moment in which "the soul of the commonest object ... seems to us radiant," and may be manifested through any chance word or gesture. Among Joyce's earliest works were little sketches or prose poems, which attempted to record such moments; he called them epiphanies.
Some are incorporated in his novel Stephen Hero; in this novel he also gives the clearest explanation of what he means by epiphany.
Epipsychidion (1821). A poem by Percy Bysshe Shelley. The title, a word coined by Shelley from Greek, means "this soul out of my soul." Of over 700 lines, the poem is addressed to Emilia Viviani, whom Shelley regarded as an embodiment of the ideal love and beauty that he constantly sought. Along with an allegorical history of the poet's soul, the poem includes rapturous praise of Emilia Viviani, a fanciful justification of free love, and a glowing vision of an Edenic isle in the Aegean.

Epistle to Dr. Arbuthnot (1735). A satiric poem by Alexander Pope in the form of a dialogue between the poet and Dr. John Arbuthnot, a physician and man of letters who was a friend of Pope. The poem gives Pope's judgment on his own work and pitilessly attacks his contemporaries, especially Joseph Addison, who is characterized as "the jealous Atticus," and Lord John Hervey who is satirized as the effeminate "Sporus."

Epistolae Obscurorum Virorum (Letters of Unknown Men, 1515, 1517). A satire on scholasticism. It is directed specifically at the reactionary University of Cologne, in the form of letters supposedly written by various church figures to a Cardinal Ortuwinus. The book parodies a collection of letters that Ortuwinus himself had published under the title of Epistolae Clarorum Virorum (Letters of Famous Men). The Epistolae Obscurorum Virorum are a central document of German humanism, and implicitly support Johann Rauchlin in his struggles with the renegade Jew Pfefferkorn. The authors are not known, but it is quite likely that Ulrich von Huttten wrote part of the book.

Epithalamion (1595). Lyric poem by Edmund Spenser. It was written to celebrate his marriage. It has been called his highest poetic achievement.

E Pluribus Unum (Lat., One From Many). A motto of the seal of the U.S. First proposed on Aug. 10, 1776, by a committee composed of Franklin, John Adams, and Jefferson, it appeared officially for the first time on a coin in New Jersey in 1786.

Epstein, Sir Jacob (1880-1959). American-born British sculptor. Epstein settled in London after studying in Paris under Rodin. He made no attempt at realism in his figures; as a result his work has been criticized as unpleasantly grotesque. Among Epstein's best known figures are Mother and Child, Rima, Day, Night, Adam, Genesis, Ecce Homo, Venus. He has also done portrait busts of prominent statesmen and artists, including Churchill, Bernard Shaw, Joseph Conrad, and Lady Gregory. He wrote an autobiography called Let There Be Sculpture (1940).

Equiscola, Mario (1470?-1525). Italian man of letters and courtier who served the Este family at Ferrara. He wrote a history of Mantua, but was noted in his time for an influential book, De natura de Amore (On the Nature of Love, 1525). It was one of several philosophical treatises on love that spread Neoplatonic doctrine among such Renaissance writers as Ariosto, Tasso, and Castiglione.

Erasmus, Desiderius (1466-1536). Dutch scholar and philosopher, noted for his satire, The Praise of Folly. Erasmus called his religious outlook "the philosophy of Christ," yet his thought was influenced by varied tendencies, some Christian, some secular. He was affected by the German religious tradition, which stressed personal piety in religion, as well as by the work of Italian humanists such as Pico della Mirandola. He adhered to the view of German Pietism that religion was less a matter of ceremony and doctrine than of morality and rational piety, and his classical education and the influence of Pico and other humanists tended to stimulate in him a skeptical, critical attitude toward superstition, clericalism, and excessive religious zeal. He tried to combine the critical, rational, and secular attitude of classical antiquity and the religious piety ofthe German Middle Ages. Aware of ecclesiastical corruption, and hostile to the intolerant dogmatism of the Church of his time, he was at first sympathetic to the Reformation and the attempts of Luther to reform the Church. Yet, humane and moderate at a time when the Reformation was fanning religious conflict, war, and hatred, he was forced finally to oppose the extremism of Luther and become an enemy of the Reformation.

Erato. In Greek mythology, the muse of love poetry. She is usually represented holding or playing a lyre.

Ercilla y Zúñiga, Alonso de. See Araucana, La.

Erda. In Wagner's Ring des Nibelungen, the earth goddess Nerthus.

Erebos (Erebus). In Greek mythology, the son of Chaos and brother of Night; hence darkness personified. His name was given to the gloomy cavern underground through which the Shades had to walk in the course of their passage to Hades.

Erec et Enide. The earliest Arthurian romance in French, written in the 12th century by Chrétien de Troyes. It tells of Erec, a knight at the court of King Arthur, who goes out in search of adventure and stays overnight at a run-down castle; here he meets Enide, the beautiful daughter of the baron who is master of the castle. Erec asks for her hand, marries her, and then retires from the active life of a knight in order to enjoy the pleasures of domestic life. His reputation soon begins to suffer from this, however, and one day he overhears his wife moaning the situation. The knight thereupon blames her for the state of affairs in which they find themselves, and sets out once more in search of adventure, forcing Enide to accompany him. They have amazing adventures in which Erec proves himself to be of prodigious strength and valor, although he is harsh in his treatment of his wife. Eventually she is kidnapped by a robber baron while the knight lies in an apparent state of death. He revives in time to rescue her, and at length they are reconciled.

Erech or Uruk. An ancient Sumerian city. It is best known as the capital of the hero Gilgamesh. It was also the favored city of Isanna, who tricked the god Enki into giving it preference over his own city of Erech.

Erechtheum (Erechtheion). A temple of the tutelary deities of Athens in the Acropolis of Athens. It derived its name from King Erechtheus.

Ereshkigal. The Sumerian queen of the underworld. She is said to have been carried off by Kur into the underworld; the god Enki then went out to do battle with Kur, but the outcome is unknown. Later, however, Ereshkigal reigns in the underworld and appears as a baleful figure in the myth of Inanna’s descent. Her role bears a striking resemblance to that of the Greek Persephone, who was carried off by Hades and thereafter reigned—at least, part of the year—in the underworld. The further parallel of the rivalry of Persephone and Aphrodite for the love of Adonis suggests that Inanna may have descended to the underworld in search of her lover Tammuz; the closely related myth of Ishhtar and Tammuz supports this conclusion.

Erewhon (1872). A satirical novel by Samuel Butler about a Utopia. In the institutions of Erewhon (an anagram of “Nowhere”) Butler satirizes contemporary English attitudes towards religion, science, crime, etc. Erewhon is probably the most brilliant specimen of 19th century Utopian novels. A sequel, Erewhon Revisited, was published in 1901.

Ericson (also Ericsson, Eriksson, Eriksen), Leif (fl. 1000). Norse explorer, son of Eric the Red. According to legend he was returning from Norway to Greenland (c. 1000) when a storm drove his ship to a shore he called Vinland (also Vineland, Wineland), variously said to have been Labrador, Newfoundland, or New England. Thus it is asserted that he, not Columbus, was the first European to discover North America.

Erie the Red (c. 950–c. 1000). Norwegian explorer, father of Leif Ericson. He fled Norway, then Iceland, to escape murder charges. He named Greenland, which had been discovered 100 years before, and founded its first colony about 985.

Eridu. An ancient Sumerian city. In ancient times it was probably on the shores of the Persian Gulf, which no longer extends so far northward. It was the chief center of the god Enki and one of his Babylonian counterpart, Ea.

Erisilla. A giantess in the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, who guards the entrance to Alcina’s enchanted castle. She is defeated by Ruggiero, who then falls prey to Alcina’s subtle enchantments for a time.

Erigena, Johannes Scotus. See Johannes Scotus Erigena.

Erinys. The Furies of Greek mythology. Snaky-haired and hideous women who sprang from the blood of Uranus when he was castrated by his son Cronus, they lived in the underworld, from which they issued to pursue and drive mad those who had committed such heinous crimes as patricide. They appeared prominently in Aeschylus’ Eumenides, where, after relentlessly harassing Orestes for the murder of his mother (see the House of the Areus), give up their vengeful insistence on the ancient law of blood for blood and are thenceforward worshiped in Athens as the Eumenides (Kindly Ones). In some accounts there were three, named Tisipho, Alecho, and Megaera.

Eriphile. The slave girl in Jean Racine’s tragedy Iphigénie en Aulide who, infatuated with Achilles, betrays the plot to save Iphigénie from being sacrificed to the gods. Far from winning Achilles or achieving her rival’s death, her treachery seals her own doom, for the priests demand her sacrifice instead.

Eriphyle. In Greek mythology, the sister of Adrastus and wife of Amphiarus. In a quarrel, the two men agreed henceforth to let Eriphyle decide their differences. Later, Polynices persuaded Adrastus to help him attack Thebes, but Amphiarus, a seer, opposed the expedition of the Seven Against Thebes, foreseeing that only Adrastus would survive it. Polynices won the support of the vain and greedy Eriphyle by bribing her with Harmonia’s necklace. Amphiarus, bowing to his wife’s will because of his vow, joined the expedition, but enjoined his young sons, Alcmaeon and Amphilochoi, to avenge his death on his mother and on the Thebans.

On growing to manhood, Alcmaeon might have forgotten his mother’s crime had she not repeated it at his own expense. Bribed by Thersander, Polynices’ son, she urged Alcmaeon to lead the Ergon against Thebes. Alcmaeon returned from the war victorious and, learning of his mother’s double treachery, killed her. Like Orestes, he was pursued by the Erinyes through many tragic events.

Eris. The goddess of discord, sister of Ares. He flung the apple of discord. See Judgment of Paris.

Erlking or Ger. Erlkönig, king of the310 elders (a mis-translation of the Danish ejer-konge, king of the elves). A malevolent goblin of the Black Forest who lures people, especially children, to destruction. Never actually a part of medieval German folk tradition, he was first popularized by Goethe in his famous ballad Der Erlkönig. One of Franz Schubert’s most famous songs is a setting of Goethe’s poem.

Ermelia. In the Gerusalemme Liberata of Tasso, a Syrian maiden whose life was spared by the Crusader Tancredi (Tancred) at the battle of Antioch. Though she loves him, he is enamored of Clorinda, the warrior maid from Persia. At one point Ermelia, learning that Tancred lies wounded, goes to him in Clorinda’s armor; but both he and the other Christian knights pursue her in the belief that she is Clorinda. Taking pleasant refuge in a beautiful wood, she is cared for by an old shepherd, who extolls the virtues of the pastoral life. Later, in the camp of the Egyptian armies, she informs Vafirno, the shield-bearer of Tancred, sent as a spy, of a plan to disguise a group of infidel warriors in Crusaders’ dress so that they can close with and kill Goffredo, the Christian general. On the way to Jerusalem with Vafirno she encounters the wounded Tancredi and nurses him tenderly back to health. After she takes him back to the camp outside the holy city, she disappears from the plot and Ariosto says nothing further of her fate.

Ermione. In the Orlando Furioso of Ariosto, a Dutch knight who is killed by the Scottish warrior Zerbino when he attempts to slay the old hag Gabrina, an ancient enemy of his family.

Ernst, Max (1891– ). German painter. A member of the surrealists and the earlier Dadaists, Ernst originally studied philosophy while at the universities of Cologne and Bonn. He was drawn into art with no formal training through his friendship with Andre Breton and Louis Aragon. He has written for the surrealist publication Literature and the Surrealist Revolution. His paintings include The Chaste Joseph and Max Ernst showing a Girl his Father’s Head.

Eroica. Beethoven’s Symphony No. 3. Its first title was Sinfonia grande Napoleon Bonaparte. When he learned about Napoleon’s accession to the imperial throne of France (May 18, 1804), Beethoven changed it in a fit of rage to Sinfonia eroica com-
Esenin, Sergei Aleksandrovich

posta per fettiggiare il souvenier d'un grand'uomo (Heroic symphony composed to celebrate the memory of a great man).

Eros. The Greek god of love. According to the accounts in Hesiod, Eros was one of the earliest gods, born of Chaos at the same time as Mother Earth. He came to be the patron god of beautiful young men.
Only in late myth did he become a child, the naughty son of Aphrodite, as he appears in the Argonautica and elsewhere. It was in this form that he was identified with the Latin Cupid.

Eros. In Shakespeare's Antony and Cleopatra, a faithful soldier of Antony. Commanded by Antony to kill him, he commits suicide rather than take his master's life.

Erostratus or Heros. The Ephesian who set fire to the temple of Artemis on the day that Alexander the Great happened to be born (356 B.C.).
This he did to make his name immortal; and, in order to defeat his object, the Ephesians forbade his name ever to be mentioned.

Erra-Pater. The assumed name of the author of an almanac published about 1535 as The Pronostycycion for ever of Erra Pater: A Jewe born in Jewery, a Doctour in Astronomie and Physycye. It is a collection of astrological tables, rules of health, and the like, and is arranged for use in any year. It is occasionally referred to in contemporary literature.

Title page of Erra-Pater's almanac (c. 1535).

THE BRITISH MUSEUM

[He] had got him a suit of durance, that would last longer than one of Erra Pater's almanacks, or a cunstable's brown bill.—Thomas Nashe, Lenten Stuffe (1599)

The almanacs were frequently reprinted, and nearly a hundred years later Samuel Butler says of William Lilly, the almanac maker and astrologer:

In mathematics he was greater Than Tycho Brahe or Erra Pater.
Hudibras, i, i (1663)

Error. See FAERIE QUEENE, THE.

Erymanthian boar. In Greek mythology, a devastating boar. It had its haunt on the mountain range of Erymanthus between Arcadia and Achaia.
It was finally killed by Hercules.

Erythraean main. Literally, the Red Sea. In ancient geography, the Erythraean Sea was the Indian Ocean including the Red Sea and the Persian Gulf.

Esau. In the Old Testament, the eldest son of Isaac and Rebekah. The name itself means in Hebrew "rough" or "covered with hair." In return for a mess of pottage, it was Esau who sold his birthright to his twin brother Jacob (Gen. 25:33-34). In another story, Jacob put on a hairy animal skin and secured the blessing that his blind father had intended for Esau (Gen. 27).

Escalus. In Shakespeare's Romeo and Juliet, the prince of Verona. He orders the feuding Montagues and Capulets to end their public brawls on pain of death and later banishes Romeo from Verona for killing Tybalt.

Escamillio. The toreador in Bizet's opera Carmen.

Escorial or Escorial, El. A royal palace some 25 miles northwest of Madrid, built (1563-1584) by Philip II. Dedicated to St. Lawrence, on whose feast day the battle of St. Quentin was fought in 1557, the building is in the shape of a gridiron, in commemoration of the gridiron on which St. Lawrence was martyred, and is famed for its artistic and bibliographic treasures. It also contains a monastery with a celebrated art collection and library, a church, and a mausoleum where the kings of Spain lie buried.

Escosura [y Morrogh], Patricio de la (1807-1878). Spanish novelist and dramatist. Escosura is best known as the author of romantic historical novels, patterned on the Waverley novels of Sir Walter Scott. The most famous of these is Ni Rey ni roque (1835), whose value lies in its portrayal of the native Spanish landscape.

Escraguille, Alfredo d'. See Viscount Tadnay.

Esenin, Sergei Aleksandrovich (1895-1925),
Russian poet. Born of peasant parents, Esenin used the theme of the passing of rural Russia in his poetry.
One of the finest lyric poets of the early Soviet period, he was for a time connected with a literary group called the Imaginists, founded in 1919, which, like the English and American Imagists, stressed the importance of the image in poetry. His growing popuarity went hand in hand with an increasingly wild life. For a chaotic year (1922-1923), he was married to the dancer Isadora Duncan. His drinking bouts grew in length, and he died, having slashed his wrist in a hotel room in Leningrad and written a farewell poem with his blood, by hanging himself. His suicide was attributed by the Soviet regime to his mental instability, and Esenin's works have not been suppressed as have those of other disaffected literary figures. His four volumes of lyrics, with their glowing pictures of the Russian countryside, are still popular in Russia.

Esmeralda. A beautiful gipsy girl, the heroine of Victor Hugo's novel The Hunchback of Notre Dame.

Esmond, Henry or Harry. The hero of Thackeray's novel Henry Esmond.

Francis Esmond. The supposed heir to the Castlewood estate. He brings up Henry with his own children but allows him to believe he is an illegitimate son of the dead viscount to whom the estate belonged.

Rachel Esmond (Lady Castlewood). The wife of Francis. After his death she marries Henry Esmond.

Frank Esmond. The son of Francis and Rachel. Like Henry, he is an ardent supporter of the Pretender.

Beatrice Esmond. The daughter of Francis and Rachel; a beautiful coquette. After numerous affairs, notably one with James Edward Stuart, the Pretender, which destroys his chances for the throne, she marries Tusher, her brother's tutor, and succeeds in having him made bishop. "She was imperious," says the author, "she was light-minded, she was flighty, she was false. She had no reverence for character and she was very, very beautiful."

esoteric (Gr.). Those within, as opposed to esoteric, those without. The term originated with Pythagoras, who stood behind a curtain when he gave his lectures. Those who were allowed to attend the lectures, but not to see his face, he called his esoteric disciples; but those who were allowed to enter the veil, his esoterics.

Aristotle adopted the same terms; those who attended his evening lectures, which were of a popular character, he called his esoterics; and those who attended his more abstruse morning lectures, his esoterics.

Espina [de la Serna], Concha (1880-1955). Spanish novelist. Her works include La esfinge maragata (1913), a regional novel, and El metal de los muertos (1920), which deals with the plight of Spanish mine workers. She is known for her feminine sensitivity and the thoroughness of her narration.

Esprit des lois, De l'. See S P I R I T O F L A W S , T H E.

Esprit Fou, L'. See Jean Claveret.

Espronceda y Delgado, José (1808-1842). Spanish poet. Espronceda was a romantic in word and in deed. An early complexity left him with no choice but to flee Spain; later he was an ardent supporter of liberalism in Holland, while in 1830 he joined the revolutionary cause in Paris. His work stresses patriotic and Byronic themes. His most famous short poems, which appeared in his Poéticas (1840), include A jarifa en una orgia, El verdugo, El mendigo, and A la patria. However, his reputation rests upon two longer works: El estudiante de Salamanca (1839), which deals with the adventures of Félix de Monetmar, a typical romantic hero who witnesses his own funeral, and the long dramatic poem El diablo mundo (1840-1841), considered his masterpiece, which resembles Byron's Don Juan and contains a famous Canto a Teresa, dealing with the poet's lost love.

Esquemeling, Alexander Olivier (1645?-1707). A Dutch buccaneer. His book, De Americasche Zeerovers (The Buccaneers of America, 1678), has become an important source for the history of piracy.

Essay Concerning Human Understanding, An (1690). A treatise by John Locke dealing with the origin and scope of human knowledge. Its basic premise is the empirical origin of ideas, which can be described as the raw material with which the mind works. The mind of man at birth, Locke claimed, is like a blank sheet of paper and possesses no "innate ideas." Man acquires knowledge through experience, which is made up of sensation, impressions of the external world derived through the senses, and reflection, the internal operation of the mind. Knowledge stems from the perception of relationships among ideas. Locke's essay contributed greatly to the growth of 18th-century rationalism and, through its impact on the work of Hume, Kant, and others, influenced modern theories of knowledge.

Essay for the Recording of Illustrious Providences, An (1684). A pseudoscientific treatise by Increase Mather. The work is a collection of reports involving supernatural incidents in New England, which Mather examines in an attempt to prove and illustrate the intervention of God in human affairs. The book was republished twice in the 19th century as Remarkable Providences.

Essay of Dramatic Poesy (1668). A famous critical essay by John Dryden. It is in the form of a conversation among four Englishmen who have ventured out on the Thames in a barge in hope of witnessing an engagement between the Dutch and English fleets. They discuss Greek, French, and English drama, the merits of several dramatists, and the use of blank and rhymed verse in plays.

Essay on Criticism, An (1711). A didactic poem in heroic couplets by Alexander Pope, written when he was 21 or younger. It is a discussion, based on neoclassical doctrines, of literary taste and style, principles of verse structure and of criticism, and gives a brief history of criticism. Standards of taste are to be derived from the order found in nature:

Those rules of old discovered, not devised,
Are nature still, but nature methodized.

The poem is sprinkled with well-known couplets:

A little learning is a dangerous thing;
Drink deep, or taste not the Plerian spring.

True wit is nature to advantage dressed,
What oft was thought, but ne'er so well expressed.

Good nature and good sense must ever join;
To err is human, to forgive divine.

Essay on Man, An (1733-1734). The best-known poem of Alexander Pope. Written in heroic couplets, it is divided into four Epistles, dealing respectively with man's relation to the universe, to himself, to society, and to happiness. The poem is addressed to, and was inspired by Henry St. John, Lord Bolingbroke; it expresses a deistic philosophy (see DEISM) loosely derived from Leibniz, being intended to set forth a coherent scheme of the universe, to “vindicate the ways of God to man” and to declare that “whatever is, is right.” It is optimistic and shows the characteristic neoclassical faith in reason and respect for tradition and authority.

Essays (Essais; 1580, 1588). The masterpiece of the French moralist Michel de Montaigne, creator of the modern discursive essay. Loosely constructed, they ramble at will over any number of subjects like a spirited conversation. The order in which the chapters appear and the division into three books had no logical significance. However, the order in which Montaigne actually wrote has been established and reveals a certain progression in his thought from a classic stoic attitude to one of skepticism (see APOLOGY FOR RAYMOND SERBON) to a final affirmation of the possibilities in human nature. He found that the knowledge he sought resided in man alone, of which he was a representative. To extract knowledge, therefore, he must learn to know himself, as his great model Socrates had taught. In the Essays, he delved into his own experience, gleaned the lessons it held for him, and gradually filled out his “self-portrait.” The ideas he expressed on such topics as death, friendship, virtue, suffering, education, politics, freedom, nature, and man are peculiarly his own. At the same time they are universal, since the truth Montaigne found it rooted in human nature itself. Montaigne was highly original in turning attention from academic learning and intellectual theorizing to man himself. Freed from the prejudices of his time, he cleared the way for the consideration of morality, politics, and justice as separate disciplines, independent of religious dogmas, whose successful practice was closely related to an understanding of human nature. He has endured because every reader has found not only the portrait of Montaigne in the Essays, but glimpses of his own image.

Essays, Counsels, Will and Morall, The. A collection of brief essays by Francis Bacon, published in three editions during his lifetime: a first edition of 10 essays (1597); a second of 38 (1612); and a third of 58 (1625). Generally, they deal with questions of personal or public conduct and philosophical or religious matters. They are written in a witty, pithy, widely metaphorical, and highly original style.

Essays in Idleness (Tsurezure gusa). Japanese miscellany of the Muromachi Period (1333–1600) by Yoshida Kenkō (1283–1350), a court official and Buddhist monk. The 243 passages, of varying length, are mainly sketches, comments, and anecdotes, which reflect both a cynical worldliness and a rather shallow Buddhistic outlook.

Establishment. Popular name for those who, wielding power in Britain, are sometimes humorously and sometimes resentfully considered to form an exclusive society that runs the country. The Establishment is conceived of as an arm of the British upper class, dedicated to preserving the values, rights, and powers of that class, generally at the expense of the rest of the population. Its membership includes virtually all royalty, nobility, money, power, and influence in British life, from debutante to prime minister, from playwright to press baron. The Establishment periodically assimilates to its bosom all competition or opposition than can be ingratiated or bought off and squashes the rest. It is, consequently, self-preserving, self-perpetuating, and unbeatable.

Estes. Italian noble family, lords of the province of Ferrara from the 13th through the 16th century, who took their name from the city of Este (hence also Estensi). Their influence on literature and the other arts was especially great during the Renaissance, when their court was a center of activity in the drama and devoted to the romanzo, or romantic epic. The most famous recipients of their patronage were the poets Boiardo, Ariosto, and Tasso. Among the outstanding Estensi were:

Leonello d'Este (1407–1450). Marquis of Ferrara, man of letters, patron of such artists as Alberti, and himself a minor poet of some ability.

Ercole I d'Este (1431–1505). Duke of Ferrara (1471–1505). Patron of Boiardo, father of two celebrated Renaissance women: Beatrice d'Este (1475–1497), wife of Lodovico Sforza of Milan; and Isabella d'Este (1474–1539), wife of Francesco Gonzaga of Mantua and one of the most learned and cultivated women of her time.

Alfonso II d'Este. Duke of Ferrara (1559–1597). Patron of Tasso, who was forced to confine the poet in an asylum after a mental breakdown. Alfonso's sister Eleonora d'Este (1537–1581) was once thought to have been the object of Tasso's love, and the reason for his confinement, but this is now considered a fiction.

Luigi d'Este (1538–1586). A cardinal and patron of the poet Tasso until 1572, when the latter entered the service of Duke Alfonso.

Esteban Calderón, Serafín (1799–1867). Spanish statesman and author. His most famous work is the colorful Escenas andaluzas (1847), which deals with the picturesque life, customs, and dress of the inhabitants of the province of Andalucia.

Estensi. See Estes.

Esterhazy, Marie Charles Ferdinand Walsin (1847–1923). French army officer. Esterhazy confessed in 1899 that he had forged the documents that led to the conviction of Alfred Dreyfus. He spent the remainder of his life in exile in England.

Esther. The name of an Old Testament heroine (in Hebrew, Hadassah) whose story is told in the book bearing her name. In place of Queen Vashti, King Ahasuerus chose the beautiful Jewish maiden Esther as his queen. She kept her religion secret, on the advice of her uncle and guardian Mordecai, until the evil Haman conceived a plot to murder all Jews in the kingdom. As queen, she made a courageous plea for her people to Ahasuerus, and Haman was hung on the gallows he intended for Mordecai. Orthodox Jews still celebrate the feast of Purim to commemorate this deliverance.

Esther (1689). A tragedy in 3 acts by Jean Racine. Based on the Book of Esther and relating the story of Esther and Haman, the play was written for the schoolgirls of St-Cyr at the request of Mme. de Maintenon; the nature of the composition explains the unorthodox interpolation of songs by a chorus of Israelite maidens.

Esther (1884). A novel by Henry Adams. Esther Dudley, a free-thinking young painter, falls in love with Stephen Hazard, clergyman at St John's. After the death of her invalid father, who strongly influenced her, she marries Hazard. Convinced that their views of life are incompatible, Esther leaves her husband; he finally promises that he will not see her until she discovers a need for faith. There is a suggestion of suicide at the end of the novel. Critics have mentioned that Esther strongly resembles the author's wife, Marian Adams.

Esther Waters (1894). A novel by George Moore. It is the story of an English servant and her long struggle to bring up her illegitimate son. The boy's father, William Latch, who had been a priest in the household where Esther had her first position, finally turns up as a bookmaker and innkeeper and marries her, but her happy married life is only an interlude in a distressed and melancholy existence.

Estienne, Henri (1531-1598). French humanist, printer, and philologist. The son and grandson of illustrious printers, he lived in Geneva, but he also spent much time among the humanists of Paris. His publication of the works of Anacreon (1554) and of other Greek authors exercised a great influence on the Pléiade poets. An admirer of Greek, which he considered the only worthy predecessor to French, he published a Thesaurus græcæ linguae (1572) and five works on the French language. His most important work in French, Apologie pour Hérode (1566), is a satire on his age; Dialogues du nouveau français italienisé (1578), a satire, laments the corruption of the French language by Italian influences.

Estrees, Gabrielle d' (1573-1599). Mistress of Henry IV of France. The daughter of the marquis of Cœuvres, she won the affection of Henry when he visited the castle of Cœuvres and became his mistress in 1592, bearing him several children, who were legitimized. Henry's plans to marry Gabrielle after his divorce from Margaret of Valois were cut short by her death.

Estridis. See Locine.

Etaples, Jacques Lefèvre d' (1453-1536). French theologian. He was one of the first French theologians to reject medieval scholasticism in favor of the humanism of the Renaissance. Rather than teach from commentaries on the classics, as had been done previously, he taught from his own editions of the texts, such as Aristotle's Physics (1492-1494), Ethics (1494), and Politics (1506). Under the influence of Erasmus, he wrote his Latin commentaries (1522) on the New Testament, which led him to reject the body of Church dogma and to consider Scripture as the only sound basis of Christianity. He thus became one of the forerunners of the Protestant reform movement.

Eteocles (Eteokles). In Greek legend, a son of Oedipus and Jocasta. See Seven Against Thebes.

Etoeclus (Eteoklos). See Seven Against Thebes.

Eternal City, the. Rome. The epithet occurs in Ovid, Tibullus, and other writers, and in many official documents of the Empire. In Vergil's Aeneid, Jupiter tells Venus that he would give to the Romans imperium sine fine (an eternal empire).

Eternal feminine. A phrase from the last lines of Goethe's Faust, "Das Eig'ne Weibliche/Zieht uns hinan" ("The eternal feminine/Draws us onward"). Goethe symbolizes this idea in the Virgin Mary at the end of Faust, and both Gretchen and Helen are manifestations of it, but its full meaning is more general. Whereas Mephistopheles represents nihilism, the complete lack of upward striving, the eternal feminine is the goal of all upward striving, of all man's attempts, however futile or misguided, to improve himself or his world.

Eternal Husband, The (Vechnyi muzh; 1870). A short novel by Feodor Dostoevski. It is a brilliant psychological study of the relations between a cuckolded husband and his wife's ex-lover. The husband, Pavel Pavlovich Trusotzki, torments himself as well as the lover, Aleksei Ivanovich Vel'chaninov. He hints to Vel'chaninov that the daughter his wife bore before she died was actually Vel'chaninov's. Trusotzki horribly mistreats the little girl who loves him, nevertheless, and who falls ill and dies when she is separated from him. Vel'chaninov hopes he has seen the last of Trusotzki, but the half-mad little man turns up again, urging Vel'chaninov to come and meet his prospective second wife, as if inviting cuckoldry all over again.

Ethan Brand (1851). A short story by Nathaniel Hawthorne. Brand, setting out to discover the Unpardonable Sin, finally finds it in his own heart. For this "sin of an intellect that triumphed over the sense of brotherhood with man and reverence for God," he destroys himself.

Ethan Frome (1911). A short novel by Edith Wharton. In a typical New England village, the title character barely makes a living out of his stony farm and exists at odds with his wife Zeena, a whining hypochondriac. When Mattie, Zeena's cousin, comes to live with them, love develops between her and Ethan. They try to end their hapless romance by steering a bobsled into a tree; but both end up crippled, tied to a long life of despair with Zeena. Zeena, however, is transformed into a devoted nurse while Mattie becomes the nagging invalid.

Etherge, Sir George (1634-1691). English dramatist. He is noted for such brilliant, if licentious, comedies as The Comical Revenge, or Love in a Tub (1664), She Would If She Could (1668), and The Man of Mode.

Ethiopians (Gr. burnt-faces). A legendary race of people in Greek mythology. The country of the Ethiopians lay south of Egypt, close to the stream of Ocean. Cepheus, husband of Cassiopeia and father of Andromeda, was one of their kings. Memnon, the son of Aurora and Tithonus who fell in the Trojan War, was another. In Greek drama mention is often made of various gods being off in Ethiopia, meaning they were a great distance removed from the action of the play.
Eulenspiegel. The story of the loves between Theagenes and Chariclea, by Heliodoros (Heliodorus), Greek romance writer and later bishop of Tricca, in Thessaly, in the 4th century. The book, considered the earliest of extant Greek romances, was formed by 10 volumes, largely borrowed from by subsequent novelists, and especially by Madeleine de Scudéry, Tasso, Guimard, and D’Urfe.

Etna or Ae Far. The famous Sicilian volcano. In the Aeolian, Vergil ascribes its eruption to the restlessness of Enceladus, a giant who lies buried under the mountain, where the Greek and Latin poets also placed the forges of Vulcan and the smithy of the Cyclopes.

Etourdi, L’ (The Scatterbrain, 1665). Moliere’s 1st comedy. In the play, which is set in Messina, Ledlie has fallen in love with Clélie but has not the money to buy her. His servant Mascarille contrives a series of maneuvers for obtaining the girl, but the hare-brained Lélie fumbles them all. Nonetheless, he finally obtains Clélie.

Être et le Néant, L’. See Being and Nothingness.

Etruria. See Etruscans.

Etruscans. An ancient non-Italic race which established itself in northern Italy some time before the 7th century B.C. Modern Tuscany is roughly the center of what was their kingdom, Etruria. The Tusci, as they were called by the Romans, gained great power in Italy and the western Mediterranean, and held sway over Rome until 509 B.C. when the last Etruscan king was expelled from that city. The Romans feared and hated them for many years thereafter, although they were finally absorbed both politically and culturally into the Roman state. Their art shows influences from Greece, Egypt, Syria, Cyprus, and Mesopotamia, and it, in turn, influenced Roman art. Their language remains undeciphered and their origin a mystery, although the Greek historian Herodotus asserts that they came from Lydia in Asia Minor.

Ettrick Shepherd, the. See James Hogg.

Et tu, Brute. According to Suetonius in his Lives of the Caesars, Julius Caesar on being stabbed by Marcus Junius Brutus, whom he had counted among his trusted friends, exclaimed: Et tu, Brute fili (“You also, O Brutus, my son”). Shakespeare, in his play Julius Caesar, immeasurably heightened the effect of the passage by adding to it an expression of utter despair at such betrayal: “Et tu, Brute! Then fall, Caesar!” The phrase is currently used as an expression of amazement at a sudden revelation of treachery or ingratitude.

Etzel. The name given Atilla of the Huns in German legends such as the Nibelungenlied. He is known as Atli in the Volsunga Saga.

Eucharist (from Gr. eucharistein, to give thanks). The sacrament of the Lord’s Supper (see Last Supper).

Euclid (Eukleides; fl. 300 B.C.). A Greek mathematician. He lived and taught at Alexandria. His Elements (of geometry) in 13 books became the basis of future geometry. He is celebrated in Edna St. Vincent Millay’s well-known line, “Euclid alone has looked upon beauty bare.”

Eugene Aram (1832). A novel by Edward Bulwer-Lytton, founded on a famous murder case. The real Eugene Aram (1704–1759) was a Knaresborough schoolmaster convicted of murdering a shoemaker, Daniel Clarke, to whom he owed money. Bulwer-Lytton makes the youthful Aram commit murder to secure money to further his own idealistic purposes. He goes free for a time, falls in love, all unknowingly, with a relative of the murdered man, and is in his wedding clothes when he is accused of the crime.

Eugene of Savoy, Prince (1663–1736). French aristocrat who served the Austrian Hapsburgs as military commander and administrator. He drove the invading Turks out of Hungary in 1697.

Eugene Onegin (Evgeni Onegin; 1831). A novel in verse by Aleksandr Pushkin. For the influence it had on later Russian literature and in its own right, Eugene Onegin is probably Pushkin’s most important work. The novel relates the experiences of its Byronic hero, Eugene. Bored with the social life in St. Petersburg, he visits his country estate and meets Tatyana, a young girl who falls in love with him and naively offers herself to him. The bored Eugene is not interested and rather bluntly tells Tatyana this. For lack of any other amusement, he then provokes a duel with Lenski, a young romantic poet who has become his friend. Lenski is killed, and Onegin goes back to the world of society. After his departure, Tatyana visits Eugene’s country manor, browses through his library, and begins to realize how hollow and artificial he is.

A few years later when Eugene meets Tatyana, who is now the wife of a prince and a prominent member of St. Petersburg society, her beauty and charm, and perhaps her eminence in society, turn his head. He announces his love to her in a letter, as Tatyana had to him in years before. Tatyana admits she still loves him, but refuses him because of her duty to her husband.

Pushkin’s novel has been a rich source of character types for Russian writers. His use of an ironic narrator to tell the story has perhaps been equally influential. This narrative device was especially well developed by Dostoevski. The libretto for Tchaikovsky’s opera Eugene Onegin (1879) was faithfully adapted from Pushkin’s tale by the composer’s brother Modeste.

Eugénie, Empress. Full name, Eugénie Marie de Montijo de Guzmán. Comtesse de Téba (1826–1920). Wife of Napoléon III, and empress of the French (1853–1871). A leader of fashion, her feminine charm added brilliance to the French court. Her influence upon her husband reveals her lack of interest in liberal and democratic ideas. After the downfall of the empire, she fled to England, where she was befriended by Queen Victoria.

Eulenspiegel or Ulenspiegel, Till or Tyll. Called in English Till Howelglas or Owlglass. A German peasant popular in legend as a player of pranks. Tradition makes him a native of Brunswick who died in 1350. The stories associated with his name tell of the often brutal tricks and practical jokes he Euphues. The chief character of John Lyly’s Euphues, The Anatomy of Wit (1579) and Euphues and his England (1580). Euphues is a witty, pleasure-loving young Athenian who, sojourning in Naples, attempts to win Lucilla, fiancée of his friend Philautus. This procedure estranges him from Philautus, but when Lucilla chooses a third lover, the unworthy Curio, the two friends are united in disillusionment. There is little plot in either romance; the interest lies chiefly in long philosophic discussions and in the elaborate and affected style that gave rise to the terms euphues and euphuism. This style, marked by ingenious antitheses, alliteration, exempla, complicated figures, and skillfully balanced sentences, was for a while in great vogue. It was frequently praised, however, and by 1590 a reaction in favor of a more masculine, pithy style had set in.

euphuism. An artificial style of English speech and writing popular in the late Elizabethan and Jacobean periods. It derived its name from Euphues: The Anatomy of Wit (1579) by John Lyly, who either invented the style or derived it from translations of certain works of a Spanish writer, Antonio de Guevara. It was characterized by exaggerated Baroque refinement and artificiality of style, with plentiful references to mythical birds and beasts, constant alliteration, and the frequent use of unduly neat antitheses. The intent of this elaborate elegance was to woo feminine readers by seeming to edify them, while avoiding scholarly solemnity. The attempt was so successful that even Queen Elizabeth began to affect the euphuistic style. The fashion lasted for half a century, and Lyly had many imitators, notably Robert Greene and Thomas Lodge. (See Euphues.)

eureka (Gr., more correctly heureka, I have found it). An exclamation of delight at having made a discovery. Originally that of Archimedes, the Syracusan philosopher, when he discovered how to test the purity of Hiero’s crown. The tale is that Hiero, a famous tyrant of Syracuse, delivered a certain weight of gold to a smith to be made into a votive crown, but, suspecting that the gold had been alloyed with an inferior metal, asked Archimedes to test it. The philosopher did not know how to proceed, but in stepping into his bath, which was quite full, observed that some of the water ran over. It immediately struck him that a body must remove its own bulk of water when it is immersed; silver is lighter than gold, therefore a pound weight of silver will be more bulky than a pound weight of gold, and would consequently remove more water. In this way he found that the crown was deficient in gold. Vitruvius says: “When the idea flashed across his mind, the philosopher jumped out of the bath exclaiming, ‘Heureka!’ and, without waiting to dress himself, ran home to try the experiment.”

Eureka (1848). An essay on the material and spiritual universe by Edgar Allan Poe. Under the influence of Laplace and Newton, Poe presented his view of the universe as a mystic and material unity. An interesting contribution to scientific and philosophic thought, the piece indicates that Poe saw the possibility of non-Euclidean geometry. Many of his notions are surprisingly in agreement with the latest theories of cosmic origin.

Euripides (480?–405 B.C.). A Greek tragic playwright. A slightly younger contemporary of Aeschylus and Sophocles, and less honored in his time, Euripides is now admired for his remarkable modern attitudes and his profound insights into psychology. In spite of Aristophanes' taunt that his mother had sold vegetables, he was actually high born and well educated. He was twice married, both times unhappily. Although he wrote between 80 and 90 plays, Euripides won prizes only four times. In 409 B.C., he left Athens and died at the court of King Archelaus of Macedonia.

According to tradition, Euripides was withdrawn and bookish, and his plays reveal a sharply inquiring mind that must have made him many enemies in Athens. He was cruelly lampooned by Aristophanes in two comedies, The Clouds and the Thesmophoriazusae. The slanders against him and the relative unpopularity of his plays may account for his leaving Athens when he was still at the height of his powers; yet Sophocles dressed his chorus in mourning when news of Euripides' death reached Athens.

Seventeen tragedies by Euripides remain, beginning with the Alcestis in 438 B.C., and ending with The Bacchantes in about 405 B.C. He also wrote the fragmentary Sater Play Cyclops about 424–423 B.C., and may have written another existing tragedy, Rhesus, of which the date is unknown. Although called a tragedy, the Alcestis has a strong comic element that relates it more closely to the satyr plays.

Three qualities in Euripides' plays have especially attracted modern readers: his biting social criticism, his subtle psychological analyses of his characters, and their humanity, as compared to the larger-than-life remoteness of the heroes and heroines of Aeschylus and Sophocles. Euripides attacked, at least by implication, many attitudes accepted by the Athenians: the subordinate position of women (Alcestis), and foreign women in particular (Medea); the unjust treatment of illegitimate children (Hippolytus); above all, the glory of war (The Trojan Women). His own attitude toward his home city of Athens seems to have changed strikingly in the decade between his Andromache and The Trojan Women. The earlier play bitterly attacks the Spartans as cruel and cowardly, and seems to imply that the Athenians would never behave in such a manner. In The Trojan Women, however, they behave in much the same way to the defeated Trojans, killing the child Astyanax out of fear that the line of Hector will be perpetuated. This play reflected Euripides' disillusionment and outrage over the massacre by Athenians of the inhabitants of Melos, because they had remained neutral in the Peloponnesian War. This disgust with war is evident also in the Iphigenia in Aulis, one of his last plays. Even as early as the Andromache, however, it was clear that Euripides found no glory in war, but only needless suffering and inhumanity.

Some of the irony of the Alcestis, in which Asmetus gallantly allows his wife to die for him, may have been lost on the Athenians, who considered men's lives more valuable than those of women. But in the Medea the sharp-tongued heroine makes his criticism of the treatment of women abundantly clear. Medea, like Electra and Phaedra (in the Hippolytus), is drawn with extraordinarily acute insights into her emotions. They are queens, yet they are extremely human women, rather than heroic personages of tragedy. It was in this reduction of tragic figures to human proportions that Euripides laid the groundwork for the New Comedy that was to come. Euripides' characters speak a much more colloquial language than that of the other tragedians, but it is still poetry of a high order, especially in the choral odes.

Euripides' other plays include Ion, Iphigenia in Tauris, Helen, Electra, Orestes, Hecuba, and The Suppliant Women.

Euryclydon. A tempestuous northeast wind of the Mediterranean. Also called gregule, i.e., the wind from Greece. The first part of Euryclydon is the word eurus, the east wind of classical antiquity; the second clydon, a wave. The word occurs in the New Testament (Acts 27:14) and may be a popular adaptation of the manuscript variant (now preferred) Euraquilo, in which the second part is Aquilo, the north wind.

Europa (Europe). In classic myth, a daughter of Agenor, or, according to the Iliad, daughter of Phoenix. She was famed for her beauty. Zeus in the form of a white bull carried her off and swam with her to the island of Crete. She was the mother of Minos, Rhadamanthus, and Evadros or Sarpedon, and, according to some forms of the legend, of the Minotaur.

Europeans, The (1878). A novel by Henry James. The plot centers about the visit of "the Europeans," Felix Young, an artist, and his sister Eugenia, the morganatically married Baroness Muenster whose husband is about repudiate their marriage, to the farm of their New England relatives, the Wentworths. The Europeans hope to gain much from their American cousins; the baronesse futilely tries to make wealthy marriage, and Felix paints portraits of the Bostonians he meets, eventually marrying akinswoman who is eager to escape from her bleak environment. James tends to treat his themes here comically, and although he portrays the Wentworths' moral solidity with respect, he nevertheless calls attention to their provincialism and timidity.

Euryanassa. See Tantalus.

Eurdyce. See Orpheus.

Eurylochus (Eurylochos). In classic myth, the only companion of Odysseus whom Circe was unable to change into a hog.

Eurythneus. In Greek mythology, a king of Mycenae, and cousin of Hercules. On the urging of Hera, or for some other reason, he imposed upon that hero his twelve famous labors.

Eurytion. (1) A centaur. In Greek legend, at the marriage feast of Pirithous, King of the Lapiths, with Hippodamia, he became intoxicated and offered violence to the bride, thus causing the celebrated battle of the Lapiths and Centaurs.

(2) Eurytion was also the name of the giant guarding Geryon's castle slain by Hercules.
Eusebius of Caesarea (260?-340). A theologian, called the “father of ecclesiastical history.” He wrote a Christian Church history in 10 books and also a universal history.

Eustace and Hilda. A trilogy by L. P. Hartley, consisting of The Shrimp and the Anemone (1944, U.S. title The West Window), The Sixth Heaven (1946), and Eustace and Hilda (1947). In the first book Eustace, as a little boy, tries ineffectually to rebel against his emotionally dominating elder sister. In The Sixth Heaven, as a student at Oxford, he tries to rid himself of Hilda by encouraging a romance between her and one of his schoolfellows. In the last book, after Hilda has been seduced, deserted, and has had a mental breakdown, Eustace restores her to health at the cost of his own life. Their relationship is emphasized by symbolic imagery. As a child Eustace is shown watching a sea anemone (Hilda) devouring a shrimp (himself); the shrimp struggles free, carrying the anemone’s tentacles with it.

Eustace Diamonds, The (1873). A novel by Anthony Trollope. It is the story of the beautiful, mendacious Lady Elizabeth Eustace who tries to keep a valuable diamond necklace she had from her husband before he died. Since it is a family heirloom, the Eustace family tries to retrieve it. Lady Elizabeth fails in her attempt to keep it, is humiliated, and marries the dubious Mr. Emilius, an apparent bigamist.

Eustazio (Eustache of Bouillon). In Tasso’s epic poem Gerusalemme Liberata, the younger brother of Goffredo (Godfrey), the Christian commander. He opposes his brother, urging the Crusaders to help the enchanteress Armida regain her kingdom. Later he becomes her slave until released by Rinaldo of Este.

Euterpe. One of the 9 Muses, the inventor of the double flute. She was the muse of Dionysiac music, patroness of joy and pleasure, and of flute-players.

Evadne. (1) In Greek legend, wife of Capaneus. She threw herself on the funeral pile of her husband, and was consumed with him.

(2) Name of one of the principal characters of Beaumont and Fletcher’s drama, The Maid’s Tragedy (1610). The sister of Melantius, Amintor was compelled by the King to marry her, although he was betrothed to Aspasia, the “maid” whose death forms the tragic event of the drama.

Evangelie, A Tale of Acadie (1847). A narrative poem by Henry Wadsworth Longfellow. The lovers, Gabriel Lajeunesse and Evangeline Bellefontaine, are separated when the British expel the Acadians from Nova Scotia. He is carried to Louisiana, and she to New England. The two spend years searching for one another. Nursing the sick in an epidemic in Philadelphia, she recognizes him as the dying man in her care. Now an old woman, Evangeline and Gabriel are nursed as the two are buried together.

Evangeline Harrington (1860). A novel by George Meredith. The hero, Evan Harrington, is the twin of Melchsiedec Harrington, the tailor, “the great Mel.” Mel, who is ambitious, has succeeded in marrying his three daughters into good society, and with their assistance proposes to make a gentleman of Evan. Through the scheming manipulations of his sister the Countess de Saldar, “the most consummate liar in literature,” Evan is introduced under false pretenses among the guests at a house party at the home of the high-born Rose Jocelyn. Evan and Rose fall in love; she half suspects the truth; he tries to confess it. Meantime “the great Mel” has died, leaving huge debts, and the sensible and forthright Mrs. Mel makes every effort to persuade her son to assume the business. The truth comes out at last, but the romance survives the shock.

Evans, Caradoc (1883-1945). Welsh novelist, playwright, and journalist. He wrote scathing satires on Welsh life: My Neighbors (1919), Nothing to Pay (1930), Waps (1933) and This Way to Heaven (1934).

Evans, Mary Ann. See George Eliot.

Evans, Maurice (1901- ). English-born American actor. He scored a great success in performances of Shakespeare’s plays directed by Margaret Webster, and in Shaw’s Man and Superman. Though usually at his best in roles calling for great vitality, he was particularly moving as Richard II.

Evans, Nathaniel (1742-1767). Colonial American poet. Born in Philadelphia, where he attended a Moravian boarding school, Evans later went to England, where he was ordained a minister in the Society for the Propagation of the Gospel. Settling in Haddonfield, N.J., he wrote ghost Spenserian and Miltonic verse, collected after his death and published in 1772 as Poems on Several Occasions. He was a protégé of William Smith and a close friend of Thomas Godfrey, to whom he dedicated some poems.

Evans, Sir Hugh. In Shakespeare’s Merry Wives of Windsor, a pedantic Welsh parson and schoolmaster of extraordinary simplicity and native shrewdness.

Evans, William (d. 1632). An English giant, nearly 8 feet tall. A porter of Charles I, he carried Sir Jeffrey Hudson, the queen’s dwarf, in his pocket. Sir Walter Scott wrote of him in Peveril of the Peak (1823).

Eve (from Heb. hawwâh, life). The 1st woman, the wife of Adam, and “the mother of all living” (Gen. 3:20). Because Eve persuaded Adam to eat the forbidden fruit in the Garden of Eden, her name is often used as a synonym for a temptress. See Adam and Eve.

Evelina, or The History of a Young Lady’s Entrance into the World (1778). A novel by Fanny Burney. After having been brought up in the country by Reverend Arthur Villars, a friend of her grandfather, Evelina Anville is sent to live in London with Villars’ friend Lady Howard. Here Evelina is introduced to the ways of society. Though courted by Sir Clement Willoughby, whom she recognizes for the rake that he is, she prefers the gentlemanly Lord Orville. However, they are kept apart by numerous misunderstandings and by the mystery and intrigue surrounding Evelina’s birth; she turns out to be the daughter of Sir John Belmont and all ends happily.

Evelyn, John (1620-1706). English diarist and miscellaneous writer. A man whose interests ranged from gardening to numismatics, Evelyn held a number of offices under Charles II and was a prominent member of the Royal Society. His varied background and participation in the political events of his day lend interest and importance to his Diary (1818) which covers the years from 1640 to 1706.

_Eve of St. Agnes, The* (1819). A poem by John Keats. It is based on the legend that on the Eve of St. Agnes, young maidens are allowed a glimpse of their future husbands. Porphyro thus comes to Made-line on St. Agnes' Eve and soon they depart into the timeless world of love. Some of Keats's most striking sensuous imagery is found in this poem.

_Everdene, Bathsheba.* See FAR FROM THE MADDING CROWD.

_Everlasting Mercy, The* (1911). A narrative poem by John Masefield. It describes the redemption of a drunken villager. It was a popular success and influenced other poets. The Georgian poets were influenced by its rural setting, and younger, experimental poets admired its sometimes harsh and colloquial language and its occasional use of oaths.

_Ever Victorious Army, the.* See Charles George Gordon.

_Everyman* (c. 1500). Most famous of the _morality_ plays, probably translated into English from the Dutch _Eckhertijl_ (1495). When Everyman receives a summons from Death, he tries vainly to persuade his friends Fellowship, Kindred, Worldly Goods, Beauty, and others to journey with him; but only Good Deeds remains faithful, although so weak because of Everyman's neglect that Knowledge and Confession must renew his strength so that he can accompany Everyman to the grave. The subtitle reads "A Treatise how the hye Fader of Heven sendeth Dethe to somon every creature to come and gyve a counte of theyr lyves in this Worlde and is in maner of a morall playe."

_Hugo von Hofmannsthal's* _Jedermann* (1911) is a reworking of the play into German verse.

_Every Man in His Humour* (1598). A comedy by Ben Jonson. A familiar classic plot is used as a vehicle for the study of a series of characters, each of whom is possessed by a particular humour or dominating characteristic. The plot, which is rife with incident and misunderstanding, concerns the efforts of Young Knouwell and Wellbred to escape or contain the displeasure of their father and brother-in-law respectively. The characters to whom the title applies are: Captain Bobadil, whose humour is bragging of his brave deeds and military courage, and who is thrashed as a coward by Downwright; Kitely, whose humour is jealousy of his wife and who is befuddled and cured by a trick played on him by Brainworm; Stephen, whose humour is vertand stupidity and who is played on by everyone; Kno'well, whose humour is suspicion of his son; Dame Kitely, whose humour is jealousy of her husband, but she, like him, is cured by a trick devised by Brainworm.

The play exists in two versions, the first of which uses Italian names and places. A sequel, _Every Man Out of His Humour* (1599), has even less coherency of plot but presents a rich collection of the foibles of the time.

_Everyman's Library.* A series of books, popularly priced, including, among its hundreds of titles, most of the best works of the greatest authors of the past. The idea of the library was conceived by Ernest Rhys, and the first fifty titles appeared in 1905.

_Evil May Day.* The name given to the 1st of May, 1517, when the young apprentices in London rioted against the French residents of the city. A serious riot, it was put down only with difficulty. Sir Thomas More, and the earls of Shrewsbury and Surrey were among those helping to quell the riot. Of the thousands of apprentices involved, 278 were arrested, and 15 were hanged, drawn, and quartered. The incident forms the basis of an anonymous Elizabethan play, _Sir Thomas More._

_Ewald or Evald, Johannes* (1743-1781). A Danish national lyric poet and dramatist. He was the author of the first original Danish tragedy _Røfl Krage* (1770) and the national festival drama, _The Fishers* (1779), containing the song, _King Christian Stood by the Lofty Mast,* which has become a Danish national song.

_Ewig-Weibliche,* Das. See ETERNAL FEMININE.

_Excalibur* (OFr., _Escalibor_). The sword of King Arthur in Arthurian romance. It is called _Cailburn* by Geoffrey of Monmouth, and _Caledewich* in the _Mabinogion_. There is in Irish legend a famous sword called _Caladbolg,* a name that is thought to mean "hard belly," i.e., capable of consuming anything; this and the name Excalibur are probably connected.

The way that Arthur gains the sword is variously told in Arthurian legend. In some versions, Excalibur is the sword, magically fixed in a stone, that can be withdrawn only by one who is the rightful king of England, and Arthur proves to be the only knight that can pull the sword from the stone. In Malory's Morte d’Arthur (c. 1469), Excalibur is a gift to Arthur from the Lady of the Lake. After the last battle, when Arthur lies mortally wounded, he commands Sir Bevidere to return Excalibur to the lake. Sir Bevidere throws it into the water, and an arm, clothed in white samite, appears to receive it.

Excursion, The. A long didactic poem by William Wordsworth, forming part of The Recluse (1814). It includes discussions of virtue, religious faith, the industrial revolution and its social effects, and the education of children.

Exemplary Novels. See Novelas ejemplares.

Exeter Book (Codex Exoniensis; c. 975). Collection of manuscripts of Old English poetry, presented to Exeter Cathedral (c. 1070) by Leofric, its first bishop. It includes Widsith, The Seafarer, The Wanderer, Deor’s Lament, and a number of poems attributed to Cynewulf, including Christ, Juliana, and the “riddles.”

Exiles (1918). A play by James Joyce. The central character is Richard Rowan, who, like Joyce himself, is an Irish writer who has spent much of his life abroad and feels estranged from Irish society on his return to Dublin. The action concerns various love entanglements between Richard, his common law wife, Bertha, and his friends. It is a naturalistic play, indebted to the work of Ibsen, whose Joyce greatly admired. Only moderately successful on the stage, Exiles is chiefly important for the light it throws on the development of Joyce’s ideas about the artist’s alienation from society.

existentialism. A contemporary movement in philosophy. Although it grew out of the development of the philosophical tradition all over Europe, it was highly popularized in France in the 1940’s and is usually associated with the theories expressed by Jean Paul Sartre. The beginnings of existentialism are found in the writings of the Danish Sören Kierkegaard, the German Friedrich Nietzsche, and the Russian Feodor Dostoevski; although none of them formulated a logical system. The works of the Germans Martin Heidegger and Karl Jaspers were the most immediate influence on Sartre’s thinking, along with the method of approach of the phenomenologist Edmund Husserl.

All existentialists are concerned with ontology, the study of being. The point of departure is human consciousness and mental processes. In contrast to most previous philosophical systems, which maintain that an a priori essence precedes or transcends the individual existence of people or of objects, the existentialists conclude that existence precedes essence. The significance of this for human beings is that the concept that a man has an essential self is shown to be an illusion. A man’s self is nothing except what he has become; at any given moment, it is the sum of the life he has shaped until then. The “nothing” he begins with is thus the source of man’s freedom, for at each moment it is man’s will that can choose how to act or not to act. However, each such decision affects the future doubly: a man is or should be responsible for the consequences of his actions; and each action necessarily excludes the other potential actions for that moment, and their consequences, and thus at least partially limits the potentialities for future actions.

By what standards, then, should man make his decisions? Man’s mind cannot discern any meaning for this existence in the universe; when he abandons his illusions, he finds himself horrified by the absurdity of the human condition. The question of the existence of God (or some cosmic purpose) is irrelevant, according to Sartre and the atheistic existentialists, because even if He does exist (which they usually deny), He does not reveal to men the meaning of their life. Thus man must create a human morality in the absence of any known predetermined absolute values. Honesty with oneself is perhaps the major value common to existentialist thinking; all their writings describe the emotional anguish of trying to achieve it. Sartre calls the “man of good faith” one who understands the human condition described above and fully accepts the responsibility of the freedom it entails. The “man of bad faith” accepts illusion, is deliberately hypocritical, or tries to use the excuse of “good intentions” to escape responsibility for the consequences of his actions, the ramifications of which always involve other people. The man of good faith judges a potential action by estimating the result if everyone, not just himself, were to perform it. Yet despite the difficulty of choice, he does not withdraw from life, but is engagé, actively engaged in the business of living with himself and with other men.

The Christian existentialists agree that man can never know God’s purpose, but they affirm that it exists and that through a “leap of faith” man can establish his values in accordance with it. However, they too describe the anguish and the responsibility of honest action, for a man can never be certain that his decision is actually based on an intuition of the divine and not on the disguised temptation of evil.

Other writers in the existentialist tradition are Gabriel Marcel, leader of Christian existentialism in France, the Spaniards Miguel de Unamuno and José Ortega y Gasset, and the Jewish mystic Martin Buber.

Albert Camus is often classified with the movement, but he considers many of Sartre’s postulates as much an unjustifiable “leap of faith” as that of the religious existentialists. His “man of the Absurd” resembles Sartre’s “man of good faith” in that both acknowledge man’s lonely condition in the face of the silence of the universe; both reject despair and commit themselves to the anguish and responsibility of living as best one can; and both consider the exercise of one’s own freedom inseparable from the opportunity for all men to exercise theirs, which is contingent on their freedom from poverty, political oppression, and other avoidable external limitations. However, Camus’ writings do not attempt to constitute an organized philosophical system of ontology, as do Sartre’s.

exodos. In classical Greek drama, the last choral passage in a tragedy or comedy, recited or sung as the chorus left the orchestra. See parados.

Exodus (Gr., a going out). The escape by the Jews from their bondage in Egypt (c. 1200 B.C.). Led by Moses, they crossed the Red Sea and wandered for 40 years in the Sinai wilderness, finally reaching Canaan. During this time God revealed His name, His laws, and the destiny of Israel. The covenant between God and Israel promised Israel a “land flowing with milk and honey” in return for homage and reverence.
The book of Exodus is the second volume of the Pentateuch. It gives the account of Moses’ birth, the Israelites’ departure from Egypt, and the beginning of their long journey to Palestine. The 20th chapter of Exodus contains the Ten Commandments.

Exodus is the title of a novel by Leon Uris (1958) about the establishment of the modern state of Israel.

ex sede Hercoleum. From this sample we may judge of the whole. Literally (Late.), Hercules [may be drawn] from his foot. Plutarch says that Pythagoras calculated the height of Hercules (Gr. for the Lat. Hercules) by comparing the lengths of various stadia in Greece. A stadium was 600 feet in length, but Hercules’ stadium at Olympia was much longer; therefore, said the philosopher, the foot of Hercules was proportionately longer than an ordinary foot; and as the foot bears a certain ratio to the height, so the height of Hercules can be easily ascertained. Ex ungne leonem (a lion [may be drawn] from its claw) is a similar phrase.

Expressionism. In European art, a movement beginning about 1900, in which strong expression of the artist’s subjective feelings becomes all important. The expressionist artists sought to portray, not what they perceived from without, as the impressionists did, but only what they felt from within themselves. Moreover, they rejected harmony and beauty as criteria of art, and used violent distortion, instead, in order to represent intense emotions, especially terror, pathos, or agony. The movement flourished mainly in Germany, where it was developed by such groups as Der BLAUE REITER (The Blue Rider) and Die BRÜCKE (The Bridge). Major expressionist artists include the Norwegian painter Edvard Munch (1863–1944); the German sculptor Ernst Barlach (1870–1938); and the Austrian painter Oskar Kokoschka (1886– ).

The roots of expressionistic style may be found in earlier European art, for example, the turbulent lines and violent colors used by van Gogh, the fantastic caricatures in Goya’s graphic work, and the contorted forms of Grünewald’s religious art.

In reference to literature, expressionism denotes a movement, from about 1910 to 1925, closely akin to the corresponding movement in art. Basically, the expressionists tended to stress the individual’s will and the expression of purely internal visionary experience, as opposed to the emphasis in impressionism and symbolism upon the individual’s more or less passive reception of experience, and the emphasis in naturalism upon thorough objectivity.

Expressionism made its first major breakthrough in the field of lyric poetry with such figures as Georg Trakl, Georg Heym, Franz Werfel and Ernst Stadler, whose verses are fired with an ecstatic, hymnlike quality and written in a language that seeks to compress as much concentrated meaning in as small a space as possible. Expressionist drama, likewise, takes compression as one of its principal goals: everything not immediately necessary for expressing the play’s central idea is omitted; the external world is merely sketched in; the dramatic personae are not characters but types, without fully developed personalities and often without names; the successive scenes are often connected only by ideas, not by any continuity of action; and the dialogue is often compressed into a “telegram-style.” Major playwrights include Georg Kaiser, Reinhard Sorge, Walter Hasenclever, Ernst Toller, Fritz Unruh, Ernst Barlach, and Bertolt Brecht in his earlier work. Narrative prose, finally, did not come into its own as an expressionist medium until after the movement had passed its peak. Major figures are Leonhard Frank, Alfred Doblin, and again, Franz Werfel. In terms of history and politics, expressionism may be seen as a continuation of the satirical rejection of complacent bourgeois values begun by such writers as Sternheim and Frank Wedekind; then, with the coming of World War I, most of the expressionists took a strong pacifistic stand. After the war, several of the most powerful figures, including Kaiser, Toller, and Brecht, came out for social revolution; but by the mid-20’s, revolutionary fervor had, for the most part, given way to a resigned skepticism or even outright cynicism, and expressionism was past.

Eyck, Hubert van (1366–1420) and Jan van (1390–1441). The founders of the Flemish school of painting. The brothers van Eyck are reputed to have originated the modern process of oil painting. The only known authentic work by Hubert’s hand is the celebrated altarpiece, the Adoration of the Lamb at Ghent, which was completed by Jan. A polyptych containing over 20 panels, it is generally considered one of the great masterpieces of Western art, in its magnificence of color, skillful handling of light and atmosphere, and deeply religious tone. Both men were artists of keen observation, rendering with vigorous realism and infinite detail the world they saw around them, whether the beauty of flowers, trees, and common objects or the richness of materials and jewels. Through the artistic genius of their religious paintings and portraits and their technical innovations, the brothers van Eyck exerted an enormous influence, revolutionizing painting in northern Europe by breaking with the Gothic tradition and instituting a new realistic vigor.

Eyeless in Gaza (1936). A novel by Aldous Huxley. It is about Anthony Beavis, a weak-minded man who spends most of his life behaving badly in a meaningless, valueless world. In middle age he is converted to Huxley’s own mystical doctrines. Sunbathing with his mistress on the roof of his house, he is bespattered with blood when a dog falls from a passing plane. Beavis goes to Mexico and meets a mystical anthropologist who converts him to pacifism, vegetarianism, and Eastern mysticism, thereby reshaping his character. The title is from John Milton’s Samson Agonistes, who was...

Ezra. In the Old Testament, a Jewish priest who led a band of 1,500 Jews back to Jerusalem from their captivity in Babylon (c. 390 B.C.). The Old Testament book of Ezra, grouped with Nehemiah in early Hebrew canon, tells about the journey and Ezra’s attempts to re-establish the temple and morally purify the Jewish community.

Ezzelin, Sir. In Lord Byron’s Lara (1814), a gentleman who recognizes Lara as the corsair Conrad. A duel ensues, resulting in the death of Ezzelin. See Corsair, The.
Fabian. In Shakespeare's Twelfth Night, a sharp-witted servant of Olivia and a participant in the merry pranks on Malvolio.

Fabian Society. An association of socialists founded in 1884 by a small group of middle-class intellectuals, including George Bernard Shaw and Sidney Webb. The name is derived from Quintus Fabius (275–203 B.C.), a Roman general who won his way against Hannibal by wariness and caution rather than violence and defiance. See Cunctator.

Fable. A short tale, usually epigrammatic, with animals, men, gods, and even inanimate objects as characters. The action of a fable illustrates a moral which is usually (but not always) explicitly stated at the end. This moral often attains the force of a proverb. The fable form appears early in man's cultural development, being a common part of the oral folk literature of primitive tribes. It appeared in ancient Egyptian papyri of c. 1500 B.C., and in Greece a recognizable fable was included in the works of Hesiod in the 8th century B.C.; by far the most famous fables are those attributed to Aesop, a Greek slave who lived about 600 B.C. In India the fable also appeared early, the great Indian collection, the Panchatantra, having been composed in the 3rd century. Modern fables have been in the main dominated by the genius and style of La Fontaine, the great French fabulist of the 17th century, who wrote fables in polished and witty poetry that have been almost universally translated and imitated. Among the best-known modern fabulists are Gay (England, 17th century); Lessing (Germany, 18th century); and James Thürber (U.S., 20th century).

Fable, A (1954). A novel by William Faulkner. Set in France during World War I, A Fable is both an allegory of the passion of Christ and a study of a world that has renounced individualism and chosen submission to authority and the secular values of power and chauvinism. The novel centers on a young corporal, born in a cow-shed, who enlists in the French army, incites a mutiny, and is eventually executed for cowardice. When the gravesite is struck by an enemy shell, his body disappears. The characters of the novel tend to be either personifications of abstractions or modern versions of biblical figures.

Fable for Critics, A (1848). A long verse satire by James Russell Lowell. The fable of Apollo and his dealings with an American critic is of little interest; the poem's value is in the witty profiles in verse of leading writers. Among the writers satirized in pungent and accurate sketches are Emerson, Longfellow, Hawthorne, Poe, Cooper, Whittier, Holmes, and Lowell himself. The poet makes the important assertion that American literature has come of age.

Fables choisies, mises en vers (Selected fables, set in verse, 1668, 1678–1679, 1694). A collection of verse fables by Jean de La Fontaine. Though freely derived from ancient and modern sources, the fables are stamped with La Fontaine's own gently ironic view of life and society. In colorful and ingenious free verse, by means of animal symbols and spirited dialogues, the author propounds a philosophy of sense and moderation, drawing practical lessons from the tribulations of cows, mice, ants, and the like and holding his fellow men up to affectionate ridicule. The fables, however, are not primarily moralistic in intent, but graceful and worldly stories told for the pleasure of telling.

Fables in Slang (1899). A collection of sketches by George Apley that first appeared in the Chicago Record. Humorous tales illustrating the common sense of ordinary people, the Fables won attention for their rendering of contemporary American speech. Ade's "slang," however, is not slang, but a picturesque prose with numerous racy colloquialisms and many luxuriant figures of speech.

Fabliaux (12th–14th centuries). Short humorous tales, often ribald or scurrilous. Highly popular in the Middle Ages, they are situation comedies burlesquing the weaknesses of human nature; women, priests, and gullible fools are often the butts of the buffoonery, which sometimes becomes savagely bitter. The material derives from the oral folk tradition of bawdy anecdotes, practical jokes, and clever tricks of revenge, but the term fabliau was first specifically applied to a medieval French literary form, a narrative of 300–400 lines in octosyllabic couplets. About 150 of these are still extant. Similar prose tales became popular all over Europe, as in Boccaccio's Decameron. Apparently only a few narratives in the style of the fabliau were written in England; the most notable are the ones Chaucer included in his Canterbury Tales, such as the tales told by the Miller, the Reeve, the Friar, the Summoner, and the Shipman.

Fabre, Jean Henri (1823–1915). French naturalist. Fabre is the author of Souvenirs entomologiques (1879–1907), a 10-volume work on insect life. After his death, his laboratory became a national museum.

Fabriano, Gentile da (c. 1370–1429). Italian painter. His is a delicate and richly patterned style, Gothic in its attention to detail and incident, but Renaissance in its assimilation of contemporary themes and techniques. His best-known works include The Flight into Egypt and the Adoration of the Magi.

Fabricius, Gaius (d. c. 270 B.C.). Roman hero, famed for his honesty and incorruptibility. In Rome's struggle with King Pyrrhus of Epirus, he was sent as envoy to the enemy camp for the exchange of prisoners. There he was offered casks of gold and jewels if he would divulge state secrets. When bribery failed, the king ordered a flap of his tent opened, revealing a gigantic elephant only inches from the Roman envoy. Through both trials, Fabricius stood undismayed. When he departed, he left Pyrrhus with a striking example of Roman honor and bravery.

Fâcheux, Les (The Bores, 1661). The first comédie-ballet by Molière. Written in haste for a royal fête, it is based on satires of Horace and Régnier. The play depicts the maddening interruptions of the hero’s courtship by an endless variety of bores, most of them drawn from the author’s own observation. The production was enormously successful and started the fashion for comédie-ballet.

factotum (Lat., facere totum, to do everything). One doing for his employer all sorts of services. Sometimes called a Johannes Factotum. Formerly the term meant a busybody, or much the same as our Jack-of-all-trades, and it is in this sense that Robert Greene used it in his famous reference to Shakespeare:

There is an upstart Crow beautified with our feathers, that with his Tygers hart unapt in a Players hyde, supposes he is as well able to bumble out a blanke verse as the best of you: but being an absolute Johannes fac toton, is in his owne conceit the onely Shake-scene in a countrey. (Groatsworth of Wit, 1592)

Facundo (1845). The popular title of a book by Domingo Faustino Sarmiento. Its full title is Civilización y barbarie, Vida de Juan Facundo Quiroga. One of the classics of Hispanic-American literature, the book is partly an attack on the dictatorship of Juan Manuel de Rosas, partly a somewhat fanciful biography of Facundo, an Argentine political boss, and partly a sociological analysis of Argentine society. Argentina’s troubles, Sarmiento believed, stemmed from the conflict between the civilization of the Europeanized urban classes and the barbarism of the ignorant, untamed gauchos, as exemplified by Rosas and Facundo. Written in a vigorous, spontaneous style, the work is also famous for its description of the Argentine pampas and of gaucho types, such as the outlaw and the tracker. Facundo was first translated into English by Mary Tyler Mann, wife of Horace Mann, who was a good friend of Sarmiento.

Fadeyev, Aleksandr Aleksandrovich (1901–1956). Russian novelist. His early novel The Rout (Razgrom; 1927), also translated as The Nineteen, reintroduced the psychological realism of the 19th-century novel into Soviet literature. Fadeyev’s novel came after a number of so-called proletarian works, which often were little more than tedious documentation of socialist construction without human characters or concerns. His story of a band of Red partisans fighting in the Far East contains both excitement and psychological portraits of the characters that make them vivid to the reader. Fadeyev’s next work, The Last of the Udegs (Poslednyi iz Udege; 1928–1936), also set during the Civil war in the Far East sector of the fighting front, was not as successful. His third work, The Young Guard (Molodaya gvardiya; 1945), depicted underground resistance of young Communists living under the German occupation. The book was criticized for not stressing the leading role of the Communist Party in the resistance; and Fadeyev dutifully revised the work. From 1939 to 1953, he was secretary of the Union of Soviet Writers, a post from which he was moved after Stalin’s death. Fadeyev committed suicide in 1956.

Faerie Queene, The (Books I–III, 1590; IV–VI, 1596). An allegorical epic poem by Edmund Spenser. The Faerie Queene was conceived as a work of 12 books, each of which was to have portrayed, in the person of its leading knight, one of the 12 private moral virtues; the work as a whole was to be unified by the figure of Prince Arthur, the “image of a brave knight,” in whom all these virtues were perfected. In the prefatory letter to Sir Walter Raleigh, Spenser indicated that, if the first 12 books were well received, he would go on to “frame the other part of politic virtues” in Arthur after he became king. However, only 6 books of 12 cantos each and 2 additional cantos on Mutability (publ. 1609) were published, the other books, if they existed, possibly having been burned in the fire that destroyed Spenser’s castle at Kilcoman in 1598.

Gloriana, the Faerie Queene, signifies both the abstract concept of Glory and Queen Elizabeth in particular. Drawing heavily from the chivalric romances, Spenser has Prince Arthur see her in a vision and determine to "seek her out in Faeryland." Gloriana is holding her annual 12-day feast, on each day of which one of the 12 adventures which were to form the 12 proposed books was to begin. Following the traditional epic form, The Faerie Queene begins not with the scene of the feast and the begging of the first knight for a boon, but in medias res, with the knight already setting out on his adventure.

As a religio-political allegory of the times, The Faerie Queene presents aspects of Roman Catholicism in the evil figures of the false Duessa and the wicked enchanter Archimago (Bks. I and II), and attacks the Catholic emperor Philip of Spain, England's greatest enemy, as the tyrant Granorto (Bk. V); Duessa, executed by Queen Mercilla (Elizabeth) in Book V, here figures as the Catholic Mary, Queen of Scots. The moral allegory is explored in the trials and temptations undergone by the knights representing the virtues. The spiritual allegory of man's quest for salvation is carried on throughout by the structure of the chivalric quest-motif. In each book, the leading knight is associated with a particular virtue.

Book I: The Legend of the Red Cross Knight, or of Holiness. The Red Cross Knight (Holiness), having put on the Christian armor mentioned by St. Paul, is sent by Gloriana to rescue the parents of the virgin Una (Truth), who have been imprisoned and their kingdom laid waste by a Dragon. With Una the Knight comes to the den of Error, a monster half woman and half serpent; after a dreadful battle Error is vanquished. They then meet with Archimago (Hypocrisy), a seemingly pious, aged man, and spend the night in his hut. There the Red Cross Knight is subjected to dreams that make him believe Una false, and he abandons her. He comes upon the Saracen knight Sansjoy, accompanied by his lady Fidessa (Duessa, Falseness). The Red Cross Knight slays the Saracen and is beguiled by the lies of Fidessa. Thinking to make a garland for her head he plunges a branch from a tree, which bleeds, and which reveals itself to be Fradubo (the Doubter), who had been transformed into a tree by Duessa. Meanwhile Una, following her Knight, meets a Lion, who afterward attends her. She spends the night in the hut of Abessa (Superstition), daughter of Corecia (Blind devotion). Kirkrapine (Chirchrobbber) comes to bring his plunder to his mistress Abessa, but is slain by the Lion. Una travels on, followed by Archimago in disguise as the Red Cross Knight. He overtakes her and they meet Sansjoy, who attacks the disguised Archimago and exposes him, and takes Una off to a wild forest. The real Red Cross Knight, by this time, has come with Duessa to the House of Pride, magnificent in appearance but built on a foundation of sand, and ruled by Queen Lucifera (Pride, and chief of the Seven Deadly Sins). Sansjoy arrives and does battle with the Red Cross Knight, who would have killed him but for the magic intervention of Duessa, who causes Sansjoy to disappear and carries him in the car of Night to the Infernal regions, where he is healed of his wounds by Aesculapius. Meanwhile Una, being attacked by Sansjoy, is rescued by a troop of fauns and satyrs. Sir Satyrm (Natural Chivalry) finds her and accompanies her on her journey. They meet Archimago disguised as a pilgrim, who tells them that the Red Cross Knight is dead.

Duessa, having returned from her journey to the Underworld, persuades the Red Cross Knight to drink from an enchanted pool, which robs him of his strength. He is taken captive by the giant Orgoglio (Arrogant pride), who also makes Duessa his mistress. Una learns of her hero's plight, and meeting by chance Prince Arthur, persuades him to go to the Knight's rescue. Arthur slays the giant, strips Duessa of her rich robes and reveals her as a loathsome hag. The Red Cross Knight and Una travel on and soon meet Despair, who tempts the Knight to end his life. He is rescued by Una, who brings him to the house of Holines to be healed. After this he and Una journey to Eden, the land of her captive parents, and after a three-day battle the Knight slays the Dragon. He and Una are betrothed, but before the marriage can take place Archimago, disguised as a messenger, brings a letter from Duessa, who claims that the Knight is betrothed to her. Their falseness is revealed, Archimago is captured and bound in prison, and Una and her Knight are married.

Book II: The Legend of Sir Guyon, or of Temperance. Archimago, having escaped from his confinement, meets Sir Guyon (Temperance) and a Palmer (Sobriety or Prudence), and tells them that the Red Cross Knight has shamefully attacked a virgin; to insure the desired effect, he has disguised Duessa as a weeping virgin and placed her beside the road, and she complains of her dreadful treatment at the hands of the Knight. They travel on and soon they meet the Red Cross Knight, with whom Sir Guyon almost comes to blows before each recognizes the Christian emblem on the other's shield. A mentor's lessons are taught.

Sir Guyon and the Palmer discover the dying Amavia, who tells them how her dead husband, Sir Mordant, had succumbed to the wiles of the enchantress Acrasia (Intemperance), who lives in the Bower of Bliss on the Wandering Island. Amavia dies, and Guyon swears vengeance. They come to a castle in which live three half-sisters, Medina (Golden Mean), Perissa (Excess), and Elissa (Deficiency). Sir Guyon entrusts to Medina Amavia's infant, which he has named Ruddymane because its hands are stained with its mother's blood. He then meets raging Furor and his mother, the hag Occasion; he silences Occasion, whose constant ranting spurs Furor to anger, by putting a lock on her tongue, and binds Furor with a hundred iron chains. Phaon (or Phedon), the young squire whom Furor had been tormenting, tells how through jealousy and rage he had slain his innocent sweetheart, Claribell, and poisoned Philemon, the friend who deceived him. Pyrocles (Fiery anger) arrives, and he and Sir Guyon fight. Brought to his knees, Pyrocles begs for mercy, and is spared. He unbinds Occasion and Furor, but soon falls a victim to himself.

Cymocles (Loose living), hearing that his brother Pyrocles is dead, leaves the Bower of Bliss and his mistress Acrasia and travels to find Sir Guyon. He is ferried into the Idle Lake by Phaedria (Wantonness), whose dalliance with him soon makes him forget about revenge. Taking him to the Floating Island, she lulls him to sleep, and returns to the strand where she encounters Sir Guyon seeking a ferry. They meet the awakened and enraged Cymocles, who attacks Guyon, but Phaedria stops their battle. Meanwhile Pyrocles, inflamed by Furor, tries to end his torments by drowning himself in the Idle Lake, but is saved and healed of his fiery wounds by Archimago.

Sir Guyon comes to the den of Mammon, who takes him to the House of Riches, which adjoins Hell. He tries to tempt Guyon to covet his treasure, but the knight refuses all temptations, and asks to be taken back to earth. He is found in a trance by the Palmer just before Pyrocles and Cymocles arrive, bent on vengeance. Thinking him dead, they are about to strip him of his armor when Prince Arthur appears. After a dreadful battle in which both Pyrocles and Cymocles are killed, Guyon revives from his trance and he and Arthur travel to the castle of Alma (the Soul), besieged by the enemies of Temperance. The leader of this rabble is Maleger, the incarnation of evil passions; his twelve troops typify the seven deadly sins and the lusts of the five senses. Arthur gives him terrible battle, but each time Maleger is cast to the ground he rises up even more powerful. Finally Arthur remembers that Earth is Maleger’s mother, and restores him each time he falls; so Arthur squeezes the life out of him and throws him in a lake.

After a perilsous sea journey Sir Guyon and the Palmer arrive at the Bower of Bliss, where they capture Acrasia in a net, destroy the Bower, and restore to their normal shape the lovers whom Acrasia had transformed into beasts.

Book III: The Legend of Britomart, or of Chastity. Sir Guyon sends the captive Acrasia to the Faery Court, and he and Arthur travel on in search of adventure. Meeting an unknown knight, Guyon charges, but is unhorsed, for the strange knight is the lady Britomart (Chastity), who wields an enchanted lance. When Arthur and Guyon go off to rescue the fair Florimell, pursued by a lustful forester, Britomart remains behind, and soon comes to the Castle Joyous, where she finds six knights attacking one. She learns that the lady of the castle demands the love of every knight who comes that way, and if he loves another he is forced to do battle with the six knights. She subdues them and enters the castle, where Queen Malecasta (Lust), thinking her a man, tries to seduce her.

Meanwhile Arthur’s squire, Timias, separated from his master, is ambushed by the lustful forester and his brothers, whom he kills in a bloody battle. Badly injured himself, he is discovered by the virgin huntress Belphoebe. She eures his wounds with herbs, but he pines away from love of her. Florimell, seeing the forester, comes to the cottage of a wicked witch, whose churlish son lusts after the fair virgin. Again she flees, pursued by a monster sent by the witch, and reaching the sea escapes in a boat in which a fisherman is sleeping. The witch, however, then creates a counterfeit Florimell, who is borne away one day by Braggadocchio, only to have her taken from him by another knight. The true Florimell, out on the sea, receives the advances of the lustful fisherman; her cries bring the help of Proteus, who takes her to his bower at the bottom of the sea.

Meanwhile Sir Satyrane meets the libertine Sir Paridell, and they come to the castle of Malbecco (Jealousy), an aged miser, and his beautiful young wife Hellenore. A cunning seducer, Paridell soon persuades Hellenore to run away with him, but before leaving her husband she steals part of his money and sets fire to the rest. Malbecco, torn between pursuing his wife and rescuing his burning money, knows not what to do. Finally he sets off in search of Hellenore, whom Paridell has by now abandoned and who has gone to live with the satyrs. After watching the satyrs with Hellenore Malbecco is consumed with jealousy, and tries to persuade her to return to him, but she refuses. He returns to his buried treasure, only to find that it has been stolen by the servant of Braggadocchio. Mad with jealousy and fury, he casts himself from a cliff—but he is so consumed by wrath that there is nothing left of him but an airy sprite. He crawls into a cave, where he dwells forever in misery.

Britomart comes upon Scudamore (Shield of Love), who is prostrated with grief that his beloved Amoret is a captive of the enchanter Busirane, who torments her because she will not renounce her love for Scudamore. Britomart promises to rescue Amoret, and she and Scudamore ride to Busirane’s enchanted castle, which is guarded by a fire through which only Britomart is able to pass. Having found in the empty but lavishly decorated castle an iron door that will not open, she waits; and at midnight the door flies open and a strange Masque of Cupid passes through it. When the door opens at midnight the next night, she rushes in, finding the room empty save for Amoret, bound to a pillar, and Busirane. The enchanter and Britomart fight, and Busirane is subdued. He is forced to undo his enchantments and restore Amoret to health, and is himself bound in chains.

Book IV: The Legend of Cambel and Triamond, or of Friendship. Amoret and Britomart, in search of Scudamore, meet the knights Blandamour and Paridell, accompanied by Duesa and Ate (Dissension), a foul old hag. Later, Blandamour and Paridell come upon Scudamore, and Paridell attacks him but is badly beaten. Ate lyingly tells Scudamore that she has seen Amoret false to him with Britomart. At this point arrives Sir Ferraughe with the false Florimell he had taken from Braggadocchio. Blandamour, desiring the lovely false Florimell, rides against her knight and captures her. Paridell, egged on by envy and the querulous counsel of Ate, demands that Blandamour share Florimell with him, and the two erstwhile friends come to blows. Later, they come upon the knights Cambel and Triamond and their ladies Cambina and Canace. Canace, a fair and modest lady loved by many, had refused to love any of her suitors; in order to end the strife among her would-be lovers, her brother Cambel agreed to do battle with the stoutest three, the victor to have his sister. The three bravest and boldest were the triplets Priamond, Diamond, and Triamond, sons of Agape. Cambel, protected by a magic ring, was able to slay both Priamond and Diamond; however, their fairy mother had been granted by the Fates that the spirit of the first of her two sons to die would enter the body of the third, so that when Cambel gave the death-stroke to Triamond it failed to kill him. Neither knight could kill the other, and finally their battle was ended by the appearance of the triplets’ sister Cambina, who brought peace. Canace was married to Triamond, and Cambina to Cambel.
Together, all agree to go on to the Tournament held by Sir Satyrane in honor of the lost Florimell, whose golden girdle he had found and now offers as a prize to the lady judged the loveliest. The false Florimell is acclaimed the fairest, but the magic cestus, which will girdle only the waists of the virtuous, will not stay fastened.

Meanwhile Scudamore meets Artegal disguised, and both swear vengeance on Britomart, whom they believe has wronged them. They meet her but are both quickly unmasked. Artegal, fighting her on foot strips off her helmet, and seeing her face falls into a rapture of love. Britomart recognizes Artegal’s face as the image of her true love she had seen in her magic mirror, and they become betrothed.

The true Florimell, imprisoned in a dungeon by Proteus, still rejects his advances and is true to her beloved Marinell—who has no use for women, and is still suffering from a wound given him by Britomart. Finally his wound is cured by Tryphon, and he and his mother Cymodocce go to the house of Proteus for a great banquet. Marinell chances to overhear Florimell’s complaint of her love of him from her dungeon, suddenly falls in love with her, and ultimately has her released.

Book V: The Legend of Artegal, or of Justice. Irena (Ireland) goes to the court of the Faerie Queene to complain of the tyrant Granorto (Great wrong), who withholds her inheritance. Gloriana sends Artegal (Justice) and with him her own groom Talus (Iron Man). On their journey Artegal kills Pollente, a Saracen who stations himself on the Bridge Perilous and kills and robs travelers, bestowing the spoils on his daughter Munera. Talus then forces his way into the castle stronghold, casts Munera over the wall and into the river, burns the spoils, and destroys the castle utterly. On their way to the wedding of Florimell and Marinell, Artegal and his groom meet Braggadocchio and the false Florimell. Artegal changes armor with Braggadocchio and wins the tournament thus clad. Later, wearing his own armor as victor of the tournament, Braggadocchio presents the false Florimell; Artegal then proclaims Braggadocchio a fraud and confronts the false Florimell with her true image. The false Florimell promptly melts away and vanishes.

Artegal and Talus rescue Terpine from a band of Amazons about to hang him, and besiege the Amazon city. Radigund, the Queen, offers to meet Artegal in single combat, the winner to become the servant of the loser. Artegal, struck with pity at the sight of Radigund’s beautiful face, surrenders to her, and is made her thrall. Talus, however, escapes and brings news of Artegal’s plight to Britomart, who kills Radigund and frees Artegal. Traveling on, Artegal meets Prince Arthur rescuing Samient, handmaiden to Queen Mercilla (Mercy). On their way to the Queen they encounter the robber Malengin (Guile), who tries to escape by turning himself into various animals, but is captured and killed by Talus. Arriving at the palace, the knights find Queen Mercilla about to dispense justice; Dussia is brought to the bar and charged with having tried to usurp Mercilla’s crown, judged guilty, and executed. At this time appear at the palace two sons of Belge, whose land is held by the tyrant Geryoneo, asking Mercilla for aid. Prince Arthur goes off to rescue Belge, slays the monster, and restores her to her rightful kingdom. Artegal completes his original quest, and frees Irena and conquers Granorto.

Book VI: The Legend of Calidore, or of Courtesy. Sir Calidore (Courtey) in pursuit of the Blatant Beast (Slander), finds the fair Pastorella, the foster-daughter of a shepherd, and falls in love with her. Finally he rescues her from brigands and takes her to castle Belgard, ruled by Sir Bellamoure and his wife the fair Claribell. Calidore leaves Pastorella there and continues on his quest for the Beast. Through a distinctive birthmark Pastorella is revealed to be the long-lost daughter of Bellamoure and Claribell. Calidore conquers the Blatant Beast and binds it in chains.

Fafnir. In Wagner’s Der Ring des Nibelungen, one of the giants who built Valhalla for Wotan. He and his brother Fasolt accept Alberich’s golden ring in place of Freya, the price originally agreed on. Fafnir kills Fasolt and changes himself into a dragon to guard the board which is now his. He is killed by Siegfried. In the Norse sources, Fafnir (not Fafnir) has no brother and is guarding Andvari’s gold as a venom-breathing dragon from the start.

Fagin. In Charles Dickens’ Oliver Twist, a villainous old Jew who leads a gang of thieves, mostly boys. These he trains to pick pockets and pifler. Fagin assumes a suave and fawning manner but is grasping and full of cruelty. He is ultimately arrested, tried, and condemned to death. Fagin is one of Dickens’ most famous characters.

Faguet, Emile (1847–1916). French literary critic and professor of literature at the Sorbonne. Faguet published several volumes of French literary history and such critical studies as Les Grands Maîtres du XVIIe siècle (1885).

Fahrenheit, Gabriel Daniel (1668–1736). German physicist who devised the thermometer scale that bears his name. On the Fahrenheit thermometer, the freezing and boiling points of water are designated as 32° and 212° above the zero of its scale.

Fairfax, Edward (d. 1635). English poet and translator. Fairfax is remembered as the author of the first complete translation of Tasso’s Jerusalem Delivered. Published in 1600, it was called Godfrey of Bulloigne, or the Recoverie of Jerusalem, and was written in heroic couplets and characterized by rich and imagistic language. Fairfax also wrote eclogues, most of which have never been published.

Fairfax, Thomas. 3rd Baron Fairfax of Cameron (1612–1671). English military leader and statesman. As commander-in-chief of the Parliamentary forces, he organized the New Model Army and defeated Charles I at Naseby. Less able in civilian affairs, he became an instrument in the hands of stronger men and reluctantly acquiesced to the execution of the king. He later participated in negotiations for the Restoration and headed the commission dispatched to Charles II at The Hague.

Fair God, The (1873). A historical novel by Lew Wallace. The book is set in Mexico during the conquest by Cortez, when Montezuma futilely tried to resist the Spaniards. The fair god is Quetzalcoatl, Aztec god of the air. The result of 30 years of research and writing, the book went through 20 editions in 10 years.
Fair Maid of Perth, The (1828). A novel by Sir Walter Scott set in the 14th century. The Fair Maid is Catherine Glover, daughter of a glovemaker of Perth, who kisses Henry Smith, the armourer, in his sleep on St. Valentine's Day. Smith proposes marriage, and although Catherine refuses at first, she becomes his wife at the end of the novel. The concurrent plot is the romance of Prince James, son of Robert III of Scotland, and Louise, the Gleenmaiden.

Fair Maid of the West, The: Parts I and II (c. 1631). A romantic drama by Thomas Heywood. It deals with the love of Bess Bridges, a gallant and virtuous barkeep, for Spencer, an adventurer about to embark for the Azores. Hearing that he is dead, she outfits a ship and sails off to bring his body home. She captures a Spanish vessel on which Spencer is being held prisoner, and the two sail for Morocco where the dark King Mulehseg is much taken with the white girl. However, Bess manages to gain the king's consent to her marriage with Spencer.

In Part II, the king tries to seduce Bess but she and Spencer escape, are recaptured, are released, then shipwrecked and separated. Penniless, Bess is rescued by the duke of Florence who tries to make love to her. Eventually though, Spencer turns up and the lovers are reunited.

Faithful Shepherdess, The (1609). A pastoral play by John Fletcher. (See Beaumont and Fletcher.) Clorin, the faithful shepherdess, tends the grave of her dead lover and gathers medicinal herbs to benefit mankind. To her is drawn Thenot, who adores her for her loyalty and pines for her so long as she remains indifferent to his pleas. At the opposite pole of behavior are the lusty Amarillus and Clooe, for whom no lover is too forward, and the conniving lechery of the Sullen Shepherd. After many complications in which all the shepherds' and shepherdesses' reactions are tested in various situations, virtue and chastity triumph; lust and lechery are repudiated.

Fakir. In Arabic-speaking Muslim lands, a religious beggar or mendicant. Many are wanderers who attract attention and alms by performing such acts of austerity as lying on beds of nails; others perform menial offices connected, for example, with burials and the cleaning of mosques.

Falerina. In the Orlando Innamorato of Boiardo, a witch who presides over the enchanted garden of Orgagna. Here Orlando finds a book that teaches him how to break Falerina's enchantments, and as a result she is forced to do his bidding for a time.

Falerno. An Italian sweet wine. It was grown in what the ancients called Falernus Ager, a fertile district some 20 miles north of Naples. It was celebrated by Horace.

Faliero, Marino. See Marino Faliero.

Falkeberger, Johann Peter (1859– ). Norwegian novelist. The novel cycle Christianus Sextus (6 vols., 1927–1935), his most important work, is set in the mining town of Røros. Although his own early experiences in the mines gave Falkberget an understanding of hardship and suffering, his work is marked by Christian faith and a firm optimism.

Falkenhayn, Erich von (1861–1922). Chief of the German General Staff (1914–1916). The successor to Helmuth von Moltke, he was dismissed after the unsuccessful attack at Verdun and replaced by Paul von Hindenburg.

Falkner, John Meade (1859–1932). English novelist and antiquarian. The Lost Stradivarius (1895) is a story of demoniacal possession in a musical setting. Moonfleet (1898) is a boys' adventure tale about smugglers. The Nebuly Coat (1903) is a romance in which all Falkner's interests—music, architecture, church history and heraldry—are skillfully combined.

Fall, The (La Chute; 1956). A short novel by Albert Camus. A former Parisian lawyer explains to a stranger in an Amsterdam bar his current profession of judge-penitent. His bitter honesty prevented him first from winning his own self-esteem through good deeds, then from exhausting his own self-condemnation through debauchery. Knowing that no man is ever innocent, he is still trying to forestall personal judgement by confession, by judging others, and by avoiding any situation demanding action.

Falla [y Mathieu], Manuel [Maria] de (1876–1946). Spanish composer. Spain's first major composer of instrumental music since the 17th century, Falla studied in Paris, was influenced by the impressionist technique of Debussy, and developed a brilliant and individual style of orchestration. Aside from Noches en los jardines de España (Nights in the Gardens of Spain, 1915) and the Concerto for Harpsichord (1926), his best known music, all of it Andalusian in coloring, was written for the stage. His operas include La Vida Breve (Life is Short, 1905) and El Retablo de Maese Pedro (Master Peter's Puppet Show, 1923); his ballets include El Amor Brujo (Love, the Magician, 1915) and El Sombrero de Tres Picos (The Three-Cornered Hat), the latter based on a comedy of Alarcón. Falla’s dramatic cantata Atlantida was posthumously completed and performed in 1963.

Falla, Hans. Pen name of Rudolf Ditzen (1893–1947). German novelist. Inclined toward expressionism in his youth, he later became known as a sympathetic depicter of the lower classes. He wrote the best-selling Kleiner Mann—was nun? (Little Man, What Now?, 1932), a novel about Germany during the depression of the 1920’s and 1930’s.

Fallersleben, Hoffmann von. See August Heinrich Hoffmann.

Fall of the House of Usher, The (1839). A tale by Edgar Allan Poe. A friend visits Roderick Usher in his old family mansion. The two read together, the friend attempting to dispel Roderick's gloom. Usher plays strange music of his own composition and shows his friend one of his paintings. Although his twin sister, Madeline, has been placed in the family vault dead, Usher is convinced she lives. When she suddenly appears in her blood-stained shroud, brother and sister fall dead together. The visitor, hurriedly departing, turns to see the house split asunder and sink into the tarn.

Falls of Princes. A very long poem by John Lydgate, written in rhyme royal between 1430 and 1438, and first printed in 1494. Based on Boccaccio's De Casibus Virorum Illustrium, the poem deals with great men from the time of Richard II (1377–1399) and their rise to and decline from fame and power, subject to the fluctuations of fortune. The ghost of each appears before the poet and relates his sufferings.

Far from the Madding Crowd

Falstaff, Sir John. The most famous comic character created by Shakespeare. He appears in Henry IV, Part I and II, and The Merry Wives of Windsor, and his death is given some attention in Henry V. Falstaff is a monumentally self-indulgent braggart, the culmination of a line that can be traced back to Plautus' Miles Gloriosus and the capitanio of the commedia dell'arte. Falstaff is totally unapologetic: he revels in his lechery and chicanery, lies without scruple and, when caught in a lie, unabashedly seeks to turn everything to his own advantage. But his knavery is so engaging and his lust for life so keen that he has become one of the favorite characters of dramatic literature. He holds forth at the Boar's Head Tavern with a rascally crew that includes Bardolph, Nym, Petro, Pistol, and Prince Hal's companion Poino. Later, commissioned by the king to recruit for the army, he assembles the following company: Ralph Mouldy, Simon Shadow, Thomas Wart, Francis Feeble, and Peter Bull-calfe.

familiar. A spirit bound to its master's service by a supernatural tie. It is usually represented in the form of a small animal such as a cat, mouse, or poodle.

Family Reunion, The (1939). A drama in verse by T. S. Eliot. Combining elements of social comedy and Greek tragedy, it deals with the return of Harry, Lord Monchensery, to his English family home for the birthday of his old mother, Amy. The family think Harry is behaving oddly. Only his wise aunt, Agatha, understands that he has murdered his wife and is seeing the Eumenides, or avenging furies. She tells him that when he was born his father wanted to kill his mother, and would have done so if Agatha had not dissuaded him. Harry is bound to suffer from the family curse, especially in the decaying old family house. Agatha preserves over Harry's flight and the disintegration of the rest of the family; and over Amy's death. Like Sir Henry Harcourt-Reilly and Julia in The Cocktail Party, she serves as Eliot's mouthpiece.

fancy. In English romantic aesthetic theory, the clever, playful faculty of mind that combines sensations, observations, impressions—the various materials of art—and brings them to bear in a work of art. It is distinguished from imagination, notably by S. T. Coleridge in his Biographia Literaria, in that fancy does not transcend its material to produce truly inspired literature.

Faneuil Hall. A market house containing an assembly hall in Boston, Mass., given in 1742 to his fellow citizens by the merchant and slave trader Peter Faneuil (1700–1743). After the fire of 1761, it was rebuilt by the city and became the meeting place of American patriots during the Revolution. It is now remembered as "the cradle of liberty."

Fangen, Ronald August (1895–1946). Norwegian novelist, playwright, and critic. In all his work Fangen speaks eloquently and soberly of a Christian solution to the world's problems; he rejects belief in the communist and materialist doctrines popular between the wars. Among his plays are Synde fald (1920), Den forjoettec dag (1926), and Som des kunde ha gått (1925). His novels include Nogen unge mennesker (1929), Duel (1932), PÅ bar bunn (1936), and En lyiets engel (Both are My Cousins, 1945).

Fanshawe (1828). A novel by Nathaniel Hawthorne, published anonymously. Fanshawe, a pale, serious student, falls in love with Ellen Langdon, the ward of Dr. Melmoth, president of Harley College. Rescuing her from an attempted seduction, Fanshawe gives Ellen up to the man he knows she loves, and soon dies. The college and its environs are modeled on Hawthorne's alma mater, Bowdoin College, in Maine. Influenced by Scott and the Gothic novel, Fanshawe illustrates Hawthorne's developing technique.

Fantine. One of the principal characters in Victor Hugo's novel Les Misérables. She is the mother of Cosette.
